EDITOR'S PREFACE TO THE SEVENTH VOLUME.

This volume of the American edition of Lange's Biblework, being the seventh of the New Testament Division, embraces the following Epistles of St. Paul:

GALATIANS. By OTTO SCHMOLLER, Ph. D., of Urach, Württemberg. Translated by C. C. STARBUCK, A. M., with additions by M. B. RIDDLE, D. D.

EPHESIANS AND COLOSSIANS. By KARL BRAUNE, D. D., General Superintendent of Altenburg, Saxony. Translated, enlarged and edited by M. B. RIDDLE, D. D.

PHILIPPIANS. By Dr. BRAUNE. Edited, with additions, by Prof. HACKETT, D. D., formerly of Newton Centre, now of the Theological Seminary at Rochester, N. Y.

The Epistle to the Ephesians had been originally assigned to Prof. Dr. HITCHCOCK, of Union Theological Seminary, New York, but, much to the regret of the general editor, Dr. H. was obliged to abandon the task on account of illness. This interruption and the absence of Dr. Riddle in Germany have caused some delay in the publication of the volume.

The translation was prepared from the last editions of the original. The additions were made with constant reference to the best German as well as English and American commentators, especially to ALFORD, ELLICOTT, LIGHTFOOT, EADIE and HODGE. Dr. EADIE's work on the Galatians appeared after this part of the volume was in type. Dr. SCHENKEL's commentaries on the Ephesians, Philippians and Colossians (1862, 2d ed., 1867),—originally a part of the Biblework, but replaced since, for reasons connected with the theological change of the author, by those of Dr. BRAUNE—were also consulted throughout. BRAUNE is an able, careful, concise, sound and judicious exegete. Special attention was paid to the enlargement of the Textual and Exegetical departments. Where the translators differ from the German authors, the reasons are generally given.

Upon the whole, the additions amount to about one third of the volume, and will commend themselves to the judgment of competent readers as a valuable improvement.

The New Testament part of this laborious work is now drawing to a close. The Commentaries on the Gospel of John, and on Revelation will complete it. The former is far advanced and, if the Lord spare the health and strength of the general editor, will be finished during the coming winter.* The commentary on Revelation has not yet appeared in German, but may be expected in a few months, and will be immediately taken in hand. The last part will also contain a complete and careful Index of all the volumes on the New Testament. The Old Testament is progressing more slowly, yet as fast as the nature of the work will admit.

New York, 10 Bible House, Aug. 24th, 1870.

PHILIP SCHAFF.

* In reply to the many inquiries concerning the issue of the volume on John, I beg leave to say that the delay has been occasioned in great part by the death of my dear friend, Dr. Yeomans, to whom it had been originally assigned, and who left his unfinished translation to me as a sacred legacy. I am progressing with the revision and the numerous additions as fast as the multiplicity of my engagements and constant interruptions will at all permit, and I am desirous to make the commentary as full and satisfactory to English readers as I can.

all events adduce in favor of their German origin the names of the leaders, Leonorius (comp. Leonhardt, Leonore) and Lutharius, that is, Lothar, and also their polity as described by Strabo, according to which their princes, and not their priests, dispensed justice, this being, according to CÆSAR (Bell. Gall. VI. 13), a chief distinction between the Gauls and Germans (WIESELER). Tradition relates also, that an army of crusaders was struck with astonishment at hearing all at once, in this region, the Bavarian dialect.

[WIESELER and OLSHAUSEN advocate the Teutonic origin, at which Luther hints in his warning to the Germans against like inconstancy (Com. Gal. i. 6). MEYER suggests the mixed origin mentioned above, while Thierry, and other French writers (including the Emperor Napoleon III. Cesar. II. p. 2), claim this settlement of Celts as an evidence of Gallic enterprise. English writers generally advocate the Celtic origin. The matter is ably discussed by LIGHTFOOT, Galatians, Dissert. I. p. 235 sq.: "Were the Galatians Celts or Teutons?" He maintains that they were Celts, arguing both from the authority of classical writers, and from the philological data furnished by the proper names which remain. But the most convincing argument is drawn from the character of the people. "They are described by the ancient writers as a frank, warlike, impetuous, intelligent and impressive, but unsteady, ostentatious and vain people, strongly resembling the cognate French" (SCHAFÉ). That their peculiarities were more akin to those of the ancient Gauls and modern Celtic races, than to those of the Teutonic race, ancient or modern, is very evident. Luther might have spared his rebuke about "inconstancy," could he have foretold modern history. LIGHTFOOT (Introd. pp. 1-17) speaks of the tough vitality of national character, so strongly marked in the Celts, which is shown also by the Galatians in Asia Minor; the similar fickle temperament (i. 6; iii. 1), and even hints that the vices rebuked in this epistle are not foreign to the distinctive character of the Celts, e. g.: v. 21, "drunkenness and revellings;" vi. 6, 7, niggardliness in alms giving; v. 26, "vain glory;" v. 15, "bite and devour one another." Certainly the tendency of the Galatians in religion was toward superstitious ritualism (iii. 3), not to mysticism as among their neighbors, the Phrygians, and to-day the Celtic people have the same tendency. It is worthy of note, if the Celtic extraction be admitted, that those Epistles (Galatians and Romans) which assail most plainly the errors of legalism and ritualism, should have been addressed to Celtic and Latin readers. The progress of ethnographic science seems to favor the view that the Galatians were Celts. Comp. CONYBEARE and HOWSON: Life and Epistle of St. Paul, I. p. 243 sq.—R.]

The opinion, that we are to regard, not the Galatians proper, but inhabitants of the district added under King Amyntas, Lycaonians (especially the christians of Derbe and Lystra), and Pisidians, as the recipients of our Epistle, is altogether untenable, owing its rise to hypotheses about the time of its composition.

The recipients of the Epistle are more particularly, the Christian congregations, αἱ ἐκκλησίαι of Galatia. There were therefore several Christian churches in this district—perhaps in the chief places, Ancyra, Tavium and Pessinus, according to a missionary principle observed by the Apostle (WIESELER). In the book of Acts also no places are mentioned. In one other passage these churches are spoken of in the same way (1 Cor. xvi. 1). The passages, 2 Tim. iv. 10; 1 Pet. i. 1, also presuppose Christians in Galatia. These churches were founded by Paul himself. This appears indisputably from our Epistle, i. 6-8; iv. 13 sq., and is confirmed by the narrative in the Acts. According to this he came hither for the first time soon after the apostolic council, Acts xvi. 6. He must then have preached the gospel there, and founded churches; for although this is not expressly stated, it is to be assumed, since, at the visit mentioned in Acts xviii. 23, he was already employed in "strengthening" the churches there. A second visit of the Apostle to Galatia is also indicated in our Epistle, especially iv. 13 (comp. ad. loc.). The first one is more particularly described as having been occasioned by bodily weakness, which had constrained him to delay in Galatia, and given him opportunity to preach the gospel there. This visit, therefore, cannot well coincide with that mentioned in Acts xviii. 23.

These churches were undoubtedly chiefly composed of Gentile Christians, as is clear from our Epistle, partly from the passages of general reference, i. 16; ii. 9, in which Paul takes pains to prove to the Galatians his vocation as Apostle to the Gentiles, partly and especially from iv. 8, where the readers, as a whole, are designated as having been idolaters, and from v. 2, 3; vi. 12, 13, according to which they were as yet uncircumcised. Unquestionably there was also in Galatia a Jewish population, perhaps a numerous one (comp. Josephus, Ant. 12, 3, 4; 16, 6, 2), and so there may have been Jewish Christians also in the churches. But we cannot draw a certain conclusion from the ἡμεῖς in passages which refer especially to Jewish Christians, as iii. 23-25; iv. 3; for we cannot decidedly affirm that here Paul includes the readers also in the first person. The abrupt transition from the first to the second person in iii. 25, 26; iv. 5, 6, might rather favor the opposite conclusion, namely, that he has reference to the readers only in the second part of these passages where he treats of the Christian state, and not in what precedes, respecting the condition of a Jew. [It is by no means certain that the use of the first person in the passages cited involves an exclusive reference to "the condition of a Jew." See EXEG. NOTES, iv. 3.—R.] Nor is the fact that acquaintance with the Old Testament presupposed in the arguments of the epistle, a convincing proof. For all evangelical preaching rested on the Old Testament Scripture. Besides this, thorough discussion of the Old Testament was here demanded by the subject of the epistle. For the churches were wrought upon by Judaizing false teachers, who endeavored to lead them back to an Old Testament position; as they had doubtless been already sufficiently instructed by these teachers in the Old Testament, on this account alone Paul was obliged to enter on the discussion of the Old Testament, and out of it to refute them; to open up to them a still deeper and juster understanding of the Old Testament economy. Only so could they be delivered from an authority pretending a support from the Old Testament. The supposition that the Galatian Christians had formerly been in great part proselytes, is therefore unnecessary. [SCHAFF: The congregations of Galatia were, like all the churches founded by Paul, of a mixed, yet predominantly Gentile Christian character.—R.]

§ 2. OCCASION OF THE EPISTLE.

The spiritual state of these Galatian churches, at first a matter of joy, had been sadly disturbed by certain unnamed persons, who, to be sure, were Christians, but of Judaizing or pharisaistic tendencies. These, it is plain, had come from abroad, and perhaps were emissaries from Palestine. They were hardly proselytes. Such a conclusion does not follow from v. 12; vi. 13. They set themselves in direct opposition to the Christian view, which had, till then, prevailed in the church; and, moreover, directed their polemics expressly against Paul, as the first promulgator of this view. To the persuasion which had taken root through him, that justification and salvation are to be attained alone through faith in Christ, by grace, they opposed the assertion that certain works of the law, especially the observance of the Jewish festivals, and the receiving of circumcision, were necessary to salvation. From prudential motives, they did not require the observance of the whole law. In order to gain entrance for this view, diametrically opposed as it was to the doctrine of Paul, they sought to undermine the consideration in which the Galatians held him, by denying to him the apostolic dignity, and by appealing, in opposition, to the authority of the senior Apostles, especially James, Peter and John, as the true pillars of the church, to whom Paul, as they represented, stood in opposition, while they proceeded in concurrence with them. Nay, they appear to have even imputed to Paul the inconsistency of sometimes himself preaching circumcision among the Jews, v. 11; and would have it, therefore, that his doctrine of the freedom of believers from the law proceeded only from unworthy complaisance towards the Gentiles. (Comp. i. 10.)

How long these false teachers had been working in the church cannot be precisely determined; yet we see from i. 9; v. 3; iv. 16, that Paul, on his second visit, had already spoken against this Judaizing error; chiefly, we may suppose, by way of warning and precautionary instruction, as the danger was yet only imminent, although the inclination to yield was already present. Matters came to an actual leading astray only after the departure of the Apostle. For from the impression which the Epistle makes, we must conclude that he has now, for the first time, to deal with the church after its actual fall into error. This falling away, however, must have made surprisingly rapid progress, as unmistakably appears from the tone of the Epistle; comp. also i. 6: οὕτω ταχέως.

As just remarked, the false teachers actually succeeded in finding entrance and seducing the churches. How far can only be partially determined. At all events, we must not underrate their success. From the whole tenor of the Epistle from the earnestness with which Paul speaks (e. g. i. 6; iii. i. 3; iv. 12, 19, 20; v. 1 sq. 7), from his thorough handling of the question of his own doctrinal position, and of the question respecting his apostolic authority, as also from the allusion to the division that had arisen in the church (chaps. v. and vi.), it is sufficiently clear that the Judaizing view, at least, had already completely got the upper hand, and especially that the consideration enjoyed by the Apostle was already a good deal shaken. (Comp. the peculiarly full exposition of this question in the Epistle.) On the other hand, the apostasy from the principle of justifying faith was as yet by no means complete, but only incipient. (Comp. e. g. i. 6; iv. 9, 17, 21.) Especially the practical observance of Judaism was only in its beginnings. The observance of the Jewish days and times had commenced, but "to the chief requirement of the false teachers, obedience to which would first render the apostasy from evangelical Christianity complete, namely the receiving of circumcision, they had as yet yielded no compliance, in any numbers worth speaking of, since the circumcision of the readers is mentioned as something still impending." On the other hand, we cannot, from the "little leaven," (v. 2), draw the inference of a falling away as yet insignificant, since this expression rather refers to the small number of their corrupters, or rather to the fact that a deviation from evangelical truth in one point or a few points may easily work great mischief.

This condition of the Galatian churches has evidently been speedily reported to the Apostle; for, as yet, all is in the bud; he has still good hope of the Galatians, that all will come right again; he deals with them throughout as having but just set foot on the downward path, and feels himself to be still standing in close connection with them, notwithstanding that, on their side, some estrangement may have already taken place, inasmuch as the personal consideration of the apostle itself had been so directly impugned. Yet he does not appear to have received his intelligence so very soon, but that he speaks of their already having begun to observe days, and months, and times, and years. Though we cannot, of course, from this last expression, draw the inference of their having been already a year in this condition, yet the Judaizing usage in this respect must have already, in some measure, obtained prevalence. Such intelligence is it which gives the Apostle occasion for the writing of our Epistle to the Galatians.

[LIGHTFOOT: "The fragmentary notices of its subsequent career reflect some light on the temper and disposition of the Galatian church in St. Paul's day. Asia Minor was the nursery of heresy, and, of all the Asiatic churches, it was no where so rife as in Galatia. The Galatian capital was the stronghold of the Montanist revival, which lingered on for more than two centuries, splitting into diverse sects, each distinguished by some fantastic gesture or minute ritual observance. Here too were to be found Ophites, Manichæans, sectarians of all kinds. Hence during the great controversies of the fourth century issued two successive bishops (Marcellus and Basilus), who disturbed the peace of the Church, the one on the side of Sabellian, the other of Arian error. A Christian father of this period (GREGORY NAZ.), denounces 'the folly of the Galatians, who abound in many impious denominations.'" Still both in the Diocletian persecution and against Julian, who personally attempted the restoration of heathenism in Galatia, the Christians bore themselves with fortitude and constancy.—R.]

§ 3. TIME AND PLACE OF COMPOSITION: GENUINENESS.

It is evident that Paul composed the Epistle immediately after he had received the displeasing intelligence, for it is written under the fresh, immediate impression of it, as appears by the troubled style, full of astonishment and strong feeling. If the opinion given above is correct, that Paul himself, in his letter, intimates having made a second visit to Galatia (comp. especially iv. 13), the Epistle was, of course, written after this; and, therefore, if the second visit is the one mentioned, Acts xviii. 23, about A. D. 55 or 56. As Paul, after laboring the second time in Galatia, went to Ephesus, and remained there three years, it is most natural to suppose that he wrote the Epistle in Ephesus. The common subscription says, ἐγράφη ἀπὸ Ῥώμης, and several fathers favor this view, but it has arisen only out of a misunderstanding of iv. 20; vi. 2, and especially of vi. 17.

[Time and place are linked together; the two most probable opinions are: 1. That it was written from Ephesus, A. D. 54-57 (Acts xix. 1-10). 2. From Corinth, A. D. 57-58 (Acts xx. 3). If 1. be adopted, then it was written before the Epistles to the Corinthians; if 2., then subsequently. 1. is held by as more probable among others by MEYER, LANGE, SCHAFF (History of the apostolic church, p. 282), REUSS (Gesch. der heil. Schriften des N. T. 4th ed. p. 73), ALFORD, ELLICOTT, DAVIDSON, TURNER; 2. by DE WETTE, CONYBEARE, BLEEK, and by LIGHTFOOT most decidedly. STANLEY and JOWETT, leave the question undetermined, while WORDSWORTH dates it as early as A. D. 53, before Paul's second visit from Corinth, during his first visit there. (See his Introd. to Gal.) As the first named is the view generally received, it will be proper to state more fully the arguments of LIGHTFOOT. 1. The resemblance to the Second Epistle to the Corinthians, and that to the Romans, between which he would place it, its affinity in tone of feeling to the former, and in thought to the latter. 2 This order best accords with the history of Paul's personal sufferings and the progress of his controversy with the Judaizers, as shown in the fulness of doctrinal statement against their views. 3. This date explains one or two allusions more satisfactorily, as vi. 1, against severe treatment, the evil effects of which he may have witnessed at Corinth; vi. 7: "Be not deceived," etc., referring to their illiberality in response to the "orders to the churches of Galatia," mentioned 1 Cor. xvi. 1. See LIGHTFOOT, pp. 36-56. The question is one of probabilities, yet, as respects internal evidence, it may be remarked that the strong emotion of the Galatian Epistle renders it more probable that it was written speedily after the news of their error had come to the Apostle, while the calmer, more didactic setting of the same truth in the Epistle to the Romans indicates the lapse of a considerable interval between the two. Hence, the earlier date, from Ephesus, is to be preferred, and until lately was generally allowed by the best commentators. The view of WORDSWORTH, assigning a yet earlier date, involves a somewhat forced interpretation of iv. 13, 14, and, while ingeniously supported, rests too entirely upon hypotheses respecting Paul's course in dealing with an erring church.—R.]

Although the apostolic fathers contain no trace even measurably certain, and Justin's writings only a probable trace of the Epistle, its genuineness is nevertheless so firmly established, that it has never yet been doubted. It is supported partly by external, and partly by internal testimony. As to the former, the Epistle is already in use by the Gnostic Valentine (IREN. Adv. hær. 3: 3.) and by his disciple THEODOTUS (*Exc. ap. Clem. Alex. c. 53); and by MARCION about the middle of the second century, who has it in his canon as the first of the Pauline epistles, and draws his chief arguments from it to prove the other apostles Judaizers (Epiph. hær. 42: 9); it is known to TATIAN (JEROME, Comm. in Gal. 6); it is found on the testimony of the elder Peshito in the Syrian church; and according to the CANON of MURATORI, composed in 170, it is found in the church of the Occident; towards the end of the second century, it is used by the fathers IRENÆUS [Adv. hær. III. 7, 2—R.], CLEM. ALEX. [Strom. III. p. 468—R.] and TERTULLIAN [De Præscript. hær. c. 6—R.]; and, finally, it is reckoned by EUSEBIUS among the Homologoumena. Yet stronger is the thoroughly Pauline character and style of the Epistle. The Tubingen school, far from denying its genuineness, uses it rather as the great lever of its criticism upon the writings whose genuineness this school impugns. The sole exception to this universal consent is BRUNO BAUR (Kritik der Paulin. Br., 1ste Abtheilung, 1850), who has discovered in the author a compiler, that fabricated the Epistle out of that to the Romans and the two to the Corinthians. His imaginary proof, however, is so utterly without foundation, or scientific worth, that it bears its refutation on its face (WIESELER, MEYER).

§ 4. OBJECT, STYLE AND COURSE OF THOUGHT OF THE EPISTLE.

As implied in the occasion of writing indicated above, the Apostle intended by this, his Epistle, to destroy the influence which the Judaizing teachers, with their legal doctrine, had gained in the Galatian churches, and to bring anew to general acknowledgment, in the first place his apostolic authority, and next, on this basis, the gospel preached by him of the sinner's justification through faith, and of the freedom of the believer from the law. His essential aim is, to bring back the misled Galatians into the right path, as he also cherishes the strong hope, that he shall succeed in this. To this end he exhorts them most earnestly to a return, and supports this admonition by a careful demonstration of the perversity of that which the false teachers have brought in the way.

Inasmuch, therefore, as the Epistle has as its object, on the one hand, the combatting of an intriguing attempt, that had succeeded but too well, to destroy a work which had had a fair beginning, and at the same time, the combatting of a general doctrine of error, which overturned the evangelical foundation; and on the other hand the bringing back of a beloved church, which had erred from the truth, and the firm establishment of a momentous fundamental truth of the gospel, it is easy to explain the style of strong feeling which the Apostle on the whole maintains. Especially may we thus explain the sharp earnestness with which ever and anon he breaks forth against the false teachers; the zeal of love pervaded by sadness, with which he seeks to persuade the readers of their error, and to make clear the matter to them in the most varied aspects; while, with all this personal reference he does not shrink from going into the most thorough exposition of that which had been brought into doubt.

In treating a writing of such a kind, nothing is more mistaken than the desire to dispose it according to scholastic rules. It is true, the thought moves in thoroughly close connection, and a steady and clear progress is found, but the whole is a living growth, where one thing grows out of the other in the most immediate connection. With all the steadiness of the progress of thought, there prevails also a freedom of movement, and all pedantic analysis does violence to this mighty gush of thought.

As usual, Paul begins his Epistle with an ADDRESS and SALUTATION (i. 1-5), except that even here, agreeably to the purpose of the Epistle he emphasizes his apostolate in a very peculiar manner, i. 1, and brings into prominence the significance of the atoning death of Christ (i. 4). Then entering at once upon the matter, he sets forth the occasion of the Epistle, by expressing his astonishment at the speedy entrance which false teachers had found into the Galatian churches; and against every one, who preaches another gospel than that which he had brought them, denounces the Anathema—a severity which he justifies by reference to his duty as a servant of Christ (i. 6-10). There follows now:

I. The clearly marked FIRST CHIEF DIVISION of the Epistle (I. 4—II. 21)—a detailed demonstration of his full apostolic dignity, and thereby of the full authority of his evangelical preaching. Although the polemical reference is not distinctly announced, this is of course in definite opposition to the attacks of his opposers. Because this was the point of departure, the base of operations for the legal doctrine, he accordingly refutes these attacks first and before all, in order to have a foundation for what follows. For only by re-establishing his apostolic consideration, could he hope to destroy the influence which the false teachers and their legal doctrine had won and to convince his readers of the truth of his own preaching. The proof Paul conducts in the following manner. He shows,

(1), How he had received his commission to preach the gospel from God and Christ Himself, through special revelation, and not otherwise, as from the senior Apostles; how he could not possibly have received it from these, since for a long time he had only come once into hasty communication with them (vers. 11-24).

(2), That during a later interview in Jerusalem with the senior Apostles, having reference to doctrine, the latter by no means assumed any authority over him, or uttered any censure of his course; that on the contrary, while he, in opposition to the false brethren, most decidedly upheld the evangelical truth, it was precisely by the "pillars" of the church, the Apostles James, Peter and John that he was acknowledged as an Apostle of equal authority, and the preaching among the Gentiles left to him by a free and friendly agreement (ii. 1-10).

(3), That when Peter, although himself fully committed to the freer view respecting the Mosaic law, yet from fear of man had once deviated from it, he had not hesitated publicly to rebuke him, and to lay before him in the most definite manner the principles of his preaching among the Gentile Christians, in order to guard against these being led astray (ii. 11, 26). With Chap. iii. Paul passes over:

II. to a new section, the HEART of the whole Epistle. In this, he sets himself in complete opposition to the legal tendency itself, or to the opinion of a necessity of the observance of the law to the attainment of salvation, which, in opposition to the evangelical view inculcated by him, had found entrance, by means of the false teachers, among the Galatians. In this part, doctrine, complaint, and admonition alternate with one another (III. 1—VI. 10).

A. He begins (iii. 1–5) by expressing astonishment at the opposition into which they thus come with their own experience in the receiving of the Spirit, and then:

B. For the first time passes into a doctrinal exposition, namely,

1. To the proof of the principle, that through works of the law, Salvation (Justification, Blessedness, Inheritance) is not to be obtained, but through Faith alone. (iii. 6–18). The proof of this he finds in the Scripture, partly in the testimony of the Scripture concerning the justification of Abraham through faith, partly in the promise given to Abraham, that in him all the Gentiles shall be blessed; which promise finds its fulfilment only through faith in Christ, since the law instead of a blessing, brings a curse, while Christ has become a curse, in order to redeem us from that curse (iii. 6–14). The principle to be proved is, moreover, indicated even by the relation of time between the law and the covenant of promise. According to a fundamental principle of law, universally valid, the law, as given much later, could not annul the promise, that is, works of law could not be subsequently made a condition of attaining the inheritance, after it had been first promised as a gift (iii. 15–18). Paul, however, does not content himself with this demonstration, which, in relation to the law, afforded a merely negative result, nor indeed could the readers content themselves with it, since the fact of the law was not thereby explained. He therefore passes now:

2. To the Law itself, and its relation to the covenant of promise, and shows, (positively), what significance attaches to the law, in order therefrom to demonstrate, definitely and positively the freedom of Christians from the same (iii. 19; iv. 7).

a) The law had its sufficient end, one having an important reference even to the attainment of salvation. This end, however, was only preparatory, namely, to prepare the way, as a school-master to bring us to Christ.

b) But from this itself appears the merely transitory significance of the law: with the coming in of faith, the way for which it was to prepare, this ceases; believers are now all, without distinction, God's children, and so heirs (iii. 25–29). That is, remarks Paul more definitely still:

c) God's children and heirs (as were the children of Israel), might, it is true (after the analogy of human relations), be placed in servitude under the law, during their state of minority, but with the sending of the Son of God the stated majority, and with it the full position of children and heirs, has come in, which finds its realization in fact through the Spirit's inward witness of adoption (iv. 1–7). With this, the didactic exposition is, in its main part completed, and the Apostle's painful sense of the contrast in which the present behavior of the Galatians stands to the freedom from the law, which has fallen to the portion of Christians and therefore to them also, forces him again:

C. To a lamentation over this behavior of theirs. He presents before them the inconceivable retrogression which they make, and also, in painfully agitated language, the equally groundless personal estrangement, which had sprung up between themselves and him, through the selfish intrigues of the false teachers (iv. 8–18).

D. His complaint, pervaded by the motherly wish for a restoration of misguided children to the right way,* unconsciously passes over once more into instruction, into a confirmation of what had been taught concerning the freedom of Christians, from the Scripture narrative of the two sons of Abraham, Ishmael and Isaac, by means of an interpretation referring these to the Jewish and the Christian churches (iv. 19–31).

E. This gives so much the better right to utter the admonition to stand fast in this freedom from the law; an admonition which is at once strengthened by a threatening reference to the dangerous consequences of a return to the law, even in the one point of circumcision: that thus they lost Christ in whom alone that faith which works by love is efficacious (v. 1–6).

F. This admonition and warning now suggesting the thought how much lies at stake, pass over again into complaint, through which, however, hopefulness is visible, the complaint taking rather the form of accusation against their false guides (v. 7–12).

G. But so much the more urgently is the admonition again pressed, in the form of an exhortation (supplementing that under E.), instead of returning to the law, as if faith were insufficient to accredit their faith, in a right understanding of the freedom bestowed on believers, by a serving love, through a walk in the Spirit, which is the best fulfilling of the law. This admonition is given a) more in general, and with reference to the principle on which it rests, namely, the opposition between Flesh and Spirit; b) with a special inculcation of the duty of love in several particular relations, for which the churches may have given occasion (v. 25—vi. 10).

VI. 11-18. Paul adds a CONCLUSION written with his own hand.* In this with a few strokes he portrays himself in opposition to the false teachers, and opposes to their shrinking from persecution his own joy in the cross of Christ, through which he has become a new man. Wishing then a blessing on all who walk according to the principles laid down by him, he alludes to the marks of the Lord Jesus in his body, and begs that henceforth no man may trouble him, closing with the accustomed benediction.

[Subjoined is the satisfactory summary of DR. SCHAFF, published as a part of a projected commentary:

The object of the Epistle was both apologetic and polemic. It is a personal and a doctrinal self-defence, and a refutation of the Judaizing heresy. To this are added appropriate exhortations.

The first part, chap. i. 1—ii. 14, is historical and personal, giving a resumé of the Apostle's career, partly confirmatory, partly supplementary to the narrative of the Acts, and justifying his office and authority from the direct call of Christ, the revelation of the gospel doctrine made to him, and the testimony of the other Apostles during the Council of Jerusalem.

In the second or doctrinal part, chap. ii. 15—iv. 31, he defends his teaching, the free gospel of Christianity, in opposition to the slavish and carnal legalism of his opponents.

In the third or practical part, chaps. v. vi., he exhorts the Galatians to hold fast to the evangelical liberty without abusing it, to study love, unity and other Christian virtues, and concludes with a benediction.

Comp. the able analysis of LIGHTFOOT, which may be roughly sketched as a division into three sections of two chapters each: the first couplet Personal, the second Doctrinal, the third Hortatory.—R.]

§ 5. VALUE AND SIGNIFICANCE OF THE EPISTLE.

The high doctrinal importance of our Epistle needs no proof. It is the Magna Charta of the freedom of a Christian man. A spirit of holy zeal for the freedom which the Christian has through his faith, and for the Christian's right thereto, breathes through the whole. Hereby is the freedom which we have in Christ, established for all time; and against all attempts to induce it to make a law, or any outward performances, the condition of salvation, the Christian commonwealth can always oppose our Epistle as its charter of manumission. Our Reformers, therefore, in contending against the yoke, which the papacy, in the course of time, had again laid on the Christian conscience, supported themselves chiefly on our Epistle, and the nearly related Epistle to the Romans: and "through the famous exposition of its doctrinal contents rendered by Luther, has it become for ever part and parcel of the church of the Reformation." WIESELER.

A more particular comparison presents the doctrine of justification by faith, and not by works of the law, as, it is true, developed in the Epistle to the Romans with greater fulness, "according to its essence and its effects, in contrast with the corruption of sin;" in our Epistle it is brought forward rather as a means of proving the freedom of Christians from the obligation of observing the law. In this direction, then, are we to look for the peculiar significance of our Epistle: in the firm establishment of the high and holy right which Christians have to this freedom through their faith, in the demonstration of the dignity which faith in Christ bestows, so that our Epistle might be called not only the Christian's deed of manumission, but also his patent of nobility. At the same time the relation of law and promise, of religious childhood and maturity, from which this freedom results, are so clearly exhibited, in a profound and noble interpretation of the history of salvation, as to give a sure and immovable basis for all more special exposition.

* [On the disputed point whether the whole letter or only this conclusion was written by Paul's own hand, see notes on vi. 11.—R.]

But decidedly as the Apostle enters the lists to combat for the freedom of a Christian man, he is just as far from overlooking its ethical character, so that in our Epistle, both the dogmatical and the ethical features, essential to the idea of evangelical freedom, are contained.

While our Epistle is thus, first and chiefly, of high, abiding worth for Christian doctrine, it is moreover, important for the history of the church, through the valuable communications which it gives in chaps. i. and ii., respecting the history of the Apostle, and of the beginnings of Christianity generally. Considering the indisputable genuineness of the Epistle, these accounts, as being statements of the Apostle himself, are peculiarly valuable; and, although it is true that they have been abused by negative criticism of a destructive tendency, for the construction of its own system, yet the unprejudiced Church historian will, on the other hand, use them only the more effectively, as a sure starting point, with which what is elsewhere related respecting the state of things in early Christianity connects itself, and with which it unites itself to form a harmonious whole.

[SCHAFF: "The Epistle is polemical, impetuous and overpowering; and yet tender, affectionate and warning in tone. It strikes like lightning every projecting point that approaches its path, and yet undelayed by these zigzag deflexions, instantaneously attains the goal. Every verse breathes the spirit of the great and free Apostle of the Gentiles. His earnestness and mildness, his severity and love, his vehemence and tenderness, his depth and simplicity, his commanding authority and sincere humility, are here vividly brought before us in fresh and bold outlines." A half barbarous people, like the Galatians, known for their simplicity and impressibility, would be likely to listen to both of these methods of address; to be won by his fatherly pleading, as well as over-awed by his apostolic rebukes and denunciations (ALFORD).

LUTHER said of it, "The Epistle to the Galatians is my Epistle; I have betrothed myself to it; it is my wife." And he might well thus speak of "his most efficient engine in overthrowing the mass of error which time had piled on the simple foundations of the gospel." "In this epistle we have to this day the divine right and divine seal of genuine Protestantism against Romanism as far as this is a revival of Judaism, and denies to the Christian man that liberty 'wherewith Christ hath made us free.' But it is also, at the same time, an earnest protest against all pseudo-protestantism, which would abuse the evangelical freedom and pervert it into carnal license" (SCHAFF).

Besides furnishing the keenest weapons for the Reformers in their struggle for liberty within the camp, it is now of like value in the war of defence against assailants from without. This Epistle affords the refutation of that rationalistic view, which claims that the earliest form of Christianity was a modified Judaism, but that the distinctive features of our Christianity were added by Paul, which distinctive features prevailed after a long struggle between the Apostles and their antagonistic doctrines. True we here see the mutual jealousy of the Jew and Gentile converts, and are told of personal but temporary disagreement between Paul and Peter, yet are also shown the true relation between Paul and the Twelve; in fact, both the narrative and argument of the Epistle lose their point, if any such continued antagonism be admitted. Luther's commentary was translated into English, and published under the approval of the Bishop of London, 1575. So highly esteemed was this work that there are but few early English commentaries. We may notice, however, THOMAS LUSHINGTON: Commentary on the Galatians, London, 1650. JAMES FERGUSON, Edinburgh, 1659.

Of later works, the following are prominent:

J. A. HALDANE: Commentary. 1848.

JOHN BROWN: An exposition of the Epistle of Paul the Apostle to the Galatians. Edinburgh, 1853.

C. J. ELLICOTT: A Commentary, critical and grammatical, of the Epistle to the Gal., with a revised translation. London, 1853. 3d edition, 1863. The first commentary of this lucid, exact, and scholarly author, whose translation has been largely used in the emendations of the English text in the present work.

J. B. LIGHTFOOT: St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians. A revised text with introduction, notes and dissertations. London, 1865. Exceedingly valuable, on account of its full discussion of difficult questions. The frequent citations from this work are made from the Second Edition. 1866.

The American Editor of Lange's Commentary, PHILIP SCHAFF, D. D., has published an Introduction and comments on chaps. i., ii., as a specimen of a projected popular commentary on the New Testament. Mercersburg Review, Jan., 1861. Most of the material there presented is incorporated here.

The History of the Apostolic Church of the same author treats of many questions belonging to the exposition of this Epistle. So CONYBEARE and HOWSON, Life and Epistles of St. Paul. The works of ALFORD, WORDSWORTH, BURKITT, HENRY, and others (for full list, see General Introduction to New Testament, LANGE's Comm. Matthew), include comments on this Epistle. *[TITLE: Rec. ἡ πρὸς Γαλάτας ἐπιστολὴ Παύλου. Elz. Παύλου τοῦ ἀποστόλου ἡ πρὸς Γαλάτας ἐπιστολή. K. A. B. K., Lachmann, Tischendorf and most editors, πρὸς Γαλάτας.—R.]

² Ver. 3.—K. inserts ἡμῶν after πατρός, omitting it after κυρίου. [This reading is an alteration to conform with other salutations (Meyer). That of Rec. is undoubtedly correct. So all modern editors.—R.]

³ Ver. 4.—Περί (instead of ὑπέρ, Rec.) is found in most MSS. and in the best MSS. K. also, though K², reads ὑπέρ. [The external authorities are decisive against the reading of the Rec.; περί is adopted by modern editors almost universally.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. Paul, an apostle not of men, neither through man, etc.—His office, Paul says, is not derived from men (ἀπ' ἀνθρώπων), so as to be in itself human, and therefore subservient only to human interests; nor has it even been committed to him through the medium of any man (δι' ἀνθρώπου), in which case it might still be a divine function, although only not directly so. The change of number is only of secondary importance. The general sense: "of human derivation," is better expressed by the indefinite plural; while on the other hand, in denying human mediation, the singular is used with more precision, by Paul, the rather, as having already in mind the definite antithesis "but by Jesus Christ."

This double negation is essentially only a setting forth of the definition of "Apostle." He would be in no event an Apostle, if he had his office, ἀπ' ἀνθρ.; nor yet, if he had it, δι' ἀνθρ. He would then stand only on equal footing with a Timothy and others, in short with all laborers in the gospel, who are inducted into their office by men; he is an Apostle only because called and inducted into his office, through Jesus Christ, etc. He was therefore placed in his office immediately through Christ, not through a man: for the activity of Ananias in Damascus had been only secondary and subsequent, the beginnings were divine. But, furthermore, he has received his office through Christ from God the Father, so that, as "through Jesus Christ" explains "not through man," so God the Father explains "not of men." Yet Paul does not place this θεοῦ πατρ. in express antithesis to ἀπ' ἀνθρ., inasmuch as he does not say ἀπὸ θεοῦ π. There being on the positive side no occasion for so precise a discrimination, he here no longer distinguishes between author and medium: perhaps not without design, in order thus to set his apostleship in a like direct relation, as to Christ, so to God the Father, and thereby to place the dignity of the same so much the more strongly in view. What in the first place constitutes the apostolic office, is the immediate calling through Christ, who is the κύριος ἀποστέλλων (on which account διὰ I. Xp. is placed before καὶ πατρός). Christ Himself, certainly, cannot be reduced to the same level with men, if "not of men," etc., is to remain true. And every thought of it is precluded by this very comprehending of Christ with God the Father, as it were, in one conception, under one preposition.

[ELLCOTT neatly paraphrases thus: "Not from men as an ultimate, nor through man as a mediate authority." The second ἀπό which we should expect to find before θεοῦ πατρὸς has not been omitted without good reason: while the preposition ἀπό admits an extension of meaning that would cover both ideas (MEYER), the Apostle's language, as it stands, is more forcible; the directness of his divine commission is emphasized (LIGHTFOOT), and although an argument for the consubstantiality of the Father and the Son, must not be forced from the passage, "there is something very noticeable in this use of a common preposition with both the first and second Persons of the Trinity, by a writer so cumulative, and yet for the most part so exact in his use of prepositions as St. Paul" (ELLCOTT). SCHAFF: "By includes here the instrumental and the more remote originating cause.—The immediate coördination of Christ with God the Father, and this in contrast with the preceding men and man, prove that the Apostle regarded the Saviour as a Divine being."—R.]

Paul here, probably, designates God the Father [i. e., "of Christ,"—R.] as who raised him from the dead, simply because through this divine act, namely, the resurrection of Christ, his own immediate vocation through Christ had been made possible (1 Cor. xv. 8). [While it is not necessary to insist on a polemic reference here, as an answer to the reproach that he had not seen Christ (CALVIN), there seems to be an immediate reference to the fact that Paul was called by the exalted Christ, not that he claimed a preëminence on this account (AUGUSTINE, ERASMUS, and others), but God having raised Christ from the dead, and Christ having immediately chosen him to be an Apostle, it was fitting that he should give prominence here to that act of God which enabled him also to be an Apostle, a witness of the resurrection.—R.]

This laying claim so expressly to apostolic dignity in the very introduction, stands (as is shown by what follows) in connection with the vital questions of the Epistle, since his equal apostolic rank had been impugned by the Galatian false teachers. In chap. i. 11–ii. fin. there follows the detailed proof of this "not through man, but through Jesus Christ," whereby the "not of men" is also indirectly proved. (In other Epistles, where he has not this definite purpose in mind, Paul designates himself more simply, but in substantially the same style as ἀπόστολος or κλήτος ἀπ. 'Ι. Χρ. διὰ θελήματος θεοῦ.)

Ver. 2. And all the brethren who are with me.—Hardly his companions in travel at that time merely, especially helpers in his office (MEYER), but rather all the Christians of his place of residence at that time. This addition has, at all events, the special purpose of adding the authority of others to his own. He wishes the Galatians to understand, that he has on his side all the brethren in the midst of whom he writes, that these have the same opinion of their conduct, and thus indicates that the Galatians, unless they came to another mind, would sever themselves from the great communion of the brethren, who stand and abide upon the foundation of faith which Paul had laid. Of course the Apostle alone wrote the Epistle. He can, however, bring in the brethren as joint authors, so far as they may, after a previous communication of the leading thoughts, or, more probably, after hearing the Epistle itself read, have signified their agreement with it. [The more restricted meaning is allowable (see Phil. iv. 21, 22, where "the brethren which are with me" are distinguished from "all the saints.") The idea of the patristic commentators, that thus additional authority would be given, is incorrect; "the Epistle, being the product of an infallible Apostle, required no such help" (SCHAFF). CALVIN's remark is just, however: "The concurrence of so many godly persons must have had some degree of influence in softening the minds of the Galatians, and preparing them to receive instruction." ELLCOTT: "He adopts the inclusive term to show the unanimity that was felt on the subject of the Epistle; did it mean the whole Christian community we should certainly have expected 'with whom I am' rather than 'who are with me.'"—R.]

Unto the churches of Galatia.—The same title, 1 Cor. xvi. 1. There existed there, it seems, therefore, different local congregations, of which each one constituted at least a relatively complete whole, and the Epistle was so far a circular letter. The omission of a phrase of commendation, such as is usually found in the other Epistles of the Apostle, has perhaps its ground in dissatisfaction with the Galatians. Perhaps, however, the omission is in part attributable to the external circumstance, that ἐκκλησίαι, whole congregations, are addressed, hence any such titles as κλήτοι, ἅγιοι, would have been less suitable. [The dissatisfaction of the Apostle is so natural and evident a reason for the omission of any commendatory addition to the simple address, that any other explanation is farfetched. ALFORD quotes MEYER as saying that 1 and 2 Thess. present a similar instance, but in the 4th ed. MEYER expressly mentions these Epistles as no exceptions. WORDSWORTH: "a remarkable address in what it does not, as well as in what it does say."—R.]

Ver. 3. Grace be to you—and peace.—Respecting the Pauline form of salutation, χάρις καὶ εἰρήνη, consult remarks on the other Epistles.—From God the Father and our Lord, etc. As in ver. 1. Christ and the Father were comprehended under the one preposition ἀπό, without distinction of the Father through an ἀπό, so here the reverse takes place, an evident token how little Paul has in mind a severance of the Divine Persons. Christ is by no means, then, the merely instrumental medium of grace, but, as well as the Father Himself, the Bestower of grace (see DOCTRINAL and ETHICAL notes). Here, however, "God the Father" is placed first; in ver. 1 the order was reversed. There is, moreover, a special reason here for placing "our Lord Jesus Christ" last, namely, that it receives in addition a predicate defining it more closely. Grace and peace, Paul wishes for the Galatians, especially in view of the path of error into which they had been led, and for this very reason with especial allusion to that, which alone secures this grace and this peace, namely, the atoning death of Christ.

Who gave Himself for us.—In this clause the Apostle anticipates the other main point which he has to unfold. Instead of regarding the cross of Christ alone as the ground of salvation, the false teachers had influenced the Galatians to seek salvation again in observance of the law. In ver. 1 Paul touches on the personal, here he touches on the doctrinal question, which he afterwards handles. Δόντος ἑαυτὸν, "gave Himself," nothing less than His own person, which could be fully accomplished only in His death. Περί undefined: "in respect to our sins." The sense, however, clearly appears not only from the following, "that He might deliver us," but also in the very form of the expression, which sets forth an expiatory sacrifice that has been offered, in which Christ was the Offerer and the Offered, the Highpriest and the Sacrifice, in one person (comp. WIESELER'S careful investigation of the use of περί, ἐπὶ, ἀντί, in declarations respecting the death of Christ). [ELLICOTT: In its ethical sense, ἐπὶ retains some trace of its local meaning, "bending over to protect," and thus points more immediately to the action, than to the object or circumstance from which the action is supposed to spring. The latter relation is more correctly defined by περί, which is thus more naturally used with the thing, "sins," ἐπὶ with the persons, "sinners." Often, however, in the N. T. the distinction is scarcely appreciable.—R.]

Ver. 4. That He might deliver us.—Effect of the expiation accomplished through Christ.—Ἐξαιρεῖσθαι, to tear away from a power. The evil world is viewed as possessor by force, as a tyrant, who brings destruction, and in whose power we are by nature. This deliverance Paul doubtless understands in a double sense, as a making free from the moral corruption of the world, and also as a keeping from the destruction which it thereby brings upon its own at the judgment day. The immediate reference is to the latter, which, however, in view of the ethical character of Christianity, cannot take place without the former, as indeed there can be no doubt that the death of Christ has an ethical intent. It is false, however, to think only of this here.—"Present world" may mean, present or impending age. The latter signification is, however, hardly to be assumed here—contrary to MEYER, who would take it as meaning the evil times which, according to many passages of Scripture, are shortly to precede the second coming of Christ, and on this account are wont elsewhere to be called the last times. But "our phrase, on account of the union of ἐνεστώς with αἰών, is most naturally regarded as parallel with ὁ αἰὼν οὗτος or ὁ νῦν αἰών. The expression ὁ αἰών, since this appears to denote a period of time complete in itself, is nowhere used of the last times, preparatory only, as the pangs of travail, to the αἰὼν μέλλων. Nor, finally, is there in the connection the least reason why Paul should have confined the salutary workings of the redeeming death of Jesus to the last times." (WIESELER). Therefore we must take it as, "the present period of time," in sense the same as ὁ κόσμος, so that the translation "present world," is substantially correct.—"Evil" emphasizes the ethical character of "this world," which is besides included in the very conception of "the present world." It is equivalent to "ruined by sin," and therefore a deliverance out of it was necessary in the twofold relation given above. [SCHAFF: "The words contain an allusion to the Jewish distinction between 'this world,' and 'the world to come,' or the period before, and the period after the appearance of the Messiah. But the sense of these terms is modified in the N. T., so as to make the second coming of Christ the dividing line between the two æons." LIGHTFOOT: "The distinction of time between the two, which is the primary distinction, becomes lost in the moral and spiritual conception." The second adjective πονηρός, emphatically placed, gives prominence to the ethical idea, especially if the better supported order of the Rec., ἐκ τοῦ ἐνεστώτος αἰῶνος πονηροί, be adopted.—R.]

According to the will of God and our Father.—It is best to connect this with the whole of ver. 4. It refers the redeeming work as a whole to the gracious will of the Father, and thus cuts off every ground of objection against this work from the legal point of view. The thought of this redemptive counsel of the Father moves him very naturally, then, to the concluding doxology.—In τοῦ θεοῦ καὶ πατρὸς ἡμῶν, ἡμῶν belongs probably only to πατὴρ. By θεός God is meant to be designated as the God of all alike; by πατήρ, according to His special relation to the Christian. By the prefixed article two predicates are ascribed to the same person. The same who is God is also our Father. [LIGHTFOOT argues from the absence of the article before πατὴρ, that ἡμῶν belongs to both nouns, but as ELLICOTT well remarks, "πατήρ is anarthrous according to rule." CALVIN, MEYER and most, restrict the pronoun to Father, giving the last words somewhat of a predicative force: "God, who is our Father." It is to be remarked that in vers. 1-3 Paul speaks of "God the Father," i. e., the Father of Christ—but having in this verse spoken of the redemptive act of Christ, and its redeeming design for us he calls God, who has purposed this "our Father."—WORDSWORTH: "Specially our Father by the redemption of us His children by the blood of His Son."—R.]

Ver. 5. To whom be glory.—To be taken as optative; for δοξα means Honor, Praise—not Essential Glory, although it is true that the δοξα which should be given to God, rests upon the δοξα which He has. [SCHAFF: "The doxology in this place is likewise an indirect reproof of the Galatians for dividing the glory of our salvation between God and man." It is an affirmation rather than a wish. There can be no reasonable doubt that τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων here is an expression for eternity.—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The Apostolate. a. An essential characteristic of the apostolate was the immediate "call" through Christ, as whose "delegates" the apostles went out into the world with that proclamation of the Gospel, which should lay the foundation of all that followed. Hence the express assertion here (and afterwards the detailed proof) of this immediate calling. For this, if for no other reason, the office of the Apostles was specifically distinct from all others.* In the office of preacher in these days, there always occurs a "call" ὁὶ ἄνθρωποι. The office, however, is not on this account ἀπὸ ἄνθρωπων, nor should any bearer of it thus regard it. It is on the contrary "from" "Jesus Christ and God the Father," is divina institutio.

b. In the decision and certainty with which Paul insists upon his apostolic rank, there is implied, on the one hand, a justifiable sense of personal dignity in opposition to all who would question it, and especially to false teachers: "I am an Apostle and nothing less." This personal feeling, however, was certainly counterpoised at once, by the feeling of humility in view of the momentous duties involved, for the discharge of which grace alone could give strength. But, above all, the Apostle lays stress on this his dignity, not in his personal interest, but in the interest of his Lord, and the gospel of his Lord; in order to shield this against the "perverting" (ver. 7) of the false teachers, he is forced to lay this emphasis on the fact that he is really an Apostle of Christ, and therefore was such in his preaching of the gospel.

c. The care with which he proves his fundamental authority and capacity for preaching the gospel, is a pledge to us of the soundness of this preaching. The Christian church has, therefore, in this foundation laid by the Apostle, a standard for all time by which to prove doctrine.

d. That Christ has been raised, and now lives, is the fundamental truth, which to the Apostle stands immovably firm, and on which rests, for Paul, the certainty of his calling, and for him and the other Apostles the vigor and joyfulness of their labor in their vocation. For the Apostles were in a special sense to be witnesses of the resurrection of Jesus, and to be persuaded of it by a personal beholding of the Risen One. It was only because the risen Jesus had appeared to him, that Paul was an Apostle.

2. The brethren. This strong emphasizing of his particular vocation (or office) does not imply the least prejudice to his brotherly relation toward other Christians, who have no such vocation.

* It is one of the anti-scriptural fancies of the Irvingites to believe, notwithstanding this, in the reappearance of Apostles proper in their churches. WIELAND. [In LIGHTFOOT, p. 92 sq., there is an interesting discussion on the name and office of an Apostle.] He, however, objects to the restriction of the office to the twelve, with only the exception of St. Paul, adducing the apostleship of Barnabas, and implying that "James, the Lord's brother" (ver. 19) was an Apostle, even though not the same as James, the son of Alphaeus. This position is not safe, nor is it accordant with the argument of Paul in this Epistle, where he lays so much stress upon the "immediate call." Lightfoot is forced, therefore, to deny the necessity for a call from an outward personal communication with our Lord, though his admission that the having seen Christ was a necessary qualification, is a denial of the perpetuation of the office. It is better to hold that there were but Twelve Apostles, to whom was added, by direct call, Paul the Apostle to the Gentiles—Barnabas and others were "apostolic men." On the relation of Paul to the original college of apostles, see SCHAFF, History of the Apostolic Church, p. 512 sq., p. 253 sq. His note p. 234 is appropriate here: "The strict hierarchical view, which always looks for an outward, palpable succession, admits no satisfactory explanation of the fact, that the Apostles had no share whatever in the ordination of Paul after his conversion (Acts ix. 17), and in his being sent to the Gentiles by the Church of Antioch (xiii. 3). The divine irregularity of his call, and the subsequent independence of his labors, make Paul, so to speak, a prototype of evangelical Protestantism, which has always looked to him as its main authority, as Romanism to Peter."—R.]

Far from it. Paul not only mentions them in immediate connection with himself, including himself and them in the same salutation, but even treats them as fellow-writers, hence as those who, together with him, impart instruction and admonition, thus strengthening the weight of his own words by their concurrence. He is only called to preach what, as the substance of his faith, is the substance of theirs also; and he wishes to bring back his erring readers to the same faith in which these, his companions, stand and have remained firm. [Their concurrence could add nothing to the real authority of his apostolic teaching, but might aid in establishing that authority among the Galatians. Yet the Apostle seems fond of thus associating others of lower rank with himself in his Epistles.—R.] Here is a hint for the behavior of office-bearers towards other Christians now as well; in personal conduct, to regard and treat them as "brethren," standing on precisely the same footing; to lay claim to no precedence; and in official activity also, while maintaining full consciousness of their own special vocation, and of the authority inherent in it, never to ignore the might which dwells in the personal faith and believing life of the members of the Church, when there is an opportunity of joining them with one's self in exhortation and rebuke.

3. "Churches" still. Paul, it is true, gives to the Galatian Christians no especial title of honor, "yet he still counts them worthy to be called churches, because, though they were indeed for the most part fallen from the truth in some main points, they had, notwithstanding this, retained many parts of the pure Christian doctrine; he cherishes then the hope that they would still suffer themselves to be brought right again" (STARKE). Hence important doctrinal and ethical defects of a church do not of themselves warrant us in withholding or withdrawing from it the predicate ἐκκλησία. A judgment, whether in any place there is the Church of Christ or not, depends, although largely, yet not in the chief degree, upon subjective character, but in the chief degree stand the objective factors, namely, that verbum divinum recte docetur, and sacramenta, recte administrantur. This, as is well known, is one of Luther's prime principles. In the objective factors, there certainly resides the power (even if latent) to work subjectively.—Yet it cannot therefore be denied that there may be, notwithstanding, a subjective character of the congregation as respects doctrine and morals, where the predicate ἐκκλησία ceases to be applicable; we cannot, however, pronounce a judgment thereon, but must leave this to the searcher of hearts, so far as it is not a question of scandalous offences in the case of individuals.

4. God and Christ. Both in ver. 1 and in ver. 3, Christ is placed in the closest connection with God the Father; and in ver. 3 in such a way that Grace and Peace are invoked in the same manner from God the Father, and from Christ. From this appears, in immediate certainty, the eminent, god-like position of Christ. For the highest and best things, those which are needful for all men, proceed from Him, as much as from the Father. As respects grace, as much depends on His dispositions towards us, as on those of the Father. As Christ is thus placed with the Father on one Divine level, so is the Father, on the other side, placed on the same level with the Son, who, through His Incarnation, has drawn so near to us. LUTHER: "Therefore Paul, in wishing grace and peace not only from God the Father, but also from Jesus Christ, teacheth, first, that we should abstain from the curious searching of the Divine Majesty (for God no man knoweth), and hear Christ, who is in the bosom of the Father, and uttereth to us His will."

5. Christ's giving Himself. The expression for the death of Christ is here (ver. 4) so chosen, that it appears as His own free act, while, as is known, there runs parallel to the series of passages which apprehend it thus, another representing it as something decreed by God concerning Christ, representing Christ as burdened with the Father's curse (comp. iii. 13). This designation is here chosen, in order to render prominent and bring home to the hearts of the Galatians the great love of Christ, displayed in His "giving Himself for us." "The giving of Himself consisted of many actions, from the incarnation on, but it applies especially to his atoning death." This "giving Himself"—this morally great act was occasioned by our sins, our moral perversion; a cutting contrast, and yet a necessary nexus between cause and effect!—For its intent was to procure a remedy for our sins, and their ruinous results.

6. This present evil world. Through our sins we belong to this present evil world, bear its character, and are in its power, that is, through it and with it are going to destruction. From this destroying might Christ would rescue us, and has rescued us, by His giving Himself for our sins, that is, through the reconciliation thus accomplished for our sins; because we, when reconciled, lie no longer under the judgment of God upon the sinful world, and therefore do not go with it to ruin. Undoubtedly Christ had in view besides, an inward, moral deliverance from the corrupt course of the world; yet this is the secondary aim: the primary is the deliverance from judgment and perdition.—God's acts of grace, according to the Biblical view, are throughout directed, first of all, toward a deliverance from destruction, and consequently to the impartation of a good, of a definite happy destiny, not chiefly to the rehabilitation of certain ethical qualities, of a particular direction of life and will. They are directed thus, in a certain measure, towards an outward end, with which however an inward one is inseparably connected, as the economy of the Spirit, whose work it is to bring forth the corresponding ethical quality, is, although inseparable from that of the Father and the Son, yet distinct from it, presupposing it. The deliverance from the evil world, is, so far as concerns its being won, already accomplished by the sacrifice of Christ. Of course a participation in this is only gained through faith (this is implied in ἡμᾶς, which refers to believers), and is actually perfected only on the coming in of the αἰὼν μέλλων. A certain pledge and a joyful foretaste of it, however, the believer has already in justification, because this is an assurance of the divine grace. As to the rest, the apostolical expectation of the αἰὼν μέλλων as near lies at the foundation of this passage. [Whatever indications there may be elsewhere of "this apostolical expectation," neither the words nor context show any trace of it here, except on the view of ΜΕΥΕΝ, which refers "present evil world" to the times of danger immediately preceding the second coming of Christ, a view which is not adopted by Schmoller himself, nor by any other commentator of note.—R.]

7. Redemption according to God's will. The work of redemption was accomplished "according to the will" of the Father. This indicates the other side in the redeeming work, alluded to under 6, namely, that the death of Christ was also decreed to Him, by God for an expiation, and that Christ's "giving Himself" was accordingly, at the same time an act of obedience to the Father's will, a suffering Himself to be given up. Love to man and obedience to the Father, all in one, was the source of His sacrifice of Himself. This view is in full harmony with the declarations of Christ Himself, especially in John, with the emphasis which He lays on His having been sent, on His doing the will of the Father. There was nothing whatever self-elected in the redeeming work of Christ; it was a God-appointed work.—In this it first finds its firm, immovable foundation, and all scruples as to the availing worth of this self-sacrifice of Christ before God are taken away from the troubled conscience. At the same time, all clinging to such scruples is also condemned, as a striving against the will of God. We may, but we also ought to believe in the atoning death of Christ; hence especially, we ought not to lessen its significance by a righteousness of works. This will of God is the will that we should be saved, according to which, He willed both the way that should lead to our salvation, Christ's dying on account of our sins, and also the result, our redemption. It was a loving will, but also a will of holy love, condemning sin and forgiving it; the latter only on the foundation of the former, but the former also for the sake of the latter. Because aiming at our salvation it was in any case the will of God our Father.

8. God's honor its end. As and because the will of God is the origin of the work of redemption, so the honor of God is its aim. That He, His name, be honored, is the purpose and result of redemption. To Him belongeth honor—and that honor forever—for redemption, and such honor will be rendered Him by the Redeemed. The phrase εἰς τοὺς αἰῶν. τ. αἰῶν. no doubt looks forward to the αἰὼν μέλλων. The expression is, however, thus indefinitely framed, in order, as far as the language admits, to express an eternal duration. There is nothing in this, of course, against the division found elsewhere, into simply two æons, present and future.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

VER. 1. STARKE:—To all peculiarly spiritual offices belongs a divine vocation. Every man may take comfort in the consciousness of his office and calling, and also appeal to it when there is need. Let no one deem this pride or boasting. —SPENER:—Christ is the founder of the preacher's office. He is the King in His Kingdom, and so sends whom He will. He is the Chief Shepherd, and therefore all under shepherds must be appointed by Him. He has obtained by His merits the spiritual power needed for the ministry, and has received the Holy Ghost to that end for our sakes. It is He, therefore, who speaks through His servants.—LUTHER:—Wert thou wiser than Solomon and Daniel, yet until thou art called, flee the sacred ministry, as thou wouldst hell and the devil, then wilt thou not spill the word of God to no purpose. If God needs thee, He will know how to call thee.—LONGE:—To be sure of one's divine, although only mediate vocation, is a weighty matter, and gives to the conscience rest, in the office blessing, and to vindication of the same and of the pure doctrine, much joyfulness.—WÜRT. SUMM.:—There is a twofold vocation to the ministry; both are of God, who will have the gospel preached to the end of the world; but some are called of God without means, of which sort are the patriarchs, prophets, apostles; and some through men, although according to God's commandment and ordinance.—RIEGER:—As certainly as every believer shall be taught of God, so that what he has apprehended from human instruction is confirmed in his heart with divine impressions and powerful workings, just so certainly must every teacher have in his conscience a divine seal upon his vocation, although derived through men, and on this account a joyfulness which his hearers cannot impeach.

The apostolate in its high significance, 1. for the founding, 2. for the continuance of the Christian church which must perpetually rest upon the foundation of the apostolic doctrine.—The divine vocation to office: 1. To have it, is under all circumstances needful; 2. To be certain of it, is often important; 3. To appeal to it, may often be right and proper.—How independent (of men), and yet at the same time, how dependent (on God), the preacher of the gospel is and knows himself (may and should know himself) to be!—Even so the Christian generally: he is what he is, not from men (although through men), for not natural descent nor outward fellowship makes him such—but through Jesus Christ and God the Father.—Christian sense of personal worth: 1. its justification, 2. its limits.—All through Jesus Christ! a) humbling truth—not through us; b) exalting truth—through no less a one than Christ, and thereby through the Highest, God.—[CALVIN:—In the church we ought to listen to God alone, and to Jesus Christ, whom He has appointed to be our teacher. Whoever assumes a right to instruct us, must speak in the name of God or of Christ.—BURKITT:—Behold the peculiar prerogative of St. Paul above the rest of the Apostles; they were called by Christ in the day of His humiliation; but he was called by Christ when sitting at His Father's right hand in heaven. As his call was thus very extraordinary, so his gifts were answerable to his call.—R.]

Ver. 2. WÜRT. SUMM.:—Although the truth of a doctrine does not rest upon the multitude of people, but alone upon God's word, yet, when many support a doctrine founded in God's word, the weak in the faith are noticeably strengthened thereby, because they see that not merely one or two, but many, confess such a doctrine.—SPENER:—Christians are "brethren" to each other; for they have one Heavenly Father, one first-born brother, Christ; one mother, the Christian church; one seed of regeneration, the divine word; one inheritance of eternal life. That is a more intimate and strict brotherhood than the common one among all men.—STARKE:—In names and titles we must give good heed not willingly to commit falsehood, nor attribute to any one, praise that does not belong to him; yet common and authorized titles must be understood not in absolute strictness, but according to common use.—SPENER:—There remains even in a loose crowd a Christian church, even though grave errors, which remove the ground of faith are found there, so long as God's word and the holy sacraments are there and are maintained.

On Vers. 1 and 2. Let us hear, when we begin to waver in the truth: 1. Apostolic doctrine; 2. The testimony of brethren!—Apostolic doctrine and the voice of brethren; an admonition to every church to abide in the evangelical truth.

Ver. 3. RIEGER:—Paul flees in this perplexity to the riches of God in Christ Jesus, and entrusts to the grace and the peace from thence, the restoration of the Galatians also; with this greeting, as with a cordial, he not only refreshes their hearts but quickens himself also to a confidence towards God in Christ.—WÜRT. SUMM.:—We see here where we must begin, when after sin committed we will come to God for grace; namely, not with ourselves, not with our piety! for if we had kept this, we should be already in favor with God, nor even with God Himself out of Christ, for He is to sinners a consuming fire, but alone with Christ, and His bitter passion and death for our sins.—LUTHER:—Paul wishes the Galatians grace and peace, not from the emperor or kings and princes; for these are wont oftentimes to persecute the godly: nor does he wish them grace and peace from the world, for in the world they shall have tribulation; but from God our Father, that is, he wishes them a godly and heavenly peace.—LONGE:—True peace can never exist without grace, for grace is the ground and source of peace; on the other hand there is grace sometimes without peace, especially with the tempted, who may, for awhile fall into great disquietness of soul, and yet remain in God's grace.

Ver. 4. STARKE:—If Christ has for our sakes given His all, ah! should not we surrender ourselves, with all that in us is, to Him? Man! keep thyself from sin, on account of which Christ hath endured so much, lest thou thyself bring to nought for Him this great work, for which He came.—LUTHER:—Mark diligently the word: "for our." For therein lies all the virtue, namely, that all which is said concerning us in the Holy Scriptures, in such passages as "for me," "for us," "for our sin," and the like, we should know how to take well in mind, and apply particularly to ourselves, and hold fast thereto by faith.—For thou hast, no doubt, easily brought thyself to believe that Christ, God's Son, was given for St. Peter's, St. Paul's, and other saints' sins, who were worthy of such grace; but, contrariwise it is especially and thoroughly hard, that thou, for thine own person, a poor, unworthy, condemned sinner, shouldst from thine heart certainly believe, held, and say, that Christ, God's Son was given for thy so many and so great sins, who yet nevertheless hast never yet been worthy of such grace.—Therefore should we well train and prepare our hearts with this utterance and the like utterances of St. Paul, that when the devil hereafter comes and accuses us and says: "See, you are a sinner, therefore you must be damned!" we may meet him and answer, "yea, good devil, for the very reason that you accuse me and will be condemning me for a sinner, for that reason will I be righteous and holy, be not damned, but saved the rather. For in this very thing, that you tell me how I am a poor sinner, and a great one, you give me a sword and weapon in hand wherewith I can mightily overcome you, yea, slay you and put you under my feet with your own arms. For if you can tell me that I am a poor sinner, I can say to you again, that Christ died for sinners."—Count these words of St. Paul as said in earnest, and to be true, and not as a dream, when he says that the world is evil, although many people therein have many noble, beautiful, virtues; and although in outward guise and appearance there is much holiness and brilliant excellence.—To this evil world belongs also all art, wisdom, righteousness, &c., of a godless man. Thy wisdom, which thou hast out of Christ, is a double folly, thy righteousness is a double sin and godlessness, since it knows nothing of the wisdom and righteousness of Christ, and since, over and above this, it darkens, hinders, reviles and persecutes you; wherefore St. Paul may well name the world an evil world; for it is the worst when it will be at the best and most pious. In the religious, wise and learned men, it will be at its most pious and best, and yet it is twice as wicked.

BERLENE. BIBLE:—Of this present evil world, ordinances of religion form no small part, of which much is instituted whereby men will take one another captive to the spirit of the world. Without religion nevertheless will the world not be; so it dresses up such things as may be congruous with flesh and blood; but true religion burdens and depresses it. Thus the deliverance takes place especially from the Pharisaic leaven.—STARKE:—See how availing and certain is our redemption and salvation, because it proceeds from the will of the Father: how can that be unavailing, which has come to pass according to His will.—[SCHAFF:—God is our Father because He is the Father (not simply of Jesus Christ which would place him on a par with us, but) of our Lord Jesus Christ.—R.]

Ver. 5. As often as we think on the great work of redemption, we should heartily praise God; and therefore should we often think thereon; that we may be powerfully excited to praise.—To praise God is the best divine service; it is that which must endure unto eternity. Happy he who begins it here, and prepares himself thereby for a blessed eternity. It is a proof that he knows God aright, and has become partaker of

His grace, and that he will one day come to the heavenly choirs of angels who praise God.

Jesus' giving Himself to death: 1. Its occasion (our sins); 2. Its purpose (our deliverance therefrom); or: 1. the strongest testimony against us (our sin); 2. the mightiest consolation for us; or: 1. Its great effect (to deliver us from this evil world); 2. Whence it has this effect (as being a satisfying and bearing and thereby a taking away of the divine wrath); 3. in whom it is thus effectual (only in those who are His in faith).—What defends us from being lost with this evil world? 1. Not our own righteousness whereby we only entangle ourselves in this evil world the more, but 2. Christ's sacrificial death alone.—The appropriation of the merits of Christ: 1. Every one needs it on account of his sins; 2. The sinner needs it precisely as sinner.—Jesus Christ the Deliverer out of the power of this present evil world: 1. The world the tyrant in whose power we are; 2. Christ the Deliverer that has appeared.—Evil—the character of this world: 1. Therefore the Christian in this world longs for the world to come; 2. He must however be delivered from this present world, in order to enter the world to come.—Redemption through Christ rests upon the will of God: 1. A rich consolation (against all doubts); 2. An earnest admonition: Whoever lightly esteems the redemption accomplished through Christ, sins thereby against the will of God Himself.—The honor which is due to God for the redemption in Christ.—The praise of God: 1. a fruit of the redeemed state; 2. a proof of the same.—The praise which the redeemed bring to God: 1. begins in time; 2. continues into eternity.

Vers. 3-5. LISCO:—The Apostle's invocation of blessings for his churches: 1. What does it contain? The greatest benefits which are bestowed by God on man. 2. On what is this invocation grounded? a. On the free will offering of Christ. b. On the gracious counsel of God, to redeem us by such offering.—The benediction of the Apostle: 1. A proof of his hearty love: even to the unthankful, who through their apostasy have so troubled him, he wishes the best things; 2. A proof of his standing fast in the truth: in direct opposition to them he held fast so much the more definitely the evangelical truth, of redemption through Christ's death alone, and points them to that in contrast with their erroneous opinions.—Right wishing: 1. wishes true benefits; 2. points to the true source of such benefits.—The right behavior toward those who are disposed to depart from the truth: to open the heart fully to them in expressions of desire, full of divine blessing, before closing with and combatting their errors.

Vers. 1-5. The appearance of the Apostle against the Galatians: 1. in the full dignity of his office, at the same time, however, associating the brethren with himself; 2. with the full love of his heart, at the same time conceding nothing of the truth.

Occasion of the Epistle: APOSTASY OF THE GALATIANS FROM THE GOSPEL, WHICH PAUL HAD PREACHED TO THEM, TO THE FALSE DOCTRINE OF CERTAIN SEDUCERS, AGAINST WHOM HE THEREFORE UTTERS THE ANATHEMA.

CHAPTER I. 6-10.

6 I marvel that ye are so soon removed [changing over]¹ from him that called you 7 into [in or by]² the grace of Christ³ unto another [a different]⁴ gospel: Which is 8 not another; but there be [except that there are] some that trouble you, and would 9 [θέλοντες, wish to] pervert the gospel of Christ. But though we, or an angel from 10 heaven, preach [should preach]⁵ any other gospel unto you⁶ than [or contrary to]⁷ 9 that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed [anathema]. As we said before,⁸ so say I now again, If any man preach any other gospel unto you than 10 [or contrary to] that ye have received, let him be accursed [anathema]. For do I now persuade [am I now conciliating]⁹ men, or God? or do I seek to please men?
for [omit for]¹⁰ if I yet pleased men, I should not be the [a] servant of Christ.

⁴ Ver. 6.—Ἐτέρον, "different in kind," not "another of the same kind" (ἄλλο, ver. 7). So Alford, Ellicott, Wordsworth, Lightfoot.—R.]

¹⁰ Ver. 10.—Rec. εἰ γὰρ ἔτι; but γὰρ is best omitted. [Rejected on preponderant MSS. authority by all modern editors.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Without any thanksgiving for the readers' gifts of grace, as in other Epistles, the Apostle passes immediately from the invocation of a blessing to sharp rebuke which, however, strikes not so much the Galatians themselves as their seducing teachers. Vers. 6-9.

Ver. 6. I marvel that ye are so soon changing over.—He finds it strange, since he has expected, and had reason to expect, something different. "So soon" refers rather to the entrance of the apostasy than to its course, as having so rapidly developed itself from its commencement. The latter view suits the connection the less, inasmuch as μετατίθεσθε designates the apostasy as yet in process of development; ὁὕτω ταχέως, is therefore, we may say, equivalent to—so soon after the last visit of the Apostle. ["So soon" either 1) after conversion, or 2) after his visit, or 3) after the false teachers came; all three may be included, and are true; which is the primary reference cannot be certainly determined. In any case in view of the middle force of μετατίθεσθε ("turning renegades," LIGHTFOOT), it is a charge that the change was sudden and one for which they were to blame. SCHAFF: "The Greek implies first that the apostasy was voluntary, hence their own guilt; secondly, that it was not yet completed, and hence might be averted. The passive rendering would transfer the guilt to the false teachers."—R.]

From him that called you: most probably from God, who called you on the ground of the grace of Christ, which He has shown in His surrender of Himself to death; not—from Christ, who out of grace has called you. It is true that with the first explanation ἐν χάρι. Χρ. is difficult to render, but in any case it is not to be understood of the state of grace, as if—called you to the possession and enjoyment of grace.—[By the grace of Christ.—The E. V. renders ἐν χάριτι, "into the grace," following the Vulgate, but ἐν is here used in its instrumental sense. ALFORD: "Christ's grace is the elementary medium of our 'calling of God;' the sum of all that He has suffered and done for us to bring us to God;—whereby we come to the Father,—in which, as its element, the Father's calling of us has place." ELLICOTT: "The dogmatical consideration that the grace of Christ, in the sense it here appears used by St. Paul, denotes an active and energizing influence rather than a passive element, seems distinctly to suggest the instrumental sense." Comp. his notes in loco.—R.] But it is God Himself who "calls." The reference of καλεσάντος to the Apostle has some support in the fact that he afterwards opposes so expressly his own preaching to that of others, yet must be rejected, as καλῆν too constantly expresses an activity of God for this interpretation. The apostasy is described, doubtless not undesignedly, as an apostasy from a person, not from a doctrine, that it may appear as ingratitude.—To a different gospel.—More exactly: to another kind of gospel = εὐαγγ. παρ' ὃ παρελ. (ver. 9). A gospel, either because the Galatians naturally took the doctrine which the false teachers brought them for the Gospel, or primarily in the general sense of Doctrine of Salvation, which the legal doctrine also claimed to be.

Ver. 7. Yet Paul as it were at once corrects himself, and respecting that which he has just named “gospel,” denies again that this predicate in fact belongs to it, this false teaching is no gospel, but a subversion of the gospel. This is at all events the sense, if ὃ—the most obvious construction—is referred to the immediately preceding εὐαγγ. = “which other sort of gospel is no other, by the side of that preached by me, except that there are,” etc. [The more correct reference is to ἕτερον εὐαγγέλιον. So MEYER, ALFORD, ELLICOTT, LIGHTFOOT, and Schmoller himself. See ALFORD's notes in loco for a full discussion and objections to the reference below.—R.] The reference however to the whole sentence is possible—which is nothing else (that is, this turning to another gospel) than that you have let yourselves be seduced by such as wish to subvert the gospel.

There be some that trouble you.—“Paul is fond of calling his opposers: τινές, i. e., certain well known people, whom one for any reason whatever, in this case out of disparagement, will not designate more nearly.” WIESELER.—[WORDSWORTH suggests and defends an ironical meaning: “unless they who are troubling you, are somebody,” but this seems forced. LIGHTFOOT paraphrases well: “only in this sense is it another gospel, in that it is an attempt to pervert the one true gospel.”—R.] Ταρασσέν = to disturb the conscience and thereby the feelings by exciting doubts whether the gospel preached to them were the true teaching or not.—Wish to pervert = to have the will, to labor for; as the sequel plainly shows, it has not yet come to an actual perversion; μεταστρέφειν = ῥῆψ, funditus evertere.—The gospel of Christ, probably=gospel respecting Christ, inasmuch as in the first place the gospel treats of Christ generally; especially, however, because the merit of Christ is the chief theme of the true gospel in distinction from the legal teaching. The gospel, of course, could not, in itself, be destroyed, but the evangelical preaching among the Galatians might be, if they received another teaching.

Ver. 8. But though we—let him be anathema.—Certain persons wish to destroy the gospel of Christ among you, and bring you another, but (ἀλλά) rather let every one who does that be ἀνάθεμα, instead of passing for an evangelist.—Ἡμεῖς: first and chiefly the Apostle himself, then, however, also the “brethren who are with me,” in whose name he likewise writes.—Angel from heaven, to be taken together=angel descended from heaven. “If Paul repudiates his own and even angelic authority in the case assumed, as accursed, then every one, without exception (comp. δοτις ἂν ὃ, v. 10), is subject to the same curse in the same case.” MEYER.—Παρ' ὃ εὐαγγ. ἔμειν=literally: beyond that, etc., may be equivalent to præterquam, or to contra. “Formerly dogmatic interest came here into play, the Lutherans, in opposition to tradition, contending for præterquam, and the Catholics in defence of it, for contra. Contra, or more exactly the sense of specific difference, is according to the context the right sense. (See ver. 6. ἕτερον.)” MEYER. [This sense of παρὰ, “contrary to,” is now generally conceded by Protestant commentators. WORDSWORTH and LIGHTFOOT give it the sense of “besides;” the latter arguing from the context that Paul means, his gospel will brook no rival, will suffer no foreign admixture, but, as ELLICOTT remarks: “the Apostle implies throughout the Epistle that the Judaical gospel was in the strict sense of the words an ἕτερον εὐαγγ., and in its very essence opposed to the true gospel.” Both ideas may properly be included (ALFORD, SCHAFF).—R.]—Εὐαγγελιστάμεθα ὑμῖν: namely, I and my companions at the time of your conversion. Comp. παρελάβ. ver. 9.

Let him be anathema.—A translation of ῥῆψ = Dedicated to God without ransom=given over to annihilation, to death, in the Old Testament to bodily, in the New Testament to θάνατος in opposition to ζωή, to eternal death. See in WIESELER a detailed elucidation and refutation of the explanation, “excommunicated.” [Ἀνάθεμα is the common Hellenistic form of the classical and Attic word ἀνάθημα, which in both forms originally meant “devoted to God.” When the two forms were desynonymized, the Hellenistic word naturally took a meaning from the Hebrew (through the LXX.) in altam partem, while the Attic form was used in a good sense. Comp. Luke xxi. 5, where only it is found in N. T. This distinction was general, but not universal. Afterwards the common patristic sense of our word undoubtedly was “excommunicated,” though sometimes accompanied with distinct execration. It cannot have this meaning here, for “an angel from heaven” is not open to excommunication, nor does N. T. usage favor such a signification. Comp. Rom. ix. 3; 1 Cor. xii. 3. See also TRENCI, Syn. N. T. § 5, MEYER, ELLICOTT, LIGHTFOOT.—This passage affords no warrant for ecclesiastical anathemas. Such a practice presupposes the milder meaning, which is incorrect, and as milder, in itself forbids such anathematizing. It is obviously unfair to find in St. Paul's language first, a reason for ecclesiastical “excommunication,” and then a warrant for “anathematizing.”—R.]

Ver. 9. As we said before.—Referring probably to his last visit, not to ver. 8.—The Apostle repeats the curse, which he has pronounced ver. 8, in order to show that he “speaks deliberately.” BENDEL. — [Notice that in ver. 8 the Apostle uses εἰ with the subjunctive: “though we, or an angel, should preach,” in ver. 9, εἰ with the indicative: “if any man preach,” appending the anathema in both cases. “In the former, a pure hypothesis is put forward, in itself highly improbable; in the latter a fact which had actually occurred and was occurring” (LIGHTFOOT). There is additional force in the change of subject: even Paul or an angel from heaven—did they do so—would be anathema, much more—any man, neither Apostle nor angel—is anathema, having done so.—R.]

Ver. 10. For am I now conciliating men?—Explanation (ἵνα) of the severity with which he demeans himself towards the false teachers by this repeated ἀνάθεμα. He does it, because he is concerned only for the favor of God, not that of men. It would be natural to understand “now” like ver. 9 of the time of the composition of the epistle. Yet on the other hand this limitation is not quite congruous to the general contents of the verse, it is therefore better to understand it more generally of the time of the Apostle’s conversion. [It seems more natural to regard “now” as an emphatic taking up of “now” in ver. 9—“now in what I have said.” Paul had not been a man-pleaser before conversion. If he had been charged with it among the Galatians, he was not so now in what he had been writing.—R.] Πείθω=to win over, to draw to one’s side by persuasion, whether directly by words or otherwise; here, in view of the reference to God—to gain for one’s self, to win for one’s self as a friend.—Ἀρπύσκω: sometimes to please, sometimes to be disposed to please, to live according to the pleasure of; the latter here. “Yet” goes back to the same time with “now.” [“Yet,” i. e., after my call to the apostleship, and all that has happened to me (SCHAFF). “It is equivalent to ‘at this stage, at this late date’” (LIGHTFOOT).—R.] I should not be a servant of Christ=could make no claim to this title. As a true servant of Christ, who dares not act to please men, I must, even though it should not please men, judge with all sharpness and severity respecting those who subvert the gospel. “Servant of Christ” is here doubtless to be taken in its official sense=could make no claim to the name of a teacher. With how much right Paul could say so of himself is shown, e. g., by 2 Cor. xi. 23 sq.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Apostasy even in the early church. The glimpse of such scenes of the first Christian Church as our Epistle speaks of, and as are mentioned by anticipation in our section, is instructive. Even in such as had been brought to the faith by a Paul himself, a speedy lapse was possible, and yet he certainly fulfilled his office among them in the right way, and his activity was blessed. Even the best preaching cannot overcome the sinful nature of the human heart. This preserving and making steadfast in the truth, is a work of the Holy Ghost, and it goes on, just as growth is wont to do: through advances and fallings back on account of the opposing might of the flesh, according to the account of the Apostle himself. Chap. v. 17.

2. The false teachers. Defections from evangelical truth, however, are not on this account to be taken lightly; but on the contrary, very gravely, as the language of the Apostle in this passage shows. Paul had full justification in uttering a curse against the false teachers, and thus giving them over to everlasting destruction, in the wickedness they committed with their false teaching; which was a double one—1) against persons: they perplexed their consciences and brought them in danger of losing the salvation of their souls; 2) against the cause: they went about to subvert the gospel of Christ. They made an attack on the sacred rights of believers, and their conduct was therefore worthy of a curse. That this curse does not flow from personal mortification, because they had rejected his teaching, Paul shows plainly by placing himself under the curse, in case he should teach differently. Besides, the anathema is, of course, aimed at this conduct of the false teachers in itself, and this sharp opposition by no means excluded the wish that they might themselves see the error of their way, and themselves come to the knowledge of the evangelical truth. But this was not the place for saying this. He expresses himself with thorough earnestness against the false teachers, only to open the eyes of the Galatians, and to release them from the snares in which they had allowed themselves to be taken. Although in this earnestness he comes in conflict with men, he must do what becometh a servant of Christ: be zealous for Christ and the salvation of His people.

3. Pleasing men. What Paul says, ver. 10, appears to be opposite to 1 Cor. x. 33; but in 1 Cor. Paul speaks of things indifferent, in which a man may yield somewhat without wounding his conscience (comp. Rom. xv. 2). Here, however, he means sinful complaisance, where one fashions his doctrine and preaching according to the sense of men, in order thus to gain their favor. He only then is a servant of Christ, who subordinates unconditionally the favor of men to the favor of God, who in His official activity does not seek to make Himself pleasing to men, does not make this his object. When, however, from time to time—for uninterrupted it can never be—the favor of men falls to his lot, he is to receive it from God’s hand with thankfulness and humility, as a kind indulgence, which in his manifold conflicts may be of value. That the servant of Christ must be on his guard, not to draw upon himself deservedly the ill-will of the world through pride and self-will; that he is not in carnal temper to fly in the face of men, and hence that he must always examine well whether his zeal is a spiritual one, or is not becoming a carnal one, if it were not such from the beginning, is indeed self-evident, but cannot be carefully enough considered; as in general the theory of the relation of human and divine favor is tolerably simple, but the practice is very difficult.

[4. WORDSWORTH:—Not to please men, be they never so many or great, out of flatness of spirit, so as, for the pleasing of them, either

- 1) To neglect any part of our duty towards God and Christ; or,
- 2) To go against our own consciences, by doing any dishonest or unlawful thing; or,
- 3) To do them harm whom we would please, by confirming them in their errors, flattering them in their sins, humoring them in their peevishness, or but even cherishing their weakness; for weakness, though it may be borne with, yet it must not be cherished.

But then, by yielding to their infirmities for a time, in hope to win them, by patiently expecting their conversion or strengthening, by restoring them with the spirit of meekness, with meekness instructing them that oppose themselves, should we seek to please all men.—R.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1. "I marvel:"—is a word of apostolic wisdom.—LUTHER:—St. Paul does not set upon the Galatians with vehement and terrifying words, but speaks in quite fatherly and friendly wise with them; and does not only soften down their fall and error, but excuses them also in a manner, yet so that he nevertheless also punishes them. Therefore, of all sweet and mild words, he could hardly have chosen one more fit than when he says, "I marvel."—RIEGER:—In itself the preservation and perseverance of a man in good is more to be wondered at than when there is a stumbling or falling. But the Apostle says, "I marvel," in order to express to them thereby the confidence of something better, which he has retained on their behalf, and to let them discover something of the hope, in which he stands, of begetting them again through the gospel unto their first faith.

WÜRT. SUMM.:—We are here reminded of our human weakness. We should endeavor to be so assured of divine truth in our own heart, as to be able to persevere therein, though even an angel would persuade us of something else, and the whole world would believe otherwise. Such perseverance is not in our power, however, but must be obtained from God through prayer and through diligent use of the divine word, which alone can make our walk steadfast.

"From him that called you by the grace of Christ unto another gospel."—RIEGER:—A tender description of the good work begun in them. A feeling contrast with the yoke which some would now lay upon their necks.—SPENER:—Whosoever will no longer be saved simply through the grace of God in Christ falls away from the Father and the grace of Christ to another gospel, even though he holds the other articles of faith. For so soon as merit is mixed therewith, it is no more grace.

Apostasy from the truth: 1. how far not to be wondered at; 2. how far to be wondered at.—So soon alienated! 1. a word of grief, true of so many; 2. a warning word, in relation to all.—An apostatizing tendency, or inconstancy a radical fault of the human heart: 1. sluggish and immovable, where it is of moment that it should move and apply itself; 2. so movable and unsteady where it should abide firm.—To turn ourselves from Him who hath called us: 1. so lightly done; 2. weighs yet so heavily.—Another Gospel! is the world's cry; no other! must forever remain our answering testimony.

Ver. 7. SPENER:—The gospel of Christ will not let itself be mixed with the doctrine of works, as if these were necessary to salvation; but as soon as this is done, the gospel is perverted.—HEDINGER:—More taught than God has thought, is to the gospel quite athwart. The false teachers will have Christ's grace, to be sure, but something of their own works therewith. Gross error! Adding more destroys the store.—STARKE:—Where Satan cannot persuade men to open sins, he seeks to perplex their consciences, and pervert the gospel, which is the only means of salvation; in this too he very easily succeeds, because the doctrine of works appears quite agreeable to the reason.

Ver. 8. LUTHER:—It is not in vain that St. Paul sets himself first, and will, first of all, be accursed, if he shows himself herein worthy of it. For all excellent workmen are wont also thus to do, namely, to reprehend their own faults first, for then can they so much the more freely chide and censure the faults of others.—SPENER:—No creature has authority to change anything in the gospel, or to add thereto, of however eminent rank, office, enlightenment, holiness, and miraculous power he may be. Not even the whole Church, nor her teachers, nor her councils and the like. If the change is made, no inquiry is needed; but it is to be reprobated, because it is new and another.—LANGE:—As the blessing coming out of the gospel is the most weighty and noble of all, so is the curse which rests upon the hindering of the blessing through falsifying the gospel, the greatest of all, one which remains forever upon soul and body.

Ver. 10. LUTHER:—We cannot more hotly and bitterly anger the world than by attacking and condemning her wisdom, righteousness, ability, and powers. If we now reject and condemn these highest gifts of the world, that is truly not to behave feigningly to the world, but to strive after hate and ill luck, and, moreover, to get both our hands full of the same. For if we condemn men with all their doings, it can never fail but that we must soon take our chance and bring upon ourselves such scorn and envy that we shall be persecuted, hunted, banished, condemned, and, very likely, even murdered.—SPENER:—The sincerity of a teacher, when men see that his concern is alone to please God, and not men, is a strong ground for believing that his teaching is sound and pure.—HEDINGER:—Just so! Whoever in the church, in the state, in the family, serves men, fears and cowers before men, and, for their sake, bends the right, flatters and fawns, has trifled away his best title—Christ's servant and disciple. A thunder-stroke! Whose ears tingle not, when he hears it?—RIEGER:—O God! preserve all thy servants, that no one, through pride and self-will, may draw persecution upon himself, and fly in the faces of men; but grant also that we may not count persecution, mocking, and contempt as tokens of our having betrayed the truth, but may view them and bear them as the marks in the foreheads of thine approved servants!

The earnestness with which Paul opposes the false teachers: 1. well founded, 2. very significant for us: should (a) withhold us from the reception of any unevangelical doctrine; (b) strengthen us in the certainty that the gospel, which we have, is the true one.—A curse upon him who preaches a false doctrine! 1. A fearfully earnest utterance; 2. yet pressingly needful; 3. instructive for all that are wavering.—Let not every man undertake to be a teacher, but whoever is, let him take heed what he teaches.—The curse which Paul pronounces upon himself, if he should preach another gospel, is a token: 1. how high the gospel stands in his view; 2. how humbly he thinks of himself (viewing himself only as a mere instrument, as a servant, who has to accomplish what his Master has commanded him).—Not the Church above the word, but the word above the Church!—Two earnest questions: 1. Which seekest thou most, man's favor or God's favor? 2. Which is weightier, man's favor or God's favor?—Man's favor or God's favor? Choose: there is no third.—The right union of unsparingness and forbearance in our intercourse with men: an art of difficult attainment.—To be entirely unsparing, and entirely forbearing, each in the right way, is the Christian's duty in dealing with men.—Man's disfavor, compared with God's favor, as insignificant as wholesome, perfects us in humility, and impels us the more to assure ourselves of the favor of God.

On the whole section.—Lisco:—The curse of the Apostle against the false apostles: 1. Whom it strikes: 1. Necessarily every one, without exception, who changes the blessing of the gospel into mischief, and so out of good prepares for himself death; 2. those also who have deep insight, or other high qualities for serving the kingdom of God, and yet do not preach it purely; 3. even an angel himself, if he could preach another gospel. II. Why must it be uttered? 1. He who preaches the gospel must have a will thereby to serve, not men, but God; 2. through a false gospel men may, indeed, be attracted, but God views it as blasphemy; 3. therefore, he is placed under the curse, who will serve the gospel, and yet doing so as a man-pleaser, is found an unfruitful servant of Christ.

The apostasy of believers: 1. is, alas, sometimes a fact; 2. from what does it proceed? 3. how is it to be remedied?—The Apostle's demeanor: 1. towards the misled: he makes a complaint and charge; but through it all the full tones of compassion and love are heard; 2. towards the misleaders: unsparingly stern even to denouncing a curse.—To fall away from the gospel is bad, but to subvert the gospel is worse.

I.

TO DESTROY THE INFLUENCE WHICH THE FALSE TEACHERS HAD GAINED IN THE CHURCHES, PAUL REFUTES THEIR ATTACKS UPON HIS APOSTOLIC DIGNITY, AND PROVES THEREBY THE FULL AUTHORITY OF HIS PREACHING.

CHAPTER I. 11—II. 21.

1. To this end he appeals to the fact that he received his commission to declare the Gospel from God and Christ Himself through immediate revelation, not from the senior Apostles.

(CHAP. i. 11—24.)

11 But I certify you [Now I declare unto you],¹ brethren, that the gospel which was 12 preached of [$\delta\pi$, by] me is not after man. For I neither received [For neither did I receive]² it of [from] man, neither was I taught it, but by [through] the [omit the] 13 revelation of [from]³ Jesus Christ. For ye have [omit have] heard of my conversation in time past in the Jews' religion [Judaism],⁴ how that beyond measure I per-14 secuted the church of God and wasted [was destroying]⁵ it: And profited in the Jews' religion above many my equals [And surpassed in Judaism many of my age]⁶ in mine own nation, being more exceedingly zealous of the traditions of my 15 fathers [or my ancestral traditions]. But when it pleased God,⁷ who separated me 16 [set me apart]⁸ from my mother's womb, and called me by his grace, To reveal his Son in [within] me, that I might preach him among the heathen [Gentiles]; 17 immediately I conferred not with flesh and blood: Neither went I up [away]⁹ to Jerusalem to them which [who] were apostles before me; but I went [went away] into 18 Arabia, and returned again unto Damascus. Then after three years I went up to Jerusalem to see Peter [to make the acquaintance of Cephas],¹⁰ and abode with 19 him fifteen days. But other of the apostles saw I none [I did not see], save 20 James the Lord's brother. Now the things which I write unto you, behold, be-21 fore God I lie not. Afterwards I came into the regions of Syria and Cilicia;
22 And [but] was unknown by face unto the churches of Judea which were in Christ:
23 But they had heard only [only they were hearing],¹¹ That he which persecuted us in times past [who once persecuted us] now preacheth [is now preaching] the faith 24 which once he destroyed [was destroying]. And they glorified God in me.

¹ Ver. 11.—The Recepta γυνωρίζω δέ is well attested, adopted by Lachmann and latterly by Tischendorf. [Alford retains γάρ on the authority of B. F. and a few others; δέ is adopted by Wordworth, Ellicott and Lightfoot, on the authority of N. A. D²³. K. L. and most versions. "Now I declare unto you" is taken from E. V., 1 Cor. xv. 1, where the Greek is the same.—R.]

² Ver. 12.—[Ellicott's rendering given above, is an alteration made to retain the emphasis on "I," and to indicate that the first negative is not strictly correlative to the second. "From" instead of "of," in conformity with modern usage.—R.]

⁴ Ver. 13.—Ἰουδαϊσμῷ is better rendered literally. So in ver. 14.—R.]

⁵ Ver. 13.—[The sense of the imperfect, ἐπόρθουν, is best expressed thus. Schaff renders: "labored to destroy." The same change in ver. 23.—R.]

⁶ Ver. 14.—[Schaff thus renders it. The E. V. is unusually unsatisfactory here; the ἀπᾶς λεγόμενοι, συνηλικιώτας means "contemporaries."—R.]

⁷ Ver. 15.—Ο ὅς ἐς of Rec. is rejected by Tischendorf, and bracketted by Lachmann. N. has the words [so also A. D. K. L., many cursives and versions; retained by Ellicott, Wordsworth. There are paradiplomatic reasons for retaining it, but if a gloss, undoubtedly a correct one.—R.]

⁸ Ver. 15.—[“Separated” has a local sense not intended here.—R.]

¹⁰ Ver. 18.—Instead of Ἰερόσω (Rec.), Κηφᾶ is to be read, as also in il. 9, 11, 14. So also N. The Hebrew name was expressed by the Greek gloss, hence in il. 7, 8, where Paul himself wrote the Greek name, the variation Κηφᾶς is not found [So all modern editors. Ἰστορήσας means more than to see, "to visit, to make the acquaintance of."—R.]

¹¹ Ver. 23.—[The English text has been amended to bring out the force of the Greek imperfects.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 11. Now I declare unto you—not after man.—[Literally: "I make known unto you as respects the gospel, the one preached by me, that it is not according to man."—R.] To the warm burst of feeling succeeds the composed statement of reasons. Accordingly we have the formal γυνωρίζω, and the address "brethren," which also shows that Paul, although in the introduction he gives no peculiar title of honor to the Galatian Christians, feels himself to be still standing in the fraternal relation to them. He takes this as his starting point with them, because his aim in what follows is to bring them back and win them again from their error. He first justifies his preceding rebuke by the distinct and formal assurance that his teaching is not of man. Of course this was not something entirely new to the church, yet it had, doubtless, been at first a merely tacit presupposition in connection with the Apostle's preaching, without having been expressly emphasized: hence the γυνωρίζω; after it had been called in question, it must be definitely affirmed.

The gospel which was preached by me is most naturally referred to the preaching of the gospel among the Galatians, although self-evidently the same declaration was of general validity.—Ὁ ὅ κατὰ ἀνθρώπον literally: "not according to man," not after the fashion of man, not man's work. This applies not immediately to its origin, but to its character, which however is especially and primarily conditioned by its origin (ver. 12). The sequel shows the phrase to be nearly equivalent in sense to "scholastic" [schulmässig].

Ver. 12. For neither did I receive it of man, neither was I taught it.—"Neither did I"—any more than the Twelve. By the denial of any human origin of his gospel he asserts his equal rank with the other Apostles. The sentence receives a simple exposition when compared with ver. 1, which it more closely explains. The first and negative part: "neither did I receive it from man, neither was I taught it," is an explanation of "not of man, neither through man," while the second part, "but through revelation from Jesus Christ," is an explanation of "through Jesus Christ and God the Father," which is afterwards made yet more definite (vers. 15, 16).—[LIGHTFOOT: The idea of the preposition (παρά) is sufficiently wide to include both the ἀπό and διά of ver. 1.—R.]

Through revelation from Jesus Christ.—This is commonly explained as merely a giving of instruction respecting the contents of the gospel, and there is then a difficulty as to when Christ gave to Paul this ἀποκάλυψις, discovery. Here Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ is taken as gen. subj.—the revelation which Jesus Christ gave. MEYER explains it of revelations received soon after the event near Damascus, of which, however, there is no mention in the Acts. Others, with reason, refuse to assume any such revelations, but explain the "revelation" as identical with the actual appearance of Christ on the way to Damascus, through which Paul received certainty of that which is precisely the essence of the gospel, namely, "Jesus the Son of God." They are led to this, moreover, by a just instinct, that it is not the developed contents of that which Paul taught, that is here in question. This explanation, therefore, is quite correct, and Paul's reference here is solely to the fact of that appearance on the way. Yet he has in view chiefly, not a receiving of instruction thereby, but his call to the apostleship itself, for this was a call "to preach the gospel" (see also ver. 18), and therefore a "receiving the gospel." The expression, that he had received the gospel through revelation from Jesus Christ, has primarily the simple meaning, that through this he had been called and appointed to preach. In the phrase "through revelation," etc., Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ is at all events the subjective genitive, for Christ is in any case to be regarded as active in the installation of the Apostle (ver. 1), and hence in his call to preach. As the object of this "revelation" we are to understand not the contents of the gospel, but more simply Christ Himself, hence it is—by Christ's revealing Himself to me.—This view is, it is true, in apparent contradiction to the "taught" immediately preceding, which seems to point to a definitely developed doctrine, but only in apparent contradiction. It is only in the negative that he speaks of "being taught;" in order to deny most entirely the human calling to preach, Paul denies also the "being taught;" he did not, he says, first receive in a course of school instruction, his equipment, authorization and capacity to preach, hence not in a secondary, derived manner, as a scholar (of the Apostles). Over against this human origin, Paul now simply asserts his "revelation from Jesus Christ" which need not be complemented by "taught"—an expression in itself awkward too—but merely by "received."—In what immediately follows it is not "through revelation from Jesus Christ," so much as the negative "neither was I taught it," that is proven. For in vers. 15, 16, where "through revelation" has to be touched, it is mentioned properly only as a historical notice, in order to mark the transition from the first period of his life to the second, hence only in the subordinate clause. From this, however, the conclusion cannot of course be drawn: "I was taught through revelation from Jesus Christ;" for this reason first, that then we should expect a detailed statement of this positive side. But all that was to be said on the positive side, had been said already in the short ὁ ἀποκαλύψας ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ because here a simple fact only was in question; on the other hand the "received from man" and "taught" could have taken place in many ways and at different times, might have been of long continuance; and on this account the demonstration was needed that there had been no point of time whatever, when such instruction from the senior Apostles (whom he has in mind throughout in "from man"), could have taken place, since at first he has been hostile to Christianity, and after his calling had never lived in intercourse with the senior Apostles, though at the same time he had already preached the gospel. And, he proceeds to say in chap. ii., when afterwards, he was once somewhat longer with them, he then appeared as a fully equal Apostle, and was so acknowledged; hence there could no longer be any talk of his occupying the place of a pupil.

[Since the design of the Apostle in what follows is to prove that his doctrine as well as his apostleship was God-given, that He was "taught of God," it seems more natural to refer "revelation from Jesus Christ," to instruction as well as to calling to the apostleship. WORDSWORTH calls attention to the force of ἀλλά, which he considers to be here "except" "save"—"nor was I taught it except by revelation." He was θεοδιδάκτος. And this view is further sustained by the omission of the article before the noun, which is not rendered definite either by the genitive following or by the fact that there was but one revelation (Paul undoubtedly had many). To what instructive revelation does he refer? Undoubtedly to that on the way to Damascus, but not to that exclusively. Nor to any particular revelation soon after his conversion (AQUINAS, MEYER, ELLICOTT, ALFORD, who suggest the sojourn in Arabia, ver. 17, as the probable time), but to the revelation on the way to Damascus as "the fundamental and central illumination," "followed by special revelation" at different periods of his life. Comp. Acts xxii. 17;

xxiii. 11; 1 Cor. xi. 13; 2 Cor. xii. 1 sq.; Gal. ii. 2. SCHAFF. Schmoller's view on this point colors his notes on the entire section.—R.]

Ver. 13. For ye heard of my conversation in time past, etc.—How far this statement is meant to confirm the previous proposition (γάρ), has just been indicated. Perhaps, however, he also emphasizes his former Jewish zeal, with particular reference to his Judaistic opposers. He wishes thereby to call attention to the fact that his present anti-Judaistic position does not result from any want of acquaintance with Judaism, but that, on the contrary, it rests upon only too intimate an acquaintance with it.

Ἰουδαϊσμός: the word in itself, it is true, signifies nothing more than the Jewish religion; yet Paul, in this connection, evidently throws more meaning into it, joining with it the additional idea: Jewish zealotism. Only thus is a proper meaning given to "surpassed in Judaism" (ver. 14). This again finds its explanation in how that beyond measure I persecuted, etc. "He was really engaged in the work of destruction, not merely in that of disturbance." MEYER.

Ver. 14. In mine own nation.—Literally "race," the people are regarded as a single race, descending from the same ancestor. — My ancestral traditions:—not the Pharisaic traditions or the Mosaic law, together with those traditions, but teachings which the fathers of the collective people held (see WIESLER). The phrase: "the traditions of my fathers," in itself, describes only the doctrinal and ritual definitions respecting the Jewish worship which then obtained, though, of course, resting on the Mosaic law as their foundation. But Paul, in calling himself a zealot, who surpassed many of his contemporaries, has undoubtedly in view chiefly his observance of these usages according to the peculiarly strict rule of Pharisaism. [SCHAFF: "The word παράδοσις, 'tradition,' which figures so prominently in the Roman Catholic controversy, in the general sense, embraces everything which is taught and handed down, either orally or in writing, or in both ways, from generation to generation; in the particular sense it may be used favorably of the divine doctrine, and even of Christianity itself, as is the case 1 Cor. xi. 2 (E. V. 'ordinances' instead of 'traditions'); 2 Thess. ii. 15; iii. 6, or unfavorably of the human additions to, and perversions of the religion of the Old or New Testament, in which case it is generally more clearly defined as the traditions 'of the elders' or 'of men,' as Matt. xxv. 2; Mark vii. 3, 5, 8; Col. ii. 8. In our passage it means the whole Jewish religion, or mode of worship, divine and human; but in the Pharisaic sense, as opposed to Christianity." LIGHTFOOT's paraphrase is excellent: "My early education is a proof that I did not receive the gospel from man. I was brought up in a rigid school of ritualism, directly opposed to the liberty of the gospel. I was from age and temper a staunch adherent of the principles of that school. Acting upon them, I relentlessly persecuted the Christian brotherhood. No human agency, therefore, could have brought about the change. It required a direct interposition from God."—R.]

Vers. 15, 16. But when it pleased God.—In the interest of his demonstration of the independence of his apostolate, as respects men, he here studiously emphasizes the activity of God in conferring it, going back even to the divine ordination thereto at his very conception. [LIGHTFOOT: "Observe how words are accumulated to tell upon the one point on which he is insisting—the sole agency of God as distinct from his own efforts."—R.]—From my mother's womb—when he was yet in his mother's womb, he was already set apart as an Apostle. [SCHAFF: "Comp. Jerem. i. 5; Isa. xlix. 1. The decree of redemption is eternal as God's love and omniscience, but its temporal realization begins in each individual case with the natural birth, and more properly with the gospel call and the spiritual birth. He refers, however, here more particularly to his call to the apostleship, for which he was 'set apart' or destined, elected and dedicated by a Divine act. Comp. the same term, Rom. i. 1; Acts xiii. 2."—R.]—His calling followed afterwards near Damascus. In the Acts, Christ's appearance only is mentioned; here Paul takes up the event with a more doctrinal reference, and hence refers this appearance to its first cause, God. This, of course, implies no discrepancy with the narrative of the Acts.—Although appearances favor such a view, "called" does not denote an earlier act, preceding the revelation (ver. 16) which, therefore, refers to subsequent revelations (MEYER). [The aorist participle, καλέσας, in this connection, at first sight, seems to refer to an act prior to the "revelation," not, however, necessarily long before. It does not mean a "calling" in the Divine mind, as some infer from its connection with "set apart;" but most probably the Divine act which, "by means of His grace," resulted immediately in his conversion, when the revelation was made. ELLICOTT: "The moving cause of the call was the Divine pleasure; the mediating cause, the boundless grace of God; the instrument, the heaven-sent voice" or revelation; the purpose of the setting apart, the call and the revelation alike was, "that I might preach him among the Gentiles." "To reveal" depends on "pleased," not on "called."—R.]

So then "reveal" is only the explanation of the "calling;" more precisely: there is thereby indicated what took place at the calling, namely, the enlightenment and conviction then effected. For this reason also, because the calling comes into mention only as respects its result, he speaks only of revealing "His Son within me." Accordingly Paul, in this passage, indeed, says nothing of having had an outward appearance of Christ. But, that Paul, in the expression, to reveal his Son within me, was thinking of a definite, individual fact, which was connected with a definite locality, the city or the neighborhood of the city of Damascus, and not of a purely internal event, appears most clearly from what follows ver. 17, "returned again." "Had the event of his conversion been a purely inward one, his recollection of the locality where it occurred would not, more than twenty years after, have still forced itself so strongly into the foreground that, in describing only the general inner result of that revolution, he would have been constrained at once to think of Damascus." PARET, Jahrbücher für deutsche Theologie, 1858.

H. 1. Furthermore and principally, the whole proof which Paul here brings for his apostolic parity rests upon the fact that he had really and truly had an appearance of the Risen One. "I have not been called by men, but just as truly as the older Apostles, by Christ Himself to be an Apostle," is his fundamental thought: how could he be thinking on a mere internal event, a vocation by Christ only in spirit? With that, instead of his equality, his difference from the others would have been established. Therefore, if any conclusion is justified, it is this: Paul has here in his eye the event related in the Acts; presupposing, however, the outward occurrence as well known, he avails himself only of that element of it which has pertinence here, namely, that he was inwardly enlightened concerning Christ, that Christ was revealed to his inner eye, to faith. Of his conversion in itself, Paul does not speak here, or only so far as it was a condition of his capacity for the apostleship, as through it the "calling" to be an Apostle became a reality. He dates his calling, therefore, from the moment of his conversion. Therefore, he continues: that I might preach him among the Gentiles.—Him whom God has revealed to him as His Son, he was, and is still (therefore the present), to declare as such; this is the gospel which he received "through revelation from Jesus Christ" (ver. 12), this "the gospel which was preached by me" (ver. 11).—Ἐν τοῖς ἔθνεσιν: among the Gentile nations, therefore ἐν, not the dative. For Paul preached not merely to the Gentiles, but among the Gentile nations, first to the Jews dwelling among them, and only then to the heathen themselves.

Immediately I conferred not with flesh and blood.—Εὐθέως, of course, belongs strictly not to the negative sentence immediately following, but to the affirmative sentence: "went away into Arabia," it does not, however, exclude a brief previous activity in Damascus, since the Apostle was only concerned to prove that he did not go out from Damascus in any other direction than Arabia, and particularly that he did not go to Jerusalem.—"I conferred not," I addressed no communication to flesh and blood, in order to receive instruction and direction—"flesh and blood;" here merely—one clothed with a mortal body, therefore in sense equivalent simply to—Man. The conception is thus strongly expressed, because Man appears here in antithesis with God.

Ver. 17. Neither went I away to Jerusalem to them who were apostles before me.—This is the only distinction which he concedes between himself and them.—Into Arabia. "This Arabian journey is to be regarded as his first essay of foreign labor, and it is, by εὐθέως, put in connection with the purpose of the divine revelation, that he should preach the gospel among the heathen."—(MEYER). Yet I would not on this account wholly reject the other conjectures that have been offered as to the purpose of this journey, such as seeking protection from the Jews, "severing himself from pressure of the national spirit," and partially also, perhaps to prepare himself in stillness for his work.—This journey into Arabia is not mentioned in the Acts, probably because it was of short duration and therefore perhaps not known to Luke; it is, with most probability, placed in the time of the "many days," Acts ix. 23; the flight from Damascus must therefore be placed at the end of this second visit there. [Two questions arise: 1. as to the place; 2. the object of this sojourn. 1. Although "the desert region about Damascus" may have been the place (since Justin includes Damascus in Arabia, and Xenophon applies the name to the region beyond the Euphrates, Anab. I. 5), yet Paul is always more definite in his geographical statements than most ancient authors, and as in the only other place where Arabia is mentioned in the N. T. (Gal. iv. 25), it must mean the Sinaitic peninsula, it seems decidedly preferable to refer it to that locality in this case. Besides, as LIGHTFOOT well remarks, any other view "deprives this visit of a significance which, on a more probable hypothesis, it possesses in relation to this crisis of St. Paul's life." If iv. 25 refers to "Hagar" as the Arabic name of Sinai, the argument is conclusive, for he was not likely to have heard this name anywhere but on the spot. If it be a mere geographical remark, then it is a very indefinite one, granting that Paul here uses "Arabia" with so extended a signification. 2. "Paul's object in this residence in Arabia, as seems most probable from the context, was not to preach the gospel—but to enjoy a season of undisturbed preparation for his high and holy calling. This period, therefore, belongs more properly to the history of the Apostle's inward life; and this affords the simplest explanation of the silence of the book of Acts respecting it. It was for him a sort of substitute for the three years' personal intercourse with the Lord, enjoyed by the other Apostles" (SCHAFF, Apostolic Church, p. 236). This view of the object confirms the opinion that the Sinaitic peninsula was the locality. Where Moses and Elijah had been before him, Paul went. "Thus in the wilderness of Sinai, as on the mount of transfiguration, the three dispensations met in one;" Law, Prophecy and Gospel; Moses, Elijah and Paul. Comp. LIGHTFOOT, p. 87 sq.; STANLEY, Sinai and Palestine, p. 50.—R.]

Ver. 18. Then after three years.—To be reckoned probably from his calling to the apostleship; for he means: I did not go up at once to Jerusalem, but only three years after. This is the first journey of Paul to Jerusalem, Acts ix. 26.—Ἰστορησάμενος K.—in order to become personally acquainted with Cephas, not: in order to obtain instruction from him. The more precise expression is therefore designedly chosen.—Fifteen days.—Had it been in itself possible that Paul at this time received instruction, still a course of instruction strictly so called, a schooling under the senior Apostles would not have been possible in so short a time. Hence the length of his stay is expressly mentioned. [Nor does the singling out of Peter prove anything more than his prominence among the Twelve; Paul puts himself on a par with all the Apostles, including Peter.—R.]

Ver. 19. But other of the apostles I did not see.—"Apostle" must be taken in the strict sense of the Twelve, since it is precisely his parity with these that Paul wishes to make out. Therefore James the Lord's brother is either to be reckoned among the Apostles and identified with James, the son of Alphaeus, and so "brother" to be taken in the sense of "cousin;" or "saw" (εἶ μὴ) is to be referred only to "I did not see" = another one of the apostles I did not see, but I saw only James. Grammatically the former is decidedly the less difficult; but the identification with James, the son of Alphaeus, is attended with great difficulties. Comp. WIESELER in loco. Besides this impression is evidently conveyed, that Paul by the special addition he appends to the name, wishes to distinguish this James from the Apostles, not to include him in their number. For this reason the second interpretation is to be preferred. Although not an Apostle, this James could still be mentioned by Paul, as is done here, along with the Twelve, because he had a standing well-nigh apostolic. Respecting the question how the James mentioned chap. ii. 9, is related to this James, see remarks on that passage. "The notice that at that time Paul only saw Peter and James in Jerusalem, does not conflict with the indefinite τοὺς ἀποστόλους, Acts ix. 27, but authentically defines it." MEYER.

[The interpretation turns upon the much discussed question what is meant by "the brethren of the Lord," for unless this James can be identified with James, the son of Alphaeus, he is not an Apostle. The view of LIGHTFOOT, ALFORD and others that he might be an Apostle, and yet not of the Twelve, seems altogether untenable. Only one point is undisputed: This James is the one who was frequently called by the church fathers "bishop of Jerusalem," and also "the Just." Whether he were an Apostle, whether he wrote the general Epistle, whether referred to again in this Epistle, are open questions. Without entering into an extended discussion, it will suffice to mention the leading views and their bearing on this passage, referring the reader to special dissertations. There are three principal theories. That the brethren of the Lord were 1. the sons of Joseph and Mary; 2. the sons of Joseph by a former wife; 3. the cousins of our Lord, either the sons of the Virgin's sister, or the sons of Joseph's brother, etc. 1 and 2 are the older views; 3 originated with Jerome. On this latter theory alone can we identify James, the brother of our Lord, with James, the son of Alphaeus, for the other theories imply that Joseph, not Alphaeus, was his father. But this theory is with difficulty supported, for not only did it originate in an attempt to justify and thus enjoin virginity in man as well as woman, but it has always been forced to call to its aid mere conjectures. Hence, if it be rejected, our verse means that Paul saw none other of the Apostles, but he did see the Lord's brother. To which view we are in a measure forced also by the statement of John (vii. 5: "neither did his brethren believe in him") after the twelve were chosen. Comp. John vi. 67, where "the twelve" are spoken of. That his brethren were afterwards believers is stated (Acts i. 14, where they are mentioned in distinction from the Apostles); the reason of the so speedy conversion may be found in 1 Cor. xv. 7, if "James," of whom "he was seen," be distinguished from "the twelve" (ver. 5) and "all the Apostles" in the same verse.

As between 1 and 2, it may be remarked, that it seems more natural to consider the brethren of our Lord the sons of Mary, were it not for two reasons, first, the instinctive repugnance (JOS. ADD. ALEXANDER) to such a view, and secondly, the fact that the dying Saviour committed His mother to another than these brethren, a strange fact, were they her own sons. Still these are not insuperable objections. The whole question is an open one, and it was only necessary to discuss it here so far as to decide upon the meaning of this particular passage. The reader is referred to LANGE's Commentary, Matthew, p. 255 sq., where LANGE defends the modified cousin-theory, and SCHAFF advocates at length the first view stated above. Also to LANGE's Commentary, James, p. 9 sq.; SCHAFF, Monograph on James, Berlin, 1842; ALFORD, Prolegomena, Epistle of James. Comp. the authorities quoted by these writers. The best classification and history of opinions will be found in LIGHTFOOT, Dissertat. II., p. 247 sq., which has been freely used in the above remarks. He, however, defends the second theory. As regards this passage, it seems on the whole best to consider this James—1. as not identical with the son of Alphaeus; 2. as not an Apostle. Both points are involved in the exegesis of the passage, but as ἐν $\mu\eta$ is susceptible of either interpretation, these results must be reached on other than grammatical grounds. The grounds for the above opinions cannot be stated at length, but may be found in the more extended discussions.—R.]

[WORDSWORTH: "Paul's meeting with Peter and James. Peter cordially received him.—'Fifteen days;' ample time for Peter to have seen what I was, and to have proclaimed me to the world as a deceiver, if the Gospel which I preached was not consistent with his own. Therefore they who cavil at me involve Peter also in the charge of conniving at error and delusion." But thus indicating his respect for Peter and James, "he wisely guards himself against any imputations on the part of his Judaizing adversaries, that he, a new Apostle, was liable to the charge of disparaging the original Apostles of Christ. And he prepares the way for what he is about to say in the next chapter concerning his resistance to St. Peter."—R.]

Ver. 20. Now the things which I write unto you.—Ver. 20 contains a solemn asseveration, which has its ground in the importance of the account just given for the Apostle's purpose, namely, to prove his own apostolic dignity.

[Ver. 21. Into the regions of Syria and Cilicia;—No mention is made of his going into Syria in the narrative in the Acts, but he is said to have been brought down to Cesarea, and sent forth to Tarsus (in Cilicia), where Barnabas afterwards went to seek him (Acts ix. 30; xi. 25). There is no discrepancy. Paul may have gone to Antioch on his way to Cilicia, or returned that way in his labors before Barnabas came for him; or the expression here may be indefinite, since "Syria and Cilicia" appears in history almost as a generic geographical term, the more important district being mentioned first. Comp. CONY. and HOWSON. 1. pp. 104, 105. LANGE's Comm., Acts, p. 182.—R.]

Ver. 22. And I was unknown.—This remark also belongs to the proof that he had not been a disciple of the Apostles, for had he stood in near connection with them, he could not but have become known to the churches of Judea.—The churches of Judea, i. e., outside of Jerusalem. [The phrase which are in Christ Jesus, doubtless means "which are incorporated with Him who is the head" (ELLCOTT), yet it is also used to distinguish the bodies of believers from other bodies, of Jews, for example. ALFORD: "By thus showing the spirit with which the churches of Judea were actuated toward him, he marks more strongly the contrast between them and the Galatian Judaizers."—R.]

Ver. 23. Is now preaching the faith.—Πιστις here also not=Christian doctrine [it being very doubtful, as ELLICOTT remarks, whether πιστις ever has in the N. T., this more distinctly objective sense, so frequent in ecclesiastical writers. See also the valuable note of LIGHTFOOT, p. 152, sq. on the word "faith."—R.], but=Faith; he preached that men should believe, as well as, of course, what they should believe. Formerly he sought by persecution to hinder men from believing in Christ, that is, he was destroying it; i. e., Faith.

Ver. 24. In me.—Paul is not only regarded as the occasion of the praise, but as the foundation on which their faith rested. "With this impression which Paul then made upon the congregations in Judea, the hateful plotting of the Judaizers in Galatia against him stood in striking contrast. Therefore the added clause." MEYER. [ELLCOTT: "The preposition in such cases as the present, points to the object as being, as it were, the sphere in which, or the substratum on which the action takes place."—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. How Paul was taught. A right understanding of ver. 12, according to which Paul here denies only that his calling and preparation to be an Apostle (a preacher of the gospel) was through men, is by no means inconsistent with assuming, as in any case is necessary, that Paul learned the historical particulars of the life of Jesus not by immediate intuition, but through the testimony of men, as indeed the Apostle in other passages unhesitatingly expresses the traditional character of his historical knowledge, as in 1 Cor. xv. 1; ix. 14; vii. 10, 25; also xi. 23. Comp. on this the instructive article of PARET, "Paul and Jesus." Jahrbücher für deutsche Theologie B. 3, H. 1, 1858. "The passage in the Galatians," remarks PARET, "becomes, in fact, first fairly intelligible by assuming as above. Just because Paul was remitted, in respect to particulars, to the testimony of others, could his opposers make the attempt to represent his whole knowledge and teaching, and ultimately his faith in Jesus itself, as something merely derivative, to construct the whole man, as it were, out of purely external Christian influences, human in immediate origin, and thereby to depress him in the esteem of his churches below the Apostolic elevation, to place him on one level with common Christians, and to dispute his right to make valid decisions in the domain of doctrine and discipline. If his antagonists thus made this one side promiment, in a one-sided, unintelligent way, Paul was constrained, accordingly, to bring the other side forward in the strongest light: to show that it was not from men or through any man that he from a persecutor had become an Apostle, but through Jesus Christ Himself, whom he had seen alive; that his gospel was not a school task got by heart, but rested upon a revelation of Jesus." But according to the representation of the course of events in our chapter, according to which Paul for three years did not come at all, and then came only for a very short time, into contact with the senior Apostles, we must assume that he did not derive even his knowledge of the historical particulars of the life of Jesus from these, but from other Christians; possibly from Ananias. In view of the attack which his apostolic rank suffered, compared with that of the senior Apostles, even this circumstance is of moment to him, although it was not from the beginning precisely the result of design.

[It will appear from the exegetical notes on ver. 12, how labored an effort is required to support the view, that Paul does not intend to assert here that he had learned his gospel through revelation from Jesus Christ. Of course on any theory of inspiration, save that mechanical one, which ignores the human element, it will be admitted that Paul learned the facts of the life and death of Christ from human lips; but that must be a narrow view of the gospel as Paul preached it, which could limit his "being taught it" to such human statements. "Paul does not mean here the outward historical information concerning the life of Christ, but the internal exhibition of Christ to his spiritual sense as the Messiah, and the only and all-sufficient Saviour of the world, and the unfolding of the true import of His death and resurrection; in other words the spiritual communication of the gospel system of saving truth as taught by him in his sermons and Epistles" (SCHAFF). It is more in accordance both with Paul's argument here, and with the actual phenomena of his history to believe that after the revelation on the way to Damascus there were "subsequent special disclosures of the Spirit, respecting single points of Christian doctrine and practice; for we are to conceive the inspiration of the Apostles in general as not merely an act, done once for all, but a permanent influence and state, varying in strength as occasion required" (SCHAFF). ELLICOTT very judiciously remarks: "On the one hand we may reverently presume that all the fundamental truths of the Gospel would be fully revealed to St. Paul before he commenced preaching; so, on the other, it might have been ordained, that (in accordance with the laws of our spiritual nature) its deeper mysteries and profounder harmonies should be seen and felt through the practical experiences of his apostolical labors."—R.]

2. The Revelation from Jesus Christ. Paul has been called by the Lord Himself to the apostleship, as well as the other Apostles, with the single exception that they were called by the Lord in His state of humiliation, he by the Lord in His state of exaltation; this is the fundamental truth, which stands to the Apostle immovably firm, and on which he founded the whole proof of his apostolic parity. There can therefore be no doubt that he was conscious of an objective appearance of Christ, in the well known occurrence on the way to Damascus, and we have in the decision with which Paul himself in this doctrinal treatise, in opposition to hostilely disposed antagonists, asserts this immediateness of his calling through Christ, the simplest and surest proof for the historical character of the narrative respecting the conversion of Paul contained in the Acts. For, as has been already remarked in the exegesis, we are of course not to think of a merely internal vocation—a calling in spirit. Such a notion would take away from the proof which Paul is setting forth its very ground and foundation. It is true that in it a spiritual operation, an operation of the Spirit of God upon the mind of the Apostle, also took place ("to reveal within me"), but only in consequence of the objective outward appearance of Christ. This itself was, first of all, the deciding and penetrating power: upon it all turned. And very naturally. That Christ had risen and was living, became by means of this at once a certainty to Paul. This, however, involved almost necessarily that total revolution of all his views and of the direction of his life, which followed. For Paul was a man who even previously stood upon the foundation of Israelitish faith, and whose faith in the Messiah was in itself steadfast, and who had even been misled by this to take his hostile position against Jesus and His cause, under the delusion that the dignity of Messiah was claimed for Him presumptuously. So much the more overpowering must the impression of the actual appearance of Christ, who was thereby manifested as risen and exalted to Heaven, have been upon him. This was a sudden collapse of the system held fast with so much zeal, a sudden conviction of the nothingness of that persuasion to which he had so energetically clung, and, moreover, a conviction through fact, against which therefore there was nothing more to object. As it would have been almost incomprehensible if that effect had not followed, which did follow, so on the other hand this effect presupposes the definite cause which is related in the Acts, and indicated by the Apostle himself in this passage. [That the conversion of Paul must necessarily follow the actual appearance of Jesus Christ to him, is not to be assumed in order to establish the fact of such appearance; for as in the narrative prominence is given to the actual revelation to Paul, here the stress is laid by the Apostle himself on the other fact, the revelation of Christ within him; both facts are essential in accounting for the conversion of Paul, and for Christianity itself.—R.] That the Apostle in this passage by "revelation from Christ," "to reveal His Son within me," means primarily only the external revelation at his conversion is, of course, not inconsistent with his having received subsequent revelations, such as that mentioned in Acts xxii. 17, which, however, as an εἶναι ἐν ἐκράτει, appears to be distinguished from that first fundamental one, or such as are alluded to in 2 Cor. xii., and besides immediately afterwards in this Epistle ii. 2. (Comp. 1 Tim. i. 13).

3. The calling of Paul. The conversion of Paul according to his own representation is to be viewed essentially as a call to the apostleship. Although at the same time his conversion was of course for him personally, of the greatest moment, and undoubtedly the condition of his apostolic activity (comp. 1 Tim. i. 14), yet strictly speaking the appearance on the way to Damascus had as its end the calling to the apostleship as well, and not merely his personal conversion to Christianity. Indeed, according to the Apostle's own conception, the eighth chapter of Acts would be better entitled: The Calling of Paul. In this relation of the event to the whole church—inasmuch as it specially concerned the calling of an Apostle, that which is extraordinary in it, namely, the revelation of Christ finds its explanation. This event appears also as a call to the apostleship according to the representation of the Apostle in Acts ix. 15; xxii. 15; xxvi. 17, that is, it was first made known to Ananias, but in immediate connection with the wonderful scene, so that the purpose of the latter cannot be mistaken, and Paul, before Herod Agrippa, Acts xxvi. 17, could speak of the message which was communicated to him by the mouth of Ananias, as an immediate message of Jesus to himself. The definite direction to preach the gospel among the Gentiles, Paul first received, according to Acts xxii. 21, during his first visit to Jerusalem. Yet even the first commission he received, pointed in a very distinct manner to the Gentiles, so that from the very beginning his call as Apostle of the Gentiles, in distinction from the other Apostles, was firmly established. So far, therefore, Paul is not to be reckoned with them, as thirteenth or indeed as twelfth (if the choice of Matthias be considered a premature one), but he stands beside them, in a certain measure over against them, with a special calling; only in the originality of his apostleship he is not inferior to them, but fully their peer. Comp. ii. 7, 9. Furthermore, the special purpose of his calling stands certainly in a causal connection with the manner of the calling. "The Paul who through so unexpected a mercy of God was brought to the knowledge of His Son, was well fitted for the preaching of the same among the Gentiles, called as they also were out of God's unlooked for mercy" (RIEGER). The very manner of his calling, out of pure grace, passing thus a sentence of condemnation upon the legal position, caused him to know that to the Gentiles also, who are ἀνομοι, the way to salvation of grace must stand open. Comp. also for 2 and 3, LANGE's Commentary, Acts, p. 165 sq.

4. Paul set apart by God. Paul cannot regard himself otherwise than as destined by God Himself, even in his mother's womb, for what he now is, separated to the peculiar calling of the apostleship (an analogy, as it were, to the Nazarete's vow, by which the child was dedicated, even from the womb, to be a Nazarite). His life up to his conversion, Paul then of course regards as standing in opposition to this, his divine destination; and therefore a special vocation was necessary. This vocation, however, has its root in the elections and as this, of course, was an entirely free one, founded on no manner of merit (as being entirely precedent to the whole course of his life), the calling, therefore, was a pure act of grace ("by his grace"), on account of the opposition in which the previous life of Paul stood to his destined work. In the connection of this particular passage Paul contemplates his previous life from no other point of view, and certainly therefore does not designate himself as one set apart even from his mother's womb, because he thought that before his conversion he possessed qualities for the sake of which God had called him. It is true his natural gifts and his acquirements of knowledge served to capacitate him for his vocation; and it was doubtless providential that even before his conversion he was the person that he was; and this natural adaptedness itself had its root in the divine destination of the man. And negatively, beyond question, the legal zeal by which Paul was animated, bringing as it did his subsequent evangelical position into so much more decided contrast with it, was advantageous to his apostolic activity, as in general the zeal with which Paul acted—at first, it is true, in the interest of the law, turned afterwards to the good of the gospel. Otherwise, however, his religious character, as a blindly legal, Pharisaical one, resting on the righteousness of works, stood in decided opposition to his destination. "He has called me," says the Apostle. But how? For my standing as a Pharisee? For my holy and blameless life? For my admirable works? No; I trow! Still less, then, for my blasphemy against God, my persecution and mad rage. How then? Through his pure grace." LUTHER.—[CALVIN:—He intends to assert that his calling depends on the secret election of God; and that he was ordained an Apostle not because by his own industry he had fitted himself, but because God had counted him worthy to undertake that high office, and because, before he was born, he had been set apart by the secret purpose of God. The Apostle had most explicitly attributed his calling to the free grace of God, when he traced its origin to his separation from the womb. But he repeats the direct statement ("by his grace") both to take away all grounds of boasting by his commendation of Divine grace, and to testify his own gratitude to God.—R.]

5. Paul's walk in Judaism. "His former walk Paul calls a walk in Judaism: if it had been a walk in the footsteps of the faith of Abraham, it would have led him to faith in the gospel. It was, therefore, a walk in the Judaism that was tending towards apostasy, that, under pretext of the law, would defend itself against the faith in Christ." RIEGER.—Judaism of course here means the Jewish religion in its then form, when the soul of the Old Covenant, by which it pointed beyond itself, and in general its character of promise, was more or less overlooked. Or at least the legal sense in which the whole divine revelation was then apprehended, took away the right understanding of this character of promise. Hence the incapacity to understand Him in whom the fulfillment came. On this account proficiency in Judaism and persecution of the Christian church could go hand in hand with each other.

6. Paul's solemn oaths. The solemn asseverations which Paul more than once utters (in ver. 20, Rom. i. 9; ix. 1; 2 Cor. xi. 31), would of themselves sufficiently show how little the passages, Matt. v. 34 sq., James v. 12 sq., are meant to forbid swearing in itself and totally, and how unwarranted it is to limit lawful oaths to oaths required by the magistrate, while on the other hand we certainly cannot be too strongly warned against all lightness in the taking of an oath. It must ever, as here, have respect to a weighty matter. [WORDSWORTH from Augustine: "An oath which cometh not from the evil of him who swears, but from the unbelief of him to whom he swears, is not against our Lord's precept: 'Swear not.' Our Lord commands that as far as in us lies we should not swear; which command is broken by those who have in their mouths an oath as if it were something pleasant in itself. As far as in him lies, the Apostle swears not. He does not catch at an oath with eagerness, but when he swears it is by constraint, through the infirmity or incredulity of those who will not otherwise believe what he says."—R.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 11. RIEGER:—In the address he has omitted the customary appellations: saints, beloved of God, etc.; after the first rebuke, however, he now adds, as the mollifying ointment, the name of "brethren." What we cannot always do in unimpaired love, may yet be done at times in hope.

Ver. 12. LUTHER (who emphasizes this so expressly in remarking on this passage):—Human teaching, human tradition, though it come down from holy fathers and teachers, from the holy Church herself, is in itself nothing; for in all this there may be error, just because it is human. And hence we must not let any one scare us by appealing to never so great human authorities; over against all this the only concern is, to abide simply by the Word of God.

SPENER:—Such as should be true, enlightened preachers, must have learned the Gospel through revelation from Christ; not immediately, to be sure, but so that, having been instructed by men, Christ's spirit by means of such instruction having become a power in their hearts, they truly have a divine light in their souls, from which they then enlighten others.

The gospel no work of man: 1. as a word of doctrine, not sprung from men, nor taught by men, but by Christ Himself (who brought it Himself and through whom alone His people have it); 2. as a word of comfort, only through Him can we commit ourselves to it; 3. as a word of power, in which there should be no change, from which no departure.

Ver. 13. RIEGER:—Oh, how often and how toilsomely do we gather much that in the right light must be counted harm and dung, and cast from us.—QUESNEL:—A man may make his past sins known out of pride, but also out of humility. Whoever does not boast himself of the same, but humbles himself therefor before God, and willingly bears the shame of them before men, not relying upon himself, makes a good confession, but one not needful to be uttered before every man, as sometimes it would bring more scandal than benefit.—From STARKE:—God is wise, permitting some things to be accomplished even by His enemies, that in His time He will direct to His own honor, to which before they were quite opposed. Paul studied in the law, and in his ancestral institutions, that he might thereby the better withstand the Christians. This afterwards served to enable him to dispute all the better with the Jews in favor of Christianity, as thoroughly understanding their side.

Ver. 14. BERLEB. BIBLE:—Even unconverted men may be exceedingly zealous for ancestral traditions, traditional doctrines.—[Yes, the might of traditions, because received from "my fathers,"—whether from God or no, not being taken into the account,—is often in proportion to the ignorance of real Christianity. How conservative, yet often how contracting and how cruel the zeal for "the traditions of my fathers!" True in every age.—R.]—STARKE:—Good intentions do not of themselves make a thing good before God. Many a one means well in his conduct, and see, he still is doing a sin; yes, out of good intentions the most cruel actions may sometimes arise. Such sins, however, are much less heinous than those which spring from real godlessness and malice.

On vers. 13, 14.—Judaism and the Old Testament are different from one another: 1. the former closes the sense for Christ; 2. the latter opens it.—Persecution of the Church of God 1. takes place so easily in false zeal; 2. is so evil, therefore, take good heed!—When against others, so zealous; when for them, so lukewarm!—Take heed: is not thy progress, in reality, a retrogression?—Zeal for ancestral traditions 1. in itself good, but 2. no proof of a converted heart.—Condemnation of the perverseness of a former walk: 1. It must take place within, as a sign of a converted heart; 2. it may also become necessary before others, yet so that it is always done in humility.

Ver. 15. WÜRT. SUMM.:—Behold the Fatherly Providence of God, who careth for us and marks out the course of our life from our mother's womb. Think not that God hath passed thee over, and that thou must care for thyself. Fear God and trust Him, for what He has designed for us from our mother's womb will be sure to come, and no one shall divert it from us.—BERLEB. BIBLE:—As Paul here does, so should we look back and behold God from behind, as God says to Moses. God gives preintimations, which are forgotten. But then men should wake up when the work of God is fulfilled, and bethink themselves. His work is nothing uncertain and doubtful, although we cannot constrain others to believe it. Nevertheless we yet ourselves may know well enough how we are to look upon it.

[BUSHNELL:—Every man's life a plan of God. Go to God Himself, and ask for the calling of God; for as certainly as He has a place or calling for you, He will somehow guide you into it. Do you call it success, that you are getting on in a plan of your own? There cannot be a greater delusion.—R.]

Ver. 16. SPENER:—To the rightly profitable administration of the preacher's office, there is needful the revelation of God in us, that we should have a living knowledge of that which we are to declare to others. Without this, the word preached retains, to be sure, its power, if it is left pure and unadulterated; but such people cannot well leave it pure, or set it forth worthily; they understand not to apply it rightly, and destroy much of its power with the hearers.—

BERL. BIBLE:—The true work of God is done within, albeit He uses all manner of means thereto. The hurt is within; therefore, must the enlightenment also have place within. God must come and take away the veil. There needs then a heavenly illumination. This is the crown of conversions, that the Son becomes right plainly known to a man. But there are many veils between, and one after another is taken away, till one comes at last into the knowledge of God and the Son.

RIEGER:—The Son of God is still the pith and kernel of all revelation to be wished for in the heart.—LUTHER:—If the gospel is a revelation of the Son of God, as Paul declares, it is then certain that it does not accuse poor consciences, nor terrify them, but of Christ alone does it teach, who is no law nor work, but our righteousness, wisdom, sanctification, and redemption.—The gospel is a divine word, that comes down from Heaven, and is revealed by the Holy Ghost, yet so that the outward word goes before. For even St. Paul himself first heard the outward word from Heaven: Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? Not till then did he have secret and hidden, inner revelations.—Among the Gentiles, therefore, should be preached no law, but the gospel; no Moses, but God's Son; no righteousness of works, but the righteousness of faith. This is the right preaching, whereto the heathen have claim, and which is apt for them.—STARKE:—Paul was chiefly a teacher of the Gentiles, and that of divine purpose. Therefore we act not against God's counsel if we keep especially to Paul's writings (not excluding the other apostolical books), because in these we find most distinctly and most expressly what suits our condition, and is needful for us to know.—[WORDSWORTH:—A striking contrast! He who had been stricken with blindness as a persecutor, has now Christ, the Light of the world, revealed in him as a preacher. He who was himself dark, has become a light to others, a light revealing to them Christ.—R.]

On vers. 15 and 16. The grace of God, as free (without any merit of ours) as it is mighty in working—it can change the hearts so fully, that the man throws himself into the directly opposite course.—It is God, who defines our life's course: therefore, courage!—All depends on this, that the Son of God be revealed in us.—The revelation of Christ in us: 1. wherein it consists; 2. how it is brought to pass (only through God's grace); 3. whereto it helps.—Christ, the marrow 1. of all Christian knowledge, 2. of all Christian testimony—God reveals His Son in the hearts of believers, that they may preach Him among the Gentiles. The former attains its purpose only in the latter; the latter has its foundation only in the former.—Every Christian, even without a special call to the ministry, is yet called to preach Christ among the heathen, that is he is called to a steady testimony in deed (and more or less also in word), against all heathen living, to call men back from dead idols to serve the living God.

Ver. 16. LUTHER:—Herein the Apostle did right. For it would, indeed, have been a godless thing, if he would have had the divine revelation strengthened by man's counsel, like one who doubted thereon.—STARKE, after the Berlenb. Bible:—Yet the meaning is not, that we may not hear other people's opinion, yet we are not to give it the præ, the upper hand, where God has given His testimony. If the will of God is plain, and if the matter is plain in God's word, there is no need to ask other men for counsel. But if the will of God is yet doubtful, we may well ask good friends for advice; only these advisers must be such as possess the fear of God and wisdom.

—RIEGER:—Now, as then, the surest course for every one who will find the way of life is, to look alone upon God's commandment, to make the testimonies of the Lord his counsellors, and to hasten thereunto. Without this faithfulness in that which is hidden, the best advice of another may become a temptation and a snare.—HEDINGER:—Much doubting and long considering spoils matters. The good will, which God creates, goes to work and does not stand hesitating long.

Divine guidance and human counsel in their right relation to each other.

Ver. 17 sq. RIEGER:—God foresaw all that would afterwards be brought against Paul, therefore He so ordered his ways that men could not say: he received his authority from the chief Apostles at Jerusalem; nor yet on the other side: he does not presume to go to Jerusalem; he joins himself with no one. God's good Spirit always brings us out into a plain way.

Even the apparently slight, accidental circumstances of our lives stand under God's direction; if we know it not at the time, yet afterwards we do.

[Ver. 18. BURKITT:—Ministers ought to maintain correspondency and familiarity with each other, in token of their harmony. But though this visit was in the most delightful and desirable, yea most profitable company, yet it was but for fifteen days. After the short time spent in visiting, we must return to our business, and mind, above all things, our ministerial charge.—R.]

Ver. 20. STARKE:—God is a witness of the truth, and a righteous judge of all lies. Can you in all that you say, call on God as the witness of its truth? In all cases this ought to be possible, although it is seldom needful or proper. Ver. 21. It is excellent, when any one, having left his country and his friends, a wicked man, returns back to them again a true child of God. Universities should especially serve this purpose, that those who went to them unconverted youths, should return home converted ones. Ver. 23. It is of God's grace, when from a persecutor and misleader a man becomes a true teacher and confessor. O wonder! Is not that as much as if a dead man were raised to life? And it serves to the praise of the Divine compassion, that the Lord does not destroy His enemies, but wins them over and converts them to his service.—RIEGER:—The glory redounding to God from his conversion has wiped out much of the harm of his former course.

When Jesus, here and there again,
His time of grace declares,
That mercy count as thine own gain,
Which others find as theirs.

2. In a subsequent conference in the mother church, he had most definitely guarded the Gospel liberty over against the demands of false brethren; while the Apostles had been fully convinced of his divine mission to preach to the Gentiles, and hence in an entirely free and peaceful agreement a division of the field of labor had been decided upon, and the Gentile world committed to him, without any obligation (respecting doctrine) to the mother church.

(CHAP. ii. 1-10.)

- 1 Then fourteen years after I went up again to Jerusalem with Barnabas, and took 2 Titus with me also [also with me]. And I went up by revelation, and communicated unto [or laid before] them that [the] gospel which I preach among the Gentiles, but privately to them which were [are] of reputation, lest by any means [perchance]¹ I should run [be running]² or had [have]³ run, in vain. But neither [not even] Titus, who was with me, being [though he was]⁴ a Greek, was compelled to be 4 circumcised: And that because of [the] false brethren unawares [insidiously]⁵ brought in, who came in privily [crept in] to spy out our liberty which we have in
5 Christ Jesus, that they might bring us into bondage:⁶ To whom we gave place by subjection [by the submission, i. e., required of us]⁷ no, not [not even]⁷ for an hour;
6 that the truth of the gospel might continue with you. But of those who seemed to be somewhat, [who are of reputation—]⁸ whatsoever they were, it maketh no matter to me: God accepteth no man's person: for they who seemed to be somewhat in conference added nothing to me: [—to me those who are of reputation imparted⁹ nothing]:
7 But contrariwise, when they saw that the gospel of the uncircumcision was committed unto me [that I am entrusted with the gospel of the uncircumcision],¹⁰ as the gospel of the circumcision was unto Peter [as Peter with that of the circumcision]: (For he that wrought effectually [omit effectually] in [for]¹¹ Peter to [toward] the apostleship of the circumcision, the same [omit the same] was mighty in me [wrought for me also] toward the Gentiles;) And when James, Cephas,¹² and John, who seemed to be pillars, perceived the grace that was given unto me, they [and became aware of the grace that was given unto me, James and Cephas and John, who were esteemed as pillars,¹³ gave to me and Barnabas the right hands of fellowship; that we *should go*¹⁴ unto 10 the heathen [Gentiles], and they unto the circumcision. Only they would that we should remember the poor; the same which [which very thing]¹⁵ I also was forward to do.

² Ver. 2.—[This form of the English present undoubtedly gives the better meaning. So Alford, Ellicott, Lightfoot.—R.]

³ Ver. 2.—[“Have” must take the place of “had” for grammatical reasons, “should” being an auxiliary here also.—R.]

⁴ Ver. 3.—[The E. V. is literally correct, but does not bring out the reason for his being circumcised, here implied.—R.]

⁶ Ver. 4.—[The reading of the Rec. καταδουλώσωμαι is generally regarded as a correction, since the subjunctive usually follows iva. The future καταδουλώσουσιν is found in N. A. B. C. D. E., and adopted by modern editors.—R.]

⁷ Ver. 5.—(Τῇ ὑποταγῇ, a particular submission, that demanded of us.—R.)

⁹ Ver. 6.—(Τῶν δοκούντων εἶναι τι. The idea of “seeming to be somewhat,” must give place to that of “being deemed somewhat.” So Alford, Ellicott, Lightfoot, and most commentators, and E. V. ver. 2. The very strong anacoluthon is rendered more easy by putting ὅσοι . . . λαμβάνει, “whatsoever . . . person” in a parenthesis, and placing “to me” in the beginning of the resumptive clause, as indeed is done in the Greek, ἐμοὶ standing first.—R.]

¹¹ Ver. 7.—[The structure is altered from the original in the E. V., “I” and “Peter” are the proper subjects of the respective clauses. “Am entrusted with” is a better rendering of ἐπιστευμαι, the perfect of permanent state.—R.]

¹² Ver. 8.—[Εὐγενὴς takes iv after it, when the meaning is “wrought in;” here it is the simple dative. The E. V. renders the same verb differently in this verse. Literally: “energized,” “gave strength to.”—R.]

¹⁴ Ver. 9.—[The order of the E. V. is an inversion of the original. The true order, given above, is found in Wickliffe's, Tyndale's, Cranmer's, Bishop's and Rhemish, with a slight variation from the above reading. The participle γινώσκεις is co-ordinate with ἰδόντες (ver. 7). The whole passage should read thus: “When they saw that I am entrusted with the gospel of the uncircumcision, as Peter with that of the circumcision: (For he that wrought for Peter toward the apostleship of the circumcision, wrought for me also toward the Gentiles;) and became aware of the grace that was given unto me, James and Cephas and John, who were esteemed as pillars, gave to me and Barnabas the right hands of fellowship."—R.]

¹⁵ Ver. 10.—[Ὁ αὐτὸ τοῦτο, is stronger than "the same which." "Which very thing" (Ellicott). Alford more literally: "Which was the very thing that I also was anxious to do."—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. Then fourteen years after.—Is this to be reckoned from the calling of the Apostle, or from his first journey to Jerusalem (chap. i. 18)? At first view we might incline to the latter opinion. But the period of time mentioned chap. i. 18, is unquestionably to be reckoned from the calling, not from the return to Damascus; it is natural, therefore, to do the same here. His calling is the deciding point of time, and Paul wishes to show what he was doing from that time on, how his apostolical activity has its root in the revelation of Christ then given, and not in human instruction. Besides, if it is acknowledged that Paul here does not mean to enumerate his journeys to Jerusalem in an uninterrupted series, but that the journey to the apostolic council is here meant, there is no purpose served in giving the interval between the two journeys; but it might well be of importance to make known how many years he had already spent in his apostolical office. It would be important to know that, having received it at his calling, he had already been long in the exercise of it, when the other Apostles expressed their concurrence with his doctrine. Comp. also ELWERT, Programm on Galat. ii. 1-10. The difficult question, which of the Apostle's journeys to Jerusalem, mentioned in the Acts, is here meant, is too extended to be treated in our present space. Besides, it is of more essential importance for the Acts than for our Epistle. For no one doubts the historical character of the journey mentioned in the Epistle. The result of my investigation is that it was no other than the journey to the apostolic council, that it is not that mentioned Acts xi. 30—since he is not giving an unbroken enumeration—nor that mentioned Acts xviii. 21 (against WIESELER).

[Although this question occupies so large a space in most commentaries on this Epistle, the view given above has been so ably defended latterly, and is now so well established, that a synopsis of the argument and a reference to more extended discussions will be sufficient. The point from which Paul reckons, is his conversion, "being a purely subjective epoch" (ELLICOTT). SCHAFF thus states the case: "The Acts mention five journeys after his conversion, viz.: 1. ix. 23 (comp. Gal. i. 18), the journey of the year 40, three years after his conversion. 2. xi. 30; xii. 25, the journey during the famine year in 44. 3. xv. 2, the journey to the apostolic council in 50 or 51. 4. xviii. 22, the journey in 54. 5. xxi. 15 (comp. Rom. xv. 25 sq.), the last visit, on which he was made a prisoner and sent to Cæsarea, in 58.

"Of these journeys the first, of course, cannot be meant on account of Gal. i. 18. The second is excluded by the chronological date in ii. 1. For as it took place during the famine of Palestine and in the year in which Herod died,

A. D. 44, it would put the conversion of Paul back to the year 30, which is much too early. Some proposed to read four instead of fourteen, but without any critical authority whatever. There is no necessity why Paul should have mentioned this second journey, since it was undertaken simply for the transmission of a collection of the Christians at Antioch for the relief of the brethren in Judea, and not for the purpose of conferring with the Apostles on matters of dispute. In all probability he saw none of them on that occasion, since in that year a persecution raged in which James the elder suffered martyrdom, and Peter was imprisoned. The fifth journey cannot be meant, as it took place after the composition of the Epistle to the Galatians and after the dispersion of the Apostles. Nor can we think of the fourth, which was very short and transient (Acts xviii. 21, 22), leaving no time for such important transactions as are here alluded to; nor was Barnabas with him on that occasion, having separated from Paul some time before (Acts xv. 39).

"We must therefore identify our journey with the third one mentioned in the 15th chapter of Acts. For this took place in 50 or 51, i. e., fourteen years after his conversion (37), and was occasioned by the important controversy on the authority of the law of Moses and the exact relation of the Gentile converts to the Christian church (Acts xv. 2). This visit Paul could not possibly pass over, as it was of the greatest moment to his argument. It is true our passage differs somewhat from the account given by the Acts. But the difference is not irreconcilable. Luke, in keeping with the documentary character of his historical narrative, gives us only the public transactions of the council at Jerusalem; Paul shortly alludes to his personal conference and agreement with the Apostles (ver. 2); both together give us a complete history of that remarkable convention, the first Synod in Christendom, for the settlement of the first doctrinal and practical controversy which agitated the Church." (SCHAFF, Comm. in loco.) See also his Apostolic Church, p. 245 sq.; CONYB. and HOWSON, Vol. I., p. 227 sq.; MEYER and WORDSWORTH, in loco; ALFORD, Vol. II., Proleg., p. 26; and the valuable note of LIGHTFOOT, p. 122 sq. The authorities in support of this view might be multiplied.—R.]

Ver. 2. And I went up by revelation.—Not without design, doubtless, does he bring into view the fact that he went up κατὰ ἀποκάλυψιν, and so was again deemed worthy of a special revelation from God. He will also remove every thought of his having been, as it were, obliged to present himself before the Apostles, of their having summoned him before them. Laid before them the gospel—that which I preach among the Gentiles, namely, that they are justified by faith.—"Them," probably the whole church of Jerusalem.—But privately to them which are of reputation.—Besides having addressed the Christians in Jerusalem generally, he appears to have held separate conferences with those "of reputation." Wieseler's distinction, however, is quite arbitrary; making vers. 3-5 contain the account of his general agreement with the whole church of Jerusalem, and vers. 6-10 the first account of the separate conferences with the Apostles. [Alford thinks there was but one conference, making κατ' ἰδίαν ἑξ ἑκαστοῖς; "when I say 'to them,' I mean privately to those," etc., but the view given above (that of MEYER, ELLICOTT, LIGHTFOOT) is preferable. The general conference is described Acts xv.; "they declared what things God had done with them," (Acts. xv. 4) may refer to these private conferences which probably preceded. The emphasis here is undoubtedly on the private consultations, the result of the public council being already known to the Galatians.—R.] The judgment of "them" [the whole body] is thrown in the background, and he only speaks of "those in reputation," just mentioned; for the fact that he had received their acquiescence is what he is opposing to the false teachers. Hence we must regard what is stated in ver. 3, as their judgment also.—δοκοῦντες, astimati, principal persons. Men of authority; in fact, doubtless, the senior Apostles; especially the three who are named afterwards in ver. 9. He calls them not "Apostles," but δοκοῦντες, "men of repute" because it is as authorities, as those who stood in repute in the Jerusalem church first, but also in the Christian church generally, nay more, were decisive authorities, that they come into consideration. For precisely this is of moment to him, to be able to say to the Galatians that he has been acknowledged by these as an equally authorized Apostle. Of course δοκοῦντες does not in the least imply a disparagement of the Apostles themselves, for it is the church that accords to them this consideration;—the expression conveys a censure upon this estimation in the church only so far as it might imply a failure to recognize his own apostolic dignity. The censures therefore, touched especially this estimation in the sense in which the Apostles were δοκοῦντες for the Galatian false teachers, and in which these turned it to their own account. The censure of this false preference is given prominence in ver. 6, by the additional phrase "whatsoever they were." Paul cannot intend to dispute in the least that in the right sense the senior Apostles were δοκοῦντες for the Christians. [The force of Paul's expression is weakened by rendering "were" of reputation," since when he writes, they "are" of reputation, hence thus brought into the argument (LIGHTFOOT).—It must be noted also that Paul throughout does not use the word "Apostle." Whether they were Apostles or no, is not evident from anything in the passage, except the mention of James and Cephas and John (ver. 9), and whether that James was either an Apostle or one of the twelve is an open question. Without discussing the point here, it may be suggested that one reason for not calling them "Apostles," was that one of the three "who seemed to be pillars," and "of repute" was not an Apostle, but James the Just, the head of the church at Jerusalem. This will not only explain the omission of the title, but meet subsequent difficulties.—R.]

Lest perchance I should be running or have run in vain.—The sense remains essentially the same, whether we take μήπως as a final particle, or—whether perchance. After the thorough exposition of WIESELER, however, the latter is to be preferred. (So also MEYER in 4th ed.) Of course, however, he does not mean to say that he himself was doubtful about it. This would have been in conflict with the whole purpose of his detailed account, and would have represented him as dependent on the Senior Apostles. He wished only, on account of the antagonists of his teaching, to obtain from the Apostles, on whose authority these supported themselves, a confirmation of this teaching, in order to cut off every pretext from his opponents. "Run in vain"—labor to no purpose, operam perdere. This would have been the case, if Paul had actually proclaimed a false doctrine, with which the senior Apostles could not agree. The outward success of his preaching is not primarily in view, though we may conclude from ver. 7, 8, 9, that he spoke of this also. Others take μήπως as a final particle, and interpret as follows: in order not to appear as one who was running or had run, in vain, as might have been the case, if I had not submitted my gospel to examination, had its harmony with Apostles established; but the idea of "appearing" is extraneous to the passage. [For a clear discussion of the grammatical and exegetical difficulties of this clause, see ELLICOTT, in loco. Whatever view be adopted, we must not concede that Paul had any doubt about his Gospel. The conditional μήπως is probably used to indicate respect for those in reputation at Jerusalem. The doubt could only concern the opinion of others, which by being opposed, might render his labors in vain.—R.] In what follows he says that he received the desired acquiescence on the part of the Apostles. He does not however at once declare this, but mentions a special circumstance, which implies it in a striking manner.

Vers. 3. But not even Titus.—The sense is clear: οὐδὲ points to a thought to be supplied. "I laid frankly before them, how I preach among the Gentiles; not concealing that I do not at all hold them to the keeping of the law, to the receiving of circumcision—and now, according to the representation of the false teachers, it was to be expected that they would appear in opposition to me; but (ἀλλά) so far was this from being the case, so far from declaring this doctrine false [or, connecting it with the last clause, so far from my having run in vain—R.], not even with respect to Titus, a born Gentile, who had come to Jerusalem, to the very mother of the Jewish Christian churches with me, was the demand made that he should be circumcised, though it might readily have been, when Jewish prejudice was so greatly offended by his uncircumcision." Still less did they censure the doctrine of Paul, or demand of him that he should preach the necessity of circumcision among the Gentile Christians as a body. The case has been thoroughly perplexed by bringing in, in direct contradiction to what the words say, the thought, that the Apostles had wished, or even demanded, the circumcision of Titus; but that Paul and Titus had set themselves against their desire. ELWERT justly remarks, Programm, p. 10: Quid enim inepius dici potest quam illud: tantum abfuit, ut apostoli causam meam improbarent, ut ne Titus quidem illis contraria petentibus obsequeretur? [The word ἡναγκάσθη seems to imply that there was a demand made for the circumcision of Titus, not by the Apostles, but by the false brethren (ver. 4). Had the idea been merely, that the circumcision was not even demanded, so strong a word would not have been used. There is some force in the suggestion of LIGHTFOOT, that the Apostles recommended Paul to yield as a charitable concession, but convinced at length that he was right, they gave him their support. Still we have not sufficient knowledge of the circumstances to decide whether Paul cites this as an evidence of the Apostles' agreement with him or of his firmness—in all probability it is both. Not even Titus, of whom as a Greek the false brethren made the demand, was required to submit—or whom as a Greek I would not allow to be circumcised, since this would have been a giving up of the whole matter. The preceding context suggests the former, the subsequent context the latter side of the occurrence. On the reasons for the non-circumcision of Titus, and the circumcision of Timothy (Acts xvi. 2), see DOCTRINAL NOTES.—R.]

Ver. 4. And that because of the false brethren.—What is to be supplied with “because of the false brethren?” After an examination of all the views presented, it appears to me that we can only say: we do not and cannot know, since Paul has broken off the sentence, and all attempts to fill it out are hazardous, from the danger of introducing foreign matter. The mention of the ψευδδελφοί is very intelligible. He has already indicated the concurrence of the Apostles by reference to the striking case of Titus, or at least, negatively, that they did not oppose him. But before he says anything definite, positive, respecting this concurrence (ver. 6 sq.), he mentions his opposers, who did not concur, who attacked him and his teaching, and had also especially occasioned his journey to Jerusalem. The mention of the false brethren, however, stirs his displeasure, so that he does not complete the thought begun, but first by a brief and fit phrase, describes his opposers, and then falling out of the construction, continues with οἱς, and expresses the thought, which probably he had in mind in mentioning the “false brethren,” namely, that he had not in the least yielded to them. In what he did not yield, is not expressed; probably to their demands, in general, respecting the obligation of the Gentile Christians to keep the law. Not till he has first established this negative result does he revert to the action of the δοκῶντες, and he now relates the positive acknowledgment, which he had from them.—If we seek a complement to διά, three suggest themselves. (1), ἀνέθεν—(EWALD, substantially). According to this, as he cannot pass over the remoter cause of his journey, namely, the intrigues of the Pharisees, the same party that had now of late again persecuted him so bitterly, he begins in ver. 4, anew, as it were, the account of this journey.—Ordinarily, however, the complement is sought in the foregoing sentence, because the somewhat abrupt character of this was rather perplexing, and its contents appeared to require the statement of a reason. This view took δέ usually as epegegetical, and therefore supplied (2) οὐκ ἡναγκάσθη, which, in fact, strongly commends itself; simply, however, in the sense: Now, this took place on account of the “false brethren,” that is, it was even on account of these, that the Christians in Jerusalem, particularly the Apostles, did not urge it upon him, lest, by yielding to them, the opinion that circumcision was necessary, should receive sanction. This contains the implied thought, that in itself they would not unwillingly have seen him circumcised, but that now, for the sake of principle, they did not press it. But this makes it necessary, first to ascribe to the Jewish Christians in Jerusalem a way of thinking, which is not ascribed to them in this chapter, but expressly limited to individuals, “false brethren,” in order afterwards to find it impossible that they should have abstained from all demands for circumcising Titus, on account of these “false brethren.” Whether the “false brethren” demanded particularly the circumcision of Titus, is not said. On the other hand, if we complete the sentence thus, the sense is inadmissible, that Paul, precisely on account of the false brethren, opposed himself to a demand to have Titus circumcised, from whomever it proceeded. This alters the plain meaning of ver. 3; ἡναγκάσθη receives the sense: the constraint, which it was attempted to exercise, was frustrated; and especially οὐδὲ, and the implied thought to which it points, is quite neglected. Then we should have this absurdity: “so far were they from disapproving my teaching, that I or Titus did not even yield when his circumcision was demanded.” If this demand is referred to the Apostles, the thought is completely inverted (see above), but even if it is referred only to the “false brethren,” it is none the less impossible. And the case remains the same, if, instead of “he was not compelled,” we supply “he was not circumcised,” still explaining it, “I or we, on account of the false brethren, did not consent, when it was desired.” Finally, (3) “He was circumcised,” is supplied (δέ therefore being taken adversatively), and in its turn defended by ELWERT, Programm, with much acuteness. And, in fact, if we must fill out the sentence, I should be most disposed to declare for this. It especially commends itself by the light which it throws both upon ver. 3 and upon ver. 11. For, beyond question, it remains somewhat enigmatical, why he instances so particularly this one fact of refusing to circumcise Titus, hastening to it even before he has spoken, on the positive side, of the reception of his preaching in Jerusalem. The reproach (ver. 11) then remains not altogether intelligible. On the other hand, all is easily explained, if we assume that Titus was then circumcised. That is, many founded upon this the allegation that he commended circumcision. But especially was this circumstance urged, in order to deduce therefrom, that his teaching had been disapproved by the Apostles, and that he had yielded to these. Therefore, he declares at once: It is not even true, as is commonly related, that Titus was constrained to receive circumcision. Titus was circumcised, not upon a requisition of the Apostles, but voluntarily by me, solely on account of the false brethren insidiously brought in, that they might not, making a handle of his being uncircumcised, prepossess the Christians in Jerusalem against me, and dispose them to a resolution unfavorable for the Gentile Christians. "Quare eandem, quam semper et in omnibus normam secutus, ne quid detrimenti capiat res Christiana, suae libertatis minime tenax illorum se voluntati submittit, imbecillioribus servit. Neutiquam fratrum Irreptitiorum habita ratione hoc fecit, sed eos respiciens, quos, quum fidei infirma ac iudicii parum subacti essent, illorum insecutionibus objectos videret. Circumcisione Titī permixta insidias hominum malignorum evitavit, animos imbecilliorum sibi conciliavit apostolus." ELWERT, p. 13. This interpretation is only apparently in conflict with ver. 5. Nay, ELWERT remarks that only so does τῇ ἰστορίᾳ find its true explanation; for that only the following translation is natural: to whom not even for an hour did we yield by the submission: "obsequium se praestitisse Paulus proficitur, sed non ita praestitisse, ut illis se victum daret vel de jure suo aliquid cederet." For he provided that the truth of the Gospel should remain with the Gentile Christians. Of course, he could not yield to the circumstances of the time, without, at the same time, giving a testimony to the evangelical truth, whereby this was maintained in its integrity. This explanation of τῇ ἰστορίᾳ, however, awakens some misgiving: could Paul well admit a "ἰστορίᾳ" towards the ψευδοδιδάσκει? Is not this expression too strong? We are tempted, therefore, even admitting this explanation of δὲ, etc., to join τῇ ἰστορίᾳ to the negation, making Paul say that an εἰκεν τῇ ἰστορίᾳ nevertheless did not take place, even if their behavior occasioned him to have Titus circumcised.

[As LIGHTFOOT well remarks: "The counsels of the Apostles of the circumcision are the hidden rock on which the grammar of the sentence is wrecked," but because the grammar is wrecked on this hidden rock, it is not necessary to wreck Paul's facts and arguments and even principles, on a rock so easily avoided as the theory of ELWERT advanced above. In fact, as MEYER remarks, such conduct "would have been unprincipled and wrong." That is an all-sufficient objection. As regards what should be supplied, it is most naturally taken from the preceding verse, to which our verse then refers, δὲ being explicative. Whether "he was not compelled," or "he was not circumcised," is open to discussion. The first implies that "those of reputation" did not compel it on this account; the other, that the thing was not done, either because Paul would not thus surrender a principle, or "those of reputation" thought it were best not to do it. As this latter does not imply any definite counsel of the other Apostles—the very point about which there is greatest doubt—it is on the whole safer to adopt it.—R.]

Ψευδοδιδάσκει (also 2 Cor. xi. 26), comp. ψευδοπρόφηται, are in general, brethren, fellow-Christians, who bear this name unworthily; specifically, because they, on account of their Judaizing opinions, especially on the necessity of circumcision for Christians, are properly still Jews. So WIESELER. Yet this in itself hardly suffices to explain the strong ψευδο (and especially the παρείσακτοι and παρείσθησον), but we must add to it their behavior towards the other Christians, the utterly unbrotherly hateful opposition (not shrinking indeed from intrigues and slanders), which they maintained against the freer evangelical views. The complete definition of "false brethren" is given in "spy out," "bring us into bondage;" they do not yet stand in the freedom which there is in Christ; nay, more they wish to deprive others also of it; nay, more, they exercise a system of espionage against these. The false teachers in Galatia were essentially such people, perhaps they were emissaries of those in Jerusalem; and on this account it is with special purpose that their conduct in Jerusalem, and their discomfiture, are mentioned. But the Galatian teachers themselves are not meant here; this would be entirely foreign to the context.—A more particular notice respecting these people is given Acts xv. 5, whatever judgment may be held of the general relation of the present chapter to Acts xv. They were, according to this, persons of the sect of the Pharisees, who, it is true, had come to believe on Jesus, that He was the Christ, but had not given up their Nomism and Ergism, and, therefore, doubtless were so much the more hostile to their former fellow-Pharisee, Paul, on account of his present position, so sharply anti-Pharisaic. Holding fast, as they thus did, essentially, to their Pharisaism, it is easy to understand that their belief in Christ had as yet produced in them few effects of moral transformation. The article describes the persons as the Pharisaical Christians, historically known to the readers; either the particular individuals were known, or, at all events, this sort of people, since the Galatian false teachers were of the same class.

Insidiously brought in.—LIGHTFOOT:—"The metaphor is that of spies or traitors introducing themselves by stealth into the enemy's camp. The camp is the Christian Church. Pharisees at heart, these traitors assume the name and garb of believers." He thus paraphrases: "The agitators, who headed the movement, were no true brethren, no loyal soldiers of Christ. They were spies, who had made their way into the camp of the gospel under false colors, and were striving to undermine our liberty in Christ, to reduce us again to bondage." WORDSWORTH:—"By mentioning these, he clears the holy Apostles from the imputation of being supposed to have been parties to such a requisition, as that Titus, a Gentile, should be compelled to be circumcised."—R.] "What is already indicated in the composite ψευδοδιδάσκει is, by the predicate παρείσακτοι, interchanging immediately after with παρείσθησον, brought forward with especial emphasis. They are called παρείσακτοι, because they have pressed in on one side of the entrance; that is, by a forbidden way, sc. into the Christian church, and, therefore, do not properly belong to it. Παρείσακτοι and παρείσθησον are doubtless to be applied to these alone, and not to an outward insinuation of themselves into a single church (for instance, that of Antioch), in order there to oppose Paul. Comp. Acts xv."—WIESELER. Of course, they did the latter also; it was closely connected with their having insinuated themselves into the Christian Church. But here, doubtless, the primary reference is only to their appearance in Jerusalem itself. A local interpretation of παρεῖσασ-τοι and παρεσῆλθον is the less necessary, as parallel expressions are found: παρεσάγειν, 2 Pet. ii. 1, and παρεσθῆναι, Jude 4, where the reference is clearly to the Christian Church in general. Who crept in to spy out.—The immediate purpose of their “creeping in” in itself was hardly “to spy out” the liberty of others; but what they did make their coming in (εἰσέρχασθαι) a “creeping in” (παρεῖσρχεσθαι) whose purpose could only be regarded as this “spying out.”

“The false brethren are thus characterized according to their common dangerousness to Christian liberty, in order to give the reason why Paul could not yield to such false brethren.”
—WIESLER.

Two things are laid to their charge: first, a “spying out of” our liberty;—they lie in ambush for our liberty, spy out in what we show ourselves freemen, turn their notice to that, but with hostile intent; therefore, how widely removed from brotherly love! Then, in the second place, they seek to reenslave the free, i. e., they demand of them to give up their freedom. By the freedom which we have in Christ Jesus is primarily meant freedom from the Mosaic law, from its ritual ordinances, and especially therefore from circumcision. The wider, deeper meaning of this freedom is involved in this, but here, doubtless, not primarily in view.
“Our liberty.” Whose? Certainly it does refer to Paul merely, but yet primarily only to those who understood the freedom in Christ, and availed themselves of it, and these without exception. But as Paul no doubt vindicates this standing fast in freedom as at least a right of all Christians, and regards the “false brethren” with their views and their conduct as in truth no Christians, the “we,” in point of fact, embraces all Christians, the Gentile Christians, of course, and also the Jewish Christians, so far as these were not “false brethren.”—In Jesus Christ, as being found in him. [SCHAFF:—“In living union with Him who is the end of the law (Rom. x. 4). This is the positive side of freedom.”—ELLCOTT:—Not “through Christ,” a meaning it may bear, but in the fuller and deeper sense “in Christ.”—R.]—That they might bring us into bondage:—that is, under the law. On this account, also, the reading καταδουλώ-σονται=make us their servants, is to be rejected, and καταδουλώσουσιν to be read, which is better attested than the subjunctive—ωσιν.

Ver. 5. To whom we gave place by the submission, no, not even for an hour.—Here “we” unquestionably, takes on a more restricted sense=I, Paul, probably also Titus himself, and Barnabas. This narrowing of the sense will appear arbitrary to no one. For here the reference is to a single, definite transaction, where Paul can have in mind only the individuals who had part in it; it is somewhat different with “freedom in Christ.” The yielding is still more strongly designated by ὑποταγή. (Comp. the different interpretation of ELWERT above, ver. 4.)

This decided refusal to yield had been adequately explained by the foregoing characterization of the pseudo-brethren; it is now given again; that the truth of the gospel might continue.—For yielding would have represented Christian freedom as void, and would have overturned the truth of the gospel, on which it is founded.—With you; in itself, doubtless, signifying with the Gentile Christians generally—nay, more, with all Christians; but Paul “individualizes the matter, with reference to those to whom he writes.” For it concerned him to bring home to them, that even at that time he had guarded the benefit of Christian freedom for them, in order to show in what contradiction their present behavior stood with this fact, since they themselves were now abjuring this benefit.

Ver. 6. But of those who are of reputation.—To the pseudo-brethren he now opposes “those of repute.” The former he withstood, from the latter he received no instruction implying disapprobation of his teaching. Ver. 6 is an anacoluthon, his language being somewhat disturbed in the thoughts of the presumption and deceit with which the Galatian false teachers had elevated the “δοκοῦντες” above him, and had vindicated the apostolic authority of the former only, denying it to him. He begins as if he would subjoin an οὐδὲν ἔλαβον. But the remark respecting the δοκεῖν εἶναι τι leads him away from this, and he continues with another verb, afterwards resuming δοκοῦντες, and giving at the same time the grounds of the parenthetical statements.
EWALD, on the contrary, however, joins οὐδὲν μοι διαφέρει with ἀπὸ τῶν δοκ.=compared with these, however high they stood, I am in nothing inferior.
It is difficult to justify this grammatically. “Of reputation.”—See above, ver. 2. The main idea implied in δοκοῦντες, used absolutely, is here clearly expressed by the addition εἶναι τι=to be something great, to be of some account; with what incidental meaning, see above.—Whatever they were, it maketh no matter to me.—On the one hand Paul has emphasized the consideration in which the Apostles stood, because it was of moment to him to be able to say, that he had been acknowledged even by these. Yet this might be misunderstood, hence the parenthesis. He emphasizes only for the sake of his readers. To him, on his own account, “it makes no difference in how high authority soever they stood;” as respected him, they did not come into consideration as δοκοῦντες, they asserted no authority: to me they imparted nothing. This exaltation of individuals—the Apostles, in such a way as to throw the authority of Paul into the shade, rests entirely upon mere human judgment. God’s census does not rank them thus: God accepteth no man’s person.—He makes no such distinction, to Him the senior Apostles are not “of repute” in contrast with Paul; he has chosen Paul to be an Apostle as much as them. And, he continues, I have a right so to speak, for those “of repute” demeaned themselves altogether agreeably to this divine valuation, and did not undertake to instruct me. [The E. V., “in conference added nothing to me,” gives the commonly received interpretation of the verb προσέθεντο: “gave no new or additional instruction.” But notwithstanding the authority for such a rendering, it does not seem to be justified by the use of the word (MEYER, ALFORD, ELLICOTT). The idea of imposing burdens is obviously inadmissible.—R.]

It is most simple to refer the ποτέ to the lifetime of Jesus—it signifies nothing to me that they enjoyed the immediate, confidential intercourse of Jesus, while I did not. For it was on this that the Judaizers founded special preëminence which they attributed to the other Apostles over Paul. Others: then in Jerusalem; which is less probable. [The point in question respecting ποτέ is: has it a temporal reference in the sense of olim, formerly (either during our Lord's lifetime or then in Jerusalem), or does it simply render δοκίμου more general and inclusive, having the force of cunque. The latter is classical, but the N. T. usage is disputed. Since it is not said anywhere that these "of repute" were Apostles, who enjoyed immediate intercourse with the Lord, the latter is, on the whole, preferable, as giving a wider signification to δοκίμους. "Were" may mean in the past from the time of narration or of the incident narrated; the latter is more probable if ποτέ is taken as referring to intercourse with the Lord during His lifetime.—R.]

Ver. 7. When they saw that I am entrusted with the gospel of the uncircumcision.—Naturally, "gospel" of course means here (comp. πείσιν, and ver. 8) an official activity of the Apostle, therefore not the gospel as to its contents, but the evangelical preaching, τὸ εὐαγγελίζεσθαι, as often. The genitives, "of the uncircumcision," "of the circumcision," are therefore gen. obj.—preaching of the gospel among the uncircumcision, or the circumcision; ver. 8 exchanges it for "apostleship of the circumcision," and as εἰς τὰ ἔθνη (vers. 8, 9) shows that the abstracts "uncircumcision," "circumcision," stand for the concretes—Jews, Heathen. That here we are not to suppose two gospels different in character, the Gospel of the Uncircumcision, and the Gospel of the Circumcision, of which the latter maintained the necessity of circumcision, while the former let it drop (BAER), but only two different circles of hearers of the same gospel, may be regarded as self-evident to the unprejudiced reader.* Peter appears as the representative of the Apostles to the Jews, because he especially had hitherto labored as such. Afterwards, however, the two other Apostles, James and John, are designated, with Peter, as Apostles for the Jews (ver. 9. αὐτοὶ δέ). "That Peter had a Gentile Christian vocation also (Acts xv. 7) is not denied, but a parte potiori fit denominatio."—MEYER. The converse applies to Paul. In ver. 9 Barnabas also appears conjointly with him, as Gentile Apostle. [It must be noted that while Paul uses the word "apostleship" in ver. 8, with reference to himself and Peter, he does not use it or anything to the same purport in ver. 9, where James and Barnabas are spoken of. The same is true of the whole passage. There is no evidence of the apostleship of James or Barnabas in this whole Epistle, whatever the probabilities may be. See notes on ver. 9.—R.] "Entrusted;"† Supply: By God through Christ—agreeably to the proof of this affirmation rendered in ver. 8. For from what facts did they perceive what is said in ver. 7 respecting the different mission of each? Primarily from what follows in ver. 8 (γάρ).

Ver. 8. For he that wrought effectually for Peter.—From the fact that God had been operative for Peter in the one, and for Paul in the other direction, they concluded that God had given to the one the one, and to the other the other vocation. How far now was God operative for one and the other?—MEYER, WIESELER:—"He furnished them forth for the apostolic office, with illumination and endowments, gave them the χαρίσματα of an Apostle." (Comp. Acts xv. 12: God did miracles and wonders by them among the Gentiles.) True, it is certainly not merely these endowments themselves that are referred to, but also and especially what they did in virtue of the same, the beginning and result of their activity, wherein God's "working" was recognized. What immediately follows in ver. 9: and became aware of the grace that was given unto me, [unfortunately misplaced in E. V.—R.] undoubtedly also refers to the outfit for the apostolic office by means of charisms, yet it is most naturally referred mainly to the success of their preaching. Precisely from this they perceived how highly endowed Paul was. They first inferred his equal apostolic calling from the "grace given," hence the calling itself cannot be meant. [Yet what more natural than that Paul should mean: "they recognize my calling, because they perceive that I was called by grace." The main reference may be to the success, but the perception of the calling through the grace given, is not to be excluded. On the two participles ιδόντες and γινόντες, LIGHTFOOT says: "the former describes the apprehension of the outward tokens of his commission, as evinced by his successful labors; the latter the conviction arrived at in consequence that the grace of God was with him."—R.]

Ver. 9. James and Cephas and John.—"James." Is this one identical with James the Lord's brother, chap. i. 19? The fact that there the additional appellation is expressly given, while it is lacking here, does not, of course, disprove the identity. Inasmuch as James had already been just mentioned as "the Lord's brother," if the same one is meant this special designation might be omitted here. The main question is: Could the James, whom Paul names in this passage, have been other than an Apostle? And this question we shall always be inclined to answer negatively. In itself it would be very intelligible, that a brother of the Lord converted to the faith, although not an Apostle, might have attained an eminent position in the church of Jerusalem. But, considering how plainly our Epistle itself brings to view the strong emphasis laid by the Jewish Christians on an immediate inauguration into the apostolate by Christ, would it have been probable that such a one, not an Apostle, would have been reckoned by these among the "pillars," "those of reputation?" And if one not an Apostle had enjoyed so eminent an estimation as a "pillar" (James being here placed even before Peter), could they then have so strongly charged upon Paul a want of parity with the senior Apostles? And would he then have found it necessary to prove his equality with such strength of assertion as he does in Gal. i. ? James, the Lord's brother also lacks this parity, and could claim it even less than Paul, since he could not appeal to any immediate revelation and calling [? comp. 1 Cor. xv. 7.—R.], and Paul certainly would not have omitted bringing this forward, thereby to invalidate the reasoning of his opponents. These are substantially WIESELER's arguments. We must then either take James the Lord's brother as identical with James, the son of Alphaeus, and therefore himself an Apostle (a view already rejected in commenting on chap. i. 19), or take the James of this passage as a different one, i. e. the son of Alphaeus and not the Lord's brother. That the James in question occupied a certain official position as chief pastor in the church of Jerusalem is justly inferred from the precedence of his name here and also from ver. 12. This on the other hand accords well with the special prominence given to Peter, vers. 7, 8. In reference to proper apostolic activity, in missionary activity, Peter precedes James.

[We are again confronted with this difficult question respecting James. On the theory of the identity of James Alphaei and James, the Lord's brother, all difficulty vanishes here, as well as in Acts xv., and for this reason it is adopted by many. The view, that there were other Apostles besides the Twelve and Paul, avoids both the other difficulties, but is on other grounds very objectionable. We are to reconcile the view advanced i. 19 (that there were two prominent men named James, one the son of Alphaeus and an Apostle, the other James the Lord's brother, who was not an Apostle) with this passage. Which is referred to here? Schmoller, following WIESELER, says, the former, to which view objection must now be made. 1. The James here referred to was the head of the church at Jerusalem. Such a position is ascribed to the Lord's brother, to James the Just; if he cannot be identified with the son of Alphaeus, the son of Alphaeus is not referred to here. 2. This position over the church of Jerusalem, so obviously implied here, does not necessarily imply that James was an Apostle. For with respect to missionary activity Peter stands first, with respect to the church at Jerusalem this James. Was not missionary work distinctively apostolic work? was not one not an Apostle more likely to be in a permanent position at Jerusalem? 3. Paul does not call these three. Apostles, any more than he calls Barnabas an Apostle. In fact all the way through he uses a term that is indefinite—"of reputation." If he meant Apostles only and wished to show his agreement with the senior Apostles, he would hardly have so carefully avoided saying so.—"Those in repute" were esteemed in Galatia as well as Jerusalem, and he was defending himself against Judaizers, who while denying his apostleship, quoted against him the mother church as well as the college of the Apostles. Hence he speaks of "the pillars" of the church then and there, not of Apostles as such, and puts them in the order of precedence in that church, "James and Peter and John." Had all of them been of the Twelve, and as such recognized his apostleship (for these three gave him the right hand of fellowship), how could James' name come first? Any argument proving

James to have done this as a distinctively apostolic act proves too much: proves him to be the head of the apostolic college. It is as head of that church, whence the Judaizing influence in Galatia came, that he takes precedence. Therefore we identify this James with the Lord's brother (so in ver. 12).—R.]

Who were esteemed as pillars—as supports of the Christian church. Christ, of course, is the foundation. The Christian world is viewed as an οικοδομή.

They gave—the right hands of fellowship.—In general—They concluded with me and Barnabas an agreement as formal and firm as it was amicable. The more precise sense is given by the preceding context, inasmuch as this agreement was founded upon that. Seeing the coöperation (ἐνεργεῖν) of God rendered to both Peter and Paul, they had become persuaded of the equal divine vocation of each, of the former to the preaching of the gospel among the Gentiles, of the latter to the preaching of the gospel among the Jews. To this clearly recognized divine will they now rendered obedience by the formation of this compact. Agreeably to this twofold vocation they regulated also the twofold activity; assigning formally to each the field of labor to which, as they had become convinced, he was called. This was, it is true, a division of the work, but in the consciousness that it was a common work of preaching the gospel, one in God, who had only assigned to one this post, and to the other that. Therefore they gave "right hands of fellowship." [LIGHTFOOT: "gave pledges." "The outward gesture is lost sight of in this expression, as appears from the fact that the plural is often used of a single person."—R.] It was to be a parallel but a coöperative activity. The assumption of BAUR therefore is entirely untenable, that it had only been a purely external compromise, that the senior Apostles after as before had held firmly the necessity of circumcision and the observance of the Mosaic law to salvation; that for the mission to the Gentiles they had tolerated Paul's so widely divergent principles, because they could not prevent them, but that a further, inner bond between Paul's mission to the Gentiles, and their mission to the Jews, did not exist. This would make "gave the right hands of fellowship" signify nothing more than, to come to an agreement and indeed really to an agreement to separate.* That we should go unto the Gentiles, and they unto the Circumcision.—The purpose of the words, according to the connection, is doubtless to point out, that in this act the acknowledgment of the parity of Paul, and particularly the approbation of his teaching, was expressed in the strongest manner. So far were the senior Apostles from demanding a change in his teaching, that by this fixed compact they gave a full sanction to it, and declared in the most unequivocal manner, that they held it to be a pure gospel and worthy to be preached. For otherwise they would not have been able so compassedly to make over the Gentile world to Paul as his mission field. To the general purpose of the statement the added clause "only," etc., (ver. 10) also contributes. One wish, to be sure, they had respecting Paul and Barnabas; which, however, related in no way to a change of doctrine, implied no obligation toward the "circumcision," concerning doctrine, but was only an entreaty to remember the poor. But the meaning and purpose of this added clause is not, that this was the only limitation of the separation here coming to light (BAUR). In practice, modifications of this partition of the field of labor arose, especially to Paul, in consequence of the Jews of the dispersion. The partition therefore is to be understood not so much ethnographically as geographically. (Comp. also ver. 10, where "the poor" means poor people in Judea, and, therefore, "circumcision" here in contrast with the Gentile countries is also Judea.)

Ver. 10. Remember the poor :—of course by gifts. As to the cause of the poverty of the Christians in Judea there are different conjectures.—Which very thing.—Paul studiously brings this forward in order to strengthen the contrast between the Jewish Christian opposition to him, and his approved zeal and affection for the Jewish Christians.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The significance of this event. On the significance, with respect to Christian doctrine and the Christian Church, of the proceedings between the Apostle Paul and the Christians in Jerusalem, especially the senior Apostles, since the proceedings themselves are not here detailed, the reader is referred to Acts xv. and to the remarks of Lechler in loco, LANGE'S Comm. Acts, p. 282 sq. Only this need be said here; by the acknowledgment of the "liberty in Christ Jesus," an emancipation from the old Covenant was for the first time effected; it was authoritatively established that a new Covenant was come, and Christianity was recognized as the absolutely perfect and the universal religion. Even though it was Paul who first brought this truth, in theory and practice, to its just validity, it was not, by any means, merely his own subjective view to such an extent as to make of Christianity something else than what it was, or was meant to be, in itself. This appears in the clearest light from his representation. Doubtless there were not a few who imputed this to him, and, therefore, were passionately hostile to the rise of his influence ("pseudo-brethren"), Jewish Christians, who were as yet more Jews than Christians. Against these Paul had to combat, and to what extent is shown, not only in our Epistle, but also in the Second Epistle to the Corinthians. But precisely those whose voice was most availing ("those of repute"), and who, at the same time, best knew what was Christ's true mind and purpose, frankly concurred with Paul: were one with him, and with them certainly all who had really become disciples of Christ, and, in the power of the Holy Ghost, had overcome all Pharisaic leanings, or had never had them. And although they for themselves did not stand upon that point of the "liberty in Christ Jesus" represented by Paul, yet these only needed a setting forth, on the part of Paul, of his preaching among the Gentiles, and of the argument inhering in the fact of its success, to convince them, in the first place of the possibility, in the case of the Gentiles, of being saved through faith in Christ alone. Comp. respecting Peter, Gal. ii. 16; moreover, his course, Acts x., his justification of it, Acts xi.; must not the other Apostles then have been prepared by the latter for the report rendered by Paul, Acts xv. ? Therefore, that chapter and Gal. ii., do not at all make the impression that they might still have had an opposite opinion and only now gave it up; and, of course, not the impression that they yet retained their antagonistic opinion, and yielded only externally. And even if they, and with them, the greater part of the Jewish Christians emancipated themselves only partially and gradually from a personal observance of the law, yet with that admission respecting the Gentiles, the principle of Christianity was acknowledged, it was acknowledged that a new Covenant had come, founded upon Christ alone.—There existed a consensus apostolorum on this question of principle: shall we have Law and the old Covenant or Christ and the new Covenant? This, thank God, is securely guaranteed, and the dissensus, which is said to have arisen between the original Apostles, as contracted Judaizers, and Paul, the man of Progress, is a discovery of modern criticism, which views testimony so plain as that of our chapter, and of Acts xv., only through the glass of its own preconceptions.

2. Liberty in Christ. In opposition to the pseudo-brethren, Paul, in the interest of the truth of the gospel, indicates the "liberty in Christ," with the utmost decision, and will not be brought into bondage. On the other hand, where the truth of the gospel is not at stake, Paul scruples not of his own accord to make himself the servant of all, and for the sake of gaining souls (1 Cor. ix. 19, 20) renounces "liberty." The rule herein contained for the conduct of the Christian is clear; he may not bind his conscience by a human ordinance, which passes itself off for a commandment of God, nor permit it to be imposed upon him as a condition of salvation; but he not only may, but ought to, make himself a servant, to bind himself, to make something a duty of conscience to himself, for the sake of a weak brother. But because he does this of free will, in thus "becoming a servant," he most shows his freedom, he does it as freeman, and remains clearly conscious of the distinction between God's commandment and man's ordinance. The rule in itself is clear, but demands much wisdom in its practical applications.

3. [Titus and Timothy. The principle just stated can best be illustrated by a reference to the Apostle's conduct in this case of Titus and that of Timothy (Acts xvi. 3) subsequently. WORDSWORTH thus judiciously states the difference: "If Timothy was circumcised (as was probably well known in Galatia), why not Titus? If not Titus, why Timothy? St. Paul replies to this question here: 'But not even he who was with me at Jerusalem, being a Gentile, was compelled to be circumcised.' I would not consent that he should be circumcised, even at Jerusalem. I do not consent to your circumcision,—because you are Gentiles, and because you have embraced the gospel, and because it would be to force you backwards, instead of forwards, if I compelled you, or permitted others to compel you, to submit to the Levitical Law. But Timothy's case was very different from yours. As has been well said by Augustine, St. Paul circumcised Timothy, in order that Timothy's mother and maternal friends might not imagine that he detested circumcision, as if it were an idolatrous thing; for circumcision was from God, but Idolatry is of the Devil. But he did not circumcise Titus, lest he should afford a handle to those who alleged that Gentiles, receiving the gospel, could not be served without circumcision; and who deceived the Gentile Christians by imputing such an opinion to St. Paul. He might perhaps have allowed even Titus to receive circumcision, as a thing indifferent, and for the sake of peace and charity. But these false brethren did not proffer circumcision as a thing indifferent, but as necessary. Observe 1) His charity, in circumcising Timothy at Lystra, in condescension to the scruples of weak brethren. 2) His courage in refusing to circumcise Titus at Jerusalem, in submission to the requisitions of false brethren. He would be tender-hearted to the erring, but he would not make the least compromise with error; and he would make no concession to any who would impose their errors on others as terms of communion.”—R.]

4. The importance of Paul's position. Paul emphasizes so decidedly the fact that the senior Apostles gave him no new instruction, but recognized him as of equal authority, not out of pride, but in order to establish the truth of his preaching of the gospel, and the title by which he exercised the apostleship. He does it in the same spirit as in chap. 1; he declares that he did not receive his gospel from man.—Paul is protesting, in fact, against the beginnings of a Papacy, which the “false brethren” wished to erect by exaggerating the authority of the “Pillar Apostles” (and probably of Peter especially), as something to which a Paul must accommodate himself, as having no commission independently of it. “The authority of the pillars,” however, was only a pretext, the rallying word that they used; their own authority was what they sought.—HEUBNER.

[The authority of the “Mother Church” seems, from the drift of Paul's narrative, to have been the rallying cry rather than the authority of Peter, since, in the sentence which establishes the acquiescence of the “pillars,” the name of James stands first. The argument gains force as a protest in this view (especially if James were not one of the Twelve). For the essence of Papacy is not the primacy of Peter, that was just such a pretext as the Galatians used, but the infallible authority of a Mother-Church. Therefore, the ground on which Paul stands is the basis for other protests than the famous one of the 16th century, since the insisting upon things indifferent as necessary is not confined to one Pope at Rome, but often issues from a body claiming like authority.—R.]

5. Diversity of calling. Paul and Peter were engaged in the same one gospel, but to each the Lord had assigned a different mission; to the one, that to the Gentiles; to the latter, that to the Jews.

Clearly conscious of this, they divided the field of labor between them. This diversity of calling, resting upon diversity of gifts (Charisms), or perhaps diversity in the providential course of previous life, etc., must be carefully considered in the kingdom of God, if anything is to be really accomplished. One may stand fully and firmly upon the ground of evangelical faith, himself have living faith, and yet be by no means qualified for every task in the kingdom of God. In this respect also, the body of Christ has many members, having diverse offices, but coöperating for the same end. It is an organic whole, and hence such an organization as took place on a small scale among the Apostles is entirely admissible. It must, however, be natural, inwardly true, not artificial and merely external, else it were mechanical, not organic.

Ver. 1. From STARKE:—A preacher must not shrink from toil and labor, when he finds opportunity in his ministry to further the gospel, but neglecting his own convenience, should be ready to offer up all the powers of his body and spirit in the service of God.—RIEGER:—A carefully chosen company; Barnabas, a Jew, one of the first fruits unto Christ, and Titus a born Gentile, not even circumcised, but both one in Christ.—STARKE:—It is an excellent thing when brethren are at one.—This is in the church of God a beginning of Synods, which are rightly retained.

Ver. 2. Let us strive at least for this, that what we do in weighty matters, we may do by God's governance and not after our own will. Conferences which are held concerning the affairs of the kingdom of God, by men who stand in one Spirit, have a great advantage, for thereby there comes to pass a communication of gifts between each other to the common use.—HEDINGER:—To ask men for counsel, must have divine command, will and order, else it helps little in matters of faith, and it is hurtful for man to trust thereon.—RIEGER:—Also as concerns repute with others, a man can receive nothing except it be given him from above. Paul with all that God had bestowed on him, and wrought through him, came into no such general repute. He had to endure continually increasing contradiction against himself. It must, however, have been for him a needful mantle of obscurity.—STARKE:—As all hindrances, that can hinder the fruit of the Gospel must be diligently avoided, and removed out of the way, so also the undeserved suspicion of any.

Paul does not therefore defiantly say, “I know that I preach the right Gospel, let others think of it what they will,” but he is concerned for a mutual understanding, for the convincing of others, in the interest of peace and of the cause which they serve in common.—[CALVIN:—What then? Does the word of God fall, when it is unsupported by the testimony of men? No, but a powerful confirmation of faith is yielded, when all the teachers “speak the same thing and there are no divisions among them.” Were many as desirous as he to edify the Church, they would take more pains to be agreed among themselves.—WORDSWORTH:—Paul did all that was requisite on his part to obviate that very result which, unhappily, manifested itself among the Galatians, viz.: the bringing of his doctrine into public collision with that of the other Apostles. Also by the mention of the private conference, particularly with Peter, he prudently prepares the way for his description of the public dispute with Peter at Antioch.—R.]

Ver. 3. SPENER:—In things indifferent we may well, out of love, yield something of our liberty to the good of the weak. But where men would press these upon us as necessary to salvation, and our yielding would have the appearance of bringing the truth of the gospel into jeopardy, we should never yield.—STARKE:—It is wholly contrary to the nature of the gospel to lay on any one a constraint of conscience in things that concern our salvation, for the nature of the gospel is not to constrain, but to beseech, to allure, and to convince. But the spirit of Antichrist binds and constrains the consciences to his ordinances and doctrines of men.

Ver. 4. Even in the best state of the Christian church there are false brethren, who will be taken as right-minded Christians, and are not. Now these are much more dangerous than open enemies of the gospel.—CRAMER:—The true behavior of false teachers. They come not in at the right door; they are sneakers in, and hide themselves behind a false disguise.—HEDINGER:—Legal disciplinarians, who look at the outward cannot endure that others should enjoy liberty, and yet in the Spirit do more than they. Dear Christian! learn once for all, that outward task-work cannot make a living heir of God. The heart! the heart! The heart, from its inmost centre must love, fear, honor God, flee sin, and praise Him, who for thee has died and is risen again.—STARKE:—The main aim of false teachers is only to take us prisoners to deprive us of our liberty in Christ, although they do not confess such an aim in words, but will have the appearance of wishing only to check carnal security and liberty.

Ver. 5. BERLENG. BIBLE:—The world and hypocrites count this for obstinacy. Is that then commendable? is the cry with it. I thought now that Christians should yield, and Paul boasts himself of just the opposite! But we must get the true understanding of the matter from the words that follows: We would not give way thereto in subjection, so as to suffer ourselves to be placed under this order of things. Otherwise a Christian willingly gives way, as Paul also proved when he circumcised Timothy. But when they would have him do it as a matter of conscience he did it not. One may be zealous for true freedom, and yet for love's sake bear with much. If it be not given out for a first step to salvation, love endures all; but faith will suffer no derogation of itself.—In our time many a one thinks on a sudden, that he will be as valorous as Paul, as Luther; but he must first have their spirit. For valor there needs a divine power.—Freedom and Truth must go together, else freedom profits not. Truth is inward, freedom, what one maintains outwardly thereof. They are treasures of two kinds, but springing from the same root. And because I will not suffer men to plant anything false in my heart, I must guard myself without.—From STARKE:—The law is something transient: it is the gospel that is permanent. The gospel too contains the kernel of all the Mosaic ceremonies, the shell only falls away. The shadow recedes when the sun rises.

The liberty which is in Christ: 1. We may renounce it for love's sake; 2. we must not let ourselves be robbed of it—for the truth of the gospel's sake.—The truth of the gospel is above all; may be hazarded at no price.—If the truth of the gospel is at stake, the combat may not be shunned.—[Our freedom, 1. negatively, from the bondage of the law, 2. positively, in Christ Jesus; hence Christian liberty no license.—False brethren the most dangerous enemies to liberty. Weak brethren disturb yet strengthen it; false brethren seek to undermine and destroy it. Because "out of Christ," yet in His camp, they spy out and would betray what we have in Him, our liberty.—What a contrast! the false brethren creeping in to rob others of truth and liberty; Paul our faithful, fearless, yet humble and holy champion for the truth which makes us free (Jno. viii. 32).—R.]

Ver. 6. WURT. SUMM.:—This is Paul's meaning: God looks not on the outward person and standing of a man, so that he should prefer a learned one to an unlearned, a rich man to a poor, a powerful man to a weak, but abides by the rule of His word, namely: "In every nation he that feareth Him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted of Him." In which thing we then should all follow God, and neither for the sake of a person or of any earthly thing, should we retire from the right or from the rule of God's word, but should abide steadfastly by it, even though an emperor, a king or a governor should command otherwise, or though it should cost life or limb.—STARKE:—In matters of faith, the authority of persons and outward preëminence has no weight, but only the truth of doctrine, which is Christ's and from Christ.—[SCHAFF:—Paul means no disrespect to his colleagues, but even their advantages, he represents as having no weight where the truth of the gospel was concerned. His high sense of independence far from being identical with pride, rested in his humility; it was but the complement to the feeling of his absolute dependence upon God.

"God no respecter of persons." The Galatians were; why else this constant reference to those "of repute?" There is no slight intended to those of repute, but a rebuke to those who in their Christian opinion lean not on God, but on men, men of position, reputation. How many neither false brethren, nor so far gone in error as the bewitched Galatians pin their faith on the δοκίμους.—R.]

Ver. 7. STARKE:—The gospel is a Divine deposit and treasure, which is not given to any one for his own, but is only entrusted, so that we must deal with it as pleases Him who has given us such a trust.—SPENER:—God has made wise distribution among His servants; though He calls them in common to all spiritual functions, and none of them is quite free from some; yet He appoints to each in particular his certain part, where and in which he shall serve Him, and for that He fits him out with the needful gifts. Therefore, special blessing attends their labor, when they are where the Lord has set them.

[The gospel treasure, the chosen vessels to which it was entrusted. The adaptation for the field of labor is the gift and trust of God's grace. The preparation of the field, God's providential work. The assignment of the field, God's act, to which the Church but consents, as in the first and weightiest case.—R.]

Ver. 8. SPENER:—All gifts, all power in instruction and success of labor, come from God, who must be effectual with us and in us, if we are to accomplish anything. 1 Cor. iii. 6; 2 Cor. iii. 6. Therefore, to Him belongs all the praise and thanks.—CRAMER:—The holy ministry is not a mere babbling, but a mighty instrument, wherewith God breaks hearts to pieces, as with a hammer, and also a two-edged sword, and a sharp knife, wherewith He cuts out the stony heart.

Ver. 9. STARKE:—We are bound, not only to recognize the grace which God has given to us, and rightly to use the same, but also to recognize that which others have received, and to be helpful that this also may be turned to use.

["James, and Cephas, and John." From WORDSWORTH:—He mentions these by name, because what he says was honorable to them. When he has anything less creditable to record, he spares the names of individuals even of the false brethren. He mentions Peter below, for which, doubtless, there was a necessity. It was providential, too, since some who claim to be the successors of St. Peter profess to be above error and beyond rebuke.—R.]

SPENER:—Although the teachers of the gospel, in respect of their office, are alike, yet there is a distinction between them in respect to gifts; and it is not amiss that, according to such distinction, they should be used for weightier and greater, or for lesser functions, and accordingly should be had in greater or less reputation.

[CALVIN:—Even in the Church of God, he who enjoys a larger measure of grace ought, on that account, to receive higher honor. But, in all cases, let the rule be followed: "He that is greatest among you shall be your servant."—R.]

—"They gave the right hands of fellowship." ANACKER, Bibelstunden:—What a moment must that have been! What a blessed working of the Holy Ghost! What a victory for the good cause of Paul, or rather for the cause of Christ's Gospel itself!

We here see the distinction between true and false union in matters of faith; it would have been false union, if Paul had yielded; that is, had abandoned the sound evangelical ground upon which he stood, and the three senior Apostles had then first recognized him; it was true union when Paul, with decision, maintained the evangelical truth, and the three yet joined fellowship with him, because they were persuaded of the truth, of the divine origin, of his preaching.—Accord in matters of faith: 1. Possible and permitted only where evangelical truth is maintained, and, therefore, Paul's firmness is not to be censured; 2. but this maintained, it is not only beautiful, but a duty; a) in the interest of the fulfilment of the commandment of love; b) in the interest of the advancement of the cause of God's kingdom.—The willingness of the Apostles to recognize Paul, an example for us; 1. they examined Paul's doctrine first; but 2. so soon as they had persuaded themselves of his Divine mission, they entered into fellowship with him, giving up their particular opinions and scruples.—The one apostolic church, built: 1. not upon the authority of one or another Apostle, but 2. upon the agreement of the same, or rather upon the One Gospel.—The gospel of righteousness through faith in Christ Jesus, the touchstone of true and false Apostles; the former unite in this, in spite of all other differences; the latter not, because they are concerned for themselves, and not for Christ.—ANACKER, Bibelstunden:—Did they not then immediately separate themselves again? O, no; they were and remained one in the Lord, but each knew the field into which especially the Lord had sent him, each joyfully accepted his part, and joyfully and humbly left to the other what belonged to him. So should it be among Christians!

Ver. 10. CRAMER:—It is a part of the holy ministry to have an eye to the poor and to the distribution of alms.—ANACKER, Bibelstunden:—With respect to the poor no division should occur; but in all the various spheres and callings which separate men, mainly in place and station, let compassionate love be a continual outward proof that we are one in the inner ground of faith. On the other hand, such fellowship of love in fruitful measure is only possible where there is a consciousness of the fellowship of faith.—F. MÜLLER:—Such love, we rejoice to believe, will again awake in our days; the hearts of Christians have become warm and intent on remembering the need of their brethren, whether it be in showing love to the distant heathen, or to those who, though in the midst of Christendom, yet live no better than heathen, or to oppressed brethren in the faith, who, surrounded by a hostile communion, lack the most necessary means for the maintenance of their church life. But such love is still far from prevailing fully among us.

[LUTHER:—True religion is ever in need. Wherefore a true and faithful pastor must have a care of the poor also.—BURKITT:—The faithful ministers of Christ ought, upon first and fit occasions, to excite and stir up their people to duties of charity, as well as piety; to costly and expensive duties, as well as those that are easy and less burdensome; these being no less profitable to the Church, and much more evidential of a real work of grace upon the heart.—WORDSWORTH:—Paul here shows 1. His fraternal co-operation with the other Apostles; 2. His love for the Jewish Christians; 3. That his non-compliance with the requirements of the false brethren was from no lack of charity to them. He became a suitor to the Gentiles for alms to the Jews, and at length a victim to the rancor of the Jews, when he was engaged at Jerusalem in the act of promoting this very thing.—R.]

[Unity in beneficence: 1. a fruit of the Spirit in the early Church; 2. a hopeful sign in the Church of the present day.—Paul forward in this work of beneficence; first in time, first in effort.—He continued to be forward. Just after writing this Epistle, he made a tour, gathering the alms of the Greek churches for the saints at Jerusalem, whence came the impugnors of his office and doctrine. Christian beneficence, like God's, overlooks unworthiness and ingratitude. "The false brethren" would be "forward" at the distribution of alms to the "saints," yet Paul's forwardness was not affected by this.—R.]

8. On one occasion (in Antioch) he therefore asserted, and, with the independence of an Apostle, dared assert, even in opposition to a Peter, the principles of his Gentile Christian preaching.

(CHAP. ii. 11–21.)

11 But when Peter was come [Cephas¹ came] to Antioch, I withstood him to the face, 12 because he was to be blamed [was condemned]². For before that [omit that] certain [certain persons] came from James, he did eat [was eating together]³ with the Gentiles: but when they were come [came]⁴ he withdrew and separated himself, fearing 13 them which were [omit which were]⁵ of the circumcision. And the other Jews⁶ dissembled likewise with him; insomuch that Barnabas also [ὥστε καί, so that even 14 Barnabas] was carried away with [by] their dissimulation. But when I saw that they walked not uprightly according to the truth of the gospel, I said unto Peter [Cephas] before them [omit them] all, If thou, being a Jew, livest after the manner of Gentiles, and not as do the Jews,⁷ why compellest thou [how⁸ is it that thou art 15 compelling] the Gentiles to live as do the Jews? We who are [we are]⁹ Jews by 16 nature, and not sinners of the Gentiles, Knowing [yet¹⁰ knowing] that a man is not justified by the works of the law, but [ἐάν μὴ, except or but only] by the faith of Jesus Christ,¹¹ even we [we too] have [omit have]¹² believed in Jesus Christ [Christ Jesus],¹³ that we might be justified by the faith of Christ, and not by the works of the 17 law: for¹⁴ by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified. But if, while we seek to be justified by [in] Christ, we ourselves also are found sinners, is therefore Christ
18 the minister of sin? God forbid [or Far from it]. For if I build again the things 19 [very things]¹⁵ which I destroyed, I make [prove]¹⁶ myself a transgressor. For I
20 through the law am dead [died] to the law, that I might live unto God. I am [or have been] crucified with Christ: nevertheless I live; [omit:] yet not I, [it is, however, no longer I that live]¹⁷ but Christ liveth in me: and [yea] the life which I now live in the flesh I live by [in] the faith of the Son of God,¹⁸ who loved me, 21 and gave himself for me. I do not frustrate the grace of God: for if righteousness come by the law, then Christ is dead [died] in vain [without cause]¹⁹.

¹ Ver. 11.—Here also the preponderance of authority is in favor of Κηφᾶς. [As also in ver. 14. The simple past "came" is the best rendering of the aorist ἦλθεν.—R.]

² Ver. 11.—[Κατεγνωσμένος ἦν; "was condemned." The E. V., follows the Vulgate: reprehensibilis, which is incorrect. Some adopting a slightly different exegesis, render "had been condemned," but this is not so literal. See EXEGETIC NOTES. Schmoller renders ἀνέστην: entgegenstelt, "opposed," but "withstood" does not seem too strong.—R.]

³ Ver. 12.—[The imperfect συνῆθον expresses the idea of "habitual eating in company with." So too the other verbs, ὑπέστειλεν and ἀφώρizen; "he began to withdraw himself." etc.; but to express this fully would require a periphrasis in English. "Himself" is the object of both these verbs.—R.]

⁵ Ver. 12.—["Which were"] should be italicised if retained.—R.]

⁸ Ver. 14.—Πῶς, not τί, is the correct reading. So Lachmann, R. [A. B. C. D. F., most cursives, Meyer and the majority of modern editors. Rec. (followed by E. V.) and Tischendorf have τί.—R.]

⁹ Ver. 15.—[The insertion of "who are" in the E. V. has made this passage very obscure. "We" might be taken as the subject of "believed" (ver. 16), and all between as explanatory, but if "are" be supplied, the meaning is sufficiently clear. Ellicott adds "truly."—R.]

¹¹ Ver. 16.—Tischendorf omits Χριστοῦ, but apparently on insufficient authority. The omission probably arose from an attempt to avoid the frequent repetition of Χριστός, which occurs three times in this verse. Some read Χρ. ἡγοῦν.—R.]

¹² Ver. 16.—“Ἐπιστεύσαμεν, “believed,” better than “have believed.”—R.]

¹³ Ver. 16.—Here the order Χριστοῦ ἡγοῦν is better supported.—R.]

¹⁴ Ver. 16.—[Rec., C. E. K. L., Ellicott, Wordsworth read διότι, which was probably imported from Rom. iii. 20; οἱ τὰ is supported by κ, A. B. F. G., Lachmann, Tischendorf, Meyer, Alford, Lightfoot.—The order of Rec., οὐ δὲκ. ἐξ ἐργ. is not well sustained.—R.]

¹⁵ Ver. 18.—[Literally: “if what things I destroyed, these I build again.”—R.]

¹⁶ Ver. 18.—Συνιστάνω is adopted by modern editors on uncial authority; συνίστημι of Rec. is probably a grammatical gloss.—R.]

¹⁷ Ver. 20.—[The pointing of the E. V. alters the meaning, and weakens the force of this passage, by making two clauses where there is really but one. As, however, δέ occurs three times in quick succession, and with a variation in its force, elegance demands this translation: “It is, however (δε), no longer I that live, but (δε) Christ liveth in me, yea, (δε resumptive) the life,” etc.—R.]

¹⁹ Ver. 21.—[Δωρεάν may be more properly rendered: “Without cause.” Tittmann, sine justa causa, not frustra, sine effectu. So Meyer, Ellicott, Lightfoot.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 11. I withstood him to the face, etc.—“To the face”—not behind his back, in his absence. [It does not mean “publicly,” that is asserted below (ver. 4). Some of the fathers, “to save the authority of Peter” introduced the gloss κατὰ σῆμα, “in appearance,” because he had been condemned by others. This view is opposed nobly by AUGUSTINE. See ALFORD and WORDSWORTH, in loco.—R.]

Because he was or had been condemned: the reason why Paul opposed him. It was not therefore any attack on the part of Peter himself, that occasioned Paul’s taking a stand against him. Ἀνέστην, therefore not—I withstood him, but—I took a stand against him. [Yet Peter’s conduct was an attack on gospel liberty; and Paul “opposed” sufficiently to “withstand” him.—R.]—The reason was, the indignant feeling of the Christians of Antioch, the unfavorable judgment passed upon him by them. Moreover, the scandal which he had given, was notorious, and Paul was obliged to do what he did. But he certainly did not do it out of personal irritation or from arrogance or malice; his own words prevent such a charge. For himself he did it unwillingly, would have avoided rebuking Peter “before them all.” But a definite reason, viz., regard for the brethren, the Gentile Christian church, impelled him to it. And in this there was also a command, so that even regard for Peter on the other hand, was no ground for holding back. [It must be remarked that the Greek only states indefinitely that Peter “was condemned,” by whom is a matter to be inferred. Various answers are given: by God, by his own previous conduct, by Paul himself (ALFORD), by the church at Antioch. The last is most probably meant, else the rebuke would not have been public. It is not necessary to suppose that only the scandal at Antioch drove Paul to this course, for the conduct of Peter was in itself reprehensible. “Had been condemned” must be preferred, if it be referred to a definite condemnation on the part of the Gentile Christians at Antioch.—R.]

Ver. 12. For before certain persons came from James, he was eating together with the Gentiles, i. e., with the Gentile Christians.

He designates them according to their nationality, because it is on this that the matter turns. Peter therefore neglected the limitations of the Levitical law of meats. This is the simple sense of this remark. “A Jew could not without Levitical defilement eat with Gentiles” (even if these adhered to the decrees of the apostolic council). “Peter, however, had through Divine revelation (Acts x.) been taught the untenableness of this isolation within the sphere of Christianity.” This Jewish law of meats he disregarded, that is he lived ἔθνικῶς καὶ οὐκ Ἰουδαϊκῶς, at all events here in Antioch.—“Before certain persons came from James.” “From James” is not to be connected with “certain persons” as if—“certain adherents of James” (for “James would then be marked out as the head of a party, something which it would be neither necessary nor wise to do here”), but with “came,” either generally—“from James,” that is, from his circle of helpers, or—“sent by James.” But at all events they were such as held like sentiments with James, i. e., Jewish Christians, who themselves still adhered strictly to the Mosaic law, lived Ἰουδαϊκῶς καὶ οὐκ ἔθνικῶς, and who because, they felt obliged thereto as born Jews, regarded this Ἰουδαϊκῶς ζῆν as necessary for all born Jews, and accordingly for all Jewish Christians, but by no means demanded any such thing as the Ἰουδαϊσμός of the Gentile Christians in Antioch, as WISELER, perverting the state of facts maintains. They stood, therefore, upon the platform of James. “Certain persons” is not therefore—such as without ground, appealed to the authority of James; neither were they of the “false brethren” (ver. 4), who occupied a very different position from James. What views they had respecting the Gentile Christians, is not stated, for these were not at all in question; it is therefore natural to assume, that their views were those of James, and that the latter, when he sent these people, still thought as he did not long before, at the council (ver. 9; Acts xv.). [SCHAFF:—“It would seem from this passage that, soon after the council, James sent some esteemed brethren of his congregation to Antioch not for the purpose of imposing the yoke of ceremonialism upon Gentile Christians—for this would have been inconsistent with his speech—but for the purpose of reminding the Jewish Christians of their duty and recommending them to continue the observance of the divinely appointed and time-honored customs of their fathers, which were by no means overthrown by the compromise measure adopted at the council. It is unnecessary therefore to charge him with inconsistency. All we can say is that he stopped half-way and never ventured so far as Paul, or even as Peter, who broke through the ceremonial restrictions of their native religion. Confining his labors to Jerusalem and the Jews, James regarded it as his mission to adhere as closely as possible to the old dispensation, in the hope of bringing over the nation as a whole to the Christian faith.*—R.] But with Peter, as a Jewish Christian and an Apostle to the Jewish Christians, they found fault, undoubtedly on account of his eating with the Gentiles, that is, with his neglect of the Mosaic law of meats, his ἔθνακος ζῆν. Yet it is by no means expressly said that they reproached him with it, for "fearing them of the circumcision," may merely mean, that he feared possible reproaches, such as those, Acts xi. 3. But as he then justified himself in this, and the justification was accepted (Acts xi. 18), there is the more reason to doubt whether the Jewish Christians, who came from James, really made reproaches against Peter, or even whether they would have done it, and whether it was not an empty fear on Peter's part, which was blamed the more on this account, as a causeless denying of the convictions which he then successfully vindicated, a retreat out of weakness, from the position he had then joyfully assumed and justified, supported as he was by the experience through which God had led him. Peter must of course have feared possible reproaches to this effect: that although his conduct at that time respecting Cornelius had afterwards been approved, it would be a different thing for him now, in the presence of Jewish Christians, to live ἔθνακος, and moreover that, in the absence of so definite an occasion as then, he would now be regarded as one also standing outside [i. e. with the Gentile Christians.—R.], his authority with the Jewish Christians might be diminished, etc. But even if such reproaches were really made to him, these persons nevertheless are not to be regarded as agreeing with the "false brethren" and standing upon an entirely different platform from James himself, for neither Acts xi. 18, nor Acts xv. is to be regarded as unhistorical. Out of fear, therefore, he withdrew and separated himself.—The imperfects are adumbrative, cause the events to go on, as it were, before the eyes of the reader.—MEYER.—He ate no more with the Gentile Christians, and as appears to be intimated, discontinued this without giving any explanation: he again attached himself to the Jewish Christians, that is, he behaved himself all at once as if the Jewish law of meats were still sacred in his view, inasmuch as he began again to observe it. He did not therefore give up his freer convictions, his practice alone lost its freedom, and stood therefore in contradiction with his convictions. In the act itself there was nothing different from that indulgent regard to the prejudices of those still weak, which Paul himself so often urges as a duty. But the motive of Peter's conduct in this case was not anxiety to avoid a possible scandal to the faith—this was not to be feared here—but the fear of men, fear of reproaches, and most likely also of losing consequence and authority. [It must be noted that such a withdrawal was a withdrawal from the very frequent agapae and the frequent Lord's Supper. Though the decree of the Apostolic council did not command or forbid the common participation of Jewish and Gentile Christians in these services, yet Peter had thus communed with the Gentile Christians; he ceased to do so, and of course made great scandal. While not violating the letter of the decree, he yet treated these brethren as unclean.—R.]

Ver. 13. Paul therefore fastens on the conduct of Peter (and of the other Jewish Christians who did likewise) the sharp censure of the term ὑπόκρισις, dissimulation, and he is the more severe, because along with the consideration for the Jewish Christians, begotten of fear, there was a non-consideration for the Gentile Christians; and thus they were both scandalized and perplexed, since by the change of conduct in Peter they were tempted to the thought that the Mosaic law must after all be binding. It is of course entirely incorrect to find the "dissimulation" in the former association with the Gentile Christians, as if this had been a momentary unfaithfulness towards actual Judaistic convictions.

[Even Barnabas.—"My co-laborer in the work of heathen missions and fellow-champion of the liberty of the Gentile brethren." SCHAFF.—LIGHTFOOT: "It is not impossible that this incident, by producing a temporary feeling of distrust, may have prepared the way for the dissension between Paul and Barnabas, which shortly afterwards led to their separation (Acts xv. 39). From this time forward they never again appear associated together. Yet whenever St. Paul mentions Barnabas, his words imply sympathy and respect. This feeling underlies the language of his complaint here, 'even Barnabas.'" Comp. 1 Cor. ix. 6, and also the mention of Mark, Col. iv. 10.—R.]

[The conduct of Peter must be judged by the facts here stated, not by a desire to advocate or deny the primacy claimed for him. The occurrence is indeed characteristic of that Peter whom the Gospels describe; "first to confess Christ, first to deny Him; first to recognize and defend the rights of the Gentiles, first to disown them practically. His strength and weakness, boldness and timidity are the two opposite manifestations of the same warm, impulsive and impressive temper" (SCHAFF). The fault was one of practice, not of doctrine. The receiving of the rebuke is a sign of Peter's genuine piety. Whether he went out again and wept bitterly we know not. But there was no "sharp contention," and Peter's love for Paul remained. On the early discussions respecting this occurrence see LIGHTFOOT, p. 127, sq., showing how much the church is indebted to AUGUSTINE for a correct view of it. Comp. DOCTRINAL NOTES.—R.]

* [When we consider this position of James, and look at the Epistle which bears his name, we are led, not to doubt its inspiration and place in the canon, but rather to believe that it must be inspired, else it would have differed more from the writings of Paul, and that its place in the canon is a proof of the wisdom of God, who made His Word complete, by making it many-sided, and yet never contradictory.—R.]

Ver. 14. But when I saw that they walked not uprightly, etc.—We are to supply from ver. 11: "And at the same time heard the Gentile Christians expressing themselves in condemnation of it." [The necessity of supplying this makes it the more doubtful, whether the reference there is to the "condemnation" on the part of the Gentile Christians.—R.] Πρὸς τὴν ἀλήθειαν τοῦ εὐαγγελίου hardly = "according to," which would be κατὰ, but "in the direction of," = in order to preserve uprightly and further the truth of the gospel.

The sense, therefore, is the same as in ver. 5. This agrees with the context, for Paul, in the conduct of Peter and the other Jewish Christians, beheld an infringement of the "truth of the gospel," especially of the principle of Christian freedom founded in the gospel, on account of its effect on the Gentile Christians: "How is it that thou art compelling the Gentiles to live as do the Jews?" (MEYER).—[The force of πρὸς is open to discussion, especially as the word ὀρθοποδεῖν is not only ἀπὸς λεγόμενον, but very rare. LIGHTFOOT says it denotes here "not the goal to be attained, but the line of direction to be observed. See WINER, p. 424." And ELLICOTT in reply to MEYER, who claims that κατὰ would have been used to express the idea of rule or measure, observes that the instances he quotes are all after περιπατεῖν. If the line of direction be the meaning, the E. V. is correct, and the implication is that Peter did not deviate from the "truth of the gospel," but from the line of conduct which the truth of the gospel marked out, hence the verb retains a semi-local meaning, "walk straight."—R.]

Before all, "very probably = in an assembly of the Church, although not convened immediately for this purpose" (MEYER)—before Jewish and Gentile Christians.—If thou, being a Jew, livest after the manner of Gentiles: means the accustomed practice of Peter, from which he only then receded.—How is it that thou art compelling the Gentiles to live as do the Jews?—Paul shows him the self-contradictoriness of his behavior, by a kind of ironical address. "Thou thyself a Jew, livest as a Gentile—and how comes it, then, that thou constrainest Gentiles to live Jewishly? Is not that an utter contradiction?" It is true Peter does not constrain the Gentiles directly; it is a turn which sharpens the censure; in reality, it was only an indirect constraining through the authority of the example of Peter. The opinion is, therefore, quite unfounded, which supposes that the messengers of James had preached the principle of the necessity of the observance of the law—even for Gentile Christians—and that Peter had at least tacitly supported this principle. Thereby they would have directly oppugned the view of James himself (Acts xv.), and Peter would have oppugned his own. His "dissimulation" at this time by no means authorizes the assumption that he had changed his view as to the indispensableness or dispensableness of the law itself.—But at all events the Gentile Christians in Antioch looked upon Peter as one who, previously not observing the Jewish law, all at once began to observe it. That it was mere "dissimulation," and not an actual change of view respecting the law, they did not at first know; and, therefore, they might easily, even if no one attempted directly to impose the law upon them, feel constrained to regard it as something necessary, and also to guide themselves in practice according to it—at least, in this one point respecting meats. There was at all events the danger that such a moral compulsion might be exercised; and when once a single point was regarded as necessary, matters might go farther.—Against WIESELER's explanation: "You so act that the Gentiles also must live as Jews, if they wish any longer to eat with you" (which is connected with his erroneous view respecting the journey of the Apostle narrated ii. 1 sq.), let it be here remarked only: Had Peter, by his conduct, only imposed on the Gentile Christians of Antioch the necessity of again observing the decrees of the apostolic council, in order to be able to eat with the Jewish Christians, and had Paul himself so regarded it, Peter would certainly not have received this public rebuke from Paul. Peter's conduct, his yielding from fear, would indeed have been censurable, yet the consequences of this for others could only have given occasion for a public rebuke, provided they endangered the life of faith; but on Wieseler's supposition this could not have resulted.—Ἰουδαῖζειν is, without doubt, different from Ἰουδαϊκῶς ζῆν, and is not merely another expression for this, but it is with design that Ἰουδ. ζῆν is not repeated. With Peter, at that time, a relapse into Ἰουδ. ζῆν took place—at least in practice, and through it a misleading of the Gentile Christians into ἰουδαῖζειν was to be feared. Ἰουδαϊκῶς ζῆν was in the Jewish Christian something in itself quite irreprehensible, was only a maintenance of national usage; in the Gentile Christian a Ἰουδ. ζῆν became a ἰουδαῖζειν, that is, a Judaizing, being a Judaizer. [Hence, when Peter, who had been living ἠθικῶς, occupying the position of the Gentile Christians, began again to live Ἰουδαϊκῶς his action was constructively ἰουδαῖζειν, and a moral compulsion put upon his late associates, the Gentile Christians, to do the same.—R.] The distinction is difficult to render in a translation; it is something like, "to live Jewishly,"—"to be Jewishish."

Vers. 15-21. That this is a continuation of the address to Peter, is self-evident to every unprejudiced reader, and the assumption that an address to the Galatians suddenly comes in here is so utterly at variance with the context that it is unnecessary to refute it. To mention no other reasons against it, let any one read the historical narrative, extending from as far back as chap. i. 18, up to this point, and imagine now, all at once, without any transition, an address to the Galatians, beginning, "We are, by nature, Jews." This view, it is true, has found again decided advocates in WIESELER, VON HOFMANN. True, on our view also, the exposition is somewhat difficult, but it commends itself too distinctly to allow us to hesitate on account of the difficulties of the interpretation. And has not this difficulty, in part, its ground in this, that Paul only cites words, spoken on another occasion, and perhaps somewhat condensed also.—At all events the words are not to be regarded as merely addressed to Peter personally. Paul passes over into a more general exposition, for the instruction of the Gentile and Jewish Christians that were then present. "He makes out of the transaction, which then arose respecting the eating or not eating with the Gentiles, a locum communem (an article of doctrine), which extends much further than the transaction itself. He speaks of the works of the law generally."—Roos. Paul cites with such detail his words then uttered for this very reason, that the substance of what he then said corresponds so well with the purpose of his letter, suits the case of the Galatians so precisely. Of course it cannot be affirmed that Paul cites the words that he then used, with literal exactness; his expressions may have been modified to a nearer correspondence with the particular purpose for which he here adduces them, although there is nowhere in the expressions themselves any necessity for such an opinion.

Ver. 15. We are by nature Jews, etc.—Vers. 15–17 give the ground of the censure in ver. 14: We, as Jews, have the law, which, of itself, exalts us above the Gentiles, who, as "without law," are to be regarded as "sinners;" yet we have surrendered the preëminence which we had, and emancipated ourselves from the law in the knowledge that a man is not justified by it, but by faith in Christ,—how then can one of us wish to bring the Gentiles under the law, over whom it was never in force?—would be the very obvious conclusion, which Paul, at all events, compels the hearer to draw, but he himself makes the more general, but more pointed one: How then can any one of us press the observance of the law again, as though otherwise we fell into the category of Gentiles of sinners? One who does this makes Christ thereby a minister of sin—that is, he declares, by this reëstablishment of the law, that faith in Christ itself, as it involves the giving up of the law, brings men into the category of sinners (ver. 17).—Not sinners of the Gentiles.—Spoken from the national and theocratic point of view, on which Paul expressly places himself by the emphasizing of their Jewish descent. From that point of view, the Gentiles, as ἀνομοι, in contrast with the Jews, who are ἐννομοι, are, in themselves, ἀμαρτωλοί κατ' ἐξοχὴν, although it is, of course, certain that Paul, in another sense, enforces the truth that there is also an ἐν νόμῳ ἀμαρτ., Rom. ii. 12; and that, in a deeper sense, they also, as Jews (with the law), were ἀμαρτωλοί, is an essential thought of the following context, inasmuch as they found justification only through faith in Christ.

Ver. 16. Yet knowing that.—It is simplest to take εἰδότες δέ, "knowing that," etc., as the protasis, so that the apodosis begins with καὶ ἡμεῖς, "we also," and to supply ἐσμέν in ver. 15. The objection of MEYER, that the statement of how Paul and Peter had come to the faith, would not be historically accurate, inasmuch as the conversion of neither had come to pass in the discursive way implied in εἰδότες . . . ἐπιστ., is whimsical. The foundation of their faith in Christ was the knowledge, or at least the feeling, that in this faith alone "justification" was found. Only in the measure in which they acquired this conviction, did their faith in Christ become a full, ripe faith.—A man is not justified, etc.—As Paul here is merely citing words spoken on another occasion, the doctrine of the justification of man not by works of the law, but by faith in Jesus Christ appears here only as a doctrinal principle of the general Pauline theology. It is uttered in a very definite manner, is almost dogmatically formulated, yet strictly speaking it is not demonstrated, but presupposed as familiar. (Chap. iii. contains not so much an elucidation of the nature of justification as a demonstration that it results from "faith," not from "the law," instructive as this demonstration doubtless is for the apprehension of its nature.) Hence the philological investigation of the word δικαιοῦν belongs rather to the exposition of the Epistle to the Romans. On the doctrinal conception of justification, see DOCTRINAL NOTES below.

Looking at the present context alone, we should be disposed to refer the expression, works of the law to merely ceremonial requirements of the law; but by thus doing we should miss entirely the Apostle's meaning. The meaning of the phrase "not justified by the works of the law" is not to be gathered from the immediate context merely; it is, as intimated above, a proposition, elsewhere set forth in detail, and only cited here with the presupposition that it is familiar.—The idea ἔργα νόμου is to be taken in the universality implied in the expression. It denotes simply works prescribed by the law, whether of a more ritual character, or, in the stricter sense, moral injunctions. For a more particular consideration, see DOCTRINAL NOTES below.

[The E. V. renders ἐὰν μὴ rather weakly, "but," since the meaning is "except," "but only," sola fide (LUTHER, MEYER). The justification is not at all by works of the law: which is also the meaning of the formal, final clause of the verse.—Διὰ πίστεως, per fidem. Faith is the means by which justification is received. HOOKER: "The only hand which putteth on Christ to justification." The Apostle also uses ἐκ with πίστεως; that preposition may imply origin, but as it is used with πίστεως in this connection, that idea is forbidden; perhaps the reason of the change was merely to make the correspondence, ἐξ ἔργων—ἐκ πίστεως. It is here used in each case with ἐργων, where the thought of origin may be implied.—We believed in Christ Jesus.—Not "became believers in" (LIGHTFOOT), but "have put our faith in." The preposition (εἰς) retaining its proper force, and marking not the mere direction of the belief, but the ideas of union and incorporation with (ELLICOTT).—There seems to be some ground for the change from "Jesus Christ" to "Christ Jesus" here; it is more elevated than the usual form (MEYER), brings the Messiahship into prominence, as "we also" refers to Paul and Peter, who were Jews (ALFORD). Still this must not be insisted on.—The genitives Χριστοῦ and νόμου throughout are objective genitives (MEYER, ELLICOTT, ALFORD).—R.]

tion.' For the negation attaches to the verb, and not to the noun." This justifies the force of ἐὰν μὴ above. No justification at all from works, even in connection with faith.—R.] This is founded on Ps. cxliii. In the parallel passage, Rom. iii. 20, ἐνώπιον αὐτοῦ, "in his sight," is further added. WIESELER: "The words ἐξ ἔργων νόμον Paul has added entirely in the sense of the original passage; for when the Psalmist said, that before God no flesh shall be justified, he of course had in mind the works prescribed by the O. T. law. Since then this law prescribes not only outward works, but also holy dispositions, we must understand the latter also as included both by the Psalmist and Paul among the works of the law."—"Shall be justified."—"It remains undetermined whether the Apostle writes δικαιωθήσεται [future] in view of a final issue in the case of the individual or of mankind, but a final judgment is indicated by the future both here and in the original passage. Only thus, too, is there a progress of thought; otherwise the discourse would be intolerably indefinite. The entrance upon the way of faith (ἐπιστεύσαμεν) is explained from the knowledge that in the present it is the only means of becoming righteous, and the exclusion of the way of legal doing (καὶ οὐκ ἐξ ἔργων) has its ground in the unprofitableness of it, for appearing before God hereafter as righteous." VON HOFMANN.

Ver. 17. But if, while we seek to be justified in Christ.—"In Christ" not—through communion with Christ, as ἐν Χρ. εἶναι, although of course faith brings us into inward union with Christ, but it "denotes Christ as the ground of our justification, as the causa meritoria in which it rests" (WIESELER). [The phrase ἐν Χριστῷ is a formula of such deep significance in Paul's Epistles, that it is perhaps better always to find in it the idea of union, fellowship with Christ. Why not understand it thus: justified because in Christ by faith? See ELLICOTT, and compare MEYER in loco.—R.]

We ourselves also.—On our side also, so that we too came into the class of "sinners of the Gentiles." If we came into this class in and through the effort to be justified in Christ, Christ would thus be a minister of sin, would make sinners and not "righteous," and would therefore render a service to sin. On this interpretation of the protasis, the apodosis cannot be an interrogation (against MEYER); for from this apodosis it is now justly concluded that Christ would be the minister of sin.—God forbid negatives therefore the protasis on account of the consequence resulting therefrom—a consequence in fact utterly inadmissible. It is true, everywhere else in Paul's writings, μὴ γένοιτο negatives a question. If it be thought on this account necessary to assume a question here, the protasis must be taken differently, somewhat thus: "But if we, while we were seeking to be justified in Christ, were ourselves found sinners—because we would thereby declare, that the law has not availed us for justification, but that we were notwithstanding the law sinners, still needing justification—is Christ therefore a minister of sin?" Only we should then expect, as in Rom. iii. 3, 5, μὴ Χριστὸς ἡμ. δίκαιος; as VON HOFMANN remarks. He therefore supplies εἰπέθημεν in the protasis, making it a complete sentence, and translates: "But if as those, who seek to be justified in Christ, sc., we are found, then are we also found sinners." But this explanation is evidently forced. It must also be noted that, while Paul elsewhere only uses μὴ γένοιτο after an interrogation, he as constantly introduces that interrogation with οὐν. As a deviation from his usual practice must be admitted in any case, the further deviation, that μὴ γέν. is not preceded by an interrogation may well be conceded. But in any case the explanation is difficult. [LIGHTFOOT fairly discusses the various explanations. 1. As an attack on the premises through a monstrous conclusion (as above). 2. An illogical conclusion deduced from premises in themselves correct. This view, which makes an interrogation in the last clause, is preferred by him, and by most English commentators. "Seeing that in order to be justified in Christ it was necessary to abandon our old ground of legal righteousness and to become sinners (i. e., to put ourselves in the position of the heathen) may it not be argued that Christ is thus made a minister of sin?" This interpretation best develops the subtle irony of ἀμαρτωλοί: 'We Jews look down upon the Gentiles as sinners; yet we have no help for it but to become sinners like them.' It agrees with the indicative εἰπέθημεν and with Paul's use of μὴ γένοιτο." It paves the way for the words which follow: "I, through the law, am dead to the law." Ἀρα is to be preferred to ἀρα in this case. The former hesitates, the latter concludes.—R.]

Μὴ γένοιτο,* in no way whatever is Christ a "minister of sin," for it is not the seeking justification in Him, that makes me a sinner, but I am found a sinner in an entirely opposite case. [LIGHTFOOT: "Nay verily, for, so far from Christ being a minister of sin, there is no sin at all in abandoning the law; it is only converted into a sin by returning to the law again."—R.]

Ver. 18. For if I build again the very things I destroyed.—In this opposite case, I represent myself as a sinner, but the blame does not rest on Christ. "Build up again," etc. Thus Paul describes the conduct of Peter, "who previously, and even in Antioch had at first declared the Mosaic law not binding, as Christians had therefore, as it were, torn it down as a now useless building; but afterwards through his Judaizing conduct (even though it did not arise from conviction), represented it again as binding, and hence, as it were, built up the demolished edifice anew."—"The first person veils what had taken place in concreto, under the xxvii. 15-18, etc.; and (2) they render μή γένοιτο ἵνα, i. e., absit, literally profanum sit, by μὴ γένοιτο (Gen. xlv. 7. 17; Josh. xxii. 29). Μὴ γένοιτο is something much more than a direct negation, such as 'No verily.' It is a vehement expression of indignant aversion, reprobatum and abominatum such a notion as that by which it is looked. And therefore the English, God forbid! properly understood, i. e., God forbid that any one should so speak, is a fit rendering of it. It is used fourteen times by St. Paul (ten times in the Epistle to the Romans, thrice to the Galatians, and once in 1 Corinthians), and is generally employed by him to rebut an objection supposed by him to be made by an opponent, as here."—R.] milder form of a general statement" (MEYER).—WIESELER, according to his view of the whole section, gives the sense thus: "But if we also, who seek to be justified in Christ, are convicted as sinners, that is, should sin; Christ is not therefore a promoter of sin. For then I am myself to blame for the transgression, since what I have destroyed (namely, the dominion of sin!) this I build up again." According to this, Paul is here laying stress upon the indissoluble connection between justification and sanctification. Certainly a striking example of dogmatizing exegesis:—I prove myself a transgressor:—i. e., of the law. In what way? we must ask, for it might be the "destroying" itself in which the sin consisted, not the "building again." The latter certainly; in ver. 19 Paul tells us why.

Ver. 19. For I through the law died to the law.—"I" for my own part, letting my own experience speak, to say nothing of the experience of others," MEYER. "For" introduces a proof, found in "through the law." "Whoever has been freed from the law through the law itself, in order to stand in a higher relation, acts in opposition to the law, proves himself a transgressor if notwithstanding this he returns again into the legal relation." MEYER. νόμος is of course in both cases the Mosaic law, since otherwise the passage would have no demonstrative force; not the law of Christ in the first case as Rom. viii. 2. [The distinction made by LIGHTFOOT in his notes on this passage, must be regarded. The law is here spoken of, not as to its economical purpose (as WORDSWORTH who limits the meaning here to the law as a covenant), but rather in its moral effects.—R.] "I through the law died to the law" that is, the law itself caused me to die to it. But what now is the meaning of 1. "I died to the law"? That thereby a becoming free from the law is affirmed is clear. But in the first place this "dying to the law" is not (with many expositors) to be construed as an activity bearing upon the law—it has come to this, that I have acquitted myself of dependence on the law, etc. The Apostle means to affirm something as having happened to him, not something as having been done by him, although of course this event has had a basis in his ethical nature. In the next place, however, the conception of dying, which is involved in the expression, is not to be at once transmuted into that of becoming free; or else justice is not done to the Apostle's turn of thought, which here, as the sequel shows, revolves about the ideas of life and death. Compare the analogous expressions: ἀποθανεῖν ἀμαρτίᾳ, νεκρ. ἀμαρτίᾳ, Rom. vi. 2, 10, 11, where also the Apostle, as the connection in each passage shows, means an event coming to pass through dying, ver. 10 in the physical, vers. 2, 11, in the ethical sense. Still more closely analogous is Rom. vii. 1 sq. In ver. 4 of that passage we have the analogous expression—only there it is passive, while here it is expressed by the neuter verb θανατωθῆναι τῷ νόμῳ and in ver. 1 he gives us the key to the figure in the sentence: "the law hath dominion over a man as long as he liveth." The becoming free from the law is therefore, of course, the result of the dying to the law, but not immediately this itself. "Died to the law" is—I have died with this effect, that the law has lost me, who had hitherto belonged to it, that is, that its dominion over me, its claims upon me ceased, so that it could no longer urge its requirements upon me, as heretofore. While "died" of itself already intimates the legitimacy of this acquittal from the law, the complete demonstration of this is contained in the fact that this dying "to the law" has come to pass "through the law" not by a power residing outside of it has this death to the law been effected, not in any anti-nomistic way, not in conflict with the law, so that this would have any ground of complaint. But now the question is 2. how has he "through the law" died to the law? how has the "law" itself brought about in him a state of death as regards the law, and therewith a release from its dominion? Thus much, that the law leads to death, Paul plainly declares, e. g. Rom. vii. 5, 10, 11, 13. The middle term there is, that it is the νόμος itself which excites sin into ἀναζῆν. This thought is of obvious application here. The explanation would then be; by the fact that the "law" brought me death, its dominion over me reached, it is true, its culmination, but thereby also was broken and done away. For with him who has died, the dominion of the law ceases—according to the principle cited above. And deducing the reason from the passage itself, we might thus state it; for the law can no more come forward with the claims that I should keep it, in order to justification, when its effect is rather death. The objection that the Apostle could not well affirm this "dying" of himself, as something actual since by his conversion he had been preserved from this effect of the law, will not hold; for Paul, Rom. vii. 10 affirms this very thing himself. This explanation is, however, at variance with the fact that according to iii. 24, the νόμος is, indeed παρὰ νόμον εἰς Χριστόν, but of itself, without Christ, does not yet lead to man's becoming free from it. Now it is true, that this passage reads as if Paul here refers the dying to the law directly to the law itself, but he then proceeds to give the elucidation of this, by giving the immediate cause of the dying, namely, "I have been crucified with Christ." This statement therefore explains the former one. In the same way the dying unto sin, mentioned Rom. vi. is by means of the "dying with Christ," and in Rom. vii. the death of Christ is made the cause of the becoming dead to the law. Thus much then is already clear, that the "law" in both cases is of course the same (Mosaic) law, but in each case it comes into view in a different relation; in νόμῳ in its requirements, in διὰ νόμον in its effect. This explains in a simple way the paradoxical expression, according to which the law appears as making free from itself. But since it is still the same law, Paul is entitled to say, that he who will nevertheless again live unto the law although "through the law he died unto the law" exhibits himself as a "transgressor" sc., of the law.

Let us now consider the first statement of the purpose of this dying namely: that I might live unto God, with the dying to the law the living to the law, has, as the very terms imply, come to an end. As long as this existed, no living unto God was possible, but with the dying to the law every hindrance to this living unto God is removed. "Live unto God;" just as Rom. viii. 11. As the dying to the law may not be treated as immediately convertible into a being released from the law, obliterating the conception of dying; so on the other hand the realism of the Pauline expressions requires the like in the case of the antithetical expression: "live to God." Paul wishes first to oppose to the being dead a being alive, therefore this means: that I might be living as regards God—with this effect, that God should have me, after the law has lost me. As from the being dead there resulted the dissolution of a connection—with the law—which had hitherto existed, so from the life there results the formation of a new connection, namely, with God. (Why precisely this results, appears first from what follows, for from the dying "to the law through the law" of itself, there would certainly not as yet result any new life at all, and especially a life for God.) Hence by "living unto God" as well as by "dying to the law" Paul wishes to express, chiefly, an event, not an activity, something which should be accomplished in him, not something which should be done by him in consequence of the dying to the law. Comp. the way in which Paul, Rom. vi. 11 sets forth the "living unto God" of Christians as something that actually comes to pass in their case, not as something which is as yet their task. According to this it would be about—εἰς τὸ γενέσθαι τῶν ἐτέρω, Rom. vii. 4; to belong to God, which involves both a being under God's authority and a communion with God. So far it rather affirms the possession of a good, the attainment of a position, the gaining of a profit, than the proposal of a work. The next verse especially leads us to refer it to the full filial status in relation to God, as it appertains primarily to Christ. This filial status would then be opposed to the condition under the law. Comp. iii. 23 sq. The fact that Paul here contrasts "God" and "law," "living unto God" and "living to the law" would then be explained by the essential difference existing between the full filial position of God's children and the state of bondage under the law. And the antithesis would be essentially the same which Paul sets forth, Rom. vi. 14, as an antithesis between being "under the law" and "under grace." Life, however, is not merely a state, but essentially an activity also, actualizing itself and having permanence only as such. Hence "living to God" indicates, though not primarily, yet as immediately resulting, an activity and course of conduct with reference to God, and the more so indeed for the very reason, that by this "living to God" especially a good is gained; on which account also Paul, e. g., Rom. vi. 12, 13, affirms as an obligation contained therein, the obligation "to yield one's self to God." Since he there derives this obligation from the "being alive unto God," we should doubtless assume it here also, as a secondary idea implied in "that I might live unto God." In the first place the expression ἵνα—statement of design—points to something, which even if it is on the one hand already given, yet on the other is also still to be looked for. And in the second place the connection points to this ethical interpretation, for Paul means to repel the allegation that by faith in Christ, by abandoning the position of the law, one becomes a sinner: and he cannot do this more emphatically than by describing the release from the law as the operation of the law itself, and as having for its purpose the living unto God. "Living unto God" then passes over into the meaning: to dedicate one's life to God, the dative thus acquiring of course a yet fuller meaning, denoting not merely possession, but devotion, surrender to. The antithesis between "living unto God" and "living unto the law" is also to be explained as Rom. vii. For the law leads "to sin" (and to death). The living to the law then in truth sunders from God. The "dying to the law" thus acquires the sense of dying unto sin (Rom. vi.), though of course it is not to be identified with it.

[ELLICOTT thus sums up the results; while his views do not differ materially from those given above, the statement is so succinct that the substance of it may well be inserted here: 1. Law in each case has the same meaning. 2. The Mosaic law is meant. 3. The law is regarded under the same aspect as in Rom. viii. 7, 13, a passage in strictest analogy with the present. 4. It was not διὰ νόμον or κατὰ νόμον but διὰ νόμον, through the instrumentality of the law, that the sinful principle worked within and brought death upon all. 5. "Died" is not merely "legi valdeixi," but expresses generally what is afterwards more specifically expressed by "I have been crucified with." 6. The dative "to the law" is not merely "with reference to," but a species of dative "commodi:" "I died not only as concerns the law, but as the law required." He paraphrases thus "I through the law, owing to sin, was brought under its curse; but having undergone this, with, and in the person of Christ, I died to the law in the fullest and deepest sense—being both free from its claims and having satisfied its curse." So LIGHTFOOT: "The law is the strength of sin. At the same time it provides no remedy for the sinner. On the contrary it condemns him hopelessly, for no one can fulfil the requirements of the law. The law then exercises a double power over those subject to it; it makes them sinners and punishes them for being so. What can they do to escape? They have no choice but to throw off the bondage of the law, for the law itself has driven them to this. They find the deliverance, which they seek, in Christ. Thus then they pass through three stages 1. Prior to the law—sinful, but ignorant of sin; 2. under the law—sinful, and conscious of sin, yearning after better things; 3. free from the law—free and justified in Christ. The second stage ('through the law') is a necessary preparation for the third ('died to the law')." So MEYER and many others, following CHRYSOSTOM in the main.—R.]

Ver. 20. I have been crucified with Christ.—Χριστῷ συνεσταύρωμαι. "I have come into fellowship with Christ's death on the cross, through faith, so that what happened to Christ has also happened to me." The Apostle declares thereby in what way the dying to the law through the law has been effected. Christ died "through the law," for in the crucifixion the curse of the law was fulfilled upon Him. Whoever therefore is "crucified with Christ," has also died "through the law"—the curse of the law is fulfilled on him too. But Christ, dying through the law, died also to the law, i. e., His life of subjection to the law came to an end (comp. iv. 4) even according to the principle, Rom. vii. 1, and the more so in His case, because it brought the curse undeservedly upon Him, and therefore forfeited its claim. As now the one "crucified with Christ" has died "through the law," he has at the same time thereby also died "to the law"—he has, for the law, become a dead man, such an one as is no longer subject to the law, is free from it and its claims. The law over against him has no right of possession, having lost it. Comp. Rom. vii. 2: "dead to the law through the body of Christ." An equivalent sense is contained in chap. iii. 25: "faith having come, we are no longer under a schoolmaster." For "crucified with Christ" rests essentially upon "faith." As "I have been crucified with Christ" was the proof of the precious declaration (ver. 19), so ver. 20 first makes clear, why in consequence of the "dying to the law through the law," he has attained to a "living unto God." For as it is especially true of Christ that through the law, He died to the law, so it is also especially true of Him, that this came to pass that He might live unto God. Comp. Rom. vi. 10. For His death on the cross was for Him the departure from that life in which He also had been subject to the law (iv. 4), and through His resurrection it led in His case to the entrance into a life of another kind, into a life, in which He without any medium stood in immediate relation to God, in a pure filial relation, something which is most simply expressed by "living unto God." Whoever now believes in Christ, participates, as in Christ's death, so in Christ's new life; as he is crucified with Christ, so he lives with Christ (Rom. vi. 8). But Paul does not stop with this thought; he is not satisfied with a "crucified Christ" that he might live with Christ.—It is, however, no longer I that live.—In his case the being "crucified with" has indeed led to a life; but what now lives in him is no more his Ego; this his Ego did live, when he was still under the law, without knowledge of Christ; it is therefore an Ego essentially linked with the law, disappearing with the legal life, so that he after the revolution which has come to pass within him through faith in Christ and the release from the law, must regard it as altogether vanished out of existence. This whole Ego has died with Christ.—But Christ liveth in me.—Another life is it, on the contrary (dé adversative), that is now in him, the life of another personality; and this personality is Christ, viz., as one who has Himself passed through death to life. And as such He is living unto God. Therefore although living with Christ has as its result, living unto God, this must needs become far more complete by a living of Christ Himself in the man.

Yea the life which now I live in the flesh.—But while Paul has declared of himself, that Christ Himself lives in him, Christ as the risen and glorified One, he, on the other hand, knows well that even yet there appertains to him as before, a life "in the flesh," i. e. a life of terrestrial corporeality, and so far, therefore, a yet imperfect life, which of itself stands in conflict with the life of Christ in him (dé in ô dé adversative). [It is perhaps better to regard dé as introducing an explanatory and partially concessive clause (ELLICOTT). "So far as I now live in the flesh; it is still a life in faith." LIGHTFOOT. To avoid the repetition of "but"—the word "yea" will convey the force of the connection—"Even though I do live a life in the flesh, Christ so lives in me, that yea this very life I live by the faith," etc.—R.] "Flesh" here does not of course affirm an ethical defect, for he affirms this life at this very moment of himself, but only so to speak, a physical life; the opposite idea is not: in the Spirit, but: in vision, in heaven. Paul does not, however, on this account, recall what he said before, but reconciles the life "in the flesh" with the life of Christ in him by I live in the faith.—"Now" is in opposition to the past time before the "dying to the law." Now, after he has died to the law, he lives, it is true, even yet "in the flesh," but he lives "in the faith." "In the faith" is of course opposed, first of all in a restricted way, to "in the flesh," on which account also the two phrases are conjoined; but in fact it constitutes the antithesis to the previous "living to the law." [Not "by faith," but "in faith," "the atmosphere as it were which he breathed in this his new spiritual life" (LIGHTFOOT).—R.] Of the Son of God.—Christ, we may believe, is designedly distinguished by this exalted predicate, in order to characterize faith as something great, in that it lays hold on the Son of God Himself. As if to say: what matters it that I still live in the flesh? Even in the flesh I possess through faith the Son of God! At the same time also the prepositionalness of the thought, that one can become a sinner, "seeking to be justified in Christ," [or that "Christ is a minister of sin."—R.] is intimated. Who loved me and gave himself for me.—"It is indeed natural that I should believe on Him, since He," etc.—and on the other hand this is a more definite statement of what faith believes.

Ver. 21 is a simple conclusion from what immediately precedes. Men cannot now say, that I frustrate the grace of God, for this manifested itself in the atoning death of the Son of God. But precisely in this do I believe, yea, my whole life is a life in faith thereon. Exactly the reverse: if righteousness came through the law, then Christ died without cause, needlessly, and if I through the law sought justification, I should then declare the death of Christ to have taken place in vain, and should thus reject the grace of God: but now this latter is precisely what I did not do, and therefore not the former; I cannot be reproached with this. It is to be supposed, that some accused Paul, on account of his independence of the law in his course of conduct, of a contempt of the grace of God, not recognizing, in their confusion of thought, the truth that just this self-elevation of Christ was the chief manifestation of this grace, that therefore every disparagement of that self-devotion to death, by emphasizing the law, implied a condemning of this grace. This δωρεάν is, in conclusion, a sharply trenchant word. [MEYER: "This death took place unnecessarily, if what it should effect, could be attained through the law. ERASMUS is excellent: est autem ratiocinatio ab impossibili."—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

I. "Controversy of Paul with Peter" is a frequent, but incorrect title of this section. It should rather be entitled: Peter's weak yielding and Paul's open rebuke of it. For there is not the slightest mention made of a controversy between the two, and especially none of any opposing reply provoked by Paul.

As regards the fault of Peter, the question, in what it consisted, has been answered in the main above. To express it generally, it was a practical denying of the freer, genuinely evangelical conviction, to which he had attained, and that too from an unworthy motive, namely the fear of man, a fear of the censure of legally-minded Christians (and thus at all events an ὑποκρισις). This of itself gives an important hint as to how we are to show regard for "the weak," and when we may, out of consideration for them, renounce some particulars of Christian freedom. It is right only when it proceeds not from the fear of men or their censure or in any other way from self-interest, but from indulgent care that scandal be not given, and conscience be not perplexed.—Peter's conduct, however, was particularly indefensible on account of the special circumstances under which it took place; at a time when it was of moment to secure the principal of Christian liberty, "the truth of the gospel," which through Peter's behavior was put in jeopardy: for the Gentile Christians, who were witnesses of it, were thereby induced to suppose that the observing of the Mosaic law was something necessary for a Christian, were shaken in their previous Christian conviction. A further important hint as to this regard for the weak! it may be duty, it may also be forbidden, when the fundamental principle of evangelical freedom would thereby be rendered doubtful to any one (or when, on the other hand, it might be perverted so as to establish the legal position, and to support an attack upon evangelical liberty).

The nature of the fault determines also our judgment respecting it. It was a fault: and on this account Paul's correction of it, and that in the way in which it took place, i. e., publicly, before all, was warranted, nay, necessary: necessary, not so much on account of the fear of man betrayed in it, as on account of the perplexity of conscience among the Gentile Christians, which was to be apprehended. This was the reason why Paul took occasion to set forth with such distinctness the evangelical doctrine of justification by faith. That a Peter should be set right by Paul, ill accords with the Romish view of the primacy of Peter. The transaction in Antioch will therefore also be urged with propriety against the assumption of such a primacy. The narrative is also instructive for the just apprehension of the general personal characters of the Apostles, and constitutes a corrective against exaggerated notions of these, as though a shortcoming, and unwarranted step, or even a sin, were never possible in their case.—But on the other side, more must not be made of Peter's fault than it really was. It must not be regarded as anything else than a sin of weakness. If even Peter's denial of his Master, rightly judged, can only be regarded as such, much more, and with entire certainty must this case in Antioch be so regarded, and this case, although in some measures analogous to his denial, is much less scandalous as indeed, considering that meanwhile he had been endued with the Holy Ghost, might be expected. That he strove with the Spirit, is not even to be imagined, nam quo rectore apostoli utebantur, spiritus sanctus neque sublati illos omni virium humanarum efficientia neque ita moderatus est, ut labe quavis eximerentur vel castigationi fraternæ locus non esset (ELWERT, p. 16), as little as that sins of weakness generally are impossible in those who have received the Holy Ghost. Moreover, as this lapse of Peter was a lapse in practical conduct, and not in teaching, it cannot be pretended that it overturns faith in the inspiration of the Scriptures. The apostolic dignity of Peter and of his teaching, Paul does not in the least assail, and does not speak of them as impaired; as indeed it is precisely in his teaching on this particular point that Peter here comes into view as occupying the right position, failing of faithfulness to it in his practical behavior only. But in any case, the uncertainty of the senior Apostles respecting the obligation of the law, the existence of which is plainly enough attested by the Acts, does not warrant us in drawing a conclusion as to the truth of apostolic teaching generally. There was in this matter a learning, a growth and advancement to clear knowledge of the evangelical truth: and just in this point the corrective is given and the genuine truth of the gospel shown to us by means of Paul, in whose calling we are not to see a chance, but the significant dispensation of the Head of the Church, who knew her needs. We need not therefore isolate one from the other, but as and because both are given together, they should also be taken together, and out of both together we should gain the full light of evangelical knowledge of the truth.—Least warranted of all is the misuse of this passage to maintain the existence of a standing difference and permanent ill-feeling between Paul and Peter. Their agreement of view appears in a way hardly to be expected in Peter, inasmuch as he too set forth the principle of evangelical freedom (from the law) by his eating in common with the Gentile Christians; and if in consequence of Peter's weakness there arose a difference, nothing whatever points to anything permanent, to any deep division, but what took place in a single case was rebuked by Paul, and the unjustifiableness of this conduct openly demonstrated. The publicity of the rebuke, moreover, is by no means to be regarded merely as making it keener, but as showing no less the brotherly way in which the matter was handled, inasmuch as a reproach addressed to Peter in private would have been far more apt to make the impression of a personal strife, and had there been a deeply seated difference, it were inconceivable that Peter would have suffered himself to be thus publicly rebuked.—As it is important rightly to understand Peter's fault, on the other hand Paul's correction of it must not be misinterpreted; it was not an exaltation of himself, but flowed only from zeal for the "truth of the gospel," for the confirmation of Christian consciences; and the decision with which Paul stood forth in behalf of this without fear of man, is instructive. Although, indeed, not every one is competent to such a procedure, but ordinarily only one who has a public standing, like Paul, yet the principle expressed in his procedure is important, namely, that in matters of faith, no human authorities, however high they stand, can give law, but that their acts remain always subject to the test, according to the norm of "the truth of the gospel."—As the facts here testify against a primacy of Peter, so the ground and warrant of the act of rebuke witness most strongly against the idea of the Papacy in general, and against everything that borders on it under the protection of the principle of authority.

[SCHAFF, Apost. Church, p. 258, gives the following resumé: "This event is full of instruction. We cannot, indeed, justly infer from it anything unfavorable to the inspiration and doctrine of Peter; for his fault was rather a practical denial of his real and true conviction. But it shows that the Apostles, even after the outpouring of the Holy Ghost, are not to be looked upon as perfect saints in such sense as to be liable to no sinful weakness whatever. We here discern still the workings of the old sanguine, impulsive nature of Peter, who could, one hour, with enthusiastic devotion, swear fidelity to his Master; and the next, deny him thrice. Paul, too, on his part, may have been too excited and sharp against the senior Apostle, without making due allowance for the delicacy of his position, and his regard for the scrupulosity of the Jewish converts; which certainly go far to excuse, though not to justify Peter. Then again from the conduct of Paul we learn not only the right and duty of combating the errors even of the most distinguished servants of Christ, but also the equality of the Apostles, in opposition to an undue exaltation of Peter above his colleagues." On the bearing of this passage against the Papal claim to infallibility, see WORDSWORTH, who makes the error of Peter to have been "imposing unjustifiable terms of communion."—R.]

2. The Pauline doctrine of Justification.—We have in this section, in a short dogmatic form, the Pauline doctrine of Justification in the sentence: ὁ δικαιούται ἄνθρωπος ἐξ ἔργων νόμου, ἢ ἂν μὴ διὰ πίστεως Ἰησοῦ Χρ., "a man is not justified by the works of the law, but [only] by the faith of Jesus Christ."

a) The idea of "works of the law" is first to be determined. It does not, for instance, signify merely the observance of ritual prescriptions, and the reason why "a man is not justified by the works of the law," is not that such ceremonial works are not sufficient. For then Paul would simply have directed attention from these works to others (better, or more difficult ones), and not, as he does, have diverted attention from works, altogether to something totally different, namely, "faith." No, as the law itself contains not merely ritual prescriptions, but also precepts peculiarly ethical, undoubtedly the entirely general expression "works of the law," also denotes works of either kind. More accurately—Paul does not divide the law, but takes the law as an integral whole, as a divine institute, which, with all its precepts, the ritual as well as the specially ethical, morally obliges man, and, as an expression of the Divine will, requires and expects obedience from him. (Therefore, even if only ritual observances were meant, yet in reality the ground of non-justification could not be found simply in the externality of these precepts; in them also God has expressed His will; their observance also is to be regarded as a moral service.) "Works of the law," therefore, are generally all works that are done (and are) in conformity with the requisitions of the Divine law.—Yet this is only a preliminary and entirely general definition. For then the question immediately arises: But why then no justification by them? or (since the idea of "being justified" itself still awaits elucidation), why does Paul then point entirely away from them to something entirely different? for thus much at least is implied in it. The common answer is: If man only performed such "works of the law," all would be well, he would then be justified thereby; but this he does not, and cannot do; therefore of course in this way there is no justification possible. But this answer of itself cannot satisfy: it reminds us too strongly of alucis a non lucendo; the "works of the law" would then, strictly speaking, have their name from the fact that they are not performed, from their non-existence. On the other hand a man certainly can (even of himself) do "works of the law," can fulfil moral demands of the law (nay, he can do that much easier than have faith). But what he thereby accomplishes, is only ἔργα, "works" (on which account Paul in the Romans instead of ἔργα νόμου uses also the abridged expression ἔργα), i. e., 1. They are only single, isolated acts of obedience, here an ἔργον, there an ἔργον, and therefore even if the particular act corresponds to the particular requirement, yet this never completely satisfies the idea of the law, as an integral whole, and all trust in these, therefore, as if one could by these isolated "works" really fulfil the will of God, is perverted trust. The whole law=God's will, demands fulfilment. This presents the unsatisfactoriness of the works of the law more particularly as extensive. But 2. it presents it also intensively: the works, even because they are works, are only external acts of obedience. But the law demands fulfilment by the whole man. "Works of the law" can never satisfy it; and confidence in them, therefore, as if one could endure God's judgment on the ground of these, is always unfounded. The fulfilment of the law requires first and last a temper of mind answerable thereto. In the law God requires obedience to His will: to fulfil it, therefore, man must himself be filled with the spirit of this obedience, and that not a merely external, seeming obedience, but a genuine one, whose source is in love to God. But now the fulfilment, both of the former requirement and of this latter, is shipwrecked on the sinfulness of man, in consequence of which he cannot of himself rise above that want of unity and this externality of his moral acts, in consequence of which he accomplishes only "works of the law," and for that very reason does not attain to δικαίωσις. First of all then there would be held up before the man the duty of perfectly fulfilling the law extensively and intensively, in contrast with the mere "works of the law." But this would really accomplish nothing, because the defect is grounded in the sinfulness of man. There is therefore either no δικαίωσις, or it must come in an entirely different way, and this way is "the faith of Jesus Christ."

These "works of the law" Paul nowhere calls "good works;" he uses the term "good works" only in the full sense of the word, to denote works which are really good, as being works of faith; which is just what the "works of law" are not, else δικαίωσις would come from them, and Faith would be superfluous.—Far less than by these even is the name of "good works" deserved by those "works" which have come up within the Christian period and been imposed as conditions of salvation. These have been only a new form of the "works of the law," and therefore LUTHER, as is well known, found in the Pauline declarations respecting these his most effective weapons against the Romish "works of the law" and the false confidence reposed in them. On the other hand, it is true, he urges most distinctly and forcibly that, as being mere human ordinances, the ecclesiastical "works of the law" do not even stand on an equality with the "works of the law" of the Jews, which at least were commanded by God, and that therefore it is so much the more perverse to trust in them. This is the Roman Catholic form of the "works of the law." But they are perpetually undergoing new transformations, and coming up again with the old pretensions (less and less justified as these continually are), agreeably to the natural leaning of man to a righteousness of works. Especially does he find it easy (to say nothing of observances essentially and from the beginning serving this perverse end) to turn even well intended usages and institutions, in themselves salutary, into a "law," and then to set his trust upon the observance of these. Nay, even the exercises which are meant to further the life of faith as opposed to the legal life, are themselves too often turned again into "works of the law."

b) Signification of δικαίωσις. Passing now to δικαίωσις, the term of chief import, we ask what is the signification of this?

This question is most easily answered, if we start from Paul's denial: "not by the works of the law." The Jew believes that he ἐξ ἔργ. v. δικαιούται. What does this mean, what is expected by the man who believes this? Evidently this belief does not imply his making to himself the ethical statement: if I do the "works of the law," I shall be—made righteous (justus reddor), that is, by God. For certainly he who does the works of the law, does not expect a subsequent justum reddi by God; his doing the works of the law in itself constitutes him and proves him (according to the supposition) a justus. He is not therefore expecting, as necessary to this, that God shall first translate him into the moral conditions of a justus.

No: the thought "justified by the works of the law" conveyed to the Jew the idea of a judgment of God pronounced upon him, as being one who accomplished the "works of the law:" and nothing can therefore be better established than the forensic, declaratory signification of δικαιοῦν: taken, in the first instance, in its most general sense. As to the precise nature of the judgment, it was primarily, simply the sentence: Thou art a δικαίος [righteous, just man.—R.]. This was what the man needed to render complete his living "after the law," and thus δικαίως, what he needed to make his claim before the law perfect: namely, the Divine judgment that he was thereby δικαίος; even had he wished to derive from it nothing else than the certainty that he was δικαίος. With this he would then have had the lofty, ennobling, and blessed consciousness of God's taking pleasure in him, of God's gracious dispositions towards him. But the judgment of God, we know, is never, so to speak, a mere judgment in words, but is also a judgment in deeds, that is, the favor of God to any one shows itself in actual blessing. To this, to the obtaining of the blessing of God, and averting of His curse, the expectation of him, who occupied himself with the works of the law, was directed, agreeably to the Divine promises. This blessing was, as is known, primarily a temporal one, temporal good fortune and prosperity, the dwelling in the promised land.

If we apply this to the position which the gospel, denying δικαίωσις ἐξ ἔργ. v. assumes: "a man is justified by the faith of Christ," the sense naturally is: the judgment is uttered respecting him who believes on Jesus Christ, that he is δικαίος. (How this is brought about, so that the sentence: Thou art δικαίος, is itself δικαίον, righteous, by reason of the sacrificial death of Christ, is in this passage only intimated, vers. 19, 20, 21, and is also where more explicitly established by Paul.) The main point is first the fact [dass "dass"] of this judgment, namely that the Divine complacency and satisfaction is attested thereby: but then, as intimated above all, the whole weight falls upon the manifestation of this in act, upon the effect of this judgment, and hence, upon the certainty of Divine Blessing (instead of curse). This blessing then, it is understood, comprehends a sum of manifestations, partly internal, and enjoyed even in the earthly life, but in part such as are only realized in eternity, and make up the fruition of the heavenly "inheritance." This elucidation makes it clear that δικαίωσις is not to be taken as immediately identical with the forgiveness of sins; for the theory of a δικαιοῦσθαι ἐξ ἔργ. v. implies the expectation of a δικαίωσις not connected with forgiveness of sins; since the claim is here to a justification founded on a doing of the works of the law, and not on a transgression of the law. In this justifying "by the faith of Christ" then, which becomes necessary for the very reason that, on account of our sinfulness being justified, is not possible "by the works of the law"—the forgiveness of sin, of the transgression of the law, is no doubt an integral, nay, more, the fundamental element of the δικαίωσις, it is in the full sense an Act of Pardon.—The elements into which the δικαίωσις resolves itself, or, if the phrase is preferred, the consequences which grow out of the δικαίωσις, are then found in detail (partially at least), in chap. iii., (and also in chap. iv.), where the reference to the "Blessing," in opposition to the "curse" (agreeably to our exposition), as well as to the "inheritance," is instructive. And if at the beginning of chap. iii. the receiving of the Holy Ghost is described as an effect of "faith" (as opposed to the works of the law), it is unwarrantable to urge this against the forensic, declaratory sense of justification, as if it signified an internal transformation, a translation from the flesh into the Spirit, etc. For the immediate reference here is to the receiving of the Spirit as a Divine blessing, the communication of a gracious benefit, as a sign and evidence of the Divine good will, an evidence of pardon. This gift of the Spirit, it is indisputably true, creates a new life, and it is given to this end, but this view is second in order.—Nay, this new life itself is also to be regarded as a Divine grace. δικαιοῦν therefore is an effective act only in the above named sense, that God's approving judgment is shown also in act, or that God's judgment consists in real blessings. It is not an effective act in the sense that δικαιοῦν of itself signifies an infusio justitiæ of any sort, new life, or the like.—Unquestionably the "faith of Jesus Christ" leads not merely to δικαίωσις, but also to a new "living with Christ," which is grounded upon a "dying with Christ" (of which there is a brief mention of this section vers. 19, 20). But this is not comprehended in δικαίωσις as Paul uses it; for this idea he has the entirely different turn of thought and expression quoted above. Therefore no one should confound what Paul expressly keeps apart (e. g., as he plainly does in the relation of Rom. vi. to the preceding chapters). δικαιοθῆναι is not identical with the origination of a new life. In this passage especially (ver. 19 sq.) Paul's allusion to the new life that had arisen in him through faith in Jesus Christ, serves, strictly speaking, only as a reason why he no longer seeks δικαίωσις through the "works of the law," but through faith in Christ. Through the crucifixion with Christ the man of the law has been slain in him, and a new man has arisen who lives in "faith in Christ." The new man therefore is he who knows his δικαίωσις to be grounded on faith in Christ. It is a sign of the new man, it belongs to his nature to live "in the faith of Jesus Christ," and to seek and find in that, instead of in the law, his δικαίωσις. But it does not follow from this that δικαιοθῆναι means the same as to become a new man.

But, allowing that δικαίωσις is not to be identified with the origination of a new life, does not the latter precede the δικαίωσις, and is it not, not unfrequently, the material ground of it? This brings us

c) To the idea of "faith," and its relation to justification. "The faith of Jesus Christ" leads to justification, and this alone does not the works of the law, is what Paul declares with such distinctness. But in what way? Has Faith this effect inasmuch as, according to what has been touched upon above, the believer appropriates to himself the death and the life of Christ = the old man is slain and a new one planted in him, so that God, with reference to this, even though the new life is only in its beginning, yet recognizing in the beginning the guarantee of the rest, acquits him of sin, and bestows upon him blessing and grace, that is justifies him in the forensic sense, and then implants in him still further such life, with the effective method of the justification? This must be denied decidedly: for this simple reason, that otherwise the ground of justification, in the mind of God, would consist in something else than that which the faith of the believer apprehends as its ground, and so his faith would really be an illusion. For 1. "The believer believes on Christ," is equivalent to saying that he recognizes in Christ, and particularly in Christ's sacrificial death, the ground of his justification. 2. The believer, through his faith in Christ, undoubtedly comes to a new life, but this life is and abides, as our passage itself shows, essentially and above all a life in faith, and in faith on Christ's death (ver. 20); in the conviction of being justified before God by this death, from which then follows a life according to God's will in the special ethical sense, and transformation of the whole direction of the will. The real ground of justification, therefore, cannot consist in the believer's new life itself, but in that in which he himself, renouncing the works of the law, seeks and continually finds it, namely, in Christ's atoning death. Else were he entangled in a delusion. And faith justifies simply because it is, as it were, our unreserved assent to the reconciliation already effected in Christ. It needs only that, for through the atoning death of Christ, provided any one will not deny its value, the grace of God is already won for us all; therefore, there remains nothing on our part but to say Yes to it (manus apprehendens). Without this, that grace cannot become our own; through it, it does become our own, since an earning of it, or a making ourselves worthy of it, is no longer needful; but, on the contrary, every such thought derogates somewhat from the merit of Christ. Nothing further then is needed than just this "believing;" we need not fancy this too little when taken in its simple sense = "to trust," "to place confidence in," and we need not suppose we must first make its idea as it were more complete by taking in its effects, in order to be able to acknowledge faith as the condition* of justification. Were faith to be made more than the condition of justification, were it to be made its ground, we might intensify its idea as much as we would, it would still be too little. But now, as on the one hand, Faith utters its Amen to the reconciliation accomplished in Christ, and thus makes the man partaker of it,—that is, justifies him, so does it also lay hold of this death itself, which has wrought for it so great a benefit = the man who has heretofore lived, dies with Christ and through Christ, but there comes instead (not out of faith, but out of Christ, yet not without faith), a new man, who lives to God, but ever henceforth seeks the ground of God's favor in nothing else than in Christ. This trust comes more and more completely into exercise with the new life that springs up, instead of being now superfluous. (This is the double hand of faith.)

* There need be no mistake about the meaning of "condition" here: conditio sine qua non.—R.]

By what is said above, the idea of faith is not in any way unduly weakened. Even though man can do nothing more than apprehendere what is in God and Christ, yet this very apprehendere is the greatest and especially the hardest thing that (sinful) man can do. For it implies nothing less than a giving of all honor to God, and not to one's self, a willingness to renounce one's own reason, one's own merits, one's own will. Hence, even this man cannot have of himself, but God must bring him thereto. And he does it by the pedagogy of the "law" "unto Christ." On this, see the next chapter, although it is already intimated in ver. 19 of this.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 11-13.—STARKE:—The Apostles also had their faults, and sometimes committed great errors of conduct (1 John i. 8). What? Are ministers then, whose authority is so much less than that of the Apostles, to be expected not to err and sin? Therefore, follow them no further than they follow Christ.—Even though a thing be done with good intention, yet, so far as it is wrong in itself, or as any scandal arises thereby, it cannot be excused or defended by its good intention. When of two evils one must be chosen, it is better to let a scandal arise than to do anything that may prejudice evangelical truth.—Even children of God and great saints are capable of being very easily and suddenly surprised and overcome by the fear of man, when they do not sufficiently watch over themselves.—HEDINGER:—When faults, scandals in doctrine and life are prevalent, it is not for us to be silent, to strike sail and run before the wind, but to stand fast in our place.—QUESNEL:—The higher one stands, the more measured and guarded his conduct should be.

[CALVIN:—How cautiously we ought to guard against giving way to the opinions of men, lest we turn aside from the right path! If this happened to Peter, how much more easily to us.—LUTHER:—Such examples are written for our consolation. If Peter fell, I may likewise fall. If he rose again, I may also rise again. This comfort they take away, who say, the saints do not sin.—This is a wonderful matter! God preserved the church, being yet young, and the gospel, by one person. Paul alone standeth to the truth, for he had lost Barnabas, his companion, and Peter was against him. So sometimes one man is able to do more in a council than the whole council besides.—R.]

[BURKITT:—Such as sin openly, must be reprov'd openly.—No bands of friendship must keep the ministers of God from reprov'ing sin. A notorious fault must be reprov'd with much boldness and resolution. If such as are eminent in the church fall, they fall not alone; many do fall with them.—What a constraining power there is in the example of eminent persons. He is said to compel, in Scripture, not only who doth violently force, but who, being of authority, doth provoke by his example.—The errors of those that do rule, become rulers of error. Men sin through a kind of authority, through the sins of those who are in authority.—R.] who themselves will not receive rebuke as Peter did—nay, are very popes at heart. For there are popes in pews as well as in pulpits, besides the pope who openly claims to be such; Christian liberty suffers from them all.—The fear of man, of popular opinion often becomes to us as authoritative as decrees and Papal bulls to others.—Peter will not commune with Gentile Christians longer; so he might act if he would, as Peter, but as an Apostle, he thus made terms of communion against the truth of the gospel. He was condemned; do we never seek to bind the conscience not only "in meats and drinks," but as respects communion with other Christians?—When such conduct ceases to be a private choice, and becomes public scandal, it should be rebuked by one set for the defence of the truth of the gospel.—The yet remaining power of narrow national and social and religious prejudices in those who profess Christ as "all and in all." How strong in Peter; once so strong in Paul, but now crucified with Christ.—R.]

Ver. 14. SPENER:—The whole life of Christians has, besides God's glory, the end and aim that the truth of the gospel and pure doctrine may be established; those sins, therefore, are great above others, whereby any may be misled as to the truth of the gospel.—STARKE:—So soon as it is taught by words or deeds that anything more is necessary to salvation than the grace of God and faith, so soon is the truth of the gospel wounded.—In the matter of scandals, one who either maliciously or heedlessly causes them, has justly reckoned against him and imputed by God, what thereafter arises out of them, and thus the sin may become more grievous through its consequences.—RIEGER:—O God! if I ever err, give me a frankspoken Paul to warn me and make me on the spot or afterwards as mild in yielding, as Peter!—HEUBNER:—Things that trouble peace may arise even among children and messengers of God. In Acts xiii. 18. xv. 31, similar things are mentioned. Behold the imperfection of the earthly life! only above is harmony forever undisturbed. The kingdom of Christ, nevertheless, advances even through weak instruments.

Public rebuke: 1. admissible, yes, necessary, when anything has been done that perplexes consciences; 2. how shall it be conducted? Undoubtedly by free exposition of its evil consequences, but then chiefly by renewed and more thorough assertion of the truth of the Gospel: not with personal reproaches; and above all, in brotherly love; 3. difficult; therefore examine thyself well, whether thou be called or at all events fitted therefor, that thou destroy not more good than thou restorest; and if thou perceivest thyself not skilled, leave it: for after all it is not thou that rebuke and God knows well enough how to choose His own instruments. In all cases do it not without earnest looking up to God, that in the discharge of it He will keep thee as from the fear of man, so none the less from vanity, haughtiness and a loveless temper.

Ver. 15. STARKE:—The preëminence which we who are born of Christian ancestry have above others, must not be misused to the prejudice of divine grace; we must be none the less certain that the grace of Christ alone, not our descent from Christian parents, can save us.

Ver. 16. LUTHER:—Understand we this article rightly and purely? Then have we the true heavenly sun. But if we lose it, we have nothing else than a hellish darkness.—A troubled, wretched conscience should keep no thought or remembrance of the law, nor should oppose to the anger and judgment of God anything else than the sweet comforting word of Christ, which is a word of grace, of forgiveness of sins, of everlasting life and blessedness. But to do this is, especially hard. For the fearfulness of the conscience keeps us from well apprehending Christ, and tempts us often to let Him go, and to fall back upon the thought of law and sin.—As a Jew, through the works which he does after God's law, cannot be justified, how then should a monk be justified, by his order, a priest by his authority, a philosopher by his skill and wisdom, a sophistical theologian by his sophistry? Wise, pious, and righteous as men may become on earth through their reason and God's law, yet they are by all their works, merits, masses, and by the best of all their righteousness and acts of worship, not righteous before God.—RIEGER:—What thou art by nature and canst boast concerning thy good bringing up, thy refined education, thy works of the law, distinguish thee doubtless above many others. Thou art not bidden to throw that entirely away. What of quiet days, and advantage to thy health, and the like this secures to thee, enjoy. But into the secret chamber of judgment, where God and the conscience have to do with one another concerning the forgiveness of sins, this is not to intrude. Through no work of the law shall we ever bring it to pass that God will justify us, forgive our sins, bestow on us access to His grace, and the hope of future glory; that we learn alone from God's word and promise in Christ.

Ver. 17. RIEGER:—If I would suffer this thing again to become uncertain to me, namely, that I, leaving all works behind, should be justified through Christ alone; if I would be mistrustful about that, as if I had brought myself into sin by such a disparagement of works; if I fell back again upon works, as chanced to Peter, I should make Christ a minister of sin.—LUTHER:—Every one who teaches that faith in Christ doth not justify, unless a man also keep the law, such a one makes Christ a minister of sin, i. e. he makes out of him a law-teacher, who teaches just that, and nothing else that Moses teaches. So can Christ then be no Saviour and grace-giver, but would be only a cruel tyrant, who required of us merely impossible things, not one of which any man can fulfil. [For the other view of this passage see EXEG. NOTES.—BURKITT:—The Apostle rejects the inference of the adversaries of the doctrine of justification by faith with the greatest abhorrence and detestation. It is no new prejudice, though a very unjust one, against this doctrine of justification by faith alone, that it opens a door to licentiousness and makes Christ the minister of sin.—R.]

Ver. 18. STARKE:—Teachers should take good care, that what they tear down with one hand, that they may not build up again with the other.

Ver. 19. RIEGER.—I have not run away from the law like an escaped rogue. It has cost a death, I have made trial of the law before, and learnt well, how far the law carries us, and what is impossible to it. But now, as in the case of a marriage dissolved by death, I am lawfully divorced from the law. I have no desire to knit this bond again.—LUTHER:—St. Paul could have said nothing of mightier force against the righteousness that is supposed to come through the law, than just what he here saith: I have died to the law, I have nothing at all more to do with it, it concerns me nothing, nor can it justify me.—These words are most full of comfort, and let them come in mind to any one in time of temptations and afflictions, and be in his heart rightly and thoroughly understood. Such a one would without doubt be well able to stand against all danger and dread of death, against all manner of terrors of conscience and of sin, though they fell as vehemently upon him as ever they could.—Happy he who, when his conscience falls into distress and temptation, that is, when sin assails and the law accuses him, then can say: What matters that to me; for I have died to thee. But if thou wilt ever dispute with me concerning sins, go, bury thyself with the flesh and its members, my servants pass then in review, plague and crucify them as thou wilt; but me, the conscience, it is for thee to leave, in peace as queen. For thou hast no concern with me since I have died to thee and live now to Christ.—It is a strange, curious, and unheard of speech, that to live to the law is as much as to die to God, and to die to the law as much as to live to God. These two sentences are completely and entirely athwart the reason, therefore also no sophist as law teacher can understand them. But do thou give diligence that thou learn well to understand them, namely thus, that who now will live to the law, that is, practise himself in its works, and keep the same, in order that he may thereby be justified, such a one is a sinner and abides a sinner, and therefore condemned to everlasting death and damnation. For the law can make him neither righteous nor blessed, but if it begins to accuse him in right earnest, it only kills him. Therefore to live to the law is, in truth, nothing else than to die to God, and to die to the law is nothing else than to live to God; now to live to God, this is to become righteous through grace and faith on Christ, without any works or law.—STARKE:—The end of our freedom from the law is not, that we may live to ourselves, but that we may live to God and Christ.

Ver. 20. In STARKE:—Christ on His cross was to be regarded as the surety and head of the whole human race; therefore, in His person the whole human race was also crucified. Especially have believers part in the death of Christ, because faith brings with it a perfect union and fellowship between Christ and the faithful.—BERLENB. BIBLE:—Faith binds us to the cross of Christ, and there nothing of the old man will remain and be spared. Faith and the cross are to one another very near. Therefore, worldly wisdom turns its back on faith. Many with their faith will even separate the cross from itself; they make of faith a cross before the cross, and say of the other, away, away with it!—This is the method of stepping over from the law to the gospel, only through the death of the old Adam, and his peculiar life. It makes a huge corpse. ["I live."]—No more after my own willing and working, but in another spirit. We must lose ourselves. A man lives then most blessedly, when he lives not to himself. There must be in the heart another I. The old I must lose itself. But what says the self-love and selfishness that would gladly keep its life, and seek in everything what pleases it, that will not hate its own soul, affections, desires, dispositions, and sensual cravings? Its word is: That am I! that is from me! that is in me! therefore, that is mine! that befits me! that pleases me! that is so with me! It demands, therefore, from God and man rest, life, love, honor, obedience, trust, help, assistance, comfort, and enjoyment. O what a heavy stone of stumbling is self-love in Christ's way!—[BUNYAN:—They only have benefit by Christ to eternal life, who die by His example, as well as live by His blood; for in His death was both merit and example; and they are like to miss in the first, that are not concerned in the second.—R.]

LUTHER:—The very life that I live is Christ Himself, and therefore Christ and I are in this matter altogether one thing. None the less, it is true, there remains outwardly cleaving to me the old man that is under the law, but so far as concerns this matter, namely, that I be justified before God, Christ and I cannot but be bound in the closest wise together, so that He lives in me and I again in Him.—Christ and my conscience should become one body, so that I should keep nothing else before my eyes than Jesus Christ. But if I turn my countenance away from Christ, and look alone upon myself, it is at once all over with me. For then straightway flashes into my mind: Christ is above in heaven, and thou here below on earth, how wilt thou now find the way up to Him? Then the reason quickly answers: I will lead a holy life, and do what the law bids me, and so enter into life. But when I thus look upon myself, and consider only what I am, or what I ought to be, and what I am bound to do, I lose Christ forthwith out of my sight, who yet alone is my righteousness and life; but when I have lost Him, there is no longer either help or counsel, but at the last desperation and eternal damnation must needs follow.—BERLENEB. BIBLE:—Christ is life not for Himself alone, but a benefit that willingly and freely communicates itself. Where now it finds a man who hates and forsakes his own life, and lives no longer in his own self-love, in him Christ lives.—RIEGER:—If a man should hear of the fellowship of the cross of Christ alone, a man might form to himself too joyless an image of my religion; but it is also a fellowship with His life. And my life in the flesh, my tarrying upon this battlefield of sin and grace, is given me for a proof how the Son of God once made a journey through the world, and remained constant to His Heavenly Father.

[JOHN BROWN:—Paul here declares his experience. The law has no more to do with me, and I have no more to do with it in the matter of justification.—Christ died and in Him I died; Christ revived and in Him I revived. The law has killed me, and by doing so, it has set me free from itself. The life I now have, is not the life of a man under the law, but the life of a man delivered from the law.—Christ's relations to God are my relations. His views are my views; His feelings my feelings. He is the soul of my soul, the life of my life. My state, my sentiments, my conduct are all Christian.—"It is but right that I should be entirely devoted to Him who devoted Himself entirely for me."—R.]

LUTHER:—It is very true that I still live in the flesh, but be it now what life it may, that is still in me, I count it yet for no life at all; for it is, if one will view it aright, indeed no life, but rather a mask, under which another lives, namely Christ, who is truly my life, that thou canst not see, but hearest it alone. I live, to be sure, in the flesh; but I live not from the flesh or after the flesh, but in faith, from faith, and according to faith.—"Who loved me and gave Himself for me." With these words Paul describes in most comforting wise Christ's office and priesthood. This now is His office, that He should reconcile us with God, give Himself up for our sins, &c. Therefore, thou must not make of Him a new law-giver that does away the old law and establishes a new in its place. Christ is no Moses, no taskmaster and lawgiver, but a grace-giver and compassionate Saviour. He is nothing else than a purely measureless and overflowing compassion, that suffers itself to be bestowed upon us, and also bestows itself. Setting forth Christ after such a way, thou rightly depictest Him. But if thou suffer Him to be portrayed to thee in other guise, thou mayest, in the time of temptation, be easily and quickly overthrown.—These words of Paul are an excellent example of a genuine and assured faith.—Accustom thyself to this, that thou apprehend this brief word, "me," with certain faith, and doubtst not thereof, that thou also art in the number of those who are named with this little word "me." For, as we cannot deny that we are one and all sinners, so can we also not deny that Christ died for our sins, that He might justify us through His death. For surely He has not died for this, that He should justify those that were righteous before, but that He should help poor sinners. Because then I feel and confess that I am a sinner, why should I not, on the other hand, also say that I am righteous because of Christ's righteousness, especially because I hear that He has loved me and given Himself for me. St. Paul believed it steadfastly and assuredly, and, therefore, also does he speak of it so freely and confidently. But may He who hath loved us and given Himself for us, bestow on us grace, that we may be able, if only in part, to do the like and speak thus concerning ourselves.—[LIGHTFOOT:—Paul appropriates to himself, as CHRYSOSTOM observes, the love which belongs equally to the whole world. For Christ is, indeed, the personal friend of each man individually; and is as much to him as if He had died for him alone.—R.]

Ver. 21. STARKE:—The rejection of the grace of God, may take place: 1. by a denial of the perfect satisfaction of Christ; 2. by setting along side of it our own merits, worthiness and righteousness, as Popery does in doctrine, and many even in our churches do in fact; 3. by abusing this grace to favor presumption, and to supersede sanctification; 4. when even sincere souls, in the feeling of their unworthiness, are much too timorous to appropriate grace to themselves, and think they must first have arrived at this or that degree of holiness, before grace can avail them any thing; 5. when tempted ones from a lack of feeling conclude that they have fallen out of grace again.

LUTHER:—The righteousness that comes from the law is nothing else than mere contempt and rejection of God's grace, whereby the death of Christ becomes unworthy and unavailing. Who is, indeed, so eloquent that he can sufficiently portray and bring to light, what it is to reject the grace of God? or to make out that Christ has died in vain? It is hard to have to talk of any useless dying; but to say that Christ has died in vain, that is too much, that is quite too villanous a word, for it is nothing less than to say that Christ is wholly unprofitable, is nothing worth.—If any one will make out Christ's death an unprofitable thing, he must also make His resurrection, His glorious triumph over sin, death, etc., His kingdom, heaven, earth, God Himself, God's majesty and glory, and in brief all things together contemptible and useless.—These great, mighty, and terrible thunderclaps, which St. Paul in his writings brings down from heaven against our own righteousness, that comes from the law, ought, by good right, to terrify us from it.—When the world hears such a charge, it will not at all believe that it is true; for it does not allow that a man's heart could be so wicked that he should reject the grace of God, and count Christ's death a despicable thing, and yet for all that, this sin is of all in the world the most common. Whoever will be righteous outside of faith in Christ, such a one casts away God's grace, and despises the death of Christ, though in words he speak as highly and honorably thereof, as ever he knows how to speak.

Vers. 19-21. To live to God, our end; 1. What is thereby required? 2. Condition of accomplishing it; the way thereto is dying—to the law: this again is possible only through being crucified with Christ.—To be crucified with Christ: 1. something difficult, requires nothing less than that we place ourselves under God's sentence of condemnation; 2. indispensably necessary: else there can be no life to God.—To die with Christ—to live to God; this is the prenant definition of true Christianity.—I live, yet no longer I, but Christ liveth in me: a bold expression; but so must it be in the case of a Christian; one's own Ego must vanish, and in place of it Christ must rule in us.—Christ lives in me: 1. can we say so, when even yet there is much sin in us? 2. When can we say so? when at least it is He, in whom alone we seek our righteousness? The Christian's life a double life: a. Proof: 1. the joyful attestation: Christ lives in me; 2. he must humbly acknowledge and in manifold ways experience; I yet live in the flesh. b. What is to be done, that he, so long as he lives and whatever his life in the flesh, may not live to the flesh, but to Him who, etc.—Living in faith on the Son of God, who loved us, and gave Himself for us: 1. the blessed prerogative, 2. the sacred duty of the Christian.—In LISCO:—The life in the faith of the Son of God: 1. what it presupposes in us. Ver. 19: the death of the old natural life—the being crucified with Christ; 2. wherein it essentially consists? Ver. 20: in entire self-surrender to the Son of God, in being filled and permeated with His love, which to the true Christian is the one moving spring of all his actions; 3. what value has it? Ver. 21, it serves to the glory of the grace of God, and the praise of the death of Christ.

To say Christ has also loved me, and given Himself for me, is the height of faith's achievements, simple as it appears.—Reject not the grace of God! an admonition as earnest as needful.—To reject God's grace the greatest of all sins. When is this done? (see above.)—Christ died in vain? 1. that cannot be; such a deed of love must have a high end; 2. and yet for how many has He died in vain!—Christ would have died in vain! the severest condemnation possible of every kind of righteousness of works.—To seek righteousness from works; as foolish (for Christ cannot have died in vain), as simple (it rejects that which was God's own most glorious work of Love). [“Then Christ died without cause.” Did such a person die. Then while we may account for His life by other theories, there is no sufficient reason for His death, save that which Paul preached: Full pardon, entire salvation, to every one who by faith lays hold of Christ as dying for him. Any other view is inconsistent with God's wisdom, frustrates God's grace as well.—Self-salvation must ever deny a sufficient purpose in that death.—R.]

II.

PAUL OPPOSES THE LEGAL VIEW ITSELF, WHICH THROUGH THE FALSE TEACHERS HAD FOUND ENTRANCE AMONG THE GALATIANS.

CHAPTER III. 1—VI. 10.

A. Remonstrance and expression of astonishment, at the contradiction into which this brings them with their own experience respecting the receiving of the Spirit.

(CHAPTER iii. 1-5.)

1 O foolish Galatians, who hath bewitched [did bewitch]¹ you, that ye should not obey the truth [omit this clause]² before whose eyes Jesus Christ hath been [was]³ evidently set forth, crucified among you [set forth among you, crucified]⁴? This only would I learn of you, Received ye the Spirit by the works of the law [was it by the works of the law that ye received the Spirit]⁵, or by the hearing of faith?
2 Are ye so foolish? having begun in [with]⁶ the Spirit, are ye now made perfect by 3 [being made⁷ perfect with] the flesh? Have ye suffered [or experienced]⁸ so many 4 things in vain? if it be yet [really] in vain. He therefore that ministereth to you the Spirit, and worketh miracles among [or miraculous powers in]⁹ you doeth he it by the works of the law, or by the hearing of faith?

¹ Ver. 1.—[As a rule the English simple past tense is the better rendering of the Greek aorist.—R.]

² Ver. 1.—Τῇ ἀληθ. μὴ πείθεσθαι is to be omitted with Lachmann and Tischendorf. A gloss from Gal. v. 7. [Omitted in N. A. B. and others; by Meyer, Alford, Ellicott, Wordsworth, Lightfoot.—R.]

⁷ Ver. 3.—Ἐπιτελείσθε, passive, not middle, "being made complete," not "completing yourselves."—R.]

⁸ Ver. 4.—The meaning of ἐπάθετε is open to discussion. Schmoller renders "erfahren." See EXEG. NOTES.—R.]

⁹ Ver. 5.—Δυνάμεις ἐν ὑμῖν; the two interpretations of this phrase are indicated above. See EXEG. NOTES.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. O foolish Galatians.—Direct address, because Paul now, for the first time after his historical account, turns to the readers. It is, therefore, a trustworthy intimation that a new section begins here, and that all which precedes belonged together. "Foolish:" that they had given up the better, genuine knowledge, is what Paul wishes to prove to them in the whole Epistle; this is, in fact, implied in the very opening words, chap. i. 6. His particular motive for expressing himself precisely thus here, and in general for expressing himself with especial emphasis, is that, although a new section begins here, yet, for the writer, this beginning presupposes what precedes—that is, in the first instance the proof of the full apostolicity of his preaching generally, and then particularly the just cited rebuking of Peter for conduct similar to theirs, concluding with the powerful words:

"For, if righteousness come by the law, then Christ died without cause." This very thought, so painful, that the Galatians, by their conduct, are declaring the greatest act of God's grace, the death of Christ, to have been in vain, may have been what impelled him to the vehement exclamation: ὁ ἀνὴρ τοῖς Γαλάταις. For here also his astonishment and his censure have primary reference to this death of Christ: "set before you, crucified." [JEROME and others have imagined a national peculiarity to be referred to here, which is altogether inadmissible. The Galatians were sprightly, not stupid, and ἀνόητος marks not so much "dullness" as "foolishness," want of νοῦς, improper use of it. They were not μωροί, but ἀνόητοι.—R.] Who did bewitch you?—So senseless and therefore incomprehensible is the apostasy of the Galatians, that Paul explains their being led astray as an effect of magic. For what he immediately subjoins had actually taken place among them; naturally, therefore, this apostasy—to Judaism—was least to be expected of them. For Christ's atoning death and Judaistic legalism are at opposite poles to each other; the stronger the emphasis laid on the former, the most distant must be any thought of the latter. Comp. ii. 21. [LIGHTFOOT:—"The word βασκάνειν originally referred to witchery by spells and incantations, but in actual use it denotes the blighting influence of the evil eye. It here involves two ideas: 1) The baleful effect on the recipient, and 2) the envious spirit of the agent. The false teachers envy the Galatians this liberty in Christ, have an interest in subjecting them again to bondage. This idea, however, is subordinate to the other." See WORDSWORTH, who quotes authorities for both ideas. There may be allusion to the notion that the power of the sorcerer was felt whenever the eye of the recipient rested on him,* in the expression "before whose eyes," as if keeping their eyes on that object would have preserved them from this bewitching; but this must not be pressed.—R.]

Before whose eyes Jesus Christ was evidently set forth.—Portrayed before the eyes, of course, by means of preaching, but the expression hints at the pains which Paul took to make known to them the crucified One, and to bring Him as near as possible to them. This is done designedly, in order to contrast the more strongly with this the apostasy that had taken place, and to justify the astonishment which he expresses.—Among you strengthens the statement still further: in the midst of you, by oral communication, not merely from a distance by letters. The following is the simplest explanation: "Before your eyes," so distinctly points out the meaning; "to paint," as that of προεγράφη, that we cannot hesitate to accept it, although the compound verb does not occur elsewhere in this sense. WIESELER: "But as γράφειν is very frequently used of painting, there is little occasion for hesitation in extending the signification to the regularly formed compound, even though there were no further warrant for it. In the New Testament there are other ἀπαξ λεγόμενα, both in form and meaning, and as to the latter in this case we have also the voice of the Greek Fathers." To give προ a temporal reference [MEYER, ALFORD, and others.—R.] is less suited to the context, while the local signification corresponds with "before whose eyes." [The safest rendering is that of the E. V. LIGHTFOOT says of the verb: "This is the common word to describe all public notices and proclamations; hence: programme;" and this is, on the whole, preferable. WORDSWORTH finds here an allusion to the heathen practice of carrying amulets to guard against witchcraft, and to the Jewish custom of binding phylacteries between the eyes. "Who bewitched you, before whose eyes was written and bound up by me, as your frontlet of Faith, your spiritual phylactery, Christ crucified; and who had, as I thought, been thus guarded by me against all the envious fascination of your spiritual ene-

Ver. 2. This only would I learn of you.—The unreasonableness of the apostasy is still further, and now, indeed, for the first time, expressly exposed. Not merely has the proclamation of Christ's death on the cross been made among them, but, through faith thereon, they have already attained to the receiving of the Holy Ghost,—and yet are you disposed to turn away from that which has already so attested itself? "Vide, quam efficaciter tractat locum ab experientia." LUTHER. ["Learn" = obtain information, not used ironically in the stricter sense of "learning as a disciple," as LUTHER, BENGLI, and others.—R.] He refers them to the receiving of the Spirit through faith, as a proof that it is Faith which works justification. For the Spirit can only be given by God to the man whom He justifies (not whom He reprobates); the gift of the Spirit is a token of grace, not of wrath.—"Only," for this is the main question; by this—so far as the proof is to be sustained by facts—the thing is proved.—The Spirit, generally, not merely as the principle of miraculous gifts; "for Paul reminds the collective body of his readers of their receiving of the Spirit; not till ver. 5 are the δυνάμεις, as a species of the Spirit's workings, particularly cited." MEYER.—By the hearing of faith.—"Through the preaching concerning faith," is the right translation, although not quite congruous with the first member, which has a subjective reference. [Ἀκοή, "hearing," has a passive sense always in the New Testament, i. e., it refers to what is heard (see MEYER, ELLICOTT), "the preaching."—πίστεως, "of faith," evidently an objective genitive. See LIGHTFOOT, WORDSWORTH, against both the above positions. Most modern expositors agree with Schmoller's next remark on the meaning of πίστις.—R.] Not = "through listening to the faith," since πίστις is never = doctrina fidei, but is only the subjective believing. "That in the first member of the double question their own strength, and, in the second, the power of the gospel (= of preaching) is made prominent, is quite natural, as it was through human strength that the Judaizing teachers would fain achieve that which was in truth only to be bestowed by the might of the gospel." WIESELER. That the "hearing" was accepted is understood, of course, since, from the "hearing," the gift of the Spirit proceeded (comp. Rom. x. 17); from preaching (sc. from believing) comes faith, and with it the Holy Ghost.

Ver. 3. Having begun with the Spirit.—You have made a beginning in the Christian life through the receiving of the Holy Ghost (ver. 2). Where a beginning is made, the next question is about the completion. Now—remarks Paul with cutting irony, bringing home the sense of this ἀνόητον of their conduct—such a completion there is also with you; but with the flesh! i. e., according to your and your false teachers' fancy, this now is the true completion; yet, in truth, it is no completion, but the direct opposite of it, an annihilation of the work begun, because it is a completion with the flesh. "Flesh" is the opposite of "Spirit," and where the "flesh" reigns, the "Spirit" must [* Coleridge paints this in his wierd lines:

"So deeply had she drunken in
That look, those shrunken, serpent eyes,
That all her features were resigned

give way. "The flesh," of course, rises again to dominion, where there is a retrogression to the legal position; for therewith the Holy Ghost, which has been obtained only through faith, is necessarily lost; and where the "Spirit" is wanting, there is the "flesh." [MEYER:—"Spirit and flesh do not describe Christianity and Judaism themselves, but the specific vital agencies in each, the Holy Spirit, and the unspiritual, corporeally-physical human nature, leading contrary to God and to sin." The datives are both modal, indicating the manner in which the two actions took place.—R.] Ἐπιτελεῖν signifies not merely "to end," but "to complete," consummare. Ἐπιτελεῖσθε may be middle; if so, then it is simplest to take it as = do ye now bring to completion (s. c. the work begun) in the flesh. But ἐπιτελεῖσθαι does not occur in the New Testament in a middle sense, though it is thus used by profane writers. Hence, others take it as passive, e. g. MEYER = you are brought to completion, sc., by the false teachers, inasmuch as they make of you people who lie under the dominion of the "flesh." This renders the reproach still sharper. So also LUTHER: instead of saying, carne consummasti, he suddenly turns the address, and says: carne consummami, which strictly signifies: Will you then let the matter be carried through with you in the flesh, and thereby be made completely righteous?—The present tense denotes that the Galatians are now engaged in this ἐπιτελεῖσθαι. Comp. i. 6.—Niv = cum magis magisque deberetis spirituales fieri relictā carne. BENGL.

Ver. 4. [Are ye so foolish?—"So very foolish are ye then?" οὕτως being emphatic.—R.] Have you experienced [or suffered] so many things in vain?—MEYER, in connection with his explanation of "being made perfect," interprets it as referring to the many burdensome performances connected with observing the law, which they had been obliged, by their new teachers, to undergo, in order, according to their notion, to become complete Christians. Having (according to MEYER) reminded them of these by ἐπιτελᾶ, he then lays before them the uselessness of such things by the exclamation (not question): "So many things," etc.—This is evidently a strained interpretation, and it is, by no means, probable that this would have been described as a πᾶθειν, or even that any such πᾶθειν is to be presumed to have taken place. It is, therefore, to be understood, either of sufferings and persecutions, that they underwent, on account of their faith, or, since nothing is otherwise known of such, πᾶθειν is to be taken as vox media, with the general signification, "to experience," here "to experience manifestations of Divine grace." [While the use of the aorist seems conclusive against the view of MEYER, it is more difficult to decide which of the other two interpretations is to be taken. Though nothing be known of such "sufferings," yet what more likely to occur? And if these arose from Judaizing influences, as was generally the case in Apostolic times, additional point is given to the Apostle's language. The other view, however, seems to give a greater logical unity to the passage, since vers. 3 and 5 both refer to "benefits." But was not Paul, who gloried in tribulation, likely to cite "sufferings" also as evidences of spiritual benefits? These considerations, in connection with the fact that there is no other instance in the New Testament of such a neutral meaning of πάσχειν, render it more prudent to follow the ancient versions and expositors, and adopt "suffered," instead of "experienced."—R.]

If it be only [or really] in vain.—That is, if rather you are not in much worse case, as notorious backsliding is apt to make the man worse than he was before. This addition has special force against the interpretation of ἐπαθετε as denoting persecutions, as with this it gives a scarcely intelligible sense: for the mitigating thought, that perhaps the Galatians will yet bethink themselves, so that the πᾶθειν will not have been in vain, can hardly be in Paul's mind here, where he meditates only severe rebuke [?], while the explanation: "if only in vain!"—"if it do not rather turn to your loss and greater condemnation," in its turn is not in keeping with the reference of πᾶθειν to sufferings endured. For although, when sufferings have been endured for the faith, assistance rendered by God in bearing them may make the guilt of a subsequent apostasy greater, the sufferings themselves cannot well be said to increase it. [Notwithstanding the high authorities for this interpretation, which intensifies instead of softening "in vain," it does seem more probable that Paul here leaves "a loophole of doubt." If suffered is the thought implied, then as he recalled their sufferings, would be the very moment for a flash of doubt, or rather of hope, to enter. In this view it is better to render: "If it be really in vain," "I would fain doubt whether it can be, that all this was in vain."—R.]

Ver. 5. He therefore that ministereth to you the Spirit.—With this Paul returns to the decisive question of ver. 2, but with some variation of the thought. He no longer sets the matter back into the past, but represents (no doubt designedly) the communication of the Spirit as something still going on, on the ground of faith. They were to recognize themselves as still experiencing this gracious operation of God. Besides this, he singles out and notes particularly the miraculous powers which God communicates through the same medium. [The word "ministereth" means "to supply bountifully." The ἐπι in the compound indicates the direction of the supply, not an enlargement of it. Δυνάμεις ἐν ὑμῖν may be rendered either, as E. V., "miracles among you," or better, "miraculous powers in you," i. e., the peculiar powers there brought by the Spirit, which Paul everywhere alludes to, as observable in the Christians to whom he writes (1 Cor. xii. 28). MEYER decides for the latter from the analogy of 1 Cor. xii. 6, and it suits better the line of argument, which refers throughout to their personal experience.—R.] Moreover he now designates God expressly as the Bestower of the Spirit, doubtless, in order to bring home with special emphasis the truth that God Himself declared for the preaching of faith. For the Scripture proof which follows supports this idea. God declares for this among the Galatians because He has declared for it in His word, and He must ever agree with Himself, His acts with His testimony.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. A Christian church without a "receiving the Spirit" is not conceivable. It may lose the Spirit again (comp. σαρὶ ἐπιτελείσθητε), but it must once have received it. Paul, therefore, because he knows that the Galatians have been converted to Christ, assumes of course that they have received the Spirit. The primary reference is undoubtedly to the Holy Ghost only as a charism from God. The immediate reference is not to definite ethical effects on the hearts of recipients, though it is true that these cannot be wanting, if the Spirit received is retained. But as the Holy Ghost here is to be apprehended primarily as a charism (comp. ver. 5: ἐντοχογγών), it is quite intelligible that what is given elsewhere as the condition of justification appears here as the condition of "receiving the Spirit," namely: Faith. "Receiving the Spirit" is, it is true, not immediately identical with "being justified," but is nevertheless an inseparable consequence. At all events no receiving of the Spirit "can take place without the "being justified," because the receiving of the Spirit is a token of Divine grace. Hence from the "receiving of the Spirit" "by the hearing of faith" it is concluded that the "being justified" comes by the same method. See also on this point the remarks on the previous section.

2. The personal experience of the operation of the preaching of the gospel is rightly (according to the example of Paul) regarded as a principal proof of the truth of the same. The proof lies more particularly in the receiving of the Holy Ghost: if I receive this through the preaching of the gospel, then this must doubtless be true, be the Divinely ordained way to salvation. Thereby does God declare Himself for this preaching; for the Holy Ghost is certainly a gift of God. A special application of the "witness of the Holy Ghost" which it might not be amiss to call the strict and original meaning of this doctrine.

3. All evangelical preaching should in its essence be nothing else than a portraying of Christ, the Crucified, before the eyes of men. It is by this that it leads them to the receiving of the Spirit.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1. "O foolish Galatians."—In STARKE:—It must not be supposed that this is such a phrase of contumely as "Fool," Matt. v. 22, but it is a sorrowful and earnest representation of their spiritual blindness. Christ also addresses His disciples with a similar term of rebuke. Luke xxiv. 25.—Severe reproofs, when they flow from a zeal for the wounded honor of God, and from love to our neighbor, and a desire to save him, are not wrong. The sharp tongue of good men is many times more wholesome than the friendly tongue and flattering words of the ungodly.—As to know Christ aright is the true wisdom, so on the other hand it is the greatest folly not to know Christ aright and not to cleave fast to Him.—[LUTHER:—A carnal man would interpret this to be a reviling, rather than a godly reprehension.

Not so. So parents, of a fatherly and motherly affection, do sharply reprove and rebuke their children, which they would not bear if another should do it. Therefore one and the self-same word in the mouth of Paul is a benefit; but in the mouth of another it is a reproach.—R.]

WÜRST. SUMM.:—False doctrine is, as it were, an enchantment, wherewith the devil bewitches men's hearts. For as through sorcery men's minds are blinded, so that they think they see something, when yet they see nothing, and nevertheless it is hard to fetch them off from the notion; even so, when the devil through false doctrine engages the hearts of men, he bewitches them so that they fancy they have the truth before them, when yet it is mere error and lies. Let us therefore the more diligently take heed to ourselves, that we be not taken in and infected with doctrine; let us the more diligently cleave to God's word, and moreover pray heartily with David, Ps. cxix. 18, 37.—[What spell is this that holds so many eyes, before which Jesus Christ has been set forth so plainly as the crucified One, who dies not "without cause!"—R.]

"Jesus Christ evidently set forth before your eyes, crucified."—STARKE:—By this way of speaking is indicated the clearness of the evangelical doctrine of the cross of Christ. In the Old Testament Christ was portrayed to the Jews under many images and types, as in the type of the high priest, of the paschal lamb, etc.; but in the New Testament, He was, through the preaching of the gospel, without any shadows such as these, clearly placed before men's eyes, inasmuch as His suffering, shame, satisfaction on the cross, were most clearly published and proclaimed. That was, as it were, the programme which the Apostles placarded in all places whither they came.—SPENER:—The best church-paintings are plain instructions concerning Divine truth; thereby can a matter be brought as plainly, and more plainly into the hearts of the hearers, than by the skilfullest painter of them all, yea, those things also which no painter can set forth. Actual paintings in the church are to be by no means utterly rejected, they have their use as memorials; but the other painting of doctrine must be joined therewith, and Christ must be portrayed in the heart, else outward paintings, if men are to learn only by gazing upon them, are a lifeless affair.—[CALVIN:—Paul intimates that the actual sight of Christ's death could not have affected them more powerfully than his preaching. Such a representation could not have been made by any eloquence, or by enticing words of man's wisdom. When the Church has painters such as this, she no longer needs the dead images of wood and stone, she no longer requires pictures. Such things come, when pastors become dumb.—R.]

Ver. 2. "Was it by the works of the law that ye received the Spirit?"—HEDINGER:—A definite, keenly importunate question, with an "either—or," from which there is no escape, appealing to actual experiences, in which no debate is possible,—well fitted to dispel the sorcery (ver. 1) of the false teaching.—A hint as to the right way of convincing and freeing misguided souls out of such enchantment.—Law quickens not, but enjoins, commands, threatens and terrifies, it is true, yet without life. Bondage, constraint; good appearances enough, hypocrisy enough; carefully contrived clockwork, but mute wheels, without soul. Of such are many, that are praised as Christians. Hourglasses are they, that punctually show the time, but where is there Spirit, Heaven, marks of grace? On that hangs all.—SPENER:—The only means of receiving the Holy Ghost, is the preaching of the gospel, as being a word of the Spirit. Where this is heard, and its energy not resisted, the Holy Ghost comes into the soul, not only to work, but also to dwell therein.—STARKE:—Whatever doctrine the Holy Ghost brings to man, assuring him of Divine grace, and impelling him to all good, that is the true saving doctrine.

Ver. 3. It is not enough to have begun well, the matter must also be carried through. The beginning and the continuing of our salvation must be after one way, and we must not desire to be perfected otherwise than we have begun, else is it folly to us.—SPENER:—That is a doctrine to be abhorred, which to be sure ascribes the beginning of salvation to faith and so to the Spirit, but afterwards feigns that the rest must be accomplished and completed with works.

Ver. 5. STARKE:—It is God alone who gives the Holy Ghost. The Apostles also imparted it through their preaching and imposition of hands, but they were only instruments of God. Now-a-days teachers and preachers impart the Holy Ghost, so far as they preach the Word, which in itself has power, and has the Holy Ghost with it.—It is a truly Divine property of the gospel that God aforetime accompanied it with the most excellent miracles. No one who passed over to Judaism, received from God the power of working miracles, but those did who turned from Judaism to Christianity.—Hast thou, O man, the Holy Ghost and His energy in too small measure? Seek the cause in thyself, in that thou usest not the stated means aright.—SPENER:—Where the Holy Ghost is, there He works, although not always outward miracles, yet in the conversion and renewal of men themselves, which is a greater miracle than to make the sick well.

On vers. 1-5. To portray Jesus Christ before men's eyes as the Crucified is the soul of all preaching of the gospel: 1. This it must do, because in the cross of Christ alone salvation is found, and it must do it unweariedly and explicitly, with all earnestness, all fidelity, and all zeal. 2. But more it cannot do; the inscribing on the heart it must leave to God; although indeed it must ever admonish of the necessity of this, and exhort men to prove whether this has taken place (must warn against dead faith).—Jesus Christ has been portrayed before your eyes as the Crucified; is He also portrayed in your hearts?—Whoever seeks his salvation elsewhere than in Christ, the Crucified, 1) lacks understanding, for he leaves the living spring, which God Himself has opened for us, and hews out for himself broken cisterns; 2) is entangled in an enchantment, bewitched by the deceiving spirit of self-righteousness.—Who hath bewitched you? A question which must be sounded forth in many a congregation; for 1) Christ, the Crucified, is portrayed before their eyes, and yet 2) there is such an utter neglect to seek salvation in Him.—How is the Holy Ghost obtained? 1. Not from works of the law, this follows from the nature of the law, but 2. through faith in the gospel—simply because it is the good news of Christ, the Crucified.

Faith in Jesus Christ the true way to salvation; for through it alone is the Holy Spirit received, not through the works of the law.—How have you received the Spirit? A question to strengthen and warn those who are in danger of embracing the righteousness of works.—Faith in Christ Jesus, 1) it is true in itself, not yet a proof that a man has received the Spirit, for there is also a dead faith; 2) but yet the only way to receive Him.—The preaching of faith the way to the receiving of the Spirit. Therewith is condemned all fanaticism with which, indeed, a righteousness of works of some kind or other is commonly joined.—It is God who bestows the Spirit, but only through the preaching of faith.—The Holy Ghost is the true heavenly gift.—Where God gives the Spirit, He also gives power (Spirit and power always conjoined).—To begin in the Spirit, to end in the flesh, is the most preposterous folly, and yet how frequent.—Hast thou begun in the Spirit? Continue in like manner, and end in the Spirit!

[Christ only, Christ plainly, Christ crucified! the Gospel we preach.—That which is “so foolish” is yet so natural.—Take heed that what God blessed to your spiritual profit, be not despised by you. What means He has honored with His Spirit, do not dishonor by your treatment of them.—Is it indeed in vain? All past sufferings for the Gospel's sake? Aye, and worse than in vain. These have no power to save. Christ's sufferings alone can save.—Our works do not earn God's works.—The Gospel, “the hearing of faith,” still has the “witness of the Spirit,” is still the δυναμις of God, by which He works δυναμεις.—R.]

B. Doctrinal Exposition

CHAPTER III. 6—IV. 7.

1. Salvation is not to be attained by works of the law, but through faith alone.

(CHAP. iii. 6-18).

a. Demonstration from Scripture.

(VERS. 6-14.)

6 Even as Abraham believed God, and it was accounted to him for righteousness.
 7 Know ye therefore that they which are of faith, the same are the children [sons] of 8 Abraham. And [Moreover] the Scripture, foreseeing that God would justify [or justifyeth]¹ the heathen [Gentiles] through faith, preached before the gospel [proclaimed beforehand the glad tidings]² unto Abraham, saying, In thee shall all nations be 9 blessed.³ So then they which be [who are] of faith are blessed with [together with 10 the]⁴ faithful Abraham. For as many as are of the works of the law are under the
 [or a] curse: for it is written,⁵ Cursed is every one that continueth not in all things 11 which are written in the book of the law to do them. But that no man is justified by the law [in the law no man is justified]⁶ in the sight of God, it is evident: for, 12 The just shall live by faith. And [Now]⁷ the law is not of faith: but, The man 13 [He]⁸ that doeth [or has done] them shall live in them. Christ hath [omit hath]⁹ redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made [having become]¹⁰ a curse for 14 us; for [as]¹¹ it is written, Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree: That the blessing of Abraham might come on [unto]¹² the Gentiles through [ἐν, in] Jesus Christ [Christ Jesus],¹³ that we might receive the promise of the Spirit through faith.

¹ Ver. 8.—[δικαιοῖ, present—Ellicott calls it the "ethical present." "God justifieth," this is His one way (Alford).—R.]
² Ver. 8.—[Since "gospel" has a distinct meaning now, it is perhaps better to take the more etymological phrase in rendering ποσὲν ἡγγελλίσατο. Schmoller: "Gab die Verheissung."—R.]

³ Ver. 8.—[Elz has εὐλογησονται instead of ἐνυλογηθήσονται against decisive authorities.]

⁴ Ver. 9.—[Together with" is more distinct than "with." The article of the Greek is retained to emphasize "faithful."—R.]

⁵ Ver. 10.—[According to the best MSS. ὅτι should be inserted before ἐπικατάρατος. [The generally received reading does not affect the English form, since ὅτι is here a mere quotation mark.—R.]

⁷ Ver. 12.—[Δέ "logical, introducing the minor proposition" (Alford). "Now" is perhaps better than "but."—R.]

⁸ Ver. 12.—[After αὐτὰ, Elz. reads ἀνθρώπος against decisive authorities.]

¹³ Ver. 14.—[Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ is the reading of most MSS. (N. B. Ἰησοῦ Χριστῷ), and is adopted by most modern editors.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 6. Even as Abraham believed God.

—This stands in immediate connection with the preceding, and gives the answer to the question in ver. 5, by an affirmation of the second part of it (for Paul views the gift of the Spirit previously mentioned as a proof of justification, and can therefore answer the question in ver. 5 with the statement in ver. 6). Through the preaching of faith God bestows the Spirit of faith, and thereby justifies, even as Abraham attained to justification in the same way. But inasmuch as Paul in going on still keeps Abraham in view, we may, and ought to begin here a new section. This verse does not contain a citation proper, but Paul gives what is contained in Gen. xv. 6 respecting Abraham, as his own immediate declaration. (Comp. Rom. iv. 3.) That accounted to him for righteousness is understood by Paul entirely in the sense of "being justified" needs no demonstration.*

Ver. 7. Here, in the first place, he only draws from it the conclusion, that a man by faith becomes a son of Abraham. (Οἱ ἐκ πίστεως, "the spiritual character represented under the form of the causal relation," those that are born of faith, have as it were their nature from it. EWALD explains it somewhat differently: those whose efforts and achievements proceed from faith, as the deepest, and at the same time highest power.) This conclusion of course rests on the presupposition that faith was an essential trait in Abraham's character, and is directed against the Judaizers, who believe that they can prove themselves genuine children of Abraham by works of the law. [The older commentators took γινώσκετε as indicative; "ye know then;" modern ones generally consider it an imperative: Know ye therefore.—So MEYER, DE WETTE, ELLICOTT, WORDSWORTH, also SYRIAC, VULGATE. ELLICOTT: "The imperative is not only more animated, but more logically correct, for the declaration in the verse is really one of the points which the Apostle is laboring to prove." He contends that ἀπα is most properly joined with the imperative. ALFORD and LIGHTFOOT adopt the other view, the latter suggesting that the verb means "to perceive" rather than "to know," which makes the indicative more suitable. There is not necessarily any "argumentative irony" (ALFORD) here. On the whole the imperative seems preferable.—R.]

Paul has made reference to Abraham as the type of justifying faith; he does not, however, content himself with that, but, going deeper, he finds still more striking proof in the significance of Abraham as the bringer of blessing for all the heathen. He dwells the longer on the Old Testament because it was to this that the false teachers naturally appealed against Paul, and by their appeals to it imposed on the Galatians. So he on the other hand seeks to establish his doctrine from the Old Testament, simply by going more deeply into it. [LIGHTFOOT: "The passage vers. 6-9 was omitted in Marcion's recension of the Epistle, as repugnant to his leading principle of the antagonism between the Old and New Testaments."—R.]

Ver. 8. Moreover the Scripture foreseeing.—Δέ is simply continuative. [Neither "and" nor "but" gives the precise force.—R.] What God has promised is ascribed to the Scripture itself, not simply because it is related in the Scripture, but because the Scripture, as inspired by God, is conceived as the organ of the Spirit of God. The same then is true of God's foreknowledge, from which the promise proceeded. Yet Paul has not gained from some other source a knowledge of the fact that the Scripture foresaw, and in this foresight gave the promise (WIESELER), but he draws the conclusion as to the "foreseeing" simply from the promise itself: because it is promised, that "all nations shall be blessed in Abraham," the "justifying of the Gentiles through faith" must also have been predetermined. Why, he then explains in what follows.—[ELLICOTT calls δικαιοί an ethical present, with significant reference to the eternal and immutable counsels of God. ALFORD: "Present, not merely because the time foreseen was regarded as present, not present as respected the time of writing, but because it was God's one way of justification—He never justified in any other way—so that it is the normal present: 'He is a God that justifieth' through faith."—R.] Paul cites as proof Gen. xii. 1-3; xviii. 18. The chief emphasis lies upon "shall be blessed," which is therefore placed first in the Greek; yet only so far as it is a "being blessed in Abraham." The sense is: The blessing bestowed upon thee includes a blessing hereafter to come upon all the Gentiles (ἔθνη here of course in the pregnant sense=Gentiles). From this the conclusion is drawn in

Ver. 9. So then they which be of faith.—"So then"=agreeably to the promise in ver. 8. Ver. 9 is nothing else than an exposition of the promise cited in ver. 8. In Abraham, it was promised, all the heathen are to be blessed, a promise which has the sense indicated above. Now, he was the believing one, and it was (as follows from ver. 6) on account of his faith that he received the promise of blessing. Therefore it is, of course, believers that are partakers of the blessing promised to him, it is they who are his children, and it is to them therefore that the promise of blessing holds good.—Are blessed with [together with the] faithful Abraham.—In this sentence the ἐν is dropped, for the sense is: because the "being blessed in him," is promised to all the heathen, therefore "they which be of faith" (the heathen, if they are "of faith") are blessed with him, that is, primarily, in like manner as he; but still further: it expresses the sameness of the lot into which they entered with him, and through this one lot they entered into inner communion with him.—[The preposition shows their community with him in the blessing; the adjective "faithful" renders prominent that point of ethical character in which they must resemble each other, in order to partake of the same blessing. (So MEYER, ALFORD.)—R.] "Are blessed."—As to the meaning of this, there is little occasion for dispute. If we look at the original passage, this is, of course, to be understood quite generally, as is implied in the idea of Blessing=Manifestation of Divine Favor. This again is more specially defined in different ways, and so here; so far as concerns the blessing received by Abraham himself: "together with the faithful Abraham," the primary meaning is that he should obtain a posterity, and as concerns the blessing of the Gentiles in Abraham, the passage is justly regarded as a

* [CALVIN thus refers to "the idle cavillings of certain persons who evade Paul's reasoning. Moses, they tell us, gives the name of righteousness to goodness; and so means nothing more than that Abraham was reckoned a good man because he believed God. Giddy minds of this description, raised up in our time by Satan, endeavor, by indirect slanders, to undermine the certainty of Scripture. Paul knew that Moses was not there giving lessons to boys in grammar, but was speaking of a decision which God had pronounced, and very properly viewed the word righteousness in a theological sense. For it is not in that sense in which goodness is mentioned with approbation among men, that we are accounted righteous in the sight of God, but only where we render perfect obedience to the law. Righteousness is contrasted with the transgression of this law, even in its smallest point; and because we have it not of ourselves, it is freely given to us by God."—R.]

Messianic promise in the wider sense—the Gentiles shall have part in the salvation brought by the Messiah, in the salvation that proceeds from one who is Abraham's offspring. The latter is the sense here. Which side of this Messianic salvation, however, Paul has in mind, is to be made out solely from the connection, most simply from what is put in opposition to it, namely, to be "under the curse," and, to that again, the simple antithesis is "justified" (ver. 11). Paul of course views "blessed" and "justified" as essentially correlative, coincident ideas; and hence in ver. 8 the one, namely, "justified," is inferred from the other, "blessed." Only, as is easily understood, "blessed" still remains the more general idea; what kind of blessing is meant must be shown by the context. Somewhat more restricted, again, than "justification," is "receiving the Spirit," which, however, is not only connected with the "justification," but is really the true "blessing," on which account Paul, starting from "receiving the Spirit" in the beginning of this chapter, returns to it again in ver. 14.—The ground of the promise in ver. 8, and also of the statement expository of it in ver. 9, is given in ver. 10. A blessing to be bestowed upon the Gentiles in Abraham, and therefore one resting upon faith, is promised; such a one is, and only such a one can be, contemplated.

Ver. 10. For as many as are of the works of the law, are under a curse.—The force of this is: it must be those "of faith" who are blessed; for those who busy themselves with "works of the law" (the only alternative possible, if not "of faith") cannot be blessed; since these are under the curse, and therefore a bestowal of blessing cannot avail for them. [This negative argument (vers. 10, 12,) strengthens the position taken in the preceding verses, and has an immediate application to the Galatian errors, to which however no allusion is made in this strictly argumentative passage.—R.] "Of the works of the law;" the form is the same as in the antithetical expression, "of faith," but more fully stated.—Cursed is every one, etc.—Deut. xvii. 26, freely quoted from the LXX. The passage proves what it is cited to prove, viz., that "as many as are of the law are under the curse," provided a non-continuance can be established. This shows that the reference here is to ethical requirements, and not merely to ritualistic ones; thus confirming the view of "works of the law," given in chap. ii. At the same time the passage shows that the ground of "a man is not justified by the works of the law," is that those who "are of the works of the law are under the curse;" the non-justification has then of course its ground, not in the externality of the law, for that would not of necessity involve a curse, but in our not keeping it.

Ver. 11. But that in the law no man is justified, etc.—Those who are of the works of the law are under the curse. This includes not being justified, but only impieite. Paul now states it expressly, in order to support it by declarations of Scripture, as he previously did the positive side. The course of thought might, perhaps, be still more accurately defined as follows: Cursed, it has been declared, is every one that continueth not in all things; but, on the other hand, it might be said, such as entirely fulfil the law will be blest. But, remarks Paul, that is excluded by the tenor of the two Scripture passages about to be cited, for according to them man ζήσεται ἐκ πίστεως, but the law is in no wise ἐκ πίστεως, therefore no one is justified ἐν νόμῳ; the thought that "in the law" justification is possible, is to be entirely put aside.—In the sight of God.—Παρὰ θεῷ defines more particularly the idea of "justified," and sets it in antithesis to any (justifying) human judgment. The proof that "in the law no man is justified," Paul derives from two Scripture passages. According to the one (Hab. ii. 4) "to live," results from "faith," according to the other (Lev. xviii. 5) the law does not take note of faith, but of doing; through doing, fulfilling the law, a man has life.—This, of course, has demonstrative force, for "no man is justified" only on the presupposition that this doing (in the second passage) remains only a requirement, and does not actually take place, and that it is with the knowledge of this state of things that the prophet represents faith as the condition of life.—The just shall live by faith.—יֵחַי בְּאֵמֶן in the original has, rightly explained, not the signification "faithfulness," but as Paul translates it, "Trust, Faith." [The first is undoubtedly the primary meaning of the Hebrew word, but the other is implied in it. It is noteworthy that this passage is one of the two in the Old Testament, where the word "faith" is used in the E. V. See a very suggestive note in LIGHTFOOT, p. 152.—R.]—יֵחַי, he then naturally understands, agreeably to the New Testament knowledge of salvation, in the higher sense of the Messianic life, that which renders its consummation in eternal life. Ἐκ πίστεως must be joined as in the original with ζήσεται, and not with ὁ δίκαιος. WIESELER justly remarks: In proof of the connection ὁ δίκαιος ἐκ πίστεως, it is alleged that the origin of justification was to be shown, not that of salvation or life. It must not be forgotten, however, that according to the connection the emphasis does not rest upon δικαιοῦσθαι in itself, but upon the fact that this results ἐκ πίστεως; moreover that Paul is not here using his own words, in which case instead of ἐκ πίστεως ζήσεται he would undoubtedly have chosen another term of expression, such as ἐκ πίστεως δικαιοῦσθαι, but that he had to choose from the actually existing passages which treated of the central significance of faith. Whoever examines these more particularly will not be able to deny that the choice made is a happy one. For what does ἐκ πίστεως ζήσεται signify, but that Faith is the fundamental condition through which a man becomes well-pleasing to God, and partaker of the gracious gift of life? In this formula, therefore, the δικαιοῦσθαι ἐκ πίστεως, or the statement that one is declared righteous or well-pleasing to God, in consequence of faith, is in truth included. Δίκαιος, on the other hand, signifies the righteous or devout man, and has here nothing more than an etymological connection with δικαιοῦσθαι. That ἐκ πίστεως is joined by Paul in the Galatians with ζήσεται, appears, moreover, from its antithesis, ζήσεται ἐν αἰσίοις: "he will live through the commandments." [It is difficult to decide this question of connection; either would be grammatical, both are sustained by high authorities. WINER, DE WETTE, EWALD, ELLICOTT agree with WIESELER; while BENDEL, PAREUS, MEYER, ALFORD, and very many others connect "by faith" with "the just." The former conforms better with the Hebrew; the latter with the general course of Paul's thoughts here and elsewhere. The former is safer, the latter more pointed, but from either the same truth would be deduced.—R.]

Ver. 12. Now the law is not of faith.—[Δέ, logical, introducing the minor proposition: "The just shall live by faith." "Now the law is not of faith" (so MEYER).—R.] "The law is not an institution whose nature is determined by faith." WIESELER. [LIGHTFOOT: 'Faith is not the starting-point of the law. The law does not take faith as its fundamental principle. On the other hand, it rigidly enforces the performance of all its enactments.'—Has done them.—Actual and entire performance of all requirements. Doing, not believing.—R.]

Ver. 13. Christ redeemed us from the curse of the law.—The asyndeton makes the contrast more energetic.—MEYER. ["Redeemed." WORDSWORTH: "The aorist is important to be observed, as intimating that the Redemption was effected by one act, i. e., by the shedding of His blood, paid as the price of our ransom, when He became a curse for us by dying on the cross."—R.] That Paul here proceeds to speak of the redemption from the curse, and therefore presupposes the latter as existing, is of easy explanation. In ver. 10 it had been declared that "as many as of the works of the law are under a curse;" and, on the other hand, it needed no demonstration that all those who had the "law," and as yet nothing else, that is, the Jews, are "of the works of the law" and therefore "are under a curse." "Us," therefore, naturally refers primarily to the Jews, for these, who alone had the "law," alone stood under the "curse of the law." Comp. also, particularly, chap. iv. 5: "to redeem them that were under the law." WIESELER also justly remarks, that particularly in the doctrinal exposition in the Galatians, Paul loves, from easily intelligible reasons, to include himself with the Jewish people, in the first person. Yet I would not be disposed wholly to reject the more general sense of ἡμῶν. It is true, it was primarily only the Jews who stood under the curse of the law; but Paul here may be thinking not only of the actual, but also of the ideal or possible being under it: that is, through Christ the true way to justification by faith in Him is opened to all. it could not therefore be any longer demanded of the Gentiles (and they could not be tempted) to concern themselves with "the works of the law," through which they also would have come under the curse of the law. "Ἐθνη, ver. 14, need not be taken as the direct antithesis of this; doubtless it has the emphasis, and on this account stands first, but the ἔθνη may have been made particularly prominent, only because the fulfilment of the promise given in relation to them has become possible through the atoning death of Christ, and in the blessing of the Gentiles the reality and effect of the death of Christ is chiefly manifest. But that the effect of this extends of course to the Jews, also is added in the clause introduced by ἡμῶν. In this clause at least MEYER, WIESELER, and others, understand the first person plural generally, of Jews and Gentiles. MEYER, limiting ἡμῶν, ver. 13, to the Jews, understands the somewhat difficult connection of vers. 13 and 14 peculiarly, almost too artificially: as long as the curse of the law stood in force, and the Jews therefore were unredeemed, the Gentiles could not become partakers of that blessing; for it was involved in the preëminence which, according to the Divine plan of redemption was bestowed on the Jews, that salvation should proceed from them to the Gentiles. When therefore Christ through His atoning death freed the Jews from the curse of their law, God must necessarily have had the design therewith, of imparting to the Gentiles the promised justification, and that not in any such way as through the law, but in Christ Jesus, through whom already redemption from the curse of the law had been effected for the Jews. More simple, and more congruous also with the interpretation of ἡμῶν in the general sense, is USTERI's explanation: Christ has, by His vicarious death, redeemed us from the curse of the law, in order that (if now henceforth justification is attained through faith) the Gentiles may become partakers of the blessing of Abraham, as from now henceforth there is required for justification a condition possible for all, namely, Faith. The simplest and best exposition of "redeemed from the curse of the law" is MEYER's: "The law is personified as a potentate, who had subjected those dependent upon him to his curse; but from this constraint of the curse, out of which they would not else have come, has Christ redeemed them, and that by His having procured for them, through His mors satisfactoria, the forgiveness of sins (Eph. i. 7; Col. i. 14; Rom. iii. 24 et al.), so that now the curse of the law had no more relation to them (objectively—to which must then be added—and nothing else can be added—'faith,' in order that this redemption may also be subjectively realized.)

Having become a curse for us.—The mode of the redemption is here expressed, namely, by His crucifixion, in which he was set forth as burdened with the Divine ὀργή. The emphasis therefore rests on the word κατάρπα, which on this account is attracted to the end, and the use of which is immediately to be justified by a declaration of Scripture. The abstract instead of the concrete is chosen, in order to represent with more of vigorous precision the adequacy of the satisfaction which Christ has rendered (comp. the previous ἐκ κατάρπας), and it stands without the article, because the thought is not, that Christ suffered the definite, just named curse of the law, to which the subjects of the law are exposed, but in a general sense, that He became an accursed one; it is meant to express not what curse he became, but that He became a curse (the that moreover appears from the following Scripture passage).—Ἦν ἐν ἡμῶν: "ἐν" in all places where the discourse is of the atoning death not—in behalf of, but—in behalf of. The satisfaction, which Christ rendered, was rendered in our behalf; that it was vicariously implied in the nature of the act itself, not in the preposition. The curse of the law would have had to be realized in that all who did not completely satisfy the law (and this no one could), would have been compelled to endure the execution of the Divine ὀργή against them; but for their deliverance from this sentence Christ with His death has intervened, inasmuch as He died as Accursed, whereby, as through a ransom, that damnatory relation of the law was dissolved." See the DOCTRINAL NOTES below.

As it is written, Cursed is every one, etc.—Scriptural justification of the declaration just made respecting Christ, "having become a curse:" from Deut. xxi. 23, cited freely from the LXX. "The original passage has reference to persons stoned, and then far greater ignominy, publicly hung up on a (probably cruciform) stake, who, however, must not be left to hang over night, because such accursed ones would else have defiled the holy land. Deut. xxi. 23; Num. xxv. 4; Joshua x. 26, 27; 2 Sam. iv. 12. And in that Christ also when executed hung upon a stake, the epithet εἰκατάρατος applies also to Him." MEYER. [WORDSWORTH notes a remarkable conformity of the prophetic reference to Christ in the passage here cited. The body must be taken down, but "if He had been crucified on some ordinary day, not on the day before that High Day, the Jews would have been as eager that He should remain on the cross as they were then earnest that He should be taken down. Thus, in crucifying Him, and taking Him down from the cross, they proved unconsciously that He whom they crucified is the Messiah, and that it was He who, bearing the curse of the law, has taken away that curse from all who believe."—R.] "Therefore, even if in the original passage crucifixion proper is not meant (which was not an ancient Israelitish punishment), yet that which particularly made both kinds of punishment a curse, the hanging and exposure on the wood was common to them. ἔζωον, used of the wood of the cross, undoubtedly on account of the ץ of the Old Testament passage, is found also Acts v. 30; x. 39; xiii. 29; 1 Pet. ii. 24." WIESELER. [ELLICOTT: "It is interesting to notice that the dead body was not hanged by the neck, but by the hands, and not on a tree, but on a piece of wood."—P.]

Ver. 14. That unto the Gentiles might come.—Respecting the connection see above on ver. 13.—The blessing of Abraham = the blessing before announced to Abraham.—In Christ Jesus.—"In Christ (in His expiatory death) the bestowal of the blessing has its ground. The following διὰ τῆς πίστεως expresses the matter from the point of view of the subjective medium, while ἐν Χριστῷ sets forth the objective fact." MEYER.—That we might receive the promise of the Spirit.—"Climatically parallel to the first clause of intention." MEYER. The first person, "that we might receive," applies undoubtedly to Christians generally, Jews or Gentiles.—"Receive the promise of the Spirit" = to receive the promised Spirit. [ELLICOTT: "Not merely the promised Spirit, but the realization of the promise of the Spirit." This is to be preferred.—R.] Is this to be taken as a nearer definition of the "blessing of Abraham?" It is not immediately identical with this as (see on ver. 9) the "blessing" (in itself quite general) in the connection means primarily the "justification." However not only does the receiving of the Spirit stand in immediate connection, both of thought and fact, with the justification, but although in "the promise of the Spirit," the primary reference is to such a promise as that in Joel iii. [E. V.], yet this again stands, at least in the history of salvation, in connection with the promise given to Abraham in reference to the heathen, so that the two promises are combined on satisfactory grounds in this relation also. In any case Paul is looking back to the beginning of ver. 2. [LIGHTFOOT: 'The law, the greater barrier which excluded the Gentiles, is done away in Christ. By its removal the Gentiles are put on a level with the Jews; and thus united, they both gain access through the Spirit to the Father.' Comp. Eph. ii. 14-18. ELLICOTT: "After a wondrous chain of arguments, expressed with equal force, brevity and profundity, the Apostle comes back to the subject of ver. 2; the gift of the Holy Ghost came through faith in Jesus Christ."—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Abraham's justification on the ground of his faith (or rather the direct declaration of the Scripture respecting it), is adduced by Paul as an argument for Justification on the ground of Faith here, and particularly, as is known, in Romans iv. also. The faith in Christ must therefore be regarded by Paul as one in kind with that of Abraham. But it by no means follows from this, as WIESELER justly remarks, that Abraham himself already believed on the Messiah. "For in the Old Testament history of Abraham the idea of the Messiah is nowhere mentioned, often as there was occasion for it, but only the idea of a salvation and blessing coming from Abraham to all nations, the first traces of a universal kingdom of God, to which however the Divine Head is yet lacking. In the New Testament also the idea of the Messiah is nowhere attributed to Abraham. The passage John viii. 5, 6, hardly signifies any thing else than that Abraham, in the theophanies, etc., experienced by him, already beheld the preëxisting Christ." Yet Paul, with entire justice, places the Christian faith in parallelism with that of Abraham; for the one, as well as the other, was essentially a trustful laying hold of a promise coming from Divine grace, as to which, moreover, WIESELER points out that with Abraham, the promised heir of his body came into view at the same time as the future bearer of the collective blessing promised to Abraham, and faith on the promise respecting Him was therefore faith also on the kingdom of God originating in his posterity. It by no means follows from this, that then the matter [Inhalt] of the Christian and of the Abrahamic faith would be a different one, and that faith would justify on account of its subjective character, while yet it justifies only on account of its matter and object. In the promise given by Divine grace, the faith of the Christian, as of Abraham, has its common matter. For such a promise the Christian lays hold of in faith on Christ, as much as Abraham did in his faith. The real ground of justification in both cases is therefore the grace of God, which gives man something that he could not of himself attain to, and on natural conditions could not even expect, and faith is, as that which nevertheless confidently lays hold of this grace, only the conditio sine qua non.—It is very true, this grace of God itself has a different matter with Christians and with Abraham; with Christians its matter is essentially the reconciliation accomplished in Christ, and the forgiveness of sin implied therein, with Abraham it is what has just been mentioned—a distinction which is conditioned simply by the course of the economy of salvation, and which does not prejudice Paul's parallelizing of the two; for Paul speaks here—comp. v. 7, 8, 9—quite generally of πίστις, has in view, therefore what constitutes its generic nature.—Agreeably to this the definite matter of the δικαιοσύνη in the two cases is different, i. e., the generic unity is the becoming acceptable to God and accordingly being blessed by Him, and this community of character fully justifies this parallelizing also. But with Christians this general idea is still further defined as follows: to be delivered from the divine wrath incurred by their sins, and to become partakers of the forgiveness of sins. A distinction, to this extent at least, between the δικαιοσύνη of Abraham and that of Christians, must be conceded even by those who assume the Messiah to have been the object of faith in the case of Abraham also. For even on this assumption, it will not be alleged that “accounted to him for righteousness” in the case of Abraham has exactly the sense: his sins were forgiven him. This is not treated of in any way in this passage.—That this appeal to Abraham's faith is in no respect an arbitrary laying hold of a single chance passage, that accords with the line of argument, is clear. For, allowing that this judgment respecting the faith of Abraham is found only here, yet confessedly faith in God's gracious promise was that which specifically characterized Abraham, was precisely that which made him the child of God, nay, the Friend of God, and so of course acceptable to God. This would be irrefragably established by the history of his life, even if we had not this direct declaration, Gen. xv. 6.—With perfect justice therefore Paul can designate those who are “of faith” as Abraham's sons. A strong, crushing expression against the Jewish national pride, corresponding to the words of John the Baptist, Matt. iii. 9, and of Jesus Himself, John viii. 39—and yet not in conflict with the truth that according to the Divine purpose the Jewish nation as such, agreeably to its natural descent from Abraham, was the chosen nation. For this people itself, as a whole, was meant to be of the faith of its ancestor, in order to be a true people of God; and the Divine judgment made, we know, a perpetual distinction among the mass of the people between such as were “of faithful Abraham” = were his legitimate [i. e., spiritually legitimate.—R.] children, and such as were not.*

2. The Scripture is the exposition of a Divine plan of salvation, connected and of uniform tenor throughout, which has had its definite historical unfolding. In it therefore the earlier has respect to the later, the first to the last; a word of God, belonging to the beginning, is already shaped in view of the consummation; to this is added, that the God who beholds at once the beginning and the end, ideally anticipates with direct words of promise the future development of His counsel of salvation.—To recognize even in the germ the development, requires, doubtless, an apprehension intimately conversant with Scriptural truth, an eye illumined by the Spirit.

3. The curse of the law. As the blessing comes from God, as a revelation of His favor and grace (in gifts), so also the curse, as a revelation of His wrath (in judgments, which concentrate themselves in the κατάκριμα of death). In that this revelation of wrath is a consequence of the non-fulfilment of the law, the curse is called “the curse of the law,” ver. 13 (under which therefore, in the first place, only the Jews stood, as being alone those who hold to the law, but under which of course all would come, who are “of the works of the law”). More precisely: a man comes under this “curse,” is under bonds to it, and held prisoner by it, if he is “of the works of the law” (ver. 10), that is, performs indeed single works, but nothing more, and yet believes himself thereby to have satisfied the law, which is in no wise the case (see above on “works of the law” in the preceding section).

4. Christ a curse for us. To avert this curse of God and to bring His blessing upon all men, Christ has become “a curse for us.” Here we stand in presence of the deepest mystery of atonement; we may not, in order to make it more comprehensible, weaken the fact, but must take the words even here, as they say and sound, without artifices of interpretation. Since Christ has freed us from our curse, by having become a curse for us, then, if our redemption from the curse is not to be an illusion, but something real, He became also really the bearer of the Divine curse. He has borne the Divine ὀργή passively, has felt it, and also actively has sustained it. And this has come to pass by His death on the cross. Only we must of course not suffer the monstrous thought to arise that God was angry with Him, something that could not be; nay more, it was in His death on the cross that He was above all an ὀσμὴ εὐωδίας, “odor of sweetness,” unto God. Nevertheless He has, in the first place, undergone the Divine wrath by suffering death, whereby there was accomplished on Him the κατάκριμα, “condemnation,” of death, and so the curse upon sin; the mode of death, moreover, exhibiting this death, even in form, as a death under curse. Yet that is not all, He has, in the second place, also felt the wrath of God, in that the enjoyment, the sense of the blessed communion of love with God vanished from Him without the reality of this communion itself thereby ceasing. He was, it is true, an ὀσμὴ εὐωδίας to God, but the sense of it vanished from Him, although perhaps only momentarily in those instants of anguish when He uttered the complaint upon the cross that God had forsaken Him. But what was lacking in duration, so to speak, was most completely, as it were, compensated by the fearful intensity of such a sense of abandonment by God, in the soul of the beloved Son of God. To this extent He has fully become a curse, has felt the wrath of God, even as condemning wrath. But if it is objected, "but not as eternally condemning," we must again refer to that intensity of the sense of wrath as an adequate expiation.—He has thus become a curse for us—in our behalf; but in our behalf only inasmuch as He thereby came in our place. The vicariousness does not lie in the expression ὑπέρ, but in the fact; if we, by the very fact that He became "a curse," have been made free from the "curse," in that there is of course involved that He came in our place; an exchange of positions occurred.—For it is stated that the effect of Christ's "becoming a curse" is to "redeem us from the curse of the law," and so at all events an entire acquittal therefrom, and averting of it. Christ is here represented as showing Himself (immediately, yes alone) active in the work of redemption; He offered Himself, is the sense, in becoming a curse, and therewith He presented a ransom—to whom? to "the curse of the law" which had dominion over us. The ransom consisted in Himself; He devoted Himself in this very "becoming a curse" to the power of this potentate, and thus in return let us go free. Analyzing the conception thus, we see that it is a figurative one; in order to reduce it to its exact expression, we must take in the idea (which Paul does not here introduce in so many words) of the sin-offering. In becoming a curse Christ became a sin-offering, and this, because it was an unblemished one, and for this reason an ἀσπὴν εὐωδίας, was accepted by God; and in return Christ, as it were, discharged us from the curse of the law which He represented, took it from us. (Inasmuch as Christ Himself brought this sin-offering in free obedience, He is with justice described as the one active in it, as here; the action of God Himself being of course understood.)—This is only the negative side, the positive is then added ver. 14, where the positive (and moreover subjective) effects of the redemption "from the curse of the law" are named; generically, the being blessed, specially, the receiving of the Spirit. Upon this, especially upon the relation of it to justification, see above in the EXEG. NOTES. We add only the observation: in the Apostle's apprehension of the history of salvation, the operation of the death of Christ is taken out of its isolation; we recognize in it only the fulfilment of the promise given in the beginning of the redemptive revelation; in Christ it is nothing else than the blessing of Abraham that comes to fulfilment; Beginning and End are united. (See upon this the next Sections.)

5. [The two curses. WORDSWORTH thus sums up the doctrinal points implied: "Two curses pronounced in the law are here referred to by St. Paul. All mankind was liable to the former one. How was it to be removed?"

(1) He who was to remove it must not himself be liable to it. He who was to be a substitute for the guilty must himself be innocent. He who was to suffer in the stead of the disobedient must himself be obedient in all things.

(2) He who was to be the substitute for all must have the common nature of all. He must not take the person of one individual man (such as Abraham, Moses, Elias), but He must take the nature of all, and sum up all mankind in himself.

(3) He who was to do more than counterbalance the weight of the sins of all must have infinite merits of His own, in order that the scale of Divine Justice may preponderate in their favor. And nothing that is not divine is infinite. In order, therefore, that He may be able to suffer for sin, he must be human; and in order that He may be able to take away the sins, and to satisfy God's Justice for them, He must be Divine.

(4) In order that He may remove the curse pronounced in the law of God for disobedience, He must undergo that punishment which is specially declared in the Law to be the curse of God.

(5) That punishment is hanging on a tree. That is specially called in the Law the curse of God. Deut. xxi. 23.

By undergoing this curse for us, Christ, He who is God from everlasting, and who became Emmanuel, God with us, God in our flesh, uniting together the two natures—the Divine and the Human—in His One Person—Christ Jesus, redeemed us from the curse of the Law. Thus, having accepted the curse, He liberated us from it."—R.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 6. RIEGER:—This reckoning somewhat for righteousness rests most of all on God's taking pleasure in faith, and on the fulfilling of His promises, those to which faith trusts. True, even faith gives God the honor, and is in this respect greater than any work. But even faith cannot always give to God the honor so willingly, so fully, with such victory over all doubts arising from the reason, as it should. Therefore God's imputation is still the best, according to which good pleasure of His will He counts even a weak spark of faith for righteousness, and therefore I may be assured that, though I now and then be somewhat doubtful of His gracious will, which He has towards me, mistrust Him, become in spirit sad and heavy, I am yet surrounded and overspread with the broad heaven of His promises, and especially of His forgiving grace, and even then His gracious imputation remains valid.

Ver. 7. HEUBNER:—Abraham's spiritual children are only those like-minded with him, i. e., believing souls. By faith thou becomest like the old patriarchs; they acknowledge thee for worthy offspring, whether thou be derived from the same nation, according to the flesh, as they, or not. Spiritual genealogy and probate is of another sort from civil.

[CALVIN:—Paul has omitted one remark, which will be readily supplied, that there is no place in the Church for any man who is not a son of Abraham.—HOOKER:—The invisible Church consisteth only of true Israelites, true sons of Abraham, true servants and saints of God.—R.]

RIEGER:—The footsteps of faith and the walk therein prove this descent (Rom. iv. 12).—Ver. 8.—O man be assured, all thy temptations also, and needs, He hath seen beforehand! Only go with confidence to the Scripture, therein to seek God's consolations.—Who reads the Old Testament enough with the view of finding Christ every where therein?

Ver. 9. BEELENS. BIBLE:—Already with Abraham began the stream of blessing that proceeds from God to believers. This now is the blessing of the one God, flowing from the like grace of God, even though in the most manifold manifestations.—Companionship in blessing a blessed companionship.—Wilt thou have blessing? Believe! Other way there is none.—We see then, where the trouble is, if one finds in his soul no such well-being or blessing, but rather the curse, and disquietness in his conscience. It is in this matter of faith, which a man will not frankly receive from God, and let old matters go, and deny them for Christ's sake. But a man must himself be of faith, as Paul here expresses it, that is, thou must have so committed thy heart to the Spirit of Christ, that He has been able to gain possession of thee, and through faith bear thee as a child of God. Then is a man "of faith," that is, he has, as to the spirit, a Divine origin.

Ver. 10. "As many:" let there be as many of them as there will; and were there of them as many again who declare for this party and make their boast and glory of it, and will have their salvation from it.—"Of the works of the law:" this expresses the inner ground of the man, what fashions his soul, and whose child he is. It is not people who teach the law, but such as are born of the same. It means not: who give diligence to live after the measure of the law, but who live legally, take here a work and there a work, approach therewith before God, and so place themselves under the curse. "Under" signifies imprisonment, for these people bar themselves in.—LUTHER:—Our Lord God has two manner of blessings, a bodily, that appertains to this life, and a spiritual, that appertains to the life everlasting. Such bodily blessing have the ungodly in fulness and abundance. To banish the eternal curse, that is, the eternal wrath of God, death and damnation, there avails neither the world's nor the law's righteousness. Therefore those that have not more than the corporeal blessing alone, are for this reason not God's children, and blessed before God, but under the curse they are and abide.—If now God's law puts men under a curse, how much more other laws, which are of much less worth?

HEUBNER:—If we will be saved by the law, we must do all, and must be able to say, that we have never neglected any thing commanded, nor done any thing forbidden. In brief, the matter stands thus: if we will merit salvation, amazingly little will come of it, for our virtue is piece-work; against one or two legal performances God can oppose ten transgressions. Whoever does not view the requirements of the law with the diminishing glass of light-mindedness, and his own works with the magnifying glass of self-love, must acknowledge this.—[JOHN BROWN:—It is absurdity thus to seek for justification from that which is and must be the source of condemnation. To expect to be warmed by the keen northern blast, or to have our thirst quenched by a draught of liquid fire, were not more, were not so incongruous.—R.]

Ver. 11. CRAMER:—The religion that teaches us to believe that we are saved by grace without works, is the true, original, Catholic religion, to which also Habakkuk and the old prophets bear witness; therefore the Romish religion, which contradicts this, can be neither the original, nor the true Catholic church, but must be a new church.—STARKE:—The regenerate, who are already righteous through faith, continue in their righteousness and blessedness, and become at the last perfectly blessed, but still only through faith.

Ver. 12. The law will have doers, that deserve Heaven by works. The gospel will have only sinners, who have done working, but who, repenting them of their sins (or broken into contriteness by the law), seek medicine, help and grace in Christ and His Father's compassion. They now see aright their guiltiness, together with the loathsomeness of sin; they now first understand and love Moses aright, and walk after his law; not out of constraint or hope of reward, but as being already righteous in Christ, and minded to show forth the profit, purpose, joy and might of such righteousness in all manner of works possible.

Ver. 13. LUTHER:—God hath cast all sin of all men upon His Son. Then forthwith comes the law, accusing Him and saying: Here find I this one among sinners, yea who hath taken all men's sins upon Himself, and bears them, and I see in the whole world besides not another sin, except upon Him alone; therefore shall He suffer for it and die the death upon the cross.—Inasmuch then as through this only Mediator, Jesus Christ, Sin and Death are taken away, without doubt the whole world were so pure that our Lord God therein could see nothing except mere righteousness and holiness, if we only could believe it.—On that side there is no lack. But the lack is with us, who believe it so faintly. If we believed it fully, doubtless we should already have been blessed and in Paradise, but the old sack, that still hangs around our neck, holds us back from arriving at such certain faith.—We should not look at Christ after the flesh, as if He were a man, righteous and holy for Himself alone, and having nothing to do with us. True it is that Christ is the holiest person of all, but thou must not stop with that knowledge, that does not yet give thee Christ. But thou knowest Him aright, and obtainest Him for thy own, when thou believest that this holiest Person of all has been bestowed upon thee by the Father, that He should be thy High-priest and Saviour, yea, thy minister and servant, who should lay from Him His own innocence and holiness, and take upon Him thy sinful person, and therein bear thy sin, death and curse, and thus become a sacrifice and a curse for thee, that He might so redeem thee from the curse of the law.—All virtue lies in the little words: for us.

[Two curses are here mentioned by Paul. The one: "Cursed is every one that continueth not," etc. That curse lay on all mankind. The other: "Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree." This curse Christ took, that He might redeem us from the first. Both were curses in and of the law. The one specifies the guilt, the other the punishment. Christ bore the accursed punishment, thus He takes away the accursed guilt. He stood for the "every one" who continueth not, by becoming the very one who hung upon the tree.—R.]

[WORDSWORTH:—How much reason have we to abominate our sins, which were the principal causes of the crucifixion of Christ! They were indeed the traitors which, by the hands of Judas, delivered Him up. The Jewish priests were but our advocates; we by them did adjudge and sentence Him. Pilate was but our spokesman, the Roman executioners were but our agents therein. The Jewish people were but proxies acting our parts; our sins were they which cried out: "Crucify Him," with clamors more loud and more effectual, than did all the Jewish rabble.—The second Adam hung on the tree in Calvary, in order that by hanging on the tree He might abolish the sin committed by us in the first Adam, when he ate of the fruit of the tree of good and evil in Paradise.—There on the cross He extends His hands to all and calls all—Gentiles as well as Jews.—R.]

Ver. 14. LANGUE:—The blessing comes not alone from Christ, but also in Christ. For whoever does not receive it in Christ, receives it not from Christ; as indeed many wish to have it from Christ, but not to take it in Christ, that is, receive it so that they thereby suffer themselves to be brought into His fellowship and in it enjoy the blessing with large addition.

On the whole Section:—The Christian's walk, a walk in the footsteps of the faith of Abraham.—Those who occupy themselves with works of the law, are under the curse: (1) a fearful word, (2) yet only too true.—Blessing or Curse? Other alternative there is none.—Christ has turned the curse into blessing.—The redemption from the curse of the law through Christ.—He became a curse for us. (1) How is that possible? and yet (2) it was necessary, for (3) thereupon rests our salvation.—Our righteousness before God is grounded alone upon faith: (1) this is taught by Abraham's example; (2) proved by the promise given by God to Abraham; (3) attested by the innermost essence of the law; (4) made sure by the redemption established by Christ.—Only through faith in the Crucified One have we part in the redemption accomplished by Him. I. That faith generally is the condition, vers. 6–12. (1) Proof from the example of Abraham's faith, vers. 6–9; (a) on account of his faith was Abraham accounted righteous before God, ver. 6; (b) the promise given to him of the blessing of the Gentiles, presupposes in these also faith. (2) Demonstration from the impossibility of any one being redeemed from the curse of the law through any manner of works, vers. 10–12. II. That the redemption accomplished by Christ is the essential matter [Inhalt] of faith on Him. (1) That Christ has redeemed us from the curse of the law; (2) that He has effected this by Himself becoming a curse for us.—The death of Christ deserves an imperishable remembrance, because in it He became a curse for us. (1) He became a curse for us: (2) Therein lies the power of His death for blessing.

b. Demonstration from the chronological relation of the Lord to the Covenant of Promise.

(VERS. 15–18.)

(Vers. 16–22. The Epistle for 13th Sunday after Trinity.)

- 15 Brethren, I speak after the manner of men; Though it be but a man's covenant, yet if it be [when it has been]¹ confirmed, no man disannulleth [annulleth]² or addeth 16 thereto. Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made. [Now to Abraham were the promises made and to his seed.]³ He saith not, And to seeds, as of 17 many; but as of one, And to thy seed, which is Christ. And [Now] this I say, that the covenant, [A covenant]⁴ that was confirmed before of God in Christ [that has been before confirmed by God to Christ]⁵, the law, which was four hundred and thirty years after, cannot disannul [does not invalidate]⁶ that it should make the 18 promise of none effect [make void the promise]. For if the inheritance be of the law, it is no more of promise: but God gave [hath freely granted]⁷ it to Abraham by [through] promise.

¹ Ver. 15.—[Κεκυρωμένην, simply "confirmed." If anything be supplied, it need not be in the conditional form of the E. V.—R.]

² Ver. 15.—[Disannulleth] is now obsolete, the simple form being of precisely the same signification. "Addeth thereto" i. e. new conditions.—R.]

³ Ver. 16.—[The change in order is necessary to emphasize "and to his seed." Ἐπὶ ἡ θραν, K. A. et al. Lachmann, Tischendorf, Meyer, et al., instead of Ἐπὶ ἡ θραν, Rec.—R.]

⁷ Ver. 18.—[Καὶ χάρις ἔσται, "has given freely," "given of grace." We have no single word to express it.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 15.—[Brethren.—An affectionately pathetic address. How different from ver. 1! The tone is greatly softened.—MEYER. "Here is a pause, at which the indignant feeling of the Apostle softens, and he begins the new train of thought which follows with words of milder character, and proceeds more quietly with his argument" (WINDISCHMANN).—R.]

I speak after the manner of men.—Κατὰ ἀνθρώπων. Paul thus excuses himself for comparing a man's διαθήκη with a διαθήκη of God, he will not (he says) regard the matter from a higher point of view, but simply according to the analogy of human relations. [CALVIN: "By this expression he intended to put them to the blush. It is highly disgraceful and base that the testimony of God should have less weight with us than that of a mortal man."—R.]

Διαθήκη is not to be taken here in the sense of covenant (although approved by MEYER and WIESELER). [See below.—R.] The sense is that of Testament. It is true God made with Abraham a covenant, hence God's covenant of promise with Abraham is here spoken of. But in these verses, Paul takes up this covenant in the aspect of a Testament, in order to emphasize the fact that in it God has made a free promise (of an inheritance) in contrast with the law, which imposes injunctions, making everything depend on merit. This character of the covenant of promise reminds him of a human Testament, and the principles of jurisprudence which are valid with respect to such an instrument, furnish the basis of his argument. [The majority of modern commentators take the other view. The reason here advanced is based upon the idea of "inheritance," which belongs to a covenant as well as to a Testament. The usage of the LXX. is decidedly in favor of the rendering "covenant." So the New Testament usage (the exceptional case, Heb. ix. 15-17, beginning with this idea also). So that while doctrinally considered it is not of much moment (CALVIN, who however prefers the meaning "covenant"), the order of the words and the comparison require this meaning (ELICOTT). Comp. BAGGE, MEYER, LIGHTFOOT. The influence of the Vulgate in substituting "Testament" for "covenant" in the name of the two parts of the Bible is perhaps to be deplored.—R.]

No man annulleth—i. e., of course, legitimately. [Ὁμως belongs here logically. But the sense is well preserved in the E. V.—R.]—Addeth thereto—adds specifications to it, of any kind whatever.—From what is true of a human Testament [or covenant], Paul now argues as to the Testament [or covenant] of God; this also "no one annulleth or addeth thereto"—"no one" and hence not "the law" either. But before he draws this conclusion (ver. 17), he furnishes (ver. 16) the necessary premises for it (WIESELER). He does this, by showing that the διαθήκη referred to the time after as well as before the giving of the law, and in substance remains still in force, without which necessary link the demonstration, that the law made no change in the character of the διαθήκη, would be without value or meaning. For if the διαθήκη had been of limited duration, confined to Abraham for instance, if the promise had been made only to him, it would, when the law came, have been long before fulfilled and thereby done away; the two would not have come in contact. But this is not the case.

Ver. 16.—Now to Abraham were the promises made [lit. were spoken], and to his seed.—This, as shown by "were spoken," and still more by what follows, refers to particular passages, and such moreover as contain the clause "and to thy seed" as also the promise of an "inheritance;" not, therefore, such as Gen. xxii. 18[?], but xiii. 15; xvii. 8 (and according to the LXX. also xxiv. 17). The sense is therefore: not merely to Abraham was there in the διαθήκη a promise, sc., of an inheritance, made by God, but also to his seed; the διαθήκη was not exhausted in him, but was valid also for his seed. But especially must it be shown that it has validity even now. Therefore, says Paul, inasmuch as these promises were given "also to the seed of Abraham," they were given also to Christ. This seed of Abraham (he says), is indeed no other than Christ. This, he says, follows from the very fact of the singular form "his seed" being used. "In order to explain this emphasizing of the singular form in the exegesis of Paul, appeal has been made to the fact that the Rabbins of his time also now and then strain the singular or plural to serve an exegetical turn, and in the passages Gen. iv. 25; xix. 32, themselves explain מָשִׁיחַ of the Messiah. This comparison is admissible, if only we do not overlook the extraordinary contrast which exists between ordinary Rabbinical caprice, and Paul's exposition in this passage. That in the Abrahamic promise the idea of the Messiah is concealed, and that the "seed of Abraham" may be actually understood of the Messiah, is unquestionably the true view, on which the whole exposition of Paul rests, and which he has a little before demonstrated from the connection of Scripture and the deepest reality of the fulfilled truth. But the form in which he, in this passage, rather casually than otherwise, expresses this view, correct in itself, namely, that it is already indicated by the use of the singular in the text which gives the Abrahamic promise, appears to demand the explanation given by most interpreters, as derived from the Rabbinical training of his youth." WIESELER.

[The ground of this assumption of Rabbinical method in his argumentation is this: that the stress of the argument rests on a grammatical error; the Hebrew word, which he renders σπέρμα, having no plural answering to σπέρματα or "seeds." Granting this, it must yet be remembered that the consequences involved in an admission of such "playing" with Divine truth, in a writer, who claims to speak for God, are too grave, to permit us to make such an admission hastily. Is there no other reasonably satisfactory explanation, which denies any Rabbinical influence, implying the slightest quibbling? If there be, justice to such a writer as Paul, aside from any reverence for this Epistle as inspired, should lead us to adopt it. JEROME's application of κατὰ ἀνθρώπων to this verse is hardly allowable. He would not intentionally weaken his own cause thus. LIGHTFOOT well says: "It is quite as unnatural to use the Greek plural with this meaning as the Hebrew. This fact points to St. Paul's meaning. He is not laying stress on the particular word used, but on the fact that a singular noun of some kind, a collective term, is employed, where τὰ τέκνα or οἱ ἀπόγονοι, for instance, might have been substituted. Avoiding the technical terms of grammar, he could not express his meaning more simply than by the opposition 'not to thy seeds, but to thy seed.' The singular collective noun, if it admits of plurality, at the same time involves the idea of unity." ELLICOTT: "We hold that there is as certainly a mystical meaning in the use of שֶׁרָא in Gen. xiii. 15; xvii. 8, as there is an argument for the resurrection in Exod. iii. 6, though in neither case was the writer necessarily aware of it. As the word in its simple meaning generally denotes not the mere progeny of a man, but his posterity viewed as one organically-connected whole; so here in its mystical meaning it denotes not merely the spiritual posterity of Abraham, but Him in whom that posterity is all organically united, the πλῆρωμα, the κεφαλὴ, even Christ. This St. Paul endeavors faintly to convey to his Greek readers by the use of σπέρμα and σπέρματα." Comp. WORDSWORTH, OLSHAUSEN in loco. How Pauline this conception is, will appear to every student of the Epistles to the Romans and Ephesians. Paul's Rabbinical training undoubtedly made him quick and close in discrimination respecting the Old Testament; that it ever made him quibble, and institute false distinctions is against his character as well as against his inspiration.—R.]

That any explanation of the passage which maintains that Paul does not mean to interpret "seed" of the person of Christ is incorrect, needs no proof. [Against this, see ALFORD in loco.—R.] Doubtless, secondarily, those who are "of Christ" are also "the seed of Abraham" (ver. 29), but it is only because, primarily, Christ is this seed. This reference of "seed" to the person of Christ is not disproved by alleging that thereby the διαθήκη, the inheritance would be promised to Christ as well as to Abraham. But, it may be asked, is then the inheritance promised to Christ; is He designated as the Heir, and not rather as the Mediator and Bringer of the inheritance? Doubtless the latter, but primarily He is Himself the universal Heir; therefore in ver. 19 He is called distinctly the universal Heir: "the seed to whom the promise was made." Let us only vividly apprehend the course of prophecy that sketches the history of redemption.

The Messiah Himself, according to it, is He who occupies the promised inheritance, that is, who takes full and abiding possession of it, and by this very fact, brings in the time of salvation and of God's kingdom. The conception is therefore one somewhat different from that in ver. 14, but both are equally according to truth, and the two modes of conception are most intimately connected. For Christ is certainly the Heir, only, He is the Heir in order to procure for His people the participation of the inheritance and therewith the blessing of God. And, as is self-evident, it is this truth, namely, that He in turn brings the inheritance into the possession of His people, which is here mainly in mind. Inasmuch as the διαθήκη had reference to Him, it had and has reference also to those that are "Christ's"; the question as to them therefore still remains to be answered; nay, it is as to them that it occurs, how they become partakers of the inheritance promised in the covenant. For that the covenant with the promise of the inheritance is valid also for the Christian dispensation, that it is "confirmed by God to Christ," is only one side of the truth. On the other side it was maintained with reference to the law that had come between, that the attainment of the inheritance had now become encumbered with the condition of the fulfilment of the law, that it came now of the law and no more simply "of promise." This assertion Paul now opposes, by applying what was said in ver. 5 about a covenant in general, to the covenant of God.

Ver. 17. A covenant that has been before confirmed by God to Christ.—This passage, as WIESELER says, is rightly understood only by considering that the assertion which Paul undertakes to refute is not the assertion of an entire abrogation of the Abrahamic covenant by the law, but only that of a modification in the Judaistic sense by the law of an invalidating, so that it should make void the promise (which would be an "invalidating," because thereby the character of the covenant as a promise given by grace, and thus its specific peculiarity would be taken away). This alone gives the sense of ver. 18: I have a right to say: it "does not invalidate that it should make void the promise;" for if the inheritance is obtained by law, it no longer comes "of promise;" but "of promise" it is to come, for it was assured by God to Abraham through promise, and of grace. We cannot therefore concede an invalidating, so that the promise is made void through the law, for this would take away something essential to the covenant; but, according to ver. 15, this cannot be.—[Various interpretations of εἰς Χριστόν have been suggested. The simplest and most obvious one is: "unto Christ," i. e., as the second party to whom the covenant was ratified. ELLICOTT suggests "to be fulfilled in Christ," and renders "for Christ." Perhaps that of WORDSWORTH is implied: "unto Christ: so as to tend toward, and be consummated in Christ as its end, who, as man, sums up all Abraham's seed in Himself." But on the whole it is best to reject the words as a gloss.—R.]

The law which was four hundred and thirty years after.—Paul has taken the number from Exod. xii. 40, but apparently from the text of the LXX. which adds καὶ ἐν γῇ Χαναάν thus including the sojourn of the patriarchs in Canaan (as do also the Samaritan text and Josephus Ant., 2, 15, 3), while according to the Hebrew text this number covers only the duration of the sojourn in Egypt. Therefore "it is hardly to be said, that Paul has here made a mistake of memory, but only that, on account of his Greek-speaking readers, who used the Septuagint, he has here, as commonly in his Old Testament citations, adhered to the tradition of the LXX., which he could the more easily do, because the precise numbers of the years was a matter of no moment." WIESELER. [Though the precise number is of no moment as respects Paul's argument, the chronological difficulty is a grave one. The period from the call of Abraham to the departure of Jacob into Egypt is fixed at two hundred and fifteen years. The question is: must we compute the sojourn there as extending over four hundred and thirty years, or only two hundred and fifteen years. The Hebrew text, Exod. xii. 40, seems to demand the former term (and also Stephen, Acts vii. 6, "four hundred years," as in the prophecy Gen. xv. 13, both of which passages give round numbers). The latter term is that of the commonly received chronology. If it be adopted, the difficulty is thrown mainly upon the passage, Exod. xii. 40, to which the LXX. adds as above. ALFORD and ELLICOTT suggest this strong point in favor of the shorter term, viz., that from the data respecting ages and births, the longer term would make the age of Jochebed, the mother of Moses, at least two hundred and fifty-six years when Moses was born. So that the longer term makes the accurate statement of numbers overthrow the accurate statement of genealogies and events, which was far less likely to be tampered with. The gloss, if it be a gloss, of the LXX. affords the easiest solution of the difficulty, and Gen. xv. 40, Acts vii. 6, are then to be explained in the same way. Comp. USNER, WINDISCHMANN, HALES.—R.]

Ver. 18. But God hath freely granted it to Abraham through promise.—Prominence is to be given to the fact that God has not limited His promise, which He gave to Abraham, by conditioning it on a fulfilment of the law, but that it was a promise of pure grace; therefore, says Paul, God has, out of grace, by means of promise, bestowed, s. c., the inheritance on Abraham, i. e., not put him in actual possession, but assured it to him. The two expressions, "freely granted," and "through promise," are conjoined to exclude most definitely the idea "of the law."

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Epochs of Revelation. In the preceding section, as well as this, Paul has not cared to conduct a Scripture demonstration merely by the citation of isolated passages, but has used a freer and nobler method with the Scriptures. He showed in the revelation of God to Abraham a prophetic setting forth of the perfect revelation of God exhibited in Christ (especially at the close of ver. 14 had this become evident), and thus placed the Scripture in the light of a history of the revelation of redemption. This view of it has become, in the present section (as far as to chap. iv. 2), the controlling one. The law also here constitutes for him an epoch of the revelation of God, so that there are three of these epochs represented by Abraham, Moses, and Christ. They are not, however, simple stages of development, but the first and the third belong essentially together in one order, as germ and fruit; for the middle epoch, so diverse in character, a false claim is made, which it is his endeavor to refute, and to assign and establish its just position.—The suggestions which Paul here gives are important starting points for a just historical apprehension of Revelation, and at the same time an example of a proper adjustment of relations and reconciliation of apparent contradictions in it.

2. The Law is not a complement of the Covenant of Promise. It is not till in the next section that the purpose and meaning of the law, and its relation to the covenant of promise, are expounded positively. The negative proof, however, here adduced, is of itself important; viz.: That the law is not, and is not to be regarded or treated as a complement and rectification of the Covenant of Promise, so that whatever at first was freely promised as a boon "should be now encumbered with a burdensome condition." Or rather, this was so, indeed, but only for a time, for a definite season (as is shown afterwards). In this way, however, the inheritance was not actually attained, but as it was originally assured purely by promise, so is it now attained only through faith, the subjective correlative of the promise; and only this is required.

[3. The sum of the Apostle's argument. "This, then, is the sum of the Apostle's argument: A ratified, unrevoked constitution, cannot be set aside by a subsequent constitution. The plan of justification by believing was a ratified and unrevoked constitution. The law was a constitution posterior to this by a long term of years. If the observance of the law were constituted the procuring cause or necessary means of justification, such a constitution would necessarily annul the covenant before ratified, and render the promise of more effect. It follows, of course, that the law was appointed for no such purpose. Whatever end it might serve, it could not serve this end; it could never be appointed to serve this end."—BROWN. What end it serves, the Apostle states in the section immediately following.—R.]

4. Christ the Seed of Abraham. "Seed," comprehends posterity generally, and therefore of course a plurality. But among this posterity one nevertheless was found upon whom the whole expectation of faith was directed, and through whom also all promise first received its fulfilment. As Christ at His actual coming into the world humiliated Himself to live as a man among men, and had to be discovered and sought out by means of the words and works that were His alone, in like manner was He in the promise also concealed, as it were, among the seed, or among the collective posterity of Abraham, so that only when the time was fulfilled could any plainly distinguish Him and say: This is Christ, this is He who sanctifies and blesses, who yet is of the same descent with those that are sanctified and blessed; therefore also He is not ashamed to call them brethren, and it was not unbefitting Him, that all should be comprehended in the one Seed."—RIEGER.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 15.—“Brethren.”—RIEGER: By this address the Apostle noticeably softens the sharpness used in the first verse. Nothing calls for so much consideration, for so thorough a mingling of sharpness and gentleness, as when men fall back under the law and the blindness as to the gospel conjoined therewith. For the bewitching arts of the prince of this world, which are implied therein, and the mischief to be feared therefrom, demand sharpness; the hunger and thirst after righteousness yet alive in the conscience, and the love to the truth, demand to be appealed to with the utmost possible tenderness.—In the word of God throughout there is much condescension to our weakness, or much that is presented in human style, suitable to our power of comprehension. God has also actually so arranged it, that between the visible and the invisible, between the ordinances in the realm of nature and in the realm of grace there is much that is similar, and we therefore through the images furnished us by our experience in human life, obtain a true conception of the ordinances of grace. The Incarnation of the Son of God has such an influence on the whole economy of God forward and backwards, that God everywhere deals with us after the manner of a man.—LANGE:—Human ordinances and institutions, which in themselves serve for the outward well-being of human and civil society, are in themselves not to be condemned. Since God counts them worthy that His apostles should therewith make clearer the economy of His kingdom.—In STARKE:—If a great lord gives us his hand and seal, we are satisfied and believe, that the heavens will fall before such a promise will be broken. Why do we not rather trust the sealed handwriting of our God who cannot lie.—“Addeth thereto.”—In divine things the human addition is often discernible, but very improperly, often causing that nothing pure is left.—[So the annulling by the addition of the law would make void the promise.—R.]

Ver. 16.—SPENER: In the Holy Scripture all is written with Divine wisdom, therefore no word, no letter, no arrangement of the words is settled at random.—Divine truth must be found in the Holy Scripture itself and the letter of it, and may not be expected by separate communication from the Holy Ghost. Else Paul could not insist upon a little word and thereupon rest his argument.—[Paul, who takes such a broad view of the Scriptures as the one great history of Redemption, is the one who notices the truth in the least details of the word. One need not be a loose expositor, in order to have broad views; the accurate reader is not contracted by his accuracy.—R.]

Ver. 17. STARKE: Sacred chronology gives a great light, for a more accurate insight into the ways of God.—[How many read their Bibles, as if the whole were written at one time. They acknowledge a history there, but it sheds no light for them upon the great truth of God as a whole.—Abraham and Moses. How prominent, how related.—How often the followers of Christ stop at Moses, when they ought to go back to Abraham!—The covenant was confirmed of God to Christ. Through Abraham, indeed, yet it is essentially a covenant between God and our Redeemer. So the Old Covenant is the new and everlasting Covenant.—R.]

Ver. 18. STARKE: It is impossible to have righteousness and salvation partly from the works of the law, and partly from grace. For these are opposing things, that destroy one another. It must either be of works alone or of grace alone; now it is not of works, therefore it is of grace alone.—RIEGER:—So long, indeed, as the human heart in falsehood still parts its love between light and darkness, nothing were more pleasing, than if it could thus turn from side to side between the promise and its own merit, that is, if, so far as might be, it could boast itself of merit and the law, and where these were too scant, could put forward, under cover of the promise, the grace and merit of Christ. Then, moreover, there would be in this way no great need of going deep in either quarter; it would only be to bend a little to the law, and as to the appropriation of grace, it need not call for any very special humility. But with such a divided heart, one has neither access to grace, nor entrance into the everlasting inheritance.

All that we have from the Gospel or from the promise, is a gift, a free gift of grace, and nothing is attained by obedience as a condition. We are not, therefore, to regard a godly life as a condition of obtaining the blessings of grace, but as a part of the grace itself which the Lord shows us.—[How old this method of grace by covenant of promise! Older than Moses. Yet how new! for we never apprehend it until God reveals it to us by His spirit, and then it seems as though it were a revelation of something entirely new.—The benefits of the gospel are all through promise. Hence all of grace, all to faith, all for the glory of the Promiser!—R.]

2. The law had undoubtedly its value, and that for the attainment of salvation itself, but only a preparatory, and therefore also a transitory value. Believers are free from it.

(CHAP. iii. 19—iv. 7.)

- a. The law had its own sufficient end, having respect to transgressions, and so far from opposing an obstacle to the promises, it had the office of preparing the way for their fulfilment, as a schoolmaster unto Christ.

(VERS. 19-24.)

- 19 Wherefore then serveth the law [lit. what then is the law]¹? It was added² because of [the] transgressions, till the seed should come to whom³ the promise was [has been] made; and it was ordained [being ordained]⁴ by [by means of] angels in the hand of a mediator. Now a mediator is not a mediator of one, but God is one. Is the law then against the promises of God?⁵ God forbid: for if there had been a law given which could have given life, verily righteousness should [would] have been⁶ by the law. But [ἀλλὰ, But, on the contrary]⁷ the Scripture hath concluded [shut up]⁸ all under sin, that [in order that] the promise by faith of [or in] Jesus Christ might be given to them that believe. But before faith came we were kept under the law, shut up [kept in ward, shut up⁹ under the law] unto the faith which should afterwards be revealed. Wherefore the law was [So that the law hath been or become]¹⁰ our schoolmaster to bring us [omit to bring us] unto Christ, that we might be justified by faith.

- b. But for this very reason it has fulfilled its purpose, when it has brought us to faith, and believers, as children (sons) of God and heirs, are no longer under the law.

(VERS. 25-29.)

- 25 But after [now]¹¹ that faith is come, we are no longer under a schoolmaster. 26, 27 For ye are all the children [all sons] of God by faith in Christ Jesus. For as many of you as have been [were]¹² baptized into Christ have [omit have] put on Christ. There is neither Jew nor Greek, there is neither bond nor free, there is neither male nor female [no male and female]¹³; for ye are all [all are]¹⁴ one in Christ Jesus. And [But, ὅτι] if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and [omit and]¹⁵ heirs according to the promise.

(VERS. 23-29.—The Epistle for New Year's festival.)

² Ver. 19.—Griesbach and Scholz have ἐτίθη, which is not sufficiently supported. [So Rec., but προσετίθη is adopted by most modern editors.—The article should be retained with "transgressions" in the E. V. So Ellicott, Alford.—R.]

⁴ Ver. 19.—[The Italics in the E. V. separate διαταγείς too much from the first clause, with which it is closely connected.—"By means of" brings out the purely instrumental force of δια.—R.]

⁷ Ver. 22.—[The strongly adversative ἀλλὰ requires the insertion of "on the contrary" (Alford, Ellicott).—R.]

⁸ Ver. 22.—[As the E. V. renders the same verb (συγκλείειν) ver. 23, "shut up," it is substituted here as less ambiguous than "hath concluded."—R.]

10 Ver. 24.—[“So that the law hath become” is more literal. “Schoolmaster” is retained, since we have no better word with which to translate παιδαγωγός. “Tutor” (Alford) is no more exact.—“To bring us” is better omitted, since it presents but one side of the meaning.—R.]

11 Ver. 25.—[“Now” brings out the idea that it is so.—R.]

12 Ver. 27.—[The aorist verbs in this verse are better translated by the simple past tense of the English.—R.]

13 Ver. 28.—[The change of particles in Greek with this last pair is thus noted. On its peculiar force see EXEG. NOTES.—R.]

14 Ver. 28.—Εἰς ἑστέ ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ. A has ἐστε Χριστοῦ 'I. “But εἰς would easily be overlooked after the preceding καί, and then ἐν Χρ. 'I. was first followed by Χριστοῦ as a gloss, from the beginning of ver. 29, and afterwards supplanted by it. The reading ἐν instead of εἰς is an explanation.” Meyer. N. has ὅτι ἐστε ἐν Χριστῷ, but ἐν is marked doubtful [marked for erasure; the marks afterwards removed, N.³ reading as Rec.—It is doubtful whether we should read καὶ ἐστε or ἀναγίνετε. N. has the latter.—R.]

15 Ver. 29.—Καὶ is omitted in good MSS., including N., by some versions and Fathers, but may very easily have been overlooked, as it follows καὶ (Meyer). It is rejected by Lachmann, Tischendorf, Scholz, [also by Meyer in 4th. ed., Alford, Elliott, Lightfoot, on the authority of N. A. B. C. D. As Schmoller follows Meyer in retaining it, it may be rejected here on the same authority.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 19. Wherefore then serveth the law?—[“What then is the object of the law?”—R.] If the inheritance is not to come by the law, but still “of promise,” the objection is obvious: why then did not God suffer the promise to stand alone? Why then did the law come afterwards? Certainly this was in that case superfluous!—To this Paul answers, in effect, thus: was the law then purposeless, if it had not precisely this purpose, of mediating the obtaining of the inheritance? Could it not have another purpose? Yes, this was the case, it had a purpose, but one very different from that of being the means of securing the inheritance. What then?

The direct answer is not given immediately, but is introduced with: “It was added because of the transgressions.”—This means, simply, on account of transgressions was the law added. “Transgressions,” multiplying and becoming aggravated, gave, in the first place, occasion for adding the law, necessarily brought it to pass that God came with respect to His people into an entirely different, more distant relation than existed, in the covenant of promise, between Him and the patriarchs. Instead of the more fatherly relation existing hitherto, God was constrained to place Himself in a relation involving the exercise of severe discipline, involving rigorous requirements and commands, nay, sharp threatenings, as it is afterwards expressed: “We were kept in ward, shut up under the law.” And as this relation so different from the former had been occasioned by “transgressions,” it was of course precisely in its right place where the “transgressions” of men prevailed, and it was designed, with reference to this, not so much in order to prevent them, as rather, by its commandments and prohibitions, and the threatenings annexed, to bring them under a more stringent accountability (which now first became possible), and a plainly expressed curse. Comp. EWALD: In order, because offences had come into the world, to punish them the more severely. (At first the judgment of death had kept the sense of sin alive. As men now were too accustomed to this, the law then came, and therewith the stricter imputation of sin, the curse more severely denounced, the obedience more rigorously required. RIEGER.) At the most this is as far as we are to go in the explanation of παράβασις ἡ χάρις. A more precise declaration as to the positive purpose of the law in relation to “transgressions” is not yet given here; and cannot therefore be deduced from the general expression; for then the second objection (ver. 21) would no longer be possible; it is in the refutation of this that Paul first expresses himself more particularly. The common explanation therefore: “For the sake of transgressions” = to induce them (agreeably to what Paul elsewhere says of the effect of the law to promote sin), is at least in no way indicated. The question whether Paul had it in mind would not arise before vers. 22, 23, 24. That the word ἡ χάρις does not necessitate this explanation, is shown by such passages as Luke vii. 47; iii. 12. [The view here suggested seems to be in the main that of ELLICOTT and WORDSWORTH (Milton, Paradise Lost, vii. 285). The purpose of the law as here set forth was, not (1) to prevent transgression, nor (2) to create, multiply transgressions, though elsewhere this is mentioned as its effect, but (3) to bring to light “the transgressions” of it already occurring and to occur, to make them “palpable, to awaken a conviction of sin in the heart, and make man feel his need of a Saviour” (ELLICOTT). Thus “the law had a supplementary, parenthetical, provisional and mandatory character, and came in, as it were, incidentally” (WORDSWORTH).—R.] To this purpose of the law there then agree also:

1. The limited duration of its binding force, continuing only till the seed should come, for with that its purpose in reference to “transgressions” was fulfilled. (Why? is answered ver. 23, sq.) “The seed” to whom the promise has been made (see on ver. 16) is Christ, for He is the universal Heir; those who are Christ’s are then, it is true, included also in this seed, and become therefore joint-heirs with Him (ver. 29). 2. The manner of its origin: ordained by means of angels in the hand of a mediator. As agents in giving the law (not as its authors), Paul designates the angels, agreeably to the ancient tradition, which appears first LXX. Deut. xxxiii. 2 (not in the original); and also Heb. ii. 2; Acts vii. 53; Josephus, Antiq. 15, 5, 3, and in the Rabbins. “In the hand of a mediator” = Moses. Moses received the tables of the law from God, and brought them down to the people. “In the hand” is therefore to be taken strictly. The explanation of most of the Fathers [so BARNES.—R.] referring it to Christ is incorrect. [LIGHTFOOT remarks: “It will be seen that St. Paul’s argument here rests in effect on our Lord’s Divinity as its foundation, otherwise He would have been a mediator in the same sense in which Moses was a mediator. In another and a higher sense St. Paul himself so speaks of our Lord (1 Tim. ii. 5).”—R.] SCHNEIDER refers it to the angel of the law, who, according to Jewish theology, had the special commission to teach Moses the law. Unquestionably the Rabbins speak of an angel of the law, but it is no more possible to prove this Theologumenon to have existed in Paul's time, than it is to establish it from the Bible (MEYER). The purpose of this reference to the origin of the law is not to demonstrate its inferior dignity, and still less, indeed, is it, as even MEYER and WIESELER strangely assume, to bring the glory of the law, in the magnificence and solemnity of its institution, before the reader. The dignity of the law itself is not under consideration, but its design, as compared with the covenant of promise. We are not, in reading this verse, to pause without reason at προσέτιθη, as though this were a complete idea, but should read the whole verse together. It is true, we first read: on account of transgressions it was added, but the complete statement is: on account of transgressions it was added in the definite way which is described, 1. by "till the seed," etc., 2. by "ordained by," etc. In this way did it originate, that is, 1. in an entirely different way from the covenant of promise; it was not an immediate giving of a promise, not a fatherly provision and agreement on the part of God, but was introduced by a mediation, and a double one, first of angels, and then, and not before, of a human mediator expressly chosen; the former mediation being on the side of God, the latter being given at the desire of the people themselves. ("How strangely does this appear in contrast with the former manifestations of God, in which the promises were given." REIGER.) This is meant to point out how much more of strangeness God used towards the people in the law, how much more distant a relation it established than the covenant of promise; how could it then have had the same purpose as the covenant?—But this manner of origin 2. corresponded entirely with the purpose of the law as it has been stated: "because of the transgressions." As these made the law in general necessary, so, moreover, they were the reasons why God came, only through angels, into relation to His people, and that the people on their side had need of a mediator, to hold intercourse with God. The difference indicated in the latter circumstance between the law and the covenant of promise, is then moreover expressly dwelt upon in the following verse.

Ver. 20. Now a mediator is not a mediator of one.—The first words are simple and plain: A mediator (ὁ μεσίτης, the Art. generic) can never be mediator of a single party, the very idea presupposes more than one, two at least, between whom he is μέσος. The question can then only be, whether the design of the remark is, primarily, to express something respecting the mediator himself, personally, or something respecting his function. In the first case the sense would be: He belongs not merely to one, but to the two, the two parties between whom he mediates. So now here in concreto: the mediator of the law belonged to the two parties whose mediator he was, viz.: God and men; and the sense more particularly would be: therefore not merely to God, but also to men. The remark would then be intended as an affirmation respecting the nature of the law, that is, has not only a Divine, but also a human character.—Yet this explanation by no means commends itself. If we join ένός with οὐκ ἔστιν, the interpretation: He belongs not merely to one, is much less obvious than the other: He has to do not merely with one, but with two, mediates between two. Still simpler is the construction of EWALD, who joins ένός immediately with μεσίτης—the mediator of one is not, does not exist, is an impossibility. [So WORDSWORTH.—R.]

But God is one.—The words can mean nothing else: εἷς has a numerical signification, i. e., it can have no other meaning than that of the preceding εἷς, hence not—the same, One with Himself, etc. It is these words especially that have given rise to such an enormous number of attempts at explanation. As regards these the reader is referred to the monographs of C. F. BONITZ, C. F. ANTON REIL, KORPE, or the ordinary commentaries, such as those of MEYER and WIESELER, where the more important modern explanations are arranged in order. A detailed examination may be spared here, especially as the passage of itself is not doctrinally important. [MEYER thus remarks on the course of exegesis: "The many different explanations of the passage, and there must be more than 250 of them, have been thus multiplied especially in more modern times; for the Fathers pass lightly over the words, which are plain in themselves, without regarding their pragmatic difficulties, for the most part applying the first clause, which is generally taken correctly, to Christ, who is the Mediator between God and men, some however casting a side glance at the opponents of the Divinity of Christ. Although there was no special dogmatic interest connected with the passage, the variety of interpretations in the 16th and 17th centuries (see POOLE's Synopsis) was such, that every expositor of importance took his own separate course, yet without polemical spirit, since no dogmatical question was at issue. The variety has become still greater since the middle of the 18th century, especially since the rise of grammatico-historical exegesis (the philological errors of which exegesis it has however fully experienced), and is still increasing. How often too the absurdest fancies and crudest attempts have availed themselves of our text, the explanation of which seems to be regarded as an exegetical work of art!" He then answers fifteen of the later opinions, besides alluding to others. JOWETT reckons 430 interpretations! What a testimony to the amount of exegetical labor bestowed on the Scriptures! That too on a passage which is at best but a general statement in support of a single point in a long argument, which seeks not so much to set forth the gospel, as to remove mistaken views respecting the law! How thankful we should be that the gospel texts are so pellucid; had they been less so, we should doubtless have 250 interpretations of them also. As the exegesis now stands, it is perhaps better to admit that the verse is δυσνόητος

* [JOHN BROWN: "The existence of a mediator is certainly no proof that a dispensation is not a dispensation of mercy, for the new covenant has a mediator. But the facts connected with the law being given by the hand of Moses as a mediator, plainly show that the law was not, in its literal meaning and direct object, a revelation of the way of obtaining the Divine favor."—R.]

τὴ (2 Pet. iii. 16). The passage is undoubtedly genuine, and does not refer to Christ. Thus much seems clear. Schmoller gives below an exposition, to which he has added in the second edition another (on which comment is made in the proper place). To this the reader will find added the views of ELLICOTT and LIGHTFOOT, which have been chosen on account of their clearness, a quality especially desirable, when the explanation has so often been lucus a non lucendo.—R.]

The question is mainly this: Is δέ (of the second clause) simply metabatic, or adversative? A decision in favor of the one view, gives an entirely different sense from that arrived at by adopting the other.—In the first case we have simply the minor premise of a syllogism, ὁ θεός is with εἰς subsumed under the εἰς denied with μεσίτης. The mediator is not a mediator of one, nov God is one, therefore, &c. The conclusion now may be various. WIESELER gives it: Therefore the mediator has reference not merely to God, but also to men. But the thought that there is found in ὁ δὲ θεός εἰς ἐστίν, namely, God is only one party, appears to have too little force. EWALD gives it: Therefore the Mediator has not reference to God, for God is only one, consists not, for instance, of two internally distinct Gods, or of an earlier and later God; it is clear therefore that Moses as mediator, did not mediate, say between the God of the promise and the God of the law, and thereby confound the law with the promise, and so annul the former by what was latter and later, but that he only mediated between God and the people of that time. Ingenious, but far-fetched. The chief objection, however, to this whole view of δέ as metabatic is, that the following sentence in ver. 21 points too evidently in νόμος and θεός to a previous antithesis, from which then οὖν deduces an inference. The above-mentioned explanations are wanting in the recognition of the inner connection of the two verses (MEYER); the thought breaks off, and an entirely new one begins. Besides, according to EWALD's explanation the question as to a κατά would not have been in place here, as this κατά is precisely what the foregoing thought would have denied. Δέ is therefore doubtless to be taken adversatively, and the δέ of the first member is the metabatic δέ of a minor premise. Paul had said: The law was given through a mediator. Now with one there is no mediator, while on the other hand God is One, therefore it might be inferred that the law is against the promises. MEYER: ver. 20 contains two loci communes, from which a possible inference (ver. 21) with respect to the two concretes which are under consideration, is drawn. Sense: A mediator presupposes two, therefore also the law does; in the case of that, there were two parties, between which the mediator intervened;—on the other hand God is One, not a plurality; if the promise therefore, of which God is author (comp. vers. 18 and 21), had its origin through Him alone, there was only a single personage active thereby, it was a purely Divine act, not resting upon a contract of two parties. How entirely different in origin, therefore, was God's covenant of promise, from the law? (Was it not thereby clearly indicated, that the purpose of the law was not to be the same and therefore is not the same, as that of the covenant of promise, that therefore its purpose in specie cannot have been, to secure—directly—the κληρονομία for men?) But can it not be inferred from this, that the law is against the promises of God? that it stands in conflict with them? so that, because the law has come, the promises are no longer to be regarded as valid, and a fulfilment of them is not to be looked for; as at the giving of a constitution by compact between prince and people the question may arise whether previous promises given on one side are still to be fulfilled? The main point is to understand κατά (ver. 21) rightly (even MEYER does not explain this correctly). One objection, that the law is then purposeless, if “the inheritance is not of the law,” Paul has refuted in vers. 19 and 20, by pointing to the fact that it was given for an entirely different purpose, as appears from the very manner of its origin. But out of this refutation of the first objection arises a second, whether by this superadding of the law (προσθεῖν) the purpose of the covenant of promise be not hindered; first a free promise on the part of God (without regard to παράβασεις), and then a law, coming through a mediator, who intervened between God and the people, originating therefore by a compact of God and the people (with definite reference to παράβασεις); does not this then hinder the first, and so far do it away?—This abrogation however is not to be taken in the sense of ver. 17, that the law came in the place of the promise, so that the inheritance would now come “of the law,” for this is already refuted, first by the very course of the argument ver. 15 sq. from the idea of a διαθήκη, then also by the refutation of the objection that then the law is purposeless, vers. 19, 20. The question in ver. 21 is to be understood as implying an apprehension that by the law the attainment of the inheritance (which, it is presupposed, according to the proof already given, can only be attained “by promise”) may be hindered, may be made, comparatively speaking, impossible. It is not, therefore, the form of the “promise” which is here meant, but the substance; on which account we have here again the plural ἐπαγγελιῶν; the question being, whether the law does not render the fulfilment of the promises of God impossible. This alone gives a progress of thought, and this alone is entirely congruous with what follows. Paul now refutes this second objection also. The law in no wise interposes an obstacle to the promises of God, but rather, in itself, agrees fully therewith, nay, although it had not itself the ability or function of bringing the promises immediately into fulfilment, it was meant nevertheless to serve the purpose of rendering men partakers of this fulfilment by faith in Christ (vers. 23, 24), and with this the law itself then attained its end (ver. 25 sq.).

I allow this explanation, given in the first edition, to remain. It was grounded on that of MEYER, and has at all events this in its favor, in distinction from other explanations, that it puts ver. 21 in immediate connection with ver. 20, and understands the question in ver. 21 as seemingly resulting from ver. 20, while the other explanations, though otherwise having much in their favor, assume that the thought breaks off with ver. 20, and that in ver. 21 Paul merely turns back to ver. 17 or 19.—However a new explanation of ver. 20 has been given by Dr. VOGEL in the Studien und Kritiken, 1865, Heft 3, which, it is true, also fails to give a connection between ver. 20 and ver. 21, but which, on the other hand, points out the connection between vers. 19 and 20 with better success than usual, and which, in particular, gives due weight to the statement, the law was “ordained by means of angels.” In the other explanations full justice has not been done to this statement, which though otherwise so abrupt, could not have been made without a purpose. VOGEL starts from the usually neglected point of the signification of μεσίτης, and shows that μεσίτης by no means signifies merely, and not even predominantly—as is commonly assumed in advance—one who stands in the midst between two, but that it means most commonly one who acts instead of some one, and cares for his affairs.—A genitive joined with it signifies either the matter, which is accomplished by the mediation, or the person whom the μεσίτης represents, or (which however cannot be shown of Paul’s use of it) the several parties between whom he discharges his function (as in 1 Tim. ii. 5). When now it is said of the μεσίτης: ἐνὸς οὐκ ἔστιν; this of course involves the positive affirmation: a mediator can only be the mediator of more than one. And here VOGEL admits that it would be most obvious to understand this plurality of a plurality of parties, between whom the mediator stands in the midst, but decides nevertheless in favor of the other interpretation of μεσίτης: representative—of several persons, for the discharge of their affairs. It is true a representative may very well represent one person only; but then we must understand a representation for the purpose of mediation. In that case it is most natural, only one having to conclude a compact, that he should do it in his own person. But if several have it to do, and that in such a way that the transaction cannot be completed by all, a mediation by one person acting instead of many becomes necessary, and such a person is a μεσίτης. The sense would then be: where a mediator appears, we are obliged to understand him as representing a number of persons. VOGEL is led to this interpretation, in the first place by the sentence immediately following: ὁ δὲ θεὸς εἰς ἑαυτὸν—but (adversative) God is one. He therefore is not that plurality, which the mediator as such implies. Therefore—the strict logical inference—the mediator is not God’s mediator, does not appertain as mediator to God. But whose mediator is this mediator? who is this plurality?

The answer, given ver. 19 is: ἄγγελοι—in these we have the plurality we were looking for. The law is, according to Paul, διαταγὴς δι’ ἀγγέλων. (Comp. ver. 15, ἐπιδόα: the law is not an ἐπὶ διαταγῇ in the sense that the covenant of promise was thereby prejudiced, or destroyed; it is, however, a πρὸς διαταγῇ—comp. προσετέθη—which, however, was not intended to annul the covenant of promise, for it was only meant to be in force “till the seed should come,” etc., that is, only for a time, only till the fulfilment of the covenant of promise should take place. The covenant, therefore, neither could nor should be in any way infringed upon.) The author of the law is not mentioned here, as He had not been at προσετέθη. Of course God is to be understood. But Paul is not specially engaged, in making this authorship prominent. He stops with declaring that the law was ordained—promulgated—through angels, having in mind thereby to place it on a lower level than the covenant of promise. With “in the hand of a mediator” (by which of course no one else than Moses is to be understood) Paul now proceeds to name the signs by which the inferior dignity of the law may be known. The disposition of it committed to the angels, took effect through a μεσίτης, who, it is manifest, is to be regarded then as their delegate. The angels, the sense might be, did not even themselves promulgate the law in their own person, but this was done through a (human) mediator. The sense therefore would be: ordained for men, that is, the people of Israel, through angels, who, moreover, availed themselves of a mediator.—Yet Paul, by “in the hand of a mediator,” is not so much giving a fresh sign of the inferior rank of the law, as strengthening the previous affirmation, “ordained by angels.” The circumstance that a mediator was engaged in the work, was not meant so much to explain the manner of the angelic ministration, as to establish the fact of it. The presence of a mediator was in Paul’s mind closely connected with this, but by no means so closely connected in the current doctrine. How far this circumstance, that a mediator (namely, Moses) had a joint agency in the giving of the law, is a proof of this ministry of angels, is explained in ver. 20. “In the hand of a mediator” Paul has said and had to say: but where a μεσίτης is present, a plurality of parties represented by him is to be assumed; God however is not a plurality, but One: The law, therefore, at whose promulgation a plurality intervened, did not proceed from God, but from the angels (these being the only two parties conceivable)—and therefore form a plurality. The clause would not then be properly a proof (as indeed it is not introduced by γὰρ), but the fact of the “being ordained in the hand of a mediator” would be simply alluded to for confirmation of the “by means of angels.” It would then in fact be best to include the clause in a parenthesis. This interpretation is not disproved by the fact that in many other passages Moses is explicitly named as dealing with the people by commission from God Himself. Paul could still have the right to say that if in a single passage, as here, the giving of the law is represented as the work of angels, Moses must necessarily be regarded as their delegate; comp. Acts vii. 38.—It might also deserve attention, that in ver. 21 the ἐπαγγελίαι are expressly distinguished by the epithet τοῦ θεοῦ. Is not this connected with the fact that previously at the mention of the law, its Divine origin was entirely passed over and the giving of the law represented as the work of angels?

The question in ver. 21 would not then express a conclusion apparently resulting from the immediately preceding statement. It would rather express amazement, as to how any one could even imagine that the law, which is proximately to be referred to the angels, could invalidate the promises of God. It is too weak for that. And what would thus be improbable on account of the mode of the law's origin, would then be further refuted by the truth, that the law is incapable of giving life.

Even on this interpretation of ver. 20, however,—independently of the explanation of οὖν—the sense given by us to the κατὰ τὸν ἐπαγγέλιον (see above) and to εἰ γὰρ ἐδόθη (see below) might be preserved.

[The above view to which such prominence is given on account of its novelty and originality, is in all essential features the same as that of GFRÖRER (Geschichte des Urchristenthums, das Jahrhundert des Heils; Erste Abtheilung, pp. 228, 229, Stuttgart, 1838). So that, although thirty years old, it has met with less consideration from commentators than is here given to it in its revived form. As GFRÖRER himself intimates that this interpretation is “easy to be perceived by the eye which has been sharpened by accurate acquaintance with the Jewish mode of thought,” it may be allowable to suggest that were this Paul's meaning, his Rabbinical training would be more apparent than in ver. 16. Besides this view would make Paul apparently disingenuous in his attempt to lower the claims of the law, which is God's law,—“through angels, by the hand of a mediator.” And yet the chief peculiarity of this novel interpretation is its ignoring that fact. This vitiates the whole, in our view. As Schmoller remarks ver. 19, “the purpose of this reference to the origin of the law is not to demonstrate its inferior dignity.”*

Subjoined is the view of ELLICOTT (2d ed.): “The context states briefly the four distinctive features of the law with tacit reference to the promise, 1) restricted and conditioned; 2) temporary and provisional; 3) mediately, not immediately, given by God; 4) mediately, but not immediately, received from God. Three of these are passed over; the last as the most important, is noticed; ‘the law was with, the promise was without a mediator.’ Ver. 20 thus appears a syllogism of which the conclusion is omitted: ‘Now a mediator does not appertain to one (standing or acting alone); but (in the promise) God is one (does stand and act alone); THEREFORE (in the promise) A MEDIATOR DOES NOT APPERTAIN TO GOD. Is then the law (a dispensation which, besides other distinctions, involved a mediator) opposed to the promises which rested on God (and involved no mediator)? God forbid.’ According to this view the only real difficulty is narrowed to the minor proposition. How was God one? And the answer seems,—not because He is essentially unity, nor because He is one by Himself, and Abraham is one by himself, nor yet because He is both the Giver, the Father, and the Receiver, the Son, united (as held in ed. 1), but, with the aspect that the last clause of ver. 18 puts on the whole reasoning,—because He dealt with Abraham singly and directly, stood alone, and used no mediator.” This has the merit of simplicity and is a safe view. LIGHTFOOT is perhaps not so close in his explanation, but it may well be added: “The very idea of mediation supposes two persons at least, between whom the mediation is carried on. The law then is of the nature of a contract between two parties, God on the one hand, and the Jewish people on the other. It is only valid so long as both parties fulfil the terms of the contract. It is therefore contingent and not absolute. But God (the Giver of the promise) is one. Unlike the law, the promise is absolute and unconditional. It depends on the sole decree of God. There are not two contracting parties, there is nothing of the nature of a stipulation. The Giver is every thing, the recipient nothing. Thus the primary sense of ‘one’ here is numerical. The further idea of unchangeableness may perhaps be suggested; but if so, it is rather accidental than inherent. On the other hand this proposition is quite unconnected with the fundamental statement of the Mosaic law, ‘the Lord thy God is one God,’ though resembling it in form.”—R.]

Ver. 21. God forbid. For if there had been a law, etc.—That the law is not in the sense indicated “against the promises of God,” Paul proves first by the consideration, that if a law had been given which could make alive, δικαιοσύνη would have proceeded from it, i. e., not as it is commonly and altogether erroneously explained, in connection with the erroneous view as to the force of the objection: if a law that could do this had been given, and δικαιοσύνη came from it, then were the law actually “against the promises of God (a sense to which γὰρ, rightly taken, is unsuitable); but Paul really wishes to show that the law accords with the promises, and cannot be intended to annul these; for if the law were able to make alive, δικαιοσύνη would actually proceed from it, that is the same effect which is to be wrought through the promises. The law cannot, therefore, in itself, have any tendency hostile to “the promises.” But, he continues, “the Scripture has shut up all,” etc.—the power to “give life” (ζωοποιεῖν) was, as it were, denied the law, in order that “the promise might be given by faith in Jesus Christ.” It could not “give life,” and thereby bring “righteousness,” if only on account of the sins of men; but, in truth, it was not to do this, this was in no wise its design, for the promise was to come ἐκ πίστεως Ἰησοῦ Χρ.—Given life.—Ζωοποιεῖν = to make inwardly living, not = to give eternal life, for the sense is: if the law could awaken man from his death in sins, and give him spiritual life, “righteousness” (= δεικναι τὸν ἐκείνου εἶναι), would actually proceed from the law, for with the ζωοποιεῖσθαι, the condition of justification would be of course perfectly realized. The conclusion is therefore from cause to effect. MEYER incorrectly takes it “from effect to cause,” in connection with his explanation of ζωοποιεῖν as the bestowment of eternal life. The “making alive” is not indeed actually the cause of “justification,” but this is only because a making alive through the law is not possible. It is however precisely this unrealized case, viz., a making alive through the law, that is here spoken of. [The being dead in sins is here taken for granted; what is meant by “life?” WIESELER's view is given above. MEYER as usual restricts it to future eternal life; but LIGHTFOOT well says, it includes “alike the spiritual life in the present and the glorified life in the future, for in the Apostle's conception the two are blended together and inseparable." This seems to accord better with New Testament usage. The reasoning then is not from the whole to its part (ALFORD), for the "justification" is not strictly a part, but a condition of "life," nor from cause to effect, but from effect to cause. "Life" does not come from the law, it does not, was not designed to justify, it is not against the promise, but has another purpose afterwards set forth.—R.]—Verily.—ὅντως = in fact, and not merely according to the fancy of the Judaizers, as is now the case, the hypothesis being denied.—Righteousness.—δικαιοσύνη is of course not immediately identical with "the inheritance," but it is an essential element of it, and the one treated of throughout the Epistle, which to be attained by faith.

Ver. 22. But on the contrary, the Scripture shut up all under sin.—Συγκλείειν is the strengthened κλείειν, to shut up, (not to shut together): then more tropically with εἰς to deliver up as a prisoner to some one; and generally, to give up into the power of any one, to deliver over. Ὅτι in this verse and the next one expresses this state of subjection still more strongly. Ἡ γραφή: the Scripture, generally, the written word of God; not the law. τὰ πάντα: the collective whole—all men;* as a fact, doubtless including Gentiles as well as Jews; although, as the context shows, the immediate reference is only to those who have the law, and of whom the Scripture speaks, that is, the Jews.—The sense of this somewhat peculiar expression is easily deduced from ver. 21. It is meant to explain, why the law (and generally, any law) could not make alive—impart spiritual life. "If the law had been able ζωοποιεῖν, then δικαιοσύνη would have proceeded from it; an impossible thing, for the Scripture has placed all under the power of sin," it was therefore not possible to fulfil the law and in this way to come to spiritual life; for the law certainly has not the power to destroy the dominion of sin, such a dominion as exists; it has not the power to break as it were the yoke of sin. But how far now can such a "shutting up under sin" be ascribed to the Scripture? Of course only in so far as it bears witness to this "being shut up." The sense therefore is: according to the testimony of the Scripture all are subjected under the power of sin—sin exercises a dominion, and that over all. This was the fault of men, but the active expression: the Scripture has done it, points nevertheless to an activity, which, it is true, could not have been exercised by the Scripture (for this, in itself, could only be a witness), but which yet was exercised by the Author of the Scripture, God. He has placed all under the dominion of sin (and that, as appears afterwards, with the design that the promise might be given by faith, etc.). But this, of course, He could only do for the punishment of men, on account of their "transgressions;" it is a punishment ordained of God, that sin should exercise a formal dominion over men.—The connection stated with the previous verse excludes an explanation which otherwise would have a good deal for it, especially because then a function would be ascribed immediately to the Scripture. The explanation is this: the Scripture has, by its declaration, its portrayal, as it were, shut up=subjected all men without leaving any escape or exception, to the sentence: Thou art a sinner! and therewith has also shut them up under the curse which sin brings.—Still less is it meant to be said that the Scripture constrains all to acknowledge that they are sinners. Nor is there any allusion here to the truth, that the law, instead of restraining sin, has promoted it. Unquestionably, however, we are warranted by what Paul elsewhere says of the law, to bring in this thought, not in order to explain the words, but in order to gain a clearer conception of the fact.

The purpose of this "shutting up all under sin" was, that "the promise" should not be given "by the law" but "by faith of Jesus Christ" and therefore that matters should proceed according to the "covenant" of God, that is, that the promised good should be given, in a certain sense attained, not by merit of works, but of free grace. (This was the purpose of God of course with the foreknowledge that this end, on account of the sinfulness of men, cannot be reached through the law.) But more specially this "shutting up under sin" had as its aim, that the promise might be given ἐκ πίστεως Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ. For the law was given until the seed should come to whom it had been promised: this shutting up all under sin in consequence of which the law could not make alive, had therefore as its aim, that the promise should be given "by faith" on this Seed, that is, this Seed is Himself first made partaker of the promised good, since, according to ver. 16, the promises were given also to Him, and to others only through Him. Therefore also the duplicate expression by faith of Jesus Christ—to them that believe.—It no longer concerns the writer merely to show that the promise is given "by faith" or "to them that believe," agreeably to its original nature, and therefore really "of promise," or of grace. This has already been established in vers. 17, 18, but now, after the new epoch of the history of redemption, the epoch of law, is expressly called an adventitious [hinzugekommene] period, and the sinful condition of men having been made prominent, the discourse is directed more definitely to the point that the promise is given by faith on Jesus Christ, as the Redeemer, of grace therefore, but of grace ministered in this way. [It is perhaps best, with ELLICOTT and ALFORD, to take the genitive "of Jesus Christ" as both objective and subjective; the Object and the Giver of faith. St. Paul's opponents, as nominal Christians, might hold that the promise came to believers only, but he insists that it came not "by the law, but by faith of Jesus Christ." Hence there is no tautology (LIGHTFOOT)—R.]—"The promise:" here of course, in the objective sense, the object of promise. Taken generally this is—the inheritance; in a more special application that which is attainable for sinful men "by faith of Jesus Christ," is the "being justified," as is simply stated in ver. 24.—The promise, therefore, was to be given "by faith;" it was not possible "by the law" on account of sin: but before faith came, the law—and that on account of being shut up under sin—or more precisely, the peculiar position of men in respect to the law, was in its proper place, in order to open the way for the revelation of faith. This Paul says in ver. 23.

Ver. 23. But before faith came.—Neither here nor anywhere else [in N. T.] does πίστις mean the doctrina fidem postulans, the gospel, but subjective faith, which however is made objective. When men at the preaching of the gospel, believe on Christ, faith, which before was wanting, was now come, that is, it had entered, so to speak, the hearts of those who had become believers in Christ (MEYER).—We were kept in ward, shut up under the law.—"We"—the Christians from among the Jews. "Under the law" (ὑπὸ νόμον) is to be joined with "shut up" (συγκεκλ.), and this is then more closely characterized by "kept in ward" (ἐφρουρ.), which marks the transition to "unto the faith," etc. Paul then says first: We were "shut up under the law"—the law was the master to whose power, we were completely subjected, without any freedom of our own. And as such (shut up under the law), we were guarded, kept in ward (ἐφρουρούμεθα)—that we might not become free, in substance: we were held in subjection to the law. What now does this mean? Plainly it characterizes, briefly and strikingly, the nature of the law; it was a pressing yoke, a constraining power, to which men were subject. It was such by its continual holding up of commandments and prohibitions, and especially by what was connected therewith, the continual, terrifying denunciation of the curse in case of transgression in case of the non-fulfilment of the enjoined conditions. According to this, how can the condition of men under the law be more strikingly depicted than as a "being shut up under the law" [the perfect participle, which reading we retain, expressing this continued, permanent state.—R.], and because no manner of dispensation therefrom was bestowed in the whole epoch before faith was revealed as a συγκεκλ. φρουρεῖσθαι? [The meaning of ἐφρουρούμεθα is not "safely kept," but "kept in ward." We were shut up under the law and thus kept prisoners.—R.]

The purpose of this representation of the condition of law is no longer merely "to place in the light" still more clearly the great difference between the law and the covenant of promise in itself (as in vers. 19, 20), but it is now to be shown how the design of the law, in its deeper significance, nevertheless coincided with that of the covenant, how the former was preparatory to the perfecting of the latter. For "we were kept in ward, shut up under the law," says Paul, unto the faith which should afterwards be revealed. This is to be taken not merely as temporal, but also as telic—for faith—to the end that it might be possible for faith to be revealed, the same faith therefore, in reference to which it had just been said, that the Scripture shut up all under sin, in order that the promise might be given through it. The direct aim of the law, therefore, was the revelation of this faith, and through this we are made partakers of the promise; so absolutely untrue is it, that it stood in the way of the promise.—"Revealed:" for "so long as men had not yet believed on Christ, faith had not yet come into manifestation, it was still an element of life hidden in the counsel of God, which, as a historical manifestation, was unveiled, when the congregation of believers came into being."

MEYER. How far now was this being "kept in ward, shut up under the law" preparatory for faith, and pointing to it? This Paul does not state; we must fill out the statement for ourselves, which however is not difficult after the preceding remarks. The Scripture has shut up all under sin. But on the other hand these same were kept shut up under the law. What else was purposed thereby (since ζωοποιεῖν through it is already excluded), than to awaken and keep continually awake in the soul, the fearful consciousness of standing under the curse of the law (the curse comprehended in the law itself, against transgression of it, against sin), and by this very means, on the other hand, to ground more and more deeply in the soul the conviction of the impossibility of attaining to "righteousness" through this law. The first effect, the consciousness of deserving the curse is elsewhere (comp. ii. 19) designated by Paul as a "dying," and this operation of the law as a "killing." Comp. 2 Cor. iii. 6. In this way it led to the revelation of faith in men's hearts, as to the only way of escape yet possible, or, it led to the longing for a redemption from sin, and thus made men willing for faith on the Redeemer given by God in Christ. [This was the result, but the state "under the law" was still objectively real, whether this consciousness were awakened or not. ELLICOTT remarks on the unusual order, that it "seems intended to give prominence to μέλλουσιν, and to present more forcibly the contrast between former captivity and subsequent freedom." Comp. Rom. viii. 18.—R.]

Ver. 24. So that the law hath been.—"Ἵνα": an inference. The fact of this "being kept in ward," etc., "unto the faith which should afterwards be revealed" made the law our schoolmaster.—This name it deserves, and that for a twofold reason: 1. The παιδαγωγός* approaches his charge with commands and prohibitions, nay, sometimes with threats of punishment, and in general, with limitations of his freedom, and lays upon him in this respect a stringent yoke; there takes place a keeping in ward, shut up under him. This limitation of freedom, and in general this whole relation of subjection, is not however an end in itself, but has place only as a means to an end, serves a higher purpose, namely, that the pupil may be trained for mature age, and for the assuming of that higher grade, for which he is destined; "kept in ward, shut up" only "unto" that, which is afterwards to be revealed. And, according to ver. 23, the function of the law also had precisely this twofold aspect.—This goal that was set for attainment, the second point, was the main thing with the pedagogy of the law; this, therefore, is expressly stated in the added phrase (hath been our schoolmaster) εἰς Χριστόν, unto Christ.—This is unquestionably relic; this again is more precisely explained by that we might be justified by faith.—The goal was Christ=justification by faith in Him. Justification, which the law itself could not bring, because "shutting us up under sin," it was yet to open the way for, to conduct to; because it could not itself bring it, was yet to impel to the seeking and attaining of it "by faith."

Ver. 25. But after that faith is come, etc.—The law was preparatory to faith in Christ (and so far, indeed, in agreement with the covenant of promise), but for the very reason that it was preparatory, it had only a temporary validity, it ceased with the coming of that for the coming of which it was meant to prepare. Freedom from the law had the way prepared for it by the law itself, leading as it did to faith (how, see on ver. 23); but actual freedom came in only with faith. How?

Ver. 26 explains how (in connection with the aspect of the law as schoolmaster). By the fact that man through faith becomes a son of God. In this conception, however, we are not unduly to emphasize "son" as is commonly done, and to attribute to it the sense of free, son, come to majority, who therefore no longer stands, as a παῖς, under the παιδαγωγός. No doubt the "son of God" is also the one of full age, and therefore free; but Paul, instead of the bare notion of majority, substitutes at once a higher, theological idea, that of the Child of God. Whoever now stands to God in the relation of child, can no longer remain under the law, that schoolmaster, whose threats of the wrath of God awaken slavish fear.*—Ἰσχυρεῖς=all without distinction. This word is meant to emphasize strongly the power of faith. Whoever he be that has it, becomes a son of God and free from the schoolmaster, therefore you also are free. "You" writes Paul of set purpose, having before (ver. 25) spoken only of the Jewish Christians as those who had previously been under the schoolmaster. But now: You all, even the Gentile Christians, all you who are become believers,—that it might come into no one's mind, to place himself, of his own accord, under the schoolmaster, the law.—Paul says designedly in Christ Jesus instead of a gentive immediately depending on faith because he wishes to predicate of Christians that they are in Christ Jesus. For he proves that they are sons of God, from their putting on Christ, ver 27.

Ver. 27. The demonstrative force here appears to be simply in this, that Christ was God's Son (MEYER). WIESELER's objection that Son of God is not used in a similar sense to that in which υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ would be applied to Christ, because it is not used in the sense of a being begotten of God, is a strange one. Certainly that is not meant, but by this very putting on of Him who as begotten of God is God's Son, believers come into the relation of children to God, of course in the measure in which it is possible with them.—It is peculiar that Paul proves that all are the children of God through faith in Christ, immediately from the fact that they all have put on Christ by baptism, and so, without any intermediate step, puts Baptism in the place of Faith. Faith and Baptism, accordingly, are to him in a certain sense convertible ideas, that is, he does not conceive faith without baptism, or baptism without faith; he can therefore prove an effect of faith from an effect of baptism, and doubtless he speaks only to and of such as were not only baptized as well as believers, but with whom also the act of baptism was at the same time an act of faith.—The transition, however, from the "faith is Christ Jesus" to the baptized into Christ is easily intelligible in another view also. For nothing proves so clearly that any one has become a Son of God, as that he has put on Christ, and this takes place through the "being baptized into Christ" in a way that is also objective, and therefore undeniable.* On the other hand, his reference to baptism is of course only secondary; he does not as yet mention it in ver. 26, because, according to the connection he is there concerned directly with the effect of faith.

The full import of put on Christ is not developed, yet one thing at least is said, and that is primarily the most important—it involves the having become a son of God. It is not immediately—the putting on of "the new man." For the discussion here respects not the ethical quality of the act, but the relation to God involved in it; it is by justification and the relation of children to God given therewith and not by the subsequent sanctification, that we become free from the pedagogy of the law; the filial relation to God does not result from the putting on of the new man, but the reverse. On the other hand, in becoming a son of God, a man naturally has come into an inner relation to Christ, into communion with Him. This inner relation to Christ, in which we invest ourselves with Him, must then without fail lead to this result, that Christ becomes in us the principle of a new life, and we become inwardly transformed. This result is the more certain in that the entrance into relation with Him is so entirely real, through the act of baptism. One cannot enter into such inward relation with Christ without also experiencing this inward transformation, at least in its principle. The admonition Rom. xiii, 14: "Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ," may therefore be understood in the sense of an admonition to a corresponding ethical work—to a becoming like Him through our work.—All are children of God by faith (πάρτερες, ver. 26; ὁσοι, ver. 27). This Paul carries out in the concrete in ver. 28.

* [In ver. 25, the article is omitted before παιδαγωγόν, as if to imply, under any schoolmaster, unter Pädagogengewalt (MEYER). Still as MEYER himself suggests, the emphasis must be laid on θεοῦ, "sons of God;" therefore not in the old pedagogic bondage.—R.]

* [ALFORD says "Observe here how boldly and broadly St Paul asserts the effect of Baptism on all the baptized." WORDSWORTH also at some length presses the objective grace of this rite. But surely there is as much and more reason for pressing "by faith in Christ Jesus" (ver. 26). Clearly the primary truth is "ye are all sons of God by faith in Christ Jesus;" the thought of ver. 27 is secondary. Where there is baptism and no sonship by faith, the question is an open one, as far as this passage is concerned, whether there has been any such "effect of baptism." See DOCTRINAL NOTES, 3.—R.]

Ver. 28. There is neither Jew nor Greek.—All these natural antitheses do not come into account in this relation,—if one only believes on Christ, he is a son of God, let him be what else he may. This is tersely expressed at the end of the verse by for ye all are one in Christ Jesus.—For this, according to the connection, can mean nothing else than: these distinctions, in a certain sense, antagonisms, do not, as respects being in Christ, come into consideration. All who are in Christ Jesus, are in the same degree "sons of God," how different soever they may be in other relations, that is, they are all, (ἐν) one and the same. Paul, however, goes somewhat farther yet, and by using εἷς, says that they are capable of being regarded all together, as one (moral) person.—Here too, we are not to think, at least directly, of "the new man" as if the "one new man" were meant.—Why now precisely this concrete explication of the "all" in ver. 26? The connection shows that the Apostle's first concern is to represent the antagonism of Jews and Gentiles as done away in Christ; for by the law this antagonism especially was maintained, and was therefore removed by the falling away of the law. And, on the other hand, the abrogation of the law could not be maintained in full earnest unless that antagonism were regarded as removed. But in order to make this "all" more vivid, or to place in still stronger light the power and meaning of faith in Christ, he adjoins yet other antitheses, and remarks that they too, in the new relation, are no longer reckoned of account; the slave also is through "being in Christ" a "son of God" as well as the freeman, and it is the same with sex. In this also, he appears to have the law still in mind. For these antitheses were maintained by the law; at least the law spoke sometimes of slaves, sometimes of freemen, sometimes of men, sometimes of women, and gave in respect to one class, ordinances which were not in force for another, while in view of faith in Christ, or of baptism in Christ's name—these antitheses fell entirely away. [There is a slight change of construction in the last antithesis. "The alterable social distinctions are contrasted by οὐδέ, the unalterable natural one is expressed by καί. The latter distinction is specially applicable as against the Jews insisting on their own spiritual privileges, and on the perpetual obligation of circumcision."]—WORDSWORTH.

Of this there may be a hint in the use of υἱοί, "sons," not "children," as E. V. The other sex have now the same privilege once belonging to "sons" alone. "Ἀρσεν and θῆλυ, generalized by the neuter, as being the only gender which will express both" (ALFORD).—R.]

Ver. 29. But if ye be Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed.—Because Christ Himself is Abraham's seed (vers. 16, 19), and those that are His participate in His status.—Heirs according to the promise—for it was to Abraham and his seed that the promise was given, therefore—the promise goes then for you also into fulfilment. On the other hand it needs no proof that those who are Christ's (because they are heirs by virtue of this fact, that they are Christ's) are heirs in the way of the promise of grace, not of works.

[ELLCOTT: "The declaration of ver. 7, is now at length substantiated and expanded by twenty-two verses of the deepest, most varied, and most comprehensive reasoning that exists in the whole compass of the great Apostle's writings."—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The Law and the Covenant. Three points respecting the law are treated of in this section: a) the difference between the law and the covenant of promise; b) the inner relation of the law to the covenant as the means of preparation for the faith which receives the promised inheritance; c) the liberation from the law on the entrance of faith. Upon the first two points we have little more to say in addition to what has been already said in the EXEC. NOTES.

a. The difference between the Law and the Covenant of Promise. The law was not only given much later (ver. 17), but had also an entirely different character from the covenant of promise made with Abraham, and is not therefore to be regarded as a sort of renewal of that first covenant. The revelation of God to the patriarchs was essentially a different one from the subsequent one at the giving of the law on Sinai. In the first God gave pure, free promises of grace for faith; in the second He also, it is true, gave promises, but imposed as a condition of their fulfilment, the observance of a complex system of law. Or, primarily, the whole sinful people were placed under a constitution of law, and to this promises were attached, but only in the case of obedience; in the case of disobedience, there were threatenings, quite as distinct. To this corresponded the entirely different way in which the law was brought in—in the formal way of a compact concluded through a third party, a mediator, where both sides make engagements, and take on themselves obligations. By this was indicated a separation of God and His people, and it was therefore not the normal relation of God to His people, the one corresponding to the nature of God, but only a relation induced by the circumstances, especially by the transgressions of the people at the time; from the beginning, therefore, it pointed beyond itself, but was, no doubt, for a certain time the proper one, adapted to prepare for the relation of grace between God and His people that had been introduced by His dealings with the patriarchs.

b. The inner relation of the Law to the Covenant as the means of preparation for the faith which receives the promised inheritance. Respecting the second point we give here only the apt remarks of RIEGER (although his interpretation of ver. 22 is in itself incorrect): The attestation of God, written down and publicly promulgated in the law, has so taken hold of us and all our doing and leaving undone, that no denying, palliating, justifying of ourselves can any longer avail anything, but we must give ourselves up guilty and prisoners under the curse denounced against every transgression; and through this captivity under the law, become pliant and ready for faith on the promise, as afterwards for coming humbly to the cross of Christ preached in the gospel, and thus seizing the only way of escape left remaining to us. The law, then, by its confining me under sin, so far from having the will or power to close against me the access to grace, on the contrary drives me into a strait, in which I am most apt to find and lay hold on the only means of escape. Decluding hiding places of the caves of sin, it indeed closes; but the appointed fleeing to the wounds that have atoned for me it furthers, rather than hinders. In brief: the promise ratifies to man everything, the law comes between and denies him all. Thereupon it is thought, God is against Himself, that must be allowed; but at last it turns out, that the law itself has had to help to this end, namely, that faith and the promise should have the victory. Christ is the law's honor, end, and fulfilment.

c. The liberation from the Law on the entrance of faith. Christ is the law's honor, that is, what honors the law is precisely this, that it leads to Christ. But at the same time and on this very account is He the law's end and fulfilment. The end of the law, for this beyond question is the intention of the whole Epistle, to demonstrate that Christians are no longer under the law, and in ver. 25, this is expressly declared: now that faith is come, we are no longer under the schoolmaster; he has fulfilled his office.—This is, in the first instance, to be understood historically. With the coming of Christ the epoch of the law, when it exercised dominion, is past, and a new epoch has begun, that of faith on Christ. Hence, also, those who in this new epoch are added to the people of God, through faith in Christ, that is, the Gentiles, are no longer to be held subject to the law, as though faith were not sufficient for salvation.—But this is to be understood also more specially, in a subjective sense; the man who has attained to faith in Christ, is thereby no longer under the law, but may and ought to view himself as free therefrom, and to appropriate to himself the full consolation of God's grace, and to oppose it to all accusations of the law.

2. The Law has still its use, and must be preached among Christians. But if now from (c) it were inferred: The law then no longer concerns us, and ought not to be preached among Christians! this would be a false conclusion. A usus justificatorius, unquestionably, cannot be made of the law under any circumstances, and we must, with Paul, warn men against any such use; and to this extent the position of the Christian preacher, as respects the law, is a negative one. But such a usus, indeed, did not belong to the law in itself, according to its Divine intention (as Paul teaches us), even though it was actually so employed. What belonged to the law, was the usus pedagogicus, and that it has still, and so far it has a function even in this, the New Testament era. For although the epoch of the law as a historical preparation for redemption, ceased with the coming of Christ, and with that the epoch of faith began, yet in the individual the "coming of faith" is always at first inchoate, and in this respect it cannot be said that in the Christian era we simply admonish the soul to have faith in Christ, and lead it at once to the true source of justification. This may indeed take place, nor can it be disputed that there is such a thing as coming to faith in Christ at once. But its depth, its steadfastness, its true, full worth, this faith receives, now as ever, only through the service of the law. This must be held up before each man, and that distinctly and repeatedly, in order to bring him to the knowledge of his incapacity of fulfilling it, of the impossibility of attaining in this way to justification, and of the necessity of faith in Christ. Even the ceremonial part is applicable to this end, in order to make the value of its fulfilment in Christ the more plainly visible. Naturally, however, the specially ethical precepts come into the foreground. (That, in the application of the law within the Christian sphere, these latter, of the whole complex system of the "Mosaic law," are most prominently in mind, and that, therefore, when we speak of the law as still having a use at the present time, the word is not to be taken in its full sense, is, of course, easily understood.)—In this holding up of the law, in its usus pedagogicus, there is, it is true, only an analogon of what took place in the actual epoch of the law; for the subjection under the law is renewed, so to speak, only in an ideal way. At most, it may be said to him who will not be persuaded of the impossibility of being justified by works of law: then make trial of the law awhile! But on no one may the law be actually imposed, for the sake of having it do its work on him, to prepare him for faith; and no one ought to impose it on himself to this end. And as to the "bondage under law" of the Christian Church before the Reformation, we may, it is true, view in it a permissive Providence of God, and therefore something that was salutary, but we are bound to stigmatize the fact in itself as indicating an entire misconception of the true character of Christianity.—Yet, if the law is to have its usus pedagogicus, an actual subjection under the law must take place, namely, through the medium of the conscience. Only where this "law written in their hearts" exercises its function (but not where there is a mere agitation of feeling or conviction of the intellect), is it possible for a vitally active faith to come into existence. Only for conscientiæ perterrefacti do the consolations of the grace of the gospel in reality exist. And these exactions and threatenings of the law in the conscience are in turn essentially enlarged, more clearly defined and intensified by the positive law of God, so that in this sense it amounts to a complete "shutting up under the law." How long then this "keeping in word, shut up," etc., is to last, how soon faith is to be revealed, and justification to be brought in, is reserved to God's secret counsel, who in the history of His people alone knew when the time was fulfilled and who in the case of each soul also, alone knows it. To wish to continue "shut up under the law" would be perverse, for Christ is come, we must press through to Him, and in Him find consolation. But even when faith has been attained to, the temptation may come, to a retrogression "under the law," which must therefore be overcome with all appropriate means of strengthening faith. In this case then we are to take a decidedly negative position with respect to the law, turning from it, suffering it not to terrify us, nor to expel Christ, and set Moses again in His place. Comp. also, on the whole subject, the admirable observations of LUTHER below, in the Homiletical remarks. This no doubt is the usus, which the law even since Christ's coming has retained. But this use manifests Christ more than ever as the End of the law: the law is only meant to drive us to Him. But Christ is also the Fulfiller of the law. The question therefore arises, whether the law have not another usus also, for the Christian. Upon this see below, in the remarks upon chap. v. 15 sq.*

3. The significance and the blessing of Baptism. Upon the idea of the "sons of God" see DOCTRINAL NOTE 7, on the following Section. Those are "sons of God," who believe on Christ, the more certainly so because they have received Baptism, and therewith have been baptized "unto Christ." For therewith they have "put on Christ" = have come into Christ = into Christ's relation to God = into the relation of the sons of God. Two things are implied in this passage. (1) Baptism is only a "putting on Christ," because joined with faith, it is therefore to be considered as such only when this connection really exists. That is: whoever positively does not believe on Christ, of him it is true, even if he chance to have received baptism outwardly, that he has not put on Christ. (Indeed, his being baptized could hardly be called "baptized into Christ.") On this ground, however, our practice of infant baptism remains legitimate. In the case of those, who do not yet believe when they are baptized, only because they are not yet capable of believing, but in whom there is just as little unbelief, or perverted faith in any thing else; in the case of children, who are brought by their believing parents to baptism, nothing certainly hinders us from assuming that they in fact "put on Christ." Let us consider only what this means. Not, to become a new man (see above, in the EXEG. NOTES), but in the first instance only to enter into the relation of children to God. For children certainly are not yet "under the law," and are not placed under the law (and consequently slavish fear of the Divine wrath and curse is out of the question), but are consciously placed by their parents under the promise of God in Jesus Christ. And if any significance at all is to be attributed to the parental care in this behalf, it must be assumed that an actual transfer under the promise takes place, where no positive opposition can exist. They receive from God the adoption of children, although as yet they do not use or comprehend it, that is, God comes into the relation of a Father to them, and accepts them as His children "in Christ Jesus," although as yet, they know it not. From this possession in fact, to the conscious use of it, those baptized then make the transition in the measure in which they themselves apprehend in faith the promise of God in Christ, and the most efficacious means for promoting this conscious apprehension in faith, is precisely the translation in fact into this relation to God, that has already taken place in baptism. What therefore with the adult, come to self-consciousness, is one act, namely, the communication of the blessing and the consciousness of having it, the translation into the adoption of children and the use and enjoyment of the same, is, with the child, divided. The possession is assured to it, in order that from the very beginning of self-consciousness, it may feel itself already in possession of the good, and may so much the more certainly make use of the same.* And yet—more nearly regarded—the distinction is not even so great as this, for with the adult also, the possession in fact of the adoption of children (the "putting on Christ") and the consciousness and enjoyment of it—are two things by no means always coincident, but the latter is lacking only too often, from the weakness, nay, want of faith, that may intervene, and then the first concern always is to apprehend the promises of God afresh in faith, or more exactly, by recalling to mind that we possess them in fact, to quicken anew faith, that is, the consciousness of the possession. (2) But it is to be observed, that on the other hand also, the power of effecting the putting on of Christ, and of making one a child of God is ascribed to faith only because it is joined with the being "baptized into Christ," and therefore also, we may further conclude, can be ascribed only to it, when it is joined therewith. So then the candidate's longing after faith inheres, as it were, in his baptism, and finds first through this its realization, so the converse is true: Faith not without Baptism! i. e., not merely that baptism must be added to faith, to perfect and to seal it, &c., but although a beginning of faith, more, however, in the nature of an inquiry of the heart after the salvation in Christ, than any thing more definite must precede baptism,—faith itself comes to the certainty: I have salvation in Christ, that is, in fact, comes really to be faith, only upon the ground and in virtue of that acceptance of the individual on the part of God, and that giving of himself up to God, which takes place in the act of baptism. Only on the ground of baptism, therefore, does the actual putting on of Christ take place, and therewith the becoming a child of God. Unquestionably this is the blessing and the significance of baptism, that it would thus help us to faith, to certainty as to our personal state of grace in Christ, even though in special circumstances it is reserved to God to lead a man without baptism to the certainty of faith.

* This third use of the law, viz.: as a guide to duty, is denied by Schmoller in form, but not in fact. That we must have a guide to our new life is evident enough. The only dispute is, as to whether we shall call it a law or not. Paul certainly does so in v. 14, vi. 2. And when this New Testament guide to duty is compared with the ethical precepts of the Mosaic law, it is found to be nothing else than the Decalogue itself, as Christ interpreted it, and as it was from the first destined to be understood. Compare the position of the law in the third part of the HEIDELBERG CATECHISM, Of Thankfulness, especially Questions 90, 91, 115.—R.]

* [Although any wider discussion of the subject of infant baptism would be inappropriate in this place, yet it must be added that any consistent pædo-baptist view must admit as much as Schmoller maintains here. The practice, however cherished from "custom or superstition," must inevitably fall into disuse (where there is no law compelling it), unless parents and children are brought to look at it in this light. Undoubtedly to my mind, it were better that it should fall into disuse, than be a mere public naming of a child, without any such delightful reality in it, as is here held. Of its efficacy as a means for promoting "the conscious apprehension of the promise of God in Christ," in after years, instances are still occurring, despite the prominence of " spasmodic " over "educational" Christianity in these days.—R.]

[CALVIN's remarks on ver. 27, present the middle ground of the Reformed Confession: "It is customary with Paul to treat of the Sacraments in two points of view. When he is dealing with hypocrites, in whom the mere symbol awakens pride, he then proclaims loudly the emptiness and worthlessness of the outward symbol, and denounces in strong terms, their foolish confidence. In such cases he contemplates not the ordinance of God, but the corruption of wicked men. When, on the other hand, he addresses believers, who make a proper use of the symbols, he then views them in connection with the truth—which they represent. In this case he makes no boast of any false splendor as belonging to the sacraments, but calls our attention to the actual fact represented by the outward ceremony. Thus, agreeably to the Divine appointment, the truth comes to be associated with the symbols.—The sacraments retain undiminished their nature and force; they present both to good and to bad men, the grace of God. No falsehood attaches to the promises which they hold out of the grace of the Holy Spirit. Believers receive what is offered; and if wicked men, by rejecting it, render the offer unprofitable to themselves, their conduct cannot destroy the faithfulness of God, or the true meaning of the sacrament. With strict propriety, then, does Paul, in addressing believers, say, that when they were baptized, they 'put on Christ.' In this way, the symbol and the Divine operation are kept distinct, and yet the meaning of the sacraments is manifest; so that they cannot be regarded as empty and trivial exhibitions."—R.]

4. "Ye are all one in Christ Jesus." In this sentence there are two truths expressed, complimentary to each other, respecting the faith of Christians: a. All are one, that is, the natural differences, relative antitheses, which exist among men, place no limitations in the way of Christian faith. No one is hindered, by nationality or rank or sex, nor even by his religious belief, from becoming a Christian. Christianity is destined for absolutely all; as certainly as it is the specifically Divine, God-revealed religion; so on the other hand, this character of universality shows it to be the genuinely human religion, the religion destined for mankind as such.—Inasmuch as all can thus attain to faith in Christ, they can therewith, and this is the main thing, all attain also to the blessings contained therein, can all become God's children, all become heirs of the heavenly kingdom.—b. All, moreover, are also one in Christ. Inasmuch as the Christian faith embraces all, it also unites all, comprehends all in one great whole, and so first realizes in the full sense the idea of the unity of the human race, which by it is transformed into a great family of God. This it was meant to be, but is not of itself, not so much in consequence of the naturally established distinctions, as of the continual influence of (falsely uniting as well as) falsely sundering sin, to which so many false distinctions owe their first origin (as that of slaves and freemen), and which has given to those naturally existing a false tension, and turned them into sundering antagonisms.—This implies at the same time, that Christianity, while it unquestionably does away all artificially established distinctions, does not level down natural ones, grounded in the Divine order of creation (such as sex, age, and also nationality), although it will have them divested of all harshness and false exaggeration (comp. also ANACKER).

[The truth here set forth by the Apostle contains also the principle of true evangelical catholicity. As all are one, irrespective of the natural differences, relative antitheses, which previously existed; so all, who are "in Christ Jesus" are one, irrespective of the differences and antitheses, which remain after they become Christians. That through the influence of yet remaining sin, these antitheses become antagonisms, does not destroy the real unity, since all "in Christ Jesus" are at least tending towards assimilation to Him. This unity (or catholicity, as applied to the church) is something superior to external uniformity, whether of rite, order or mere theoretical creed. But, at the same time, it is something widely different from latitudinarianism. The latter has no positive basis, but this is the actual unity "in Christ Jesus," the real catholicity of those who are "one," not from outward constraint, or ecclesiastical regulations (however excellent), but from their position "in Christ Jesus," which necessarily involves oneness of life from Him, with Him and in Him. Such a catholicity will lead neither to attempts to unite the visible church by means of external uniformity, nor to less earnest holding fast to the truth as it is in Jesus. In the Catholic Church, as thus constituted, "neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision" (rites, polity, philosophic or speculative theology), "but a new creature." Gal. vi. 15.—R.]

Ver. 19. LUTHER:—Even as it does not make sense for a man to say: Money maketh no one righteous, therefore it is worth nothing, just as little does it profit to say: The law maketh no one righteous, therefore it is a useless thing. But a man should so acquaint himself with the matter, as to attribute to each particular thing its own functions, that suiteth and appertaineth thereto. [BUNYAN:—He that is dark as touching the scope, intents and nature of the law, is also dark as to the scope, nature and glory of the gospel.—R.]

LUTHER:—See here most evidently the evil consequence of transgressions. On account of these God was constrained to change His countenance towards His people, and could no longer simply give promises of grace. A separation had ensued, and a mediator must intervene, who yet could only throw a bridge over, but could not do away the schism; the people were placed under a law, that commanded, and promised also, it is true, and yet the promises could not receive their fulfilment.—Essentially this, even now, is always the result of transgressions. The law comes in, held up by the conscience, but this is only a mediator, which throws a bridge over, so that there is still a connection, but the separation cannot thus be taken away.—Yet as it was true of the people collectively, so is it true of the individual, that the law came indeed because of transgressions, but only until the seed should come. It is to find its end when it has done its work; is then to yield again to the Divine grace in Christ. Christ also it is true was called a Mediator, for He also was to unite that which was severed. But He has really united it, and not merely thrown over a bridge. For He received from God and brought to the people not merely the law, but came for the people's sin and transgression "with His offering of Himself, and so removed the separation." Whereas when Moses interceded upon the Mount for his sinful people, his office of mediator approached, indeed, to that of Christ; but after the intercession, although it preserved the people from destruction, he still came back to them with new tables of the law, and with the glory on his countenance which the people feared, and which he must therefore hide. Entirely different is the glory of the new Covenant.

Ver. 21. SPENER:—What God has ordained, is not at variance within itself, and therefore law and gospel are not at variance. Both agree together. But that we sometimes think they are contrary to one another, comes from our want of understanding. If we find therefore any two things in the Holy Scriptures that seem to contradict one another, we must yet believe otherwise concerning them, because both are spoken by God, and the defect is in us alone, that we cannot comprehend it.—[JOHN BROWN:—What a sad aptitude is there in our depraved nature to misapprehend the design of the gifts and works of God, and to pervert that to our destruction which was meant for our salvation, rendering such an exuberance of illustration necessary to prevent fatal mistake as to the purpose of "the law."—R.]

BERLENB. BIBLE:—The law cannot make living. It commands only: This shalt thou do, else thou art accursed. It does not give spiritual energies, but presupposes them. It cannot bring new Divine life into the dead heart of man. Therefore also it cannot justify. If it could do this, "then would be extolled and revealed to man, not God's grace, but rather men with their own power, merit, and work, which would be wholly opposite to the gospel, wherein God alone is recognized as righteous, but all men as false and powerless."

Ver. 22. The Scripture does not acknowledge in man the ability to help himself. It is the revelation of the general ruin, of the dominion of sin, over all men, showing how it began with the fall of the first man, and has extended itself over the whole. There follows from this the necessity of a redemption. This testimony of Scripture, still continued, should persuade us also, of the impossibility of attaining through works, that is, through our own strength, to justification, and of the necessity of entering, for that purpose, upon the way of faith. If the Scripture has shut up all under sin, it is an idle fancy, if thou thinkest thou canst nevertheless, in contradiction thereto, fulfil the law.—"That the promise," etc. Blessed purpose of the terrifying judgment: God would thereby only close up the false way, and therewith, as it were, procure Himself space for the redemption through Christ, and thus for the manifestation of His free grace agreeably to the covenant of promise.

Ver. 23. LUTHER:—The law is a prison, both bodily and spiritually. Bodily, it guards the ungodly outwardly, and restrains them so that they may not according to their will and pleasure practice all manner of villainy without fear. Then it shows us also spiritually our sin, terrifies and humbles us, in order that, when it has so terrified us, we may recognize our misery and perdition. And this is its true work or office, which it is appointed to discharge in us; yet so that it endure not forever.—The law with its custody is meant to serve our best good, namely, that when we are terrified thereby, grace and the forgiveness of sins may become to us so much the sweeter and more amiable, such as man can attain to by no works, but only through faith.—Whoever now is so well skilled, that in time of temptation he can bring together these two things, which are yet else of all things most opposite to one another, that is, whoever knows, when the law terrifies him most vehemently, that then the end of the law is at hand, and also the beginning of grace and faith, such a one knows rightly how to use the law. Know thou, that the law slays thee to this end, that thou mayest, through Christ, be made truly alive?—What has happened historically, at a certain point of time, since Christ has come, has done away the law, and brought freedom to light; the same happens day by day, spiritually, in every Christian man. For in such a one the matter is wont to take such a course, that now the time of law and the time of grace, ever one after the other, has room and place.—The law has its time, when it urges him, torments and plagues him, and brings him to feel his sin and acknowledge its greatness, to be afraid of death and God's judgment. And when it does this, it accomplishes its fitting and becoming work, which a Christian, while he yet lives in the flesh, feels more and oftener than he would fain feel it. But the time of grace is, when the faith, through the promise of Divine grace, is again helped up, so that it gains confidence through Christ towards God, and says: "Why then art thou cast down, O my soul, and why art thou disquieted in me?" Seest thou then nothing at all than merely law, sin, terror, mournfulness, despair, death, hell and the devil? Is there not also such a thing as grace, forgiveness of sins, righteousness, consolation, joy, peace, life, the kingdom of Heaven, God and Christ? We should with diligence learn to distinguish both manner of times, not with words only, but also in the heart, wherein they have their working. But this is above all things difficult. For although these two times, of law and grace, are widely different from each other, as concerns their unlike working, yet are they of all things most closely joined together, namely, in one heart. Yea, no one thing is to another so near as fear and faith, law and gospel, sin and grace. For so near are they to one another, that one consumes away and devours the other.—The law is abused, first, by all such as set their holiness in works, and indulge themselves in such dreams as that men can be made righteous by the law.—The law, secondly, is also abused by those that would set Christians wholly free therefrom, as the enthusiasts essayed to do, and who dream that Christian freedom is such a freedom as that every one, after his own pleasure and presumptuous mind, may do what he will.—The law is abused, thirdly, by those that are terrified thereby, and yet understand not, that such terror should not endure longer than until they reach Christ. These, through such abuse of the law finally fall into despair, even as hypocrites by their abuse of the law, become proud and presumptuous. On the contrary, one can never highly enough estimate and value, what a dear, precious, and excellent thing it is to have the law, when it is rightly used.—[Such wrong use of the law is made by those who, appointed to lead children to Christ, continually din in their ears such false doctrine, such old legalism, as this: “My child, be good, do thus and so, or God will not love you.” What wonder when parents and teachers make the first wrong use of the law above referred to, that the little ones, whom a better training would speedily bring to Jesus, waiting to receive them, make the third wrong use of the law, and are terrified by it. “Forbid them not” thus! Parents do not stand in the place of the law as a schoolmaster, but, as it were, in the place of God, the Father.—R.]

Ver. 24. [BURKITT:—Moses and the law is a rigid and severe schoolmaster, who by whips and threats requires an hard lesson of his scholars, whether able to learn it or not; but Christ and the gospel, is a mild and gentle teacher, who by sweet promises and good rewards, invite their scholars to duty, and guide and help them to do what of themselves they cannot do; by which means they love both their Master and their lesson, and rejoice when it is nearest to them to direct them in their studies.—R.]

LUTHER:—If the law is done away, we are never henceforth under its tyranny, but are under Christ, and live in all security and joy, through Him who now reigns in us mildly and graciously by His Spirit. Therefore, if we could rightly apprehend Christ, the dear Saviour, this severe and wrathful schoolmaster would not dare to touch a hair of our heads. From this it follows, that believers, as concerns the conscience, are by all means free from the law; on this account the schoolmaster [Zuchtmeister] should not rule therein, i. e., he should not affright, threaten, or take the conscience captive, and though he should undertake it, the conscience should not care for it, but should behold Christ on the cross, who through His death had freed us from the law and all its terrors. Nevertheless there is sin still remaining in the saints, whereby their conscience is accused and plagued. Yet Christ helps it up again through His daily, yea, continual drawing near. For like as Christ, when the time was fulfilled, came once upon earth, that He might redeem us from the insupportable burden and power of our schoolmaster, even so does He come every day, yea, every hour, to us spiritually, that we may grow and increase in faith and the knowledge of Him, and that the conscience may from day to day better and more certainly apprehend Him, and on the other hand, that the law of the flesh and of sin, the fear of death, and terror before God's wrath and judgment, and whatever else my unhappiness is, that the law is wont to bring with it, may continually grow weaker and weaker, and diminish more and more.

Ver. 26. [CALVIN:—It would not be enough to say that we are no longer children, unless it were added that we are freemen; for in slaves age makes no alteration. The fact of our being children of God proves our freedom.—R.]—In STARKE:—Even among God's children are many found that still are burdened with many weaknesses, as is witnessed by the example of the Galatians.

Ver. 27. LUTHER:—To put on Christ according to the gospel, means not, to put on the law and its righteousness, but means, by baptism to receive the unspeakable treasure, namely, forgiveness of sins, righteousness, peace, comfort, joy in the Holy Ghost, blessedness, life and Christ Himself with all that He is and has.—STAUKE:—The putting on of anything is such a union with that which we put on, that it becomes quite our own, that we therewith cover our nakedness, adorn ourselves, yea, it may even be, are superbly attired. Considering this matter, we may remember how our first parents, before their fall, needed no clothes to cover their nakedness, but after the fall sought them idly in fig-leaves, as an image of their own righteousness, in the place of which God made them other clothes of skins, as an image of the righteousness of Christ; for this is our beautiful garment, because it covers our nakedness, and protects us against the wrath of God, and adorns our soul.—O exceeding benefit, that we were baptized into the name of Jesus, even in our childhood! The remembrance of our baptism should be to us a continual assurance of participation in Christ and the kingdom of God; but not the less also give to us a continual impulse to all the faithfulness which the covenant of grace requires.—Believing Christians have in their daily putting on of apparel, especially when they put on new and clean garments, a beautiful figure, whereby they should bethink themselves, partly for comfort, of their legitimate nobility in Christ, partly of their bounded duty towards Him.

Ver. 28. [BURKITT:—Now since the coming of Christ there is no difference or discrimination between one nation and another, no regard to any national privilege, either of Jew or Gentile, no distinction of conditions either bond or free; or of sexes, either male or female; but circumcised or uncircumcised, we are all, one as good as another, in respect of outward privileges, or external advantages; but being sincere believers, we are all equally accepted of God in Christ. No external privilege or prerogative whatsoever, without faith in Christ, is any whit available to salvation; none are debarred from Christ, nor more nor better accepted with Him for any of these things.—R.]—LUTHER:—“For ye all are one in Christ Jesus.” These are great and admirable words. Before the world and according to the order of the law, there is a very great distinction of persons, which should be most diligently maintained. For if the wife in the family would be husband, the son father, the scholar master, the servant lord, the subject ruler, what would come of it all? Truly a wild confusion, so that no one could know which was which.* But because Christ's kingdom is not a kingdom of the law, but of grace, there is also no distinction of persons therein. The Christ whom St. Peter and St. Paul, together with all the saints, have had, even the same I, thou, and all believers, also have, the same have all baptized children also. Therefore a Christianly believing conscience knows nothing at all of the law, but looks alone upon Christ, through whom it comes to the unspeakable glory of being God's child.—LANGÉ:—If all men are one in Christ, as respects the Divine benefits or blessings of salvation, so no less do the rules of life given, and the duties inculcated by Christ, apply to all, so that no one may except himself.

VER. 29. STARKE:—The seed of Abraham is Christ with all His Christians, who cleave to Him in faith. He the Head, they as His members; He as the One through whom the blessing comes; they as His associates. Intimate and glorious union!

On vers. 15-22. (The Epistle for the 13th Sunday after Trinity.) HEUBNER:—The covenant of God with Abraham an everlasting covenant with the good. 1. Establishment, character of the same in itself: a) it is truly Divine, inviolable (ver. 15) and b) had reference as to its contents to all men and their redemption through Christ. 2. The continuance of the same even under the law (vers. 17-20): a) The law cannot abrogate the covenant of grace (vers. 17, 18). b) On the other hand the law is meant as a dispensation on account of sin to prepare the way for the perfect dispensation of the covenant (vers. 19, 20). 3. The perfecting of the same by Christianity: a) necessity of this covenant even according to the law (ver. 21), b) the condition of the same is faith in Christ (ver. 22).—The false and the right use of the law.—The dispensations of God for the salvation of men: Abraham, Moses, Christ. (The three stages of the economy of Salvation in their relation to each other.)—The unity of God with all the external difference of his revealed dispensations.—The one purpose of all the institutions of salvation.—Christ the consummation of all revelations.—GENZEN: Promise and law: (1) Both given by God, (2) have both one divine purpose.—WESTERMEIER: The testament of our God: (1) its excellence, (2) its irrevocableness.—JOH. CHR. STARR: The use of the gospel for our salvation: whoever uses the same aright, regards it as a Testament, a) to which he adds nothing, because it is God's Testament (vers. 15 sq.), b) as a testament confirmed by the death of Christ (ver. 17), c) as a free irrevocable gift of grace (vers. 18-20), d) in which alone righteousness and life are to be sought.—In LISCO: The purpose of the law: (1) what it is not, (2) what it is.—God's covenant of promise an unchangeable one—not abrogated by the law: (1) the law might not abrogate it, because it had long before been established (vers. 15-18); (2) could not abrogate it, because it could not replace it—could not help to justification (vers. 21, 22).

VERS. 23-29. (Epistle for New Year's Day.)* HEUBNER: The happiest entrance into the new year: (1) When we grow out of sin and the law's constraint and through faith become children of God (ver. 23). (2) When we begin a new life after Christ's example, and become united in love (vers. 27, 28). (3) When we keep in mind the hope of one day celebrating in Heaven the eternal year of jubilee.—The free, courageous mind with which the Christian enters upon the new year.—WESTERMEIER: The precious New-year's gifts out of God's word, which this epistle offers: (1) Golden freedom; (2) A high rank; (3) A beautiful garment; (4) Peace and unity; (5) The best hopes for the future.—In LISCO: At the entrance upon a new year how important for all believers is the certainty that we are God's children.—SCHAEZGER:—How happy our life in the new year will be, when it is a life in the new covenant! (1) What means it: to live in the new covenant? a) not to live without God; b) nor as in the old covenant—under the law; c) it means: life in the faith of the Son of God—in the adoption of God's children—in communion also with all the children of God. (2) Such a life is happy; for a) it takes from us what makes us wretched: love of the world and the servile mind; b) it gives us what makes us truly happy: the joyfulness of faith, the filial feeling, the blessing of Christian communion; c) it promises us eternal life.—The blessing of being children of God consists (1) in the inward fear; (2) in the brotherly union; (3) in the promised inheritance.

CONARD: We are God's children: (1) this ought to give us repose; (2) impel us to holiness; (3) fill us with blessed hope.—HARLESS: Freedom in Christ: (1) freedom out of Christ; (2) actual slavery out of Christ; (3) the law and freedom in Christ.

VERS. 19-29. How is the law related to the covenant of promise? (1) It is essentially distinct therefrom, vers. 19, 20; (2) yet it is not in conflict with it, for it does not aim to justify (vers. 21, 22); (3) it is on the other hand advantageous for it, vers. 23, 24; (4) it must however recede before it (vers. 25 sq.)—Christ, (1) the law's honor—this is the law's honor, that it points to Christ; (2) the law's end.—The law points to Christ, but also ends in Christ [1, historically, 2, ethically].—Justification before God (1) comes into effect not without the law, (2) yet not through the law. Or (1) only through faith in Christ, (2) yet not without the law.

[VERS. 27, 29.—CHRYSOSTOM (in TURNER):—Thus we say, with regard to friends, such a one has put on such a one, when we mean to describe great love and increasing harmony and union. For he who has clothed himself appears to be that with which he is clothed. Let Christ, therefore, always appear in us.—AUGUSTINE:—We having put on Christ are all Abraham's seed in Him, and we are Christ's members; we are one man in Him.—R.]

[VERS. 26-28. True freedom in Christ, hence true equality and true unity! How often are they sought by the world and even by the Church in some other way!—R.]

Of vers. 21-29 each one is suited to immediate homiletical application. Special suggestions are not needed.

e. In their condition of minority the sons of God were indeed held as servants—were under the law; but with the sending of the Son of God the time of majority, and therefore of the full position of sons and heirs, is come.

(CHAP. IV. 1-7.)

(The Epistle for the Sunday after Christmas.)

1 Now I say, That the heir, as long as he is a child, differeth nothing [in nothing]
2 from a servant, though he be lord of all; But is under tutors and governors [guardians and stewards]¹ until the time appointed of the father. Even so we, when we were children, were [or were kept]² in bondage under the elements [στοιχεῖα, rudiments]³ of the world: But when the fulness of the time was come [came], God sent forth his Son, made [born]⁴ of a woman, made [born] under the law, To redeem [That he might redeem]⁵ them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons. And because ye are sons,⁶ God hath [omit hath] sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your [our]⁷ hearts, crying, Abba, Father. Wherefore [So then, ὥστε] thou art no more a servant, but a son; and if a son, then an heir of God through Christ [heir through God]⁸.

² Ver. 3.—[Ἡμεῖν δεδουλωμένοι: the force of the perfect participle is more accurately expressed by "we were kept in bondage."—R.]

³ Ver. 3.—[Rudiments"] is preferable to "elements," as bringing out more distinctly the ethical meaning. See EXEG. NOTES.—R.]

⁵ Ver. 5.—[It seems more exact to indicate the repeated ἐνα by the same form of translation" (Ellicott).—R.]

⁶ Ver. 6.—[On the exact force of ὅτι κ. τ. λ., see EXEG. NOTES. "Sent forth" is the better rendering of the aorist.—R.]

⁷ Ver. 6.—[Elz. has ὑμῶν against preponderating authority. Altered to conform to the foregoing ἑστé. [Ἡμῶν, R.] A. B. C. D. F., adopted by the best editors.—R.]

⁸ Ver. 7.—The reading κληρονόμος δὲ αὐτοῦ θεοῦ is with good reason approved by Lachmann, Tischendorf, [Meyer, Ellicott, Alford, Lightfoot.] R. has it. "It is commended also by its comparative difficulty." The κληρονόμος θεοῦ διὰ Χριστοῦ of the Rec. has arisen from a wish to lighten the difficulty, and is founded on Rom. viii. 17. So also the simple θεοῦ. The reading κληρονόμος alone is without any authority. [Wordsworth alone, among many recent English editors, adopts the longer reading.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

This section depends on the proposition which Paul announced at the close of the preceding one, that Christians are no longer under the νόμος παιδαγωγός, because they are sons of God, and heirs. It distinguishes, with a reference to Israel, which was God's son, and yet was under the law, a twofold condition of the sons of God, the condition of minority, when they were still kept in bondage, and the condition of majority, when that bondage ceased, and therewith the proper position of sons first began.

Ver. 1. NOW I SAY, THAT THE HEIR, AS LONG AS HE IS A CHILD—"The heir"—the son, as the one who—by law and descent—is heir, even though he does not until afterwards come into possession of the property. He is lord of all—has the right thereto; nay, if the father is dead, he is actual possessor, only he cannot enjoy it, cannot assert his character as master, so long as he is under guardians as νήπιος, a child, [an infant, a minor. LIGHTFOOT: "The minor was legally in much the same position as the slave. He could perform no act, except through his legal representative. This responsible person, the guardian in the case of the minor, the master in case of the slave, who represents him to the state—was termed in Attic law κύριος. Prospectively, however, though not actually, the minor was κύριος πάντων, which the slave was not."—R.] The most natural reference is to a child placed under guardianship, whose father is dead, especially on account of the expression κύριος πάντων; and this is favored by the direct application to the son, of the term κληρονόμος, heir. Some interpreters, it is true, cite the expression: "until the time appointed of the father," as inconsistent with this, on the ground that the age of majority was legally determined; but this objection has too pedantic a character. [ALFORD: "The question, whether the father of the heir here is to be thought of as dead, or absent, or living and present, is in fact one of no importance; nor does it belong properly to the consideration of this passage. The fact is, the antitype breaks through the type, and disturbs it; as is the case wherever the idea of inheritance is spiritualized. The supposition in our text is, that a father has pre-ordained a time for his son and heir to come of age, and till that time, has subjected him to guardians and stewards. In the type, the reason might be absence, or decease, or even high office or intense occupation of the father; in the antitype, it is the Father's sovereign will; but the circumstances equally exist." So ELICOTT and LIGHTFOOT.—R.]

Ver. 2. Guardians and stewards.—Επίτροπος also usually signifies guardian. Here, as =he who counsels the ward, defends him, and directs him. It is distinguished from οἰκονόμος =agent, a steward of the estate. The twofold expression is meant to bring out more strongly the idea of dependence.—Until the time appointed of the father.—Προθεσμία: “tempus præstitutum, appointed term, only here in N. T., but frequently in the classics, Philo and Josephus.” MEYER. [Objection is made to the view that the definite time was appointed by the father (MEYER and others), since the term was fixed by statute in Roman law. Some suppose a reference to some exceptional legislation as respected the Galatians. But this difficulty arises only on the supposition that the father is conceived of as dead, which is but a supposition. Besides it is unnecessary, as implied above, to press the illustration.—R.]

Ver. 3. Even so we.—To be taken strictly=the Jewish Christians. They must be such as were “under the law” (ver. 5). [MEYER objects strongly to this limitation and with reason, urging 1) the sense of “rudiments of the world,” 2) that in ver. 5, where the first clause evidently refers to the Jewish Christians alone, the second, taking up ἡμεῖς again, as evidently refers to Christians generally, since ver. 6 addresses such, and 3) that οὕτως (ver. 7) and τότε (ver. 8), applied to the Galatians, refer back to the servile condition. ALFORD, ELLICOTT and others admit only a secondary reference to the Gentile Christians. This is perhaps sufficiently satisfactory, but the whole context seems to refer it to Jews and Gentiles alike (LIGHTFOOT).—R.] When we were children, νήπιιοι.—The pre-Christian state is regarded as a childhood in relation to the Christian state of the same persons, only the Christian state then is regarded as ripe age (the comparison is differently applied 1 Cor. xiii. 11; Eph. iv. 13). In childhood a state of bondage existed [the perfect indicating a continued state.—R.]; the external position was that of a servant, not that of the free son. For we were yet ὑπὸ τὰ στοιχεῖα τοῦ κόσμου, under the rudiments of the world.—For the different explanations which this difficult expression has received, see MEYER or WIESELER. According to my view the expression applies in any case only to Judaism, especially to the “law” (an Apostle Paul could not possibly comprehend Heathenism and Judaism under one idea, regarding them thus as virtually equivalent); and moreover στοιχεῖα, especially in view of iv. 9, is to be taken in any case in a spiritual sense=beginnings of religion, elementary wisdom; for only with that do the expressions ἀσθενῆ καὶ πτωχά, “weak and beggarly,” agree. [Στοιχεῖα, originally the letters of the alphabet, as being set in rows. The question here is, has it a physical or an ethical reference. The fathers adopted the former view. The latter: “elementary teaching,” is now generally received, and is supported by its simplicity, its accordance with the idea of “minor” running through the context, as well as by Col. ii. 8. See notes on that passage. Against the limitation to Judaism, see below.—R.]

individual subject, needing the Divine training, to which God, in its boyish age, lasting till the sending of Christ, gave the elementary instruction of the law” (WIESELER). It is true that the heathen world=this part of the κόσμος, had not these rudiments, but for that very reason does not here, where the object is the exposition of the Divine pedagogy, come into consideration. Or could “the world” be taken in a more specific sense, more fully characterizing the “rudiments” themselves=elements, which primarily belong only to the sphere of “the world,” of the visible, the external, and hence themselves having the like character, themselves external (comp. LUTHER), opposed to the higher stage, as pneumatic or heavenly? Comp. τὸ ἅγιον κοσμικόν, Heb. ix. 1 (WIESELER). [The first view seems preferable, but without the limitation to Judaism, which grows out of Schmoller’s view of “we.” For there was a Divine pedagogy in heathenism also, under which most of these to whom Paul wrote “were kept in bondage.” Lexically such a limitation is highly improbable. MEYER refers “world” to non-Christian humanity, and “the rudiments of the world” would then mean, not anti-Christian teachings, but the rudimentary training of non-Christian, ante-Christian humanity, including both Judaism and the strivings of heathenism, which may indeed have generally taken the form of external ceremonies, but which were alike propædæutic, the one containing besides an element absolutely good, absorbed in the gospel, the other, an element absolutely bad, antagonistic to the gospel. The Christian view of Ancient History, now generally received, strongly favors this interpretation. See CALVIN, MEYER, and comp. Col. ii. 8; also a thoughtful note of LIGHTFOOT, p. 170 sq., comparing the component parts of Judaism and heathenism.—R.]

Ver. 4, 5. But when the fulness of the time came, God sent forth his Son.—When the measure of time was full; and this was full when the time appointed by God had elapsed. The time is conceived as a measure. [LIGHTFOOT: “It was ‘the fulness of time.’” First: in reference to the giver. The moment had arrived which God had ordained from the beginning and foretold by His prophets for Messiah’s coming. This is implied in the comparison ‘the time appointed of the Father.’ Secondly: In reference to the recipient. The gospel was withheld until the world had arrived at mature age; law had worked out its educational purpose and now was superseded. This educational work had been twofold: 1. Negative: It was the purpose of all law, but especially of the Mosaic law, to deepen the conviction of sin and thus to show the inability of all existing systems to bring men near to God. This idea which is so prominent in the Epistle to the Romans appears in the context here, vers. 19, 21. 2. Positive: The comparison of the child implies more than a negative effect. A moral and spiritual expansion, which rendered the world more capable of apprehending the gospel than it would have been at an earlier age, must be assumed, corresponding to the growth of the individual; since otherwise the metaphor would be robbed of more than half its meaning.—The primary reference in all this is plainly to the Mosaic law; but the whole context shows that the Gentile converts of Galatia are also included, and that they too are regarded as having undergone an elementary discipline, up to a certain point analogous to that of the Jew."—R.]

Born of a woman.—Conveying no allusion to His miraculous conception, but simply an emphatic designation of the Incarnation, defining precisely "sent forth." The reality of the Incarnation is emphasized, in order, in the first place, to bring fully into view the humiliation which God imposed on His Son, and to make this contrast felt: He humbled Himself—we were exalted. But this humiliation did not consist in the Incarnation alone, it was only the beginning; its full expression is found in born under the law, and the contrast becomes thereby still stronger: He was brought under bondage—we, into freedom. Yet of course the object is not merely to make the contrast sensible, but "born of a woman" and "under the law" is mentioned, because it was the means of attaining the end which was to be attained, namely, that he might redeem, etc.—i. e., primarily and principally the being "born under the law" was this means, but this again was only possible through His really becoming man.—Γενόμενον ὑπὸ νόμου, probably simply=born under the law, not: brought under the law. The primary meaning of this is, in general, that by virtue of His Jewish birth, He, like every Israelite, was subordinated to the requirements of the law, and we are therefore to supplement "redeem them that were under the law" with ἐκ τοῦ νόμου, "from the law"—that He might make those subjected to the law free from the law—that He might free them from the state of subjection under it, from their obligation to it, from the "bondage" just mentioned. The sense of "redeem" is given by the simple addition: ἵνα τὴν νομοθεσίαν, κ. τ. λ.,=might translate us from the position of servants into the free position of sons. Primarily, only this is implied in the words, and the expression therefore is not immediately convertible with the narrower, more defined one in iii. 13; although, indeed, if we look for the causal nexus between Christ's being born under the law and His redeeming those under the law, we shall be led back to the thought expressed iii. 13, as the connecting one, namely, that the one who stood "under the law" became by this law "a curse"—bore also the curse of this law, and thus freed the men who stood under the curse of this law from this curse of the law, and therewith from the law altogether, from dependence on it, since in the place of that dependence there now naturally came a believing self-surrendering to the Liberator. This filling out the thought by a reference to the death of Christ, gives moreover to "born of woman" also, its full significance; for only through this was death itself possible, as only through the being "born under the law" was it possible as a death under the curse of the law.

That we might receive the adoption of sons.—Properly the position of sons [υἱοθεσία] as opposed to the position of servants. Even "under the law" they were in themselves υἱοί, but as yet differing in nothing from servants; through Christ they first attained also to the position of sons, differed from servants. Υιοθεσία here means then more exactly: the right of the free, major son. This may very well be designated simply as υιοθεσία, since sonship de facto really begins with it, the son thereby first becomes properly a son.—That a sonship relatively to God is here treated of, is made apparent by the connection. [Schmoller evidently refers "we," in this clause, to Jewish Christians alone; but the objections of MEYER and others to such a limitation (see on ver. 3), apply with great force here. That it breaks the force of the Apostle's argument, and destroys the connection of the whole passage, to restrict it thus, is evident from the explanation into which Schmoller is forced in his remarks on the succeeding verse. It may be allowed that, in the previous clause, "those under the law" refers to Jewish Christians alone, but a wider reference of "we" to all Christians must be insisted upon.—R.]

Ver. 6. And because ye are sons.—Remarkable is the abrupt transition into the address to the Galatians, whereas what preceded applied to the Jewish Christians; for these were "those under the law," while the Galatians were, at all events, predominantly Gentile Christians. But through the sending of the Son the Gentiles also were to obtain the sonship with God, and they did actually obtain it through faith in Him. He can therefore naturally say to Gentile Christians also: Ye are sons,—and can appeal to the witness of the Spirit concerning this, which they have in themselves. And the discussion had properly direct reference to the Gentile Christians, the Galatians, to their freedom from the law; the remarks ver. 1 sq., were only as it were episodically woven in [?], in order to explain the peculiar position of Israel under the law.—[Accepting the wider reference of "we" (ver. 6), we find here no "abrupt transition," but a change to the second person, in order to apply to the Galatians, what had been affirmed of all Christians. Of course this obviates the necessity of such an explanation of the connection, as Schmoller makes.—R.]—With this sentence Paul wishes to confirm to the Galatians, in a way indisputable to themselves, that they actually have the position of sons and no longer that of servants; they also (he says) have this, as well as the Jewish Christians, as certainly as the Spirit also utters His voice in them. The primary purpose of the sending of the Son, stopped with this υιοθεσία. That the purpose has been accomplished, is shown first in this, the Spirit's witness of adoption. Ver. 7 therefore contains the simple conclusion from ver. 6: Accordingly thou art, etc. [It is a question whether ὅτι should be rendered "because," quoniam, or "that," i. e., to show that ye are sons (ELLICOTT). Most commentators incline to the former view. ALFORD in his notes opposes MEYER, who adopted the latter view, which in his fourth edition, however, he characterizes as "harsh and unusual." Still the proof of sonship remains. He would not have sent the Spirit, if they had not been "sons."—R.]

God sent.—At the regeneration of each of the readers, or what may here be taken as identical, at their baptism. Yet naturally a continuous sending from that time forward, is not excluded but included. [The aorist is used as in

ver. 4, referring to a definite act. MEYER notes the similarity of form, as "a solemn expression of the objective (ver. 4) and subjective (ver. 5) certainty of salvation," and also as indicating doctrinally "the same personal relation of the Spirit, which God has sent from Himself as He did Christ."—R.]—Spirit of His Son.—A peculiar expression; not immediately convertible with the conception: spirit of sonship, but = the Spirit, which the Son of God has; plainly, moreover, which He has peculiarly as Son; hence, the Spirit, in which, with Him the consciousness of sonship relatively to God rests and expresses itself, and so = the Son of God's Spirit of sonship. God gives the very same Spirit into the hearts of those whom He has accepted as His sons for the sake of His Son Christ; and therewith they also attain to the consciousness of sons relatively to God, so that they cry: Abba, etc.—Crying.—This strong word, κραῖεν, doubtless expresses, first and chiefly, the assurance and the strength of the persuasion, the full undoubting faith of having in God our Father; also, however, as resulting from this, the fervor with which the soul turns to this Father, yet without direct reference to a condition of trouble, in which a call is made for help.—Abba, Father!—"It is simplest to suppose that the juxtaposition of the two equivalent expressions is meant to emphasize more strongly the idea of Father." WIESELER. MEYER with less probability thinks, that 'Abba' had become so settled and sacred a term, as an address to God in Christian prayer, that it had acquired the nature of a proper name, admitting thus the addition of the appellative ὁ πατήρ. The ancients found in it an intimation: quod idem Spiritus fidei sit Judeorum et gentium. [It seems best to regard this repetition as taken from a liturgical formula, which may have originated among the Hellenistic Jews, who retained the consecrated word "Abba," or among the Jews of Palestine, after they became acquainted with the Greek language. The latter theory best explains the expression as used Mark xiv. 36 (LIGHTFOOT). There may be a reason for retaining "Abba" in its affectionate character, "My Father" (ALFORD). And the repetition may contain the hint, which the Fathers, LUTHER, CALVIN and BENGEI find, of the union of Jew and Gentile in Christ. Certainly an advance from the "Abba" of childhood to the "Father" of maturity, on the part of the believer, is not implied, nor is there a reference "to the fact that a freedman might by addressing any one with the title Abba, prepare the way for adoption by him," since they are enabled thus to cry, "because ye are sons."—R.]

Ver. 7. So then thou art.—A progress in individualizing for a practical purpose; namely, to bring home fully to each one separately, what he possesses through Christ.—No more a servant.—This refers back to the being "in bondage under the rudiments of the world," and applies to the Jewish Christians in its full sense, and then to the Gentile Christians also, in this respect, that in consequence of the sending of the Son, the necessity of giving themselves up to be held in bondage "under the rudiments of the world" was done away for them also; that in Christ these have lost their force. [In the wider view of "we" (ver. 3) this explanation is unnecessary.—R.] In what special, still more wretched sense, they too were actually slaves, and so the state of servitude was abolished for them, appears immediately after in ver. 8.—But a son.—The contrast between "servant" and "son," as applied to the Jewish Christians, is limited to their being now in actual enjoyment of the son's privileges; as applied to Gentile Christians it is without restriction.—And if a son, then an heir through God.—"Through God" makes prominent that the one character, as well as the other, proceeds from grace, as opposed to all desert of works. Because a son (sc. of God), therefore according to the well-known hereditary right, also an heir, sc. of God. The controversy, whether Jewish or Roman right of inheritance is meant, may be called pedantic. Heir of God = to whom God's possession appertains, eternal life. [The briefer reading, διὰ θεοῦ, now generally adopted, is thus remarked upon by WINDISCHMANN: "It combines, on behalf of our race, the whole before-mentioned agency of the Blessed Trinity: the Father has sent the Son and the Spirit, the Son has freed us from the law, the Spirit has completed our sonship; and thus the redeemed are heirs through the Triune God Himself, not through the law, nor through fleshly descent."—R.]—This gives another basis for "heirs," iii. 29, and the train of argument thus reaches its conclusion.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The rudiments of the world. Respecting the characterizing of the law as "rudiments of the world," comp. the remark of LUTHER: Learn from this, when it concerns the business of justification before God, to speak of the law most contemptuously, following the Apostle. But when we are not treating of how a man may become acceptable and righteous before God, we are to reckon the law most highly and honorably, and with St. Paul, to call it holy, righteous, good, spiritual, and divine, as indeed it truly is.—St. Paul is alone among all the Apostles, in speaking so scornfully as it may appear, of the law. The other Apostles make it not their wont, so to speak. Therefore ought every one, who will study in the Christian theology, to take careful note of this diverse manner in St. Paul's writings. He has been called by our Lord Jesus Christ Himself His chosen vessel, and therefore also He gave him an elect mouth, and a diverse way of speaking above the other Apostles, so that he, as chosen vessel [Rüstzeug, lit. weapon], might most firmly and most faithfully found the citadel of the faith, even the article which teaches how a man must become righteous before God, and might teach the same most perspicuously, and most clearly,

2. Law and Old Testament. "Law is not synonymous with Old Testament, gospel with New Testament; as if we could say: The law has been abrogated by the gospel. Christ is the end of the law, therefore for us Christians the Old Testament has no more validity. It is not so, but the Old Testament as well as the New, contains gospel promise of grace, and the New as well as the Old contains law. Only that in the Old Testament the law, the schoolmaster unto Christ, prevails, the gospel, on the other hand, appears in the form of promise of the future salvation, and so is more veiled; but in the New Testament the gospel of the accomplished salvation strikes the key-note, and the law, as a threatening might, only opposes itself to the despisers of salvation, and is written in the hearts of believers. And since the gospel extends through the whole Holy Scripture of the Old and New Testament, every Christian must necessarily count the Old Testament also honorable and holy. It is true here also: What God hath joined together, let not man put asunder." ANACKER.

3. The fulness of the time. For a full historical demonstration of Christ's having come in the fulness of time, see e. g., ANACKER. [SCHAFF: History of the Apostolic Church, and History of the Christian Church, vol. I. "It was a great idea of Dionysius 'the little,' to date our era from the birth of the Saviour. Jesus Christ, the God-man, the prophet, priest, and king of mankind, is, in part, the centre and turning point not only of chronology, but of all history, and the key to all its mysteries. All history before His birth must be viewed as a preparation for His coming, and all history after His birth as a gradual diffusion of His spirit and establishment of His kingdom. He is 'the desire of all nations.' He appeared in the 'fulness of time,' when the process of preparation was finished, and the world's need of redemption fully disclosed."

"As Christianity is the reconciliation and union of God and man in and through Jesus Christ, the God-Man and Saviour, it must have been preceded by a two-fold process of preparation, an approach of God to man, and an approach of man to God.—In Judaism the true religion is prepared for man; in heathenism man is prepared for the true religion. There the divine substance is begotten; here the human form is moulded to receive it. Heathenism is the starry night, full of darkness and fear, but of mysterious presage also, and of anxious waiting for the dawn of day; Judaism, the dawn, full of the fresh hope and promise of the rising sun; both lose themselves in the sunlight of Christianity, and attest its claim to be the only true and the perfect religion for mankind."

"The way for Christianity was prepared on every side, positively and negatively, directly and indirectly, in theory and in practice, by truth and by error, by false belief and by unbelief—those hostile brothers, which yet cannot live apart—by Jewish religion, by Grecian culture, and by Roman conquest; by the vainly attempted amalgamation of Jewish and heathen thought, by the exposed impotence of natural civilization, philosophy, art and political power, by the decay of the old religions by the universal distraction and hopeless misery of the age, and by the yearnings of all earnest and noble souls for the unknown God. 'In the fulness of time,' when the fairest flowers of science and art had withered, and the world was on the verge of despair, the Virgin's Son was born to heal the infirmities of mankind. Christ entered a dying world as the author of a new and imperishable life."—R.]

4. God sent His Son, born of a woman. In these few words we have the sum of the second article [i. e., of the Augsburg Confession]: "Jesus Christ, true God, born of the Father in eternity, and also true man, born of the Virgin Mary." ANACKER.—If the preëxistence of the Son does not follow of necessity from the expression: God sent Him, it follows so much the more necessarily from the added clause: "Born of a woman," i. e., from the fact that this is predicated of the Son as something peculiar. Paul cannot have been thinking of a man, to whom the character of God's Son belonged only in some theocratic sense, who had been elevated to it by God: for why then the particularizing clause: born of a woman? It would be absolutely meaningless. It has a meaning only in the case of One, who in Himself was not one born of woman, who only became so, with whom this was something entirely peculiar. The peculiarity and noteworthy of the fact, also, that the Son of God was born under the law, depended, in reality, upon this, that in His original state He had not human nature.—The supernatural conception, it is true, is by no means implied in the expression: born of a woman, in itself, as if by this the concurrence of the man were to be excluded. But if we take this expression together with "God sent His Son," we are almost necessarily constrained to assume another than the ordinary origin through the generative activity of the man, an immediate activity, instead, of the God who purposed to send the Son.—The Divine Sonship of Christ is one belonging to Him in Himself, essential to His nature, so essential, that even by being born of a woman, and under the law, it was not nullified. It is on this account entirely different from our Divine sonship: this is an acquired, a mediated one; mediated through God's Son Christ.—On the other hand in this passage the true humanity of Christ is most distinctly declared. He did not bring His body from Heaven, and did not pass with it through Mary quasi per canalēm, nor did He merely assume a body like an angel. Either is excluded by the expression: born of a woman. And the tenor of the passage shows plainly that it is meant, not to declare His preëxistent being (this we can infer only by reasoning back), but precisely His true humanity, that God sent Him in such wise that He caused Him to be born and be manifested as man; it was precisely this which made it an actual sending, fulfilling the promise. But on the other hand this Man=God's Son; for if not, the purpose would in this way have failed in accomplishment, since it was no other than His Son that God would send.

5. Born under the Law. By this is made prominent not the legal obedience which Christ rendered, or anything performed by Him, but something to which He subjected Himself, the dependence on the law, in which He was placed—according to the whole connection: a δουλοῦσθαι (comp. τοὺς ὑπὸ νόμον), primarily dependence in general, and then as the culmination of it, the curse of the law, to which He subjected Himself. This passage therefore is no proof of the "active obedience of Christ," as it is termed. Christ, it is true, was in such a sense under the law that He observed it; He did not resist it; He was content with this dependence, and fulfilled the requirements of the law. But it is inappropriate to designate the obedience, which Christ indeed rendered in fullest measure towards His Father, as fulfilment of the law, and to designate the (active) fulfilment of the law as that which was great and meritorious in Christ. Christ's obedience was an essentially free obedience of a child towards the Father, and thus far surpassing a bare law-obedience.—On the other hand, the statement of doctrinal theology, which in many quarters causes scandal, that Christ was in Himself not subject to the law, is in itself not incorrect. Only we must then take law in the entirely definite Biblical sense. The γενέσθαι ὑπὸ νόμον which was added because of transgressions, was of course something in itself wholly inadequate to His sinless being, wholly obedient as it was to God; He stood, as concerned Himself, in the Son's relation to God, not in the servant's relation, was no minor, needed no παιδαγωγός. This γεν. ὑπὸ νόμον, therefore, was something in itself foreign to Him, imposed upon Him, and undertaken by Him, for the definite purpose of the redemption of those under the law. But He was the first one "under the law" who yet was sinless, obedient to God, and this availed to the good of the men who were under the law.

6. Adoption and the consciousness of it. From the attainment of the filial relation to God [Gottes-Kindschaft] Paul distinguishes again the certainty of the same, so to speak, the conscious exercise of the privilege of children. Agreeably to this he distinguishes a twofold sending: the sending of the Son into the world and the sending of the Spirit of the Son into human hearts. On the first is grounded the attainment of the adoption of God's children, inasmuch as the sending of the Son led to the ransoming of those under the law. This is the objective side. Yet this hardly denotes merely the redemptive act of Christ, but includes doubtless, even at this point, faith in this act, as without this faith there is not an actual adoption, a being a son (comp. ὅτι δέ ἐστε υἱοί). But to this is yet added the sending of the Spirit of the Son into the hearts of the redeemed, or more specifically: His crying Abba in the heart. Primarily this serves for the sealing and making sure of the now established filial right (comp. Rom. viii. 16). Yet it is not bare assurance that is wanted, but the exercise, the use of the right; and this first becomes possible by receiving the Spirit of Sonship, exclaiming Abba. "Should we wish to do it of our own desire and folly (namely, use such an heartily filial address to God), the word would die upon our lips; for we cannot make God our Father, only He Himself can do it." It is this Spirit of adoption Himself, says Paul here, that cries Abba in us, of course, by uniting Himself with the spirit of the suppliant, and forming in it the language of filial address to God. Therefore Rom. viii. 15: We cry Abba by this Spirit.

Paul distinguishes, as has been said, two stages, but yet plainly not in such a sense as if the first were something complete within itself, and the second added to it, as something distinct, but whoever is "son" receives eo ipso this Spirit, and if he did not receive it, the Apostle would not predicate the being a son of him. The receiving of this Spirit is for him, and is meant to be for the readers (on which account he alludes to it), the criterion of having become a "son of God." He cannot conceive the being a son without this Spirit in the heart exclaiming Abba. Therefore he affirms it at once and in reference to all: "Because ye are sons, God sent forth," etc. The same faith which translates us into the position of children, opens also the access to this Spirit. Yet of course this receiving of the Spirit of sons or children, is again somewhat successive, and Paul does not mean to say that this crying Abba takes place always with uniform strength and joyfulness; he will not deny that there come times of spiritual conflict; he only expresses what is normal.

7. Son, not servant. The idea of Divine sonship is a twofold idea, for the υἱὸς θεοῦ is first (υἱὸς θεοῦ) and then υἱὸς (θεοῦ). In Rom. viii. 14 sq., the previous context shows the former to be the main idea, for "being a son of God" is opposed to living "after the flesh," and is defined by "led by the Spirit of God." In this passage the essential idea is the second one: the Son of God is son and no longer servant (with which we may also supply "of God"), or the filial relation of the Christian to God, as it is brought into effect by Christ, involves the idea of religious maturity. The Christian has through his faith come religiously to majority; he no longer stands to God in the relation of the minor son, still kept in bondage. This latter relation of man to God is also one in itself possible and relatively admissible. God Himself placed man in it by the law (ver. 3); Israel itself stood by God's appointment in the relation to God of religious minority, was as yet "kept in bondage under the rudiments of the world." This was at that time what was fitting and wholesome for the people of God. (And in a certain sense the man who as yet knows nothing of Christ, is, even now, in this relation to God, is the unfreed minor, kept in by legal restraints, at least by the inward law of the conscience. It is true this law is a far more imperfect one than the positive law of God. Therefore the natural man without Christ is far more a δοῦλος than Israel was—a δοῦλος rather to the σάρξ or the φύσει μὴ ὄντες θεοί than to God; and there is needed at first a special activity directed to the awakening of the conscience. See below.) It is otherwise with the Christian; he has gained through faith in Christ, or rather through the Spirit of Christ, the position towards God of the free major son: this position, because established through Christ, has its direct analogy in the relation of Christ to His Father. It is true there is in this no independent dignity [Selbsteherrlichkeit]; but it is not so much that this is forbidden him, as that he himself is the farthest possible from wishing it, recognizing in it, as he does, an illusive image, knowing that thereby he would in truth lose his freedom, that true freedom consists in this very obedience of love towards God, in speaking nothing else than what He teaches, in doing nothing else than what He points out. Thus, although not living to himself, he is yet truly free, even towards God, as one of full age; is, sui juris, independent. For his conduct is not prescribed to him in legal injunctions, regulating even the outward life, and seeking in this way to conform the inner life to God's will; he recognizes the "living to God" as his very element, the condition of his happiness. His obedience is not merely an obedience of law towards a ruler, but a life in trustful love to Him who is recognized as Father and sealed through the Spirit.

But especially does the maturity of the Christian consist in this, that he is heir, in possession of the paternal estate. For thus the minor is distinguished from the major son; for the former the inheritance is as yet administered by others, and he himself is not yet in enjoyment of it, but only, it may be, from time to time, receives out of it what is necessary for him, and on the other hand, may, on occasion, be kept in straits, or even subjected to punishment. So with man under the law; as he first sees in God One who commands and strictly regulates life, so also he sees in Him one who bestows good only according to desert, and who just as certainly, where punishment is deserved (as is more often the case), inflicts punishment, and instead of a blessing communicates a curse. It is otherwise with the son of full age and with the Christian. He is heir, is in possession and enjoyment of the paternal estate. This actual enjoyment of the inheritance he possesses in the first instance in justification and the state of grace connected therewith. As the major son freely disposes of the paternal estate, so also the Christian, in faith freely applies himself, as it were, when he will and as oft as he will, to his Father's treasure, and takes from it whatever he desires. Only this possession and enjoyment of his is, as it were, still embarrassed by the "sufferings of this present time," and the glory of the inheritance is still "to be revealed" (Rom. viii. 17, 18), as indeed the major son also, who has come into possession of the paternal estate, has still to struggle with many inconveniences, and so cannot as yet give himself up to the undisturbed enjoyment of his estate, and yet is none the less the free son, of full age, and by no means any longer in his minority. From this the simple inference is: (1) That as the Christian may not deprive himself of his position as Christian, if he would not incur the reproach in ver. 9, so also he may not be robbed of this rank or denied it, he may not be again placed under guardianship, and thus reduced from one of full age to a minor again, that therefore in particular the law may not be again imposed upon him, and his relation to God represented as conditioned by that; (2) that a Christian church, which does not regard her members as mature children of God, and train them to be such, but which instead retains them under the guardianship of the Divine law, or, more than that, of self-devised human ordinances, and accords to them only such a share in the benefits of Divine grace as suits her own discretion, if indeed, she does not wholly conceal them and set an inheritance invented by herself in their place—that such a Christian church misapprehends her most essential character (for Christ was no new lawgiver), and that therefore the Romish church, which does this, incurs this reproach, and that the evangelical church would incur the like reproach, so far as she imitated her in this, in a supposed pedagogic interest, or for the sake of discipline and order.* She has simply to be God's almoner by offering the means of grace which excite and strengthen faith, as the condition of adoption as God's children, and what she ordains can lawfully have no other end than directly or indirectly to further such beneficence. True, individually as well as historically, the state of maturity, in the child of God, is preceded by that of immaturity; for just so certainly as a Christian is in the former state, just so certainly is he there no otherwise than through actual heart-faith. But the true way, that agreeable to the Divine order in such a case, is (according to remarks on the foregoing section) to hold up the law for this end and this only, that the man's conscience and with it the knowledge of sin may be awakened, that the law may prove itself in him also "a schoolmaster unto Christ." Now this comes to pass only through the preaching of the word of God in its completeness, inasmuch as thereby the law also is set forth, but now, of course, only with the intention of leading to the Gospel and therewith to the condition of spiritual maturity.

8. Old Testament believers not of full age.—As respects Christians the believers of the old covenant were accordingly not yet in the full sense "sons of God," i. e., "major sons." "But how were then the holy prophets, the great heroes, the upright men of God, who lived from Moses until Christ, minor children, that must be kept under the figurative rudiments of divine instruction as under tutors and governors? Doubtless in a certain sense they were. It is true that in much they have surpassed us; but what was spiritual, heavenly, eternally permanent in the kingdom of God, what Paul ever calls 'a mystery,' was not revealed to them so plainly as to us" (Roos). In order to judge correctly, we must however, with the Apostle himself, distinguish the period before the law from that under the law. For example, the patriarchs, although in another respect also children, stood in immediate intercourse with God, were not in the position of servants. On the other hand there certainly was also in the believers under the law, in proportion as the promise of the new covenant was living in them, e. g., in the prophets, an anticipation, in a certain sense, of the position of major sons of God, although rather in some single moments of elevation.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

VER. 2. STARKE:—Human ordinances, which are directed to the well-being of the commonwealth, are in themselves in no wise contrary to the Divine law.—When the Prince of Wales in his childhood once refused obedience to his governor, appealing to his dignity as heir to the throne, Prince Albert brought the Bible, read him this passage, and chastised him.

VER. 3. HEUBNER:—The human race has had authorized and unauthorized guardians. Moses was authorized, for God had appointed him, on the other hand the Pope and Mohammed without authority have endeavored to bring back the race, now free and of full age, to minority again. The authority of revelation does not retain us in minority; for the faith which it requires is no blind second-hand piety, but first makes us truly free from all that darkens and binds.—SPENER:—God has His wise distribution of the measure of grace at various times, with which we must be content and learn to accommodate ourselves thereto. He has also His holy order, according to which He leads His children in conversion from the law into grace.—BERLENBER. BIBLE:—This guardianship was designed only for minors; hence it is all wrong when Christians allow themselves to be brought into bondage again under ordinances, which are urged upon souls as good and necessary to salvation, and made a burden, beyond and without God's Word and revealed will, which therefore proceed not from nor are approved of Christ and His Spirit. O how many, that otherwise have a good degree of knowledge and personal piety, are in a pitiable bondage under such things! Either they are things which are counted as belonging to outward worship, or which should otherwise serve to make people pious. Now it is not indeed to be denied that some incitements in themselves innocent may help beginners somewhat. But so soon however as a rule and necessity, or it may be even a holiness, is made out of it, it is a yoke. But the main cause why such ordinances of men are a slavery of souls is, because men commonly therein seek and exalt themselves. Our crafty nature seeks with its tricks to maintain itself in its false life, and conceals itself behind outward observances and human usages. Meanwhile it secretly carries on its sins, as before, and will not drown and die in the death of Christ.—It is enough to suffer that other hard yoke, which presses the man at his first conversion. The law of God itself knows how to press him hard enough then, with its righteous judgments and requirements. Matters go laboriously and wretchedly enough with a young believer.

* [There is doubtless a polemical reference in these statements of Schmoller, of no special interest to the American reader. It need only be suggested that Lutheran antinomism sometimes seems (but only seems, it may be conceded) to verge on antinomianism.—K.]

Vers. 4, 5. For this fulness of the time the fathers and all believers in the Old Testament waited with great pangs and earnestness. Not less longingly then, even now, must he wait and look for this Deliverer, who feels his imprisonment. For the fulness of the time, which began with Jesus' birth, continues ever from then on through all times, our own times among them.—As this took place as to the outward work, so does it now come to pass as to the inward, since the revelation of the Son breaks forth at the time which the Lord has decreed, and His government takes the upper hand in order to bring matters to that stage, to which under the drawing of the Father they could not attain. If thou therefore spyest in thyself a mighty drawing towards faith and hungering after Jesus, take heed that thou neglect it not. For this is even the fulness of thy time, when thy Saviour is about to be sent into thy heart by the Father. In the same hour learn thou to watch and pray, and to forget all else, that thou mayst win thy freedom.

LUTHER:—Hear thou, O law, thou hast no right nor might over me; therefore I concern myself nothing, that thou accusest and condemnaest me long and much; for I believe on Jesus Christ, God's Son, whom God the Father hath sent into this world, that He might redeem us poor, wretched sinners, who were in bondage under the law's constraint and tyranny.—Christ hath redeemed us, in that He was made under the law. When He came, He found all of us together guarded and shut up under the law. What did He then? Because He is God's Son and Lord over the law, the law hath no right nor power over Him, nor can it accuse Him. Now, although He was not under the law, yea, was its Lord, He nevertheless willingly subjected Himself to the law. Christ incurred no debt to the law, yet did the law nevertheless behave itself towards this innocent, holy One, &c., even so as towards us, yea, it raged much more and more cruelly against Him than it is wont to do against us men. For it accused Him as if He were the very worst blasphemer and mover of sedition, and pronounced that He was guilty of all the sins of the whole world, and finally it condemned Him by its sentence to death, and moreover to the most shameful of all deaths on the cross.—Because now the law has dealt so cruelly against its God, Christ now appears against the law, and speaks on this wise: Good mistress Law, you are indeed a mighty invincible empress and tyrant over the whole race of man, and have moreover a right thereto; but what have I done to you, that you have so cruelly and contumeliously accused and condemned me the Innocent? Then must the law, because it can by no means answer for this, nor excuse itself, suffer for it in turn, and allow itself also to be condemned and strangled, so that it may therefore retain no right, nor power, not alone against Christ, whom it hath so injuriously assailed, but also against all who believe on Him.—So has Christ now through this His victory chased the law away out of our conscience in such manner that it can no more put us to shame before God. This one thing it does yet, it still continues to reveal sin to accuse and terrify us; but the conscience lays hold against it of these words of the apostle: Christ hath redeemed us from the law, maintains itself thereon by faith and comforts itself therewith. Yea, so proud and courageous moreover does it become in the Holy Ghost, that it dares bid defiance to the law, and say: I care little for all thy threatening. For the victory, which Christ hath won of thee, He hath bestowed upon us; therefore we are now become free of the law unto eternity, if so be we abide in Christ. Therefore let there be praise and thanks to our dear God, who hath given us such victory, through our Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

[VERS. 4, 5. ROBERT HALL:—(1) The mission of Jesus Christ, and the manner in which He manifested Himself. The Son of God, "made of a woman, made under the law." (2) The design of His mission; "to redeem them that were under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons." (3) The fitness of that season which God in His infinite wisdom appointed for this purpose.—It was a most favorable time to prevent imposture in matter of fact; an age the furthest removed from credulity, an age of skepticism. The Infinite wisdom saw fit to select this time to silence forever the vain babblings of philosophy, to "destroy the wisdom of the wise."—Because the fulness of the time was come, the event here referred to was the most important that had ever distinguished the annals of the world. The epoch will arrive when this world will be thought of as nothing, but as it has furnished a stage for the "manifestation of the Son of God."—[R.]

Ver. 6. LUTHER:—When we stand in the midst and deepest in the terrors of the law, when sin as it were thunders over us, death makes us tremble and quake, the devil roars most cruelly, then begins the Holy Ghost to cry: Abba, dear Father! And this, His cry, is much mightier than the law's, sin's, death's, and the devil's cry, let it sound ever so loud and hideously, it breaks and presses with all might through the clouds and the heavens, comes before God's ears, and is heard, &c.—Although I am on all sides in great terrors and distresses, and it seems as if I, Lord, were wholly and utterly forsaken by thee, yet am I nevertheless child, thou, Father, for Christ's sake. I am to thee dear and pleasant for the Beloved's sake. But for man in his heart to be able to utter the little word "Father" in time of temptation in true earnestness, there needs such a deep skill thereto, as truly neither Cicero, nor Demosthenes, nor any other accomplished orator has had; yea, should they even melt together all their skill in one heap it were not yet possible for them perfectly to utter forth what is meant by the Holy Ghost in the single word "Father" in believer's hearts.—We ought to let go the injurious, damned doctrine (where-with the pope hath defiled all Christendom), that man cannot be certain whether he is in grace before God, or not, and hold for certain that we have a gracious and compassionate God, who has in us a gracious complacency, cares for us as His dear children in earnest and most heartily—for Christ's sake; item, that we also have the Holy Ghost, which intercedes for us with crying and groanings unutterable.—In STARKE:—Behold the nature of ejaculatory prayers [Stossgebetelein], as they are called, wherein only the heart is lifted to God. In such a way can a believing soul very well pray without ceasing.—[BUNYAN:—O how great a task is it for a poor soul that comes, sensible of sin and the wrath of God, to say in faith but this one word, Father! The Spirit must be sent into the heart for this very thing; it being too great a work for any man to do knowingly and believingly without it.—That one word spoken in faith, is better than a thousand prayers in a formal, lukewarm way.—I myself have often found that when I can say but this word, Father, it doth me more good than when I call Him by any other Christian name.—R.]

Ver. 7. LUTHER:—Because Christ has redeemed us, that were under the law, there is no servant any more, nothing but children; therefore can thy power and tyranny, good mistress Law, have no place upon the lordly throne where my Lord Christ is to sit; therefore now I heed thee not, for I am free and a child, that is to be subjected to no servant's place.—The law may well rule and reign over the body and the old man; but the bridal bed, wherein Christ is to have His rest, it should leave unstained; that is, the law should leave the conscience at ease and undisturbed, for this is to reign alone with its bridegroom Christ, in the realm of freedom and of sonship.—"And if a son, then an heir." No one through his works or merit succeeds in becoming heir, but birth alone brings it to him; even so do we also come to the eternal, heavenly possessions, such as forgiveness of sins, righteousness, the glorious resurrection, and eternal life, not through our coöperation, but without any act of ours—we suffer them to be bestowed upon us, and receive them from God through Christ.—Whoever could believe without any doubt, that it were true, and certainly comprehend, how immeasurably great a thing it is, that one should be God's child and heir, such an one would without doubt take little account of the world, with all that therein is esteemed precious and honorable, such as human righteousness, wisdom, dominion, power, money, possessions, honor, pleasure, and the like; yea, all that in the world is honorable and glorious, would be to him loathsome and an abomination.—How great and glorious a bestowment the eternal kingdom and the heavenly inheritance is man's heart in this life can not understand, and still less express. We see in this life only the central point, but in the life to come, we shall see the whole infinite circle.

Vers. 1-7. There are two degrees of the adoption of God's children: the degree of minority, where one is rather servant than child, and the degree of majority, where one has the place of a child.—The bondage of the law the way to the full adoption of God's children.—The relation of the law and of the gospel to adoption with God.—The son, still a minor, must wait till God declares him of age; while the son of full age is not to abdicate the child's place, else he makes a retrogression displeasing to God. Without Christ, under age, through Christ, of full age.—When Christ came, came the time of majority for the people of God; when He comes to thee, it comes also for thee, not earlier—but then, really.—GLÖCKLER: The wisdom and love of God in the sending of His Son: Wisdom: He came, when the time was fulfilled: Love: He came to bring redemption, and the adoption of children.—The true intent, virtue, and fruit of the incarnation of the Son of God.—When the time is fulfilled, God will send also to thee His Son, and His Spirit into thy heart; only wait and doubt not!—Every time, even the longest, has its fulfillment, for it is subject to God, in the service of His purpose.—KAPFF: The blessedness of the adoption of God's children: It is (1) a condition of freedom, (2) of joyfulness in faith, (3) of heirship to God.—W. HOFACKER:—On the family or house of God, into which, to us as children, access stands open in Christ Jesus: 1) The house or the family of God: there is there a Father, God, a mother-free, unmerited grace, a first-born Brother; many brothers and sisters besides, and a ministering retinue in the holy angels. 2) The different relations in which we may stand to the household of God: a. there are some, and they are greatest in number, who stand in a far distant and alien relation to the family of God; b. a smaller, less considerable number stand to the family of God in a nearer, but yet not the nearest relation; c. the third class stands to it in the full, conscious relation of children, as Paul says, ver. 6. 3) The laborious [aufgabenreiche] and yet glorious condition of those, who walk as children of the house of God: a. the first task is, to learn more and more the true temper of children; b. the second, to show faithfulness and diligence in the daily work entrusted to them by the Lord; c. the third is, to wait in patience and hope for the promised inheritance.

—MÜHLHAUSER: The Abba cry: 1) a sign of being God's child; 2) but only possible through the Spirit of God.—Christ the Redeemer from the bondage of the law, 2) the redemption itself,

3) the consequence of this redemption.—HESSE: In what does sonship with God consist? 1) In the maturity of the spirit; 2) in the joyfulness of prayer; 3) in the certainty of salvation.—AHLFELD: Redemption through Jesus Christ. 1) From what has He redeemed us? From the law, from the constraint and from the curse of the law. 2) What does God offer us through our redemption? Sonship: the spirit of a child and the inheritance of a child.

C. Rebuke, passing over into Sorrowful Complaint.

CHAPTER IV. 8-18.

1. Interrupting the doctrinal exposition, Paul rebukes the incomprehensible backsliding into which they are falling.

(VERS. 8-11.)

8 Howbeit then, when ye knew not God, ye did service [were in bondage]¹ unto 9 them which by nature are no [not] gods.² But now, after that ye have known God, or rather are known [have been known]³ of God, how turn ye again [how is it that ye are turning again]⁴ to the weak and beggarly elements [rudiments], whereunto 10 ye desire again [again anew] to be in bondage? Ye observe [carefully] days, and 11 months, and times [seasons],⁵ and years. I am afraid of [respecting] you, lest I have bestowed upon you labor in vain.

2. In language agitated by sorrow, he complains of the equally ungrounded estrangement, they had suffered to grow up between him and them through the selfish intrigues of the false teachers.

(VERS. 12-18.)

12 Brethren, I beseech you, be [become]⁶ as I am; for I am [also have become] as 13 ye are: [.] ye have not injured me at all [ye injured me in nothing]: [yea] Ye know how through [that on account of]⁷ infirmity of the flesh I preached the gospel 14 unto you at the first [the first time]. And my [your]⁸ temptation which was in my flesh ye despised not, nor rejected; [.] but received me as an angel of God, 15 even as Christ Jesus. Where is then [or What then was]⁹ the blessedness ye spake of? for I bear you record, that, if it had been possible, ye would have plucked out 16 your own [omit own]¹⁰ eyes, and have given them to me. Am I therefore [So then, am I] become your enemy, because I tell you the truth [or by speaking to you the 17 truth]? They zealously affect you, but not well [They pay you court in no good way];¹¹ yea, they would exclude [desire to exclude] you,¹² that ye might affect 18 them [may pay them court]. But it is good to be zealously affected always in a good thing [to be courted in a good way at all times], and not only when I am present with you.

¹ Ver. 8.—[The idea of servitude rather than service is more accordant with the connection of thought.—R.]

² Ver. 8.—Lachmann, Tischendorf read τοῖς φύσει μὴ οὖσι θεοῖς, instead of τοῖς μὴ φύσει οὖσι θεοῖς. Rec. [The former reading is that of K. A. B. C, and modern editors generally.—R.]

³ Ver. 9.—[The tense here is the same as in the preceding clause, and the translation must conform.—R.]

⁴ Ver. 9.—[The construction is like ii. 14.—The rendering above given retains the force of the present: ye are in process of turning.—R.]

⁶ Ver. 13.—[This rendering of δεῖ ἀσθνεῖν may now be considered as established.—R.]

⁷ Ver. 14.—The reading τὸν πειρῶν ὑμῶν ἐν τῇ σαρκί μου is followed. So \aleph [A. B. D. \aleph , Tischendorf, Meyer, Bagge, Ellicott, Alford, Wordsworth, Lightfoot.—R.] Rec. reads τὸν πειρῶν μου τὸν ἐν τῇ σαρκί μου; its sense is: You have not despised my bodily temptation—me on account of my sickness, by which I was tempted of God. But MSS. authority is strongest for ὑμῶν. Evidently this was not understood, and the Receipta is a conjectural emendation, based on a false interpretation. Πειρασμὸν was understood as calamitas, as an infirmity in the body of Paul himself, because in ver. 13 this is spoken of; and so ὑμῶν had either to be entirely erased, or replaced by μου; and τὸν added to connect ἐν σαρκί μου with πειρασμὸν. On the sense of the approved reading, see EXEG. NOTES. [Schmoller follows Lachmann's punctuation, which puts a full stop after σαρκί μου, but this is objectionable, and not adopted by later editors. It is better to put a comma only after "rejected."—R.]

¹⁰ Ver. 17.—[On the alterations, vers. 17, 18, see EXEG. NOTES. Ellicott's translation has been adopted only in part.—R.]

¹¹ Ver. 17.—Ἡμᾶς [instead of ὑμᾶς.—R.] is an unnecessary conjecture [of Beza's].

¹² Ver. 18.—The reading ζηλοῦσθε is an unnecessary conjecture in all probability, though found in \aleph . B. [Rejected by all editors of importance. Meyer, Ellicott, Wordsworth, read τὸ ζηλοῦσθαι; Lachmann, Alford, Lightfoot omit the article. It probably disappeared with the incorrect reading of the verb in some MSS.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 8 Howbeit then, when ye knew not God.—This sounds as if it continued the doctrinal development, but it takes a practical turn in the very next verse. "Now no longer a servant," Paul had said,—but, he now continues, reverting to the former time, then were ye servants—when ye did not know God. Yet this is doubtless not merely a note of time, but a statement of the ground of the then existing bondage—is certainly as ye are now no longer servants, just so certainly was there a valid ground for your being formerly servants, when ye knew not God, namely, servants of idols. But comprehensible on this account as your earlier bondage was, equally incomprehensible is your present surrendering of yourselves into bondage again. For the "not knowing God" has ceased, hence with the cause, the effect also; they are, as already said, no longer δοῦλοι, and therefore a δουλεύειν in their case has no longer any justification whatever; their new bondage to the law is now as much without warrant as was their former bondage to idols.—Ye were in bondage to them which by nature are not gods.—This indicates more precisely the kind of bondage, in which the readers, as being Gentiles, formerly found themselves. From the fact that he so distinctly states of what kind their bondage was, it appears to be beyond doubt that he could not place them, as respected their pre-Christian state, in one category with the Jewish Christians as respected the pre-Christian state of these (ver. 3), nor comprehend them together under "those in bondage under the rudiments of the world." Their bondage was, it is true, also bondage, but nevertheless an essentially different, more wretched one: they were not "kept in bondage" sc. by God Himself for a while, from pedagogic reasons, under a law, but it was a bondage resulting from their not knowing God, and being servants, moreover, τοῖς φύσει μὴ οὖσι θεοῖς—to those gods, but are only so called; they are in fact according to Paul's teaching elsewhere, demons. [Undoubtedly there is a "bondage" here referred to somewhat different from that of ver. 3, but the distinction seems to be, that in addition to the pedagogic bondage, in which all were held, these Galatians, or heathen, were in even a worse condition. The sense of the two readings must be noticed; that of Rec., τοῖς μὴ φύσει οὖσι θεοῖς joins the negative μὴ with φύσει; not gods in reality, only thought to be so; but the better sustained order, τοῖς φύσει μὴ οὖσι θεοῖς joins the negative with οὖσι, asserting that they were not gods at all, did not exist; whether 1 Cor. x. 20 justifies us in supposing that the implied antithesis is demons, is very doubtful. MEYER and ELLICOTT remark that this is a subjective negation.—R.]

Ver. 9. Rather have been known of God.—A corrective climax, in order to give the following "how" still more emphasis. "This knowing on the part of God is of course not used of a theoretical knowing—for in that sense every one is an object of Divine knowledge—but of an affectionate, loving, interested knowledge; comp. 1 Cor. viii. 3; xiii. 12, and in the Hebrew יָדָע as frequently used. The aorist points to an act of God in the past, which was the act of adoption." WIESELER.—How is it that ye are turning again?—Πάλιν does not belong to "the rudiments" but to "turn" therefore not as if they had already before served the στοιχεῖα, but πάλιν only affirms that a second, new turning [Umwandlung] was taking place with them first from idols to God, now from God to "the rudiments of the world"—how turn you again—namely, to the στοιχεῖα?—In ἐπιστρέφετε, moreover, there is not of necessity implied the idea of turning back, but simply that of turning away; although in the expression: "Conversion from idols to God" the thought of an original apostasy from God lies at the foundation, yet it lay being rather in the background; and as ἐπιστρέφετε has in itself an entirely general signification, it could very well be applied, even in a case where there was no reference to a turning back; indeed there was scarcely another word to express this turning away, this striking into a particular course. [Schmoller, having adopted WIESELER's view of ver. 3, is of course, consistent in following out that interpretation here, but it is very evident that this interpretation is difficult to defend. Here, and especially in the final clause of the verse, there must be a departure from the more obvious meaning of the words, to admit the idea that they had not re-lapsed as well as lapsed by their apostasy. Πάλιν does not necessarily imply a turning back to the same things but to similar things, not retro but

iterum, i. e., not again to heathenism indeed, but to Judaism, both of which are included in "the rudiments of the world." So MEYER, ALFORD, ELLICOTT, LIGHTFOOT and others. The present tense (ἐπιστρέφετε) is used, for the change was still going on. Comp. i. 6 (LIGHTFOOT).—R.]—The rudiments are called weak, because they have not the power to atone for sinful man, and by communication of the Spirit to transform him inwardly, agreeably to what Paul says of the law, e.g. Gal. iii. 21; Rom. viii. 3; comp. also Heb. vii. 18. They are called beggarly on account of their relatively imperfect matter in comparison with the perfection and the riches of the gospel. WIESELER.—Whereunto ye desire again anew to be in bondage.—"Again" belongs to "serve," not as if they had already once served "the rudiments" but they have already served, they have been δοῦλοι; and now they wish to be so again, although servants of another lord, and thus they wish to begin the δοῦλειαν again ἀνωθεν, from the beginning, after it has scarcely as yet come to an end. [ELLICOTT'S statement is preferable: "They had been slaves to the rudiments in the form of heathenism; now they were desiring to enslave themselves again to the rudiments, and to commence them anew in the form of Judaism."—R.]

Ver. 10. Ye carefully observe.—Proof of the declaration first made: "Ye desire to be in bondage." [The punctuation is a matter of dispute. An interrogation mark is placed at the close of the verse by TISCHENDORF, LIGHTFOOT, and others, but ELLICOTT, WIESELER, and more lately MEYER and ALFORD (both of whom formerly made the verse interrogative) adopt a simple period. This suits the transition to ver. 11 much better.—R.] "Παρατηρεῖσθε: to observe carefully, not to celebrate, or else the objects would have been σάββατα, νεομηνίας, ἑορταί. The Apostle means to say, that they were not only given to the celebration, but, precisely like the Jews, were already scrupulous also as to the correct reckoning of time for their holy days. Days, with reference to the Sabbath; months, probably with reference to the new moons, not, because certain months, the seventh especially, were regarded as peculiarly holy months; seasons, within the year, with reference to the feasts; years with reference to the Sabbatical year, not the year of jubilee, which was no longer celebrated." WIESELER.—This passage shows how far and how far not, the Galatians had as yet been led astray. [Comp. Col. ii. 16. ALFORD is scarcely warranted in saying that this verse is at variance with any and every theory of the Christian Sabbath, since the reference is evidently to Jewish observances, Jewish days, etc. WIESELER supposes that they were then celebrating a Sabbatical year, because the present tense is used, but this is pressing it too far.—R.]

Ver. 11. I am afraid respecting you.—Not superfluously has Paul added the ὑμᾶς, but in the consciousness that it is not his own interest (as for instance his having labored fruitlessly, in itself regarded), but the readers' that his anxiety respects. MEYER.—Luther aptly says: Lacrimas Pauli hæc verba spirant [These words breathe the tears of Paul].

Ver. 12. Become as I.—The Apostle's re-

prehension of their conduct naturally prepares the way for the admonition to a change of this. Yet he does little more than briefly indicate the exhortation, without continuing it, but goes on rather to make mention, with painful emotion, of his personal relation to the readers, as it had been and as it had now become.—The sense of the briefly expressed admonition is not quite evident: but probably—become like me in freedom from Judaistic observance; the motive to this is then added: For I also have become as ye are, like you Gentiles, through my ἐθνικὸς ὥν, comp. ii. 14, and moreover the Apostle means, doubtless: when I brought you the gospel.—[Schmoller joins Brethren, I beseech you, with what follows, but the punctuation of the E. V. is better. The meaning of the first clause seems plain. In regard to the second, "two interpretations deserve to be considered: 1. 'For I was once in bondage as ye now are.' I once was a Jew, as ye now Judaize. 2. 'For I abandoned my legal ground of righteousness, I became a Gentile like you.' The latter sense is simpler grammatically, as it understands the same verb which occurs in the former clause, 'because,' not 'was.' It is also more in character with the intense personal feeling which pervades the passage. 'I gave up all those time-honored customs, all those dear associations of race, to become like you. I have lived as a Gentile that I might preach to you Gentiles. Will you then abandon me, when I have abandoned all for you?' This sense is well adapted both to the tender appeal 'Brethren, I beseech you,' and to the eager explanation which follows: 'Ye did me no wrong'" (LIGHTFOOT).—Ye injured me in nothing.—The emphasis does not rest on me, a mere enclitic in the Greek, as if implying that they had injured God and Christ. As the verb is aorist like those which follow, it seems best to refer this to that time of his first preaching. In that case the meaning "I have no personal grounds of complaint" (adopted by many from CURYSSON to LIGHTFOOT) is untenable. He begins with this clause to adduce their former treatment of him, as a reason for "becoming as he is." The next clause is not strictly adversative.—R.]

Ver. 13. Yea ye know that on account of infirmity of the flesh.—"The only correct, because the only grammatical explanation, is: On account of weakness of the flesh, so it appears from this, that Paul was necessitated, on his first journey through Galatia, to linger there, although properly it had not lain in his plan, and that he had during this compulsory sojourn preached the gospel to the Galatians. How and from what cause he was suffering, whether from natural sickness, or from injuries undergone for the gospel's sake, we do not know. Paul does not, by the mention of a previously unintended activity among the Galatians, work against his purpose, but rather right in the line of his purpose, since the love which received him so heartily and joyfully, must have been so much the greater, the less it was founded on the duty of a thankfulness owing for a benefit previously intended for the receivers, and for efforts made strictly on their account" (MEYER);—or rather, perhaps; "the less he, considering the impediment of his bodily condition. could expect such a reception" (WIESELER). That is, we suppose, because, through his infirmity he was in many ways impeded in his public labors, because his preaching of the gospel was a variously marred, imperfect one. He means to say then, that he preached in a state of bodily weakness. But the words themselves are not to be so translated. [WORDSWORTH: "On account of the infirmity in his flesh and the consequent temptation to his hearers, he was naturally led—perhaps he was guided by the Holy Spirit—to shun in the first instance the more civilized population, of Asia and Europe, as to go rather to the despised Galilees of the world, and then when his reputation was established, to proceed through Macedonia to Athens, and thence to Corinth and to Ephesus, and so finally to Rome." But this learned author can scarcely be warranted in making this the implication in πρότερον, as he does, in order to deny a second visit to Galatia.—R.] Πρότερον, apparently not—formerly, referring generally to time past viewed from the present; for the addition would then be entirely superfluous; but special—the first of two definite occasions. The second time of "preaching" is, however, not the present writing of the Epistle, for εὐαγγελίζω is invariably used of oral preaching; but there is a twofold presence of the Apostle among the Galatians presupposed, to the first of which the πρότερον refers. In fact, the book of Acts also mentions two visits of Paul in Galatia, Acts xvi. 6; xviii. 23. "Paul therefore adds τὸ πρότερον, in order to designate with full distinctness the first visit, during which he founded the churches. At his second visit, also, the joyful experiences which he had had τὸ πρότερον were not repeated; the churches were already infected with Judaism" (MEYER).

Ver. 14. With the reading πειρασμὸν ὑμῶν it appears best to set a period after ἐν τῇ σαρκί μου, and to connect the words with οἴδατε ver. 13—you know how you, through my bodily infirmity, and the hampering of my evangelical activity in consequence of it, were put on proof—experienced the temptation to think unfavorably of me. Unquestionably the connection is somewhat difficult. But plainly the connection with what follows is wholly inadmissible, although MEYER accepts it—you have not despised your trial in my flesh. But what is meant by despising the trial, &c.? Who could understand it at all? MEYER himself has to alter the expression somewhat, so as to mean: contemptuously repel. And besides what would be signified by the climatic expression with two words: ἐξουθενήσατε and ἐξέπνυσατε? This, however, manifestly constitutes the antithesis to the strong affirmative expression ἀλλ' ὡς ἄγγελον κ. τ. λ. The one as well as the other therefore refers to himself. He praises them in them, that they did not reject and even spit out him, as there was room to apprehend, but—the exact opposite—received him as an angel, nay, as Christ. [The reading ὑμῶν must be adopted, but this by no means compels us to follow the punctuation and connection just indicated. MEYER, ALFORD, ELLICOTT, WORDSWORTH, LIGHTFOOT and most editors reject Lachmann's punctuation, which makes the latter part of the verse intolerably harsh and abrupt, and does little to remove the difficulty of the former part. As WORDSWORTH intimates "the teacher's infirmity is the people's trial." Paul's infirmity, whatever it was, put them on trial, was the thing which tried them (πειρασμὸν ὑμῶν), and yet they did not despise and loathe him on account of this infirmity, but received him, etc.—R.]

Ver. 15. What was then [or where then is] the blessedness ye spoke of? [The E. V. gives a sufficiently correct paraphrase, if ποῦ be read.—R.] WIESELER:—How highly blessed you pronounced yourselves, sc. that you were able to hear me?—Τίς=how great. Ὁὖν comes in somewhat abruptly, but is explained by the emotional character of the style. Paul transfers himself vividly into the time when they received him with such veneration, and exclaims: How was it then, what a boasting of blessedness then arose?—With that agrees, as a proof, what follows: For I bear you record.—MEYER: Of what character then was your boasting of blessedness?—how inconstant? More far-fetched is the explanation: On what was your boasting of blessedness founded? Others supply ἔστι: What then is your boasting of blessedness?—it is nothing any longer; it is at an end, therefore somewhat in the sense of ποῦ. But the following γάρ does not agree with this.

That, if it had been possible, etc.—A proverbial mode of speech, derived from the high value and indispensableness of the eyes. Puerile is the explanation: Paul had an ophthalmia, and says here, that the Galatians, if it had been possible would have given him their sound eyes. [The E. V. "your own eyes," giving an emphasis, unwarranted by the Greek, favors this theory of "ophthalmia." It is well defended by Dr. BROWN, Horæ Subsecivæ, yet scarcely sustained by this passage.—R.]

Ver. 16. So then, am I become your enemy.—A sharp antithesis. The simplest sense: Since you were so minded towards me, can I be afterwards regarded as your enemy only because I tell you the truth (instead of speaking according to your fancy). The sentence is introduced somewhat abruptly, or the inference implied in ὥστε is not so very obvious. It may be explained, however, from the emotional character of the language. The emphasis lies on "tell the truth;" but in the first instance "enemy" (ἐχθρός), as constituting a contrast, must be made prominent; it therefore stands first, and by placing ἀληθεύων ὑμῖν at the end, this also is emphasized. The Apostle had already told the Galatians the truth, rebuking their errors and short-comings, before the writing of his Epistle (for this they had not seen as yet), at a second visit in person among them. [The present form of the E. V. seems against this, but the participle means "by telling the truth," which of course admits of a part reference. WORDSWORTH renders "being true," to avoid the admission of a second visit.—R.]

Ver. 17. They pay you court in no honest way.—[So ELLICOTT. LIGHTFOOT: "As ζηλοῦν would seem to have one and the same sense throughout this passage, its more ordinary meanings with the accusative, as 'to admire, emulate,' must be discarded. It signifies rather 'to busy one's self about, take interest in,' a sense which lies close to the original meaning of ζηλος, if correctly derived from ζέω." So Schmoller liebeifern.—R.] "They also, it is true [sc. the false teachers; for we usually abstain from naming those whose very names produce in us dislike and aversion (CALVIN)] will fain have an affectionate zeal towards you, and contend for the possession of you: but in view of the truth, that, while they will bring you out of affectionate zeal, is worse than what you already have, we must say; they are zealous for you to no good." EWALD.—They desire to exclude you,—first from me, and thus from the pure gospel to them and their teaching.—Iva, (that) with the indicative present is certainly harsh; but MEYER's interpretation is altogether too forced. He feels himself obliged on account of this harshness to take iva=ubi, in quo statu; whereby, by which exclusion, when it has taken place, you, with your zeal are directed to them as objects of your interest. [The final sense of iva, i. e., they do it for this purpose, is preferable; the indicative being regarded by ALFORD and ELLICOTT as a solecism, though Lightfoot remarks that this usage, while quite unclassical, is often found in later writers. MEYER insists very strongly however upon the local sense.—R.]

Ver. 18. But it is good to be courted in a good way at all times.—The "courting" of which they are the objects, he has been obliged to censure, and accordingly he adds (turning to the readers themselves): It is indeed good (καλόν) to be an object of the affectionate zeal of others, good to be zealously loved—but only in a good thing. It is only good to be zealously loved in a good laudable cause, and for the sake of it, but not as now, on account of an evil cause, namely, apostasy from the truth. This thought Paul completes by the addition: At all times it is good to be loved for the sake of a good cause. But (he says) more accurately considered, it is only good, when one is zealously loved at all times, for the sake of a good cause, and not merely for a while, or at certain times, i. e., when one is always worthy of zealous love (for the sake of a good cause). This thought however, Paul does not leave thus general, but suddenly—disturbing the concinuity of the discourse, though quite in congruity with the emotion expressed in the language of this section—gives it a definite application—not only when I am present with you.—Then you showed yourselves worthy of love, but, alas, not now, when I am not with you.—MEYER and WIESELER understand the beginning of the sentence thus: good it is, that zeal is shown, etc.; and not so that the Galatians are understood as the objects of the zeal, but so that the zeal εν καλῷ is opposed to the zeal of the false teachers, which was εν κακῷ. But justice is not thus done to the passive infinitive. [This verse has caused much discussion. The following results seem clear: 1. That the verb ζηλῶν is to retain the same meaning throughout. 2. That the last infinitive is passive, and the Galatians the object. But 3. the force of εν καλῷ is doubtful. It may be (a) merely adverbial (ELLICOTT). "It is a good thing to be the object of courting in an honest way (as you are by me, though not by them) at all times, and not merely when I happen to be with you." (b)

It may indicate the sphere, in contrast with that of the false teachers (ALFORD). It is a good thing (for you) to be the objects of this zeal, in a good cause, at all times and by every body, not only when I am present with you. I do not grudge the court that is paid you. Only let them do it in an honorable cause. (c) Or the phrase may be pressed, as is done by Schmoller, to imply a contrast between their present and their former state. LIGHTFOOT prefers a view similar to this, but, as he admits, it supplies too much. As (b) is entirely consistent with the requirements of 1, and 2, it seems preferable.—R.]

[Many commentators (including BENGE, WORDSWORTH, LIGHTFOOT) put a comma at the close of Ver. 18, thus joining the next verse most closely with this section. There is a sufficient change of tone and thought to justify a full stop, but it seems doubtful whether a new section or paragraph should begin with ver. 19. Most commentators, even those who separate vers. 18 and 19, begin the new paragraph with ver. 21; with more propriety apparently. Schmoller, however, joins ver. 19 with ver. 21, and divides the sections accordingly. While the matter is not of sufficient moment to warrant an alteration of his arrangement, the usual division presents the Apostle's thought more satisfactorily. See EXEC. NOTES on vers. 19, 20 in the next section.—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The characteristic of heathenism is, lack of the knowledge of God. A heathen was before his conversion an atheist (Eph. ii. 12). True they had a certain religiosity, but "Knowledge of God" is for Paul at least, a very definite positive idea, essentially distinct from that religiosity. What the heathen worship are by nature not gods.—A hint not to overvalue in an unscriptural manner the religious feeling of the heathen world, which manifested itself in idolatrous worship; also not to see in it too readily anything positive, a prophecy of the true knowledge of God, something only different from it in degree. Rather, it is something negative, a having lost the truth, or at most an echo of that truth which in its main substance is lost. For, according to Rom. i., the heathen also had indeed originally a knowledge of God, but this before they became heathen by their being servants to them which are by nature not gods; with the coming in of this servitude they lost the knowledge of God. Very different then was the standing of the Israelite from that of the heathen, i. e., although he was "in bondage under the rudiments of the world," yes, "shut up under sin," he was yet one "knowing God," not "without God" (ἀθεος) in the world.

2. Confidence between teachers and hearers.—"There must be more depending on hearty confidence between teachers and hearers, than is commonly thought, because the Apostle so solicitously strives for it, and assures them he has not lost his affection for them, but is still mindful of their first love." RIEGER.—The preacher, it is true, is in the first place only the bearer and bringer of the divine word, and it is primarily this itself, which opens and wins hearts. The man, compared with the word which he brings, falls entirely into the background, as appears from the very declarations of Paul in this section. Had not the word which he brought, in itself won hearts, had not these conceived confidence in the word as such, for the sake of its contents, Paul himself would have found no access among them; for in his personal appearance, in view of the weakness of the flesh, with which he came, there was at least nothing captivating to the hearts of men.—But on the other hand, simultaneously with the receiving of the word, there is also formed a personal relation to the bringer of it; he is not a mere instrument, but a personality, and in his bringing of the word comes into consideration as such. A bond of confidence and love is knit between the hearer and the teacher; to him who brings what searches the heart in its inmost recesses, who proclaims to us the word of salvation and eternal life, our heart must also necessarily turn in love, if it has suffered the word to gain any hold of it whatever. And on the other hand the personal bond which is formed, will then in its turn have an essential influence in promoting the reception of the word and steadfastness in faith. The preacher may also, as Paul shows, expressly appeal to this personal relation, may and should value highly the love which he experiences, may—not indeed affect an injured tone when it is withdrawn from him, but may well, when the Church has in any way gone astray, use the personal relation that has been formed, as a motive in his admonitions.

[3. Observance of days, etc. The scrupulous observance of “days and months and seasons and years,” is to the Apostle a token that his labor in the gospel has not resulted in appropriate effects. These things belong to “the weak and beggarly elements,” to which the Galatians were returning. That there is no allusion to the observance of the Lord’s Day is evident, for this cannot be classed among these “rudiments,” to which they desire to be again anew in bondage. It could not be classed among “heathen rudiments,” for they knew nothing of it; nor with “the bondage of the law,” for God’s Sabbath law ante-dated the Mosaic law (comp. the fourth commandment, “Remember”). And whatever of legal bondage had been linked with the observance of the Jewish Sabbath was eliminated together with the change to the first day of the week. This at once removes the Lord’s Day from the category of “days” (ver. 10), and also of “weak and beggarly elements” (ver. 9). The mode of observance is learned from the Lord’s words: “The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath,” which at the same time imply, when rightly understood, the perpetual necessity for a Sabbath.—R.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 8. CRAMER:—“To reflect often on our former miserable condition of heathenism, serves to move us to thanksgiving for the benefit received.” LUTHER:—There is a twofold knowledge of God, a common and a special. The common all men have by nature, in that they know that there is a God, who has made heaven and earth, &c. But how our Lord God is minded towards us, what He will give us and do for us, that we may be redeemed from sin and be saved, of that men know nothing. They know not what pleases or displeases God, and so adore, instead of the actual God, something that their own heart has dreamed out and feigningly devised, but which, in very truth, is naught.—[BROWN:—In false religion in all its forms, nothing is more remarkable than its enslaving, degrading influence on the minds of its votaries.—R.]

Ver. 9. LUTHER:—We are known of God, rather than we know Him. For what we do towards such knowledge is nothing else than to hold still, and let God occupy Himself with us, namely, by giving us His word, which we lay hold of through the faith which He also works in us, and thus to become God’s children.—We shall not fare better than the dear Apostles themselves fared, who in their lifetime had to see the congregations that had been built up through their office with much pains and labor, so sadly torn down, that for very pity their heart was ready to break.—It may easily and quickly happen, that one apostatize from the truth. For even Christians, who are in earnest as to sound doctrine, consider not sufficiently, how precious and most needful a treasure is the right and true knowledge of Christ. Besides there are exceeding few among those that hear the preaching of faith, that are tried by the holy cross and spiritual conflict, and that sometimes have with sin, death and devil a skirmish, but the greater part live on in all security, without all combat and strife. So long as they have sound teachers with them, they speak according to them; but when these their true teachers are away, and the wolves in sheeps’ clothing come creeping in, at once that takes place with them, which happened to the Galatians, namely, that they are soon and easily seduced and perverted.—When the foundation is destroyed, it is then all one, whether men turn themselves to the law, or to idols. Whoever falls from grace upon the law, has as hard a fall as he that falls from grace into heathenism, for out of Christ there is nothing else than idolatry and a vain image of God.—“To the weak and beggarly rudiments.” When the law accomplishes its right and fitting work or office, it accuses and condemns men; then it is not a weak and beggarly element, but strong and rich, yea, it is an immeasurable, invincible power and wealth, against which the conscience is indeed weak and poor.—It is most admirable that St. Paul speaks so contemptuously of the law. For he does it to this end, that they who will through the law be made righteous, may from day to day become still weaker and more beggarly. For they are of themselves weak and beggarly, i. e., by nature children of wrath and guilty of perdition, and lay hold then on that which also is nothing else than merely infirmity and beggary, whereby they will fain become strong and rich.

Ver. 10. “Ye carefully observe days.” Here might some one say: If the good Galatians did so great a sin, in that they observed days, months, seasons, &c., how comes it then, that ye do not also sin, who yet do the like? Answer: in that we keep Sunday, Christmas, Easter, and the like days of solemnity or festivals, we do it with all freedom, we burden with such ceremonies no one's conscience, nor teach, that men must needs keep them, in order to be thereby justified and saved, or to make satisfaction for sin. But on this account we keep them, that matters may go on in the church in good discipline and order, and that outward unity may not be sundered (for inwardly we have another unity). But the principal cause is this, that the ministry may remain in its full exercise, and that the people may have their certain appointed time, when they may come together, hear God's word, and therefrom know God. Item, that they may take the sacrament, pray in common for all necessities of all Christendom, and may thank our dear Lord God for all His benefits. BERLENE. BIBLE:—In such things that is even against Christianity which is urged upon men over and above Christianity. He that can comprehend what mischief the evangelical spirit suffers from such patchwork, has made great progress.

Ver. 11. HEUBNER:—The teacher labors upon an uncertainty, knows not what he accomplishes, he sows upon hope.

Vers. 12–20. RIEGER:—As much depends on such earnest remonstrances for opening the hearers' hearts, as on the most convincing arguments.

Ver. 12. SPENER:—A true pastor is sensitive in no particular, save in what is contrary to the honor of God, and the salvation of His flock.—LUTHER:—That he gives the Galatians so good words, is as much as to mix and temper the bitter wormwood drink so with honey and sugar that it may become sweet and pleasant. Even so do parents, when they have well flogged their children, give them good words, give them gingerbread, apples, pears, nuts and the like, that the children may take note and understand that their parents have at heart their good.

Vers. 13, 14. It may well be that human reason stumbles and starts back, when it beholds the slight, contemptible and weak nature of the dear Christians, wherein there is so much of suffering, yea, the world has ever counted all God's servants for great fools, who will fain comfort, help and counsel others, item, inasmuch as they boast of so great heavenly possessions and treasures, of righteousness, power, strength, victory over sin, death and all evil, of everlasting joy, &c., and are yet the poorest beggars and moreover weak, troubled and despised.—STARKE:—True servants of the gospel are angels of God, as having the name of messengers and heralds of the divine will, even as also the invisible and heavenly spirits bear the name of angels from a like office.—LANGE:—If teachers wish to be looked on as angels of God, and in a certain sense as Christ Himself, they must also approve themselves as good angels, and not as Satan's angels and servants, and discharge their office with such purity, as they have Paul for an example.—[BURKITT:—It is an high commendation to a people, when neither poverty nor deformity, nor any deficiency, which may render a minister of the gospel base and contemptible in the estimation of the world, can possibly diminish any thing of that respect which they know to be due and payable unto him.—R.]

Ver. 15. HEUBNER:—Let the apostate reflect, when he was happiest, how blessed he was before he fell.—BERLENE. BIB.:—As indeed we are owing more than the eyes of the body, to those that have opened to us the eyes of the soul.—HEDINGER:—A beautiful proof of faith, to love those from the heart, that plant faith within us! O the horror, that some would gladly tear out tongue and eyes from those that teach us the word of the kingdom of heaven!—CRAMER:—It is everywhere the same, that new preachers are welcome, and soon get followers and a great course. While the sign is new, it is hung against the wall; but when it is old, it is thrown under the bench.—[BROWN:—When the gospel is remarkably successful, the danger is not of converts not being sufficiently attached, but of their being inordinately attached, to the minister who has been the instrument of conveying to them so great a benefit. The being greatly applauded, is scarcely any proof that a minister has been successful; the being highly esteemed and cordially loved, is a considerably strong presumption that he has; the being regarded with indifference and dislike, is a clear proof that he has not.—R.]

Ver. 16. HEUBNER:—Him who tells us the truth, we ought to count for our true and best friend.—LUTHER:—In the world matters go altogether strangely and against reason, namely, he that speaks truth becomes an unwelcome guest, yea, is counted for an enemy; but this is not so among good friends, and still less among Christians.—STARKE:—He that hates any one, because he tells him the truth, such an one betrays himself very clearly as no child of God.

Ver. 17. LUTHER:—This is the way of all false spirits, to put on a friendly behavior, and give people the best words, so as to get a hold. When they first come creeping in, they swear most fervently, that they seek nothing else than alone how they may further God's honor and men's salvation; they promise to those that receive their teaching, that they shall certainly be saved. And with such assumed appearance of godliness and sheep's clothing, the ravening wolves do immensely great harm to the Christian church, where pastors are not active and vigilant and earnest to withstand them.—RIEGER:—Great pains given to any thing, great certainty assumed concerning it, is indeed something very taking to men's minds; but zeal alone gives no certain proof of truth. The doctrine is not to be judged according to the zeal, but the zeal according to the doctrine. The zeal does not make the cause good, but the cause must make the zeal good.—[BUNYAN:—Zeal without knowledge is like a mettled horse without eyes or like a sword in a madman's hands.—RICCALTON:—In reading the history of the church it is hard to say whether what has gone, and still goes under the name of zeal, has done more good or hurt to religion.—BURKITT:—The old practice has ever been amongst seducers, first to alienate the people's minds from their own teachers, and next get themselves looked upon as alone, and only worthy to have room in the people's hearts.—R.]

Ver. 18. STARKE:—Zeal for good must be enduring.—This is a human feeling, which exists in many, even pious souls. They are zealous in good, when faithful teachers are present, but when they are absent, or it may be dead, they slacken in their zeal.

- D. Confirmation of the freedom of Christians, from the narrative of the Scripture concerning the two sons of Abraham, Ishmael and Isaac, by means of an interpretation referring it to the Jewish and the Christian Church.

CHAPTER IV. 19-30.

(Vers. 21-31. The Epistle for the 4th Sunday in Lent.)

19 My little children¹ of whom I travail in birth again [with whom I am again in 20 travail] until Christ be formed in you, I desire [I could wish indeed] to be present with you now, and to change my voice [tone];² for I stand in doubt of you 21 [am perplexed about you].³ Tell me ye that desire to be under the law, do ye not 22 hear⁴ the law? For it is written, that Abraham had two sons, the one by a bond-maid, the other by a free woman [one by the bondmaid, and one by the free wo-23 man]. But he who was of the bondwoman was born after the flesh; but he of 24 the free woman was by promise [through the⁵ promise]. Which things are an allegory [are allegorical]:⁶ for these are the [omit the]⁷ two covenants; the one from the [omit the] mount Sinai, which gendereth to [bearing children unto] 25 bondage, which is Agar [Hagar].⁸ For this Agar is mount Sinai in Arabia [(For Sinai is a mountain in Arabia), or For the word Agar means in Arabia mount Sinai; or For this Hagar represents mount Sinai in Arabia], and answereth to [she ranks⁹ with] Jerusalem which now is [the present Jerusalem], and is [for¹⁰ she 26 is] in bondage with her children. But Jerusalem which is above is free, which is 27 the mother of us all [and she is our¹¹ mother]. For it is written, Rejoice, thou barren that bearest not; break forth and cry, thou that travailest not: for the desolate hath many more children [many are the children of the desolate more] 28 than she which [who] hath a husband. Now we [But ye],¹² brethren, as Isaac was, 29 are the [omit the] children of promise. But [still] as then he that was born after 30 the flesh persecuted him that was born after the Spirit, even so it is now. Nevertheless what saith the Scripture? Cast out the bondwoman and her son; for the son of the bondwoman shall not be heir [shall in no wise¹³ be heir] with the son¹⁴ of the free woman.

¹ Ver. 19.— χ . τέκνα. [So B. F. G., Lachmann; but \aleph^3 A. C. K. L. read $\tau\epsilon\kappa\nu\acute{\iota}\alpha$, adopted by Tischendorf and most recent Editors. Occurs nowhere else in Paul's writings.—R.]

² Ver. 20.— $\Phi\omega\sigma\eta\upsilon$, literally "voice," but "tone" is a more intelligible rendering.—R.]

³ Ver. 20.—"Am perplexed"; so Ellicott, Alford, Lightfoot. Schmoller (with doubtful propriety) throws this verse into a parenthesis.—R.]

⁴ Ver. 21.— ἀναγινώσκετε , an ancient gloss. [followed by the Vulgate, but rejected by all modern Editors.—R.]

⁸ Ver. 25.— ἐκ τῆς reads $\alpha\iota\ \delta\upsilon\sigma$, against decisive authorities. \aleph^3 inserts, \aleph^5 omits $\alpha\iota$. Besides this we find these readings: 1. $\tau\delta\ \gamma\alpha\rho\ \Sigma\iota\nu\alpha\ \delta\iota\sigma\tau\epsilon\lambda\epsilon\iota\ \tau\eta\ \text{Ἀραβία}$. [It is difficult to decide which is the correct reading, since the weight of authority is about equal for some of these readings. The Rec. is supported mostly by cursives. 1. is decidedly better sustained; \aleph has it, but with an addition found in no other MSS. ($\delta\upsilon\text{ before } \epsilon\tau\eta\ \text{Ἀρ}$). 2. and 3. are very weakly supported; but 4. is well sustained. The choice then seems to be between 1. and 4.: $\tau\delta\ \gamma\alpha\rho\ \Sigma\iota\nu\alpha$ and $\tau\delta\ \delta\epsilon\ \text{Ἀγὰρ } \Sigma\iota\nu\alpha$; and between these it is scarcely possible to make a positive decision. [It may be remarked that the readings Rec. and 4. differ only in the substitution of $\delta\epsilon$ for $\gamma\alpha\rho$; since this can readily be accounted for ($\gamma\alpha\rho$ first omitted because of the closely following Ἀγὰρ , then $\delta\epsilon$ inserted for connection, or to correspond with $\mu\epsilon\iota\varsigma$, ver. 24), it is perhaps better to regard the choice as lying between Rec. and 1. The former is adopted by Tischendorf, Meyer, Ellicott, Alford, Wordsworth; 1. by Lachmann and Lightfoot among others. In favor of each, see the above-named commentators. Lightfoot has two valuable notes, p. 189 sq. 1. is certainly lectio brevior; Rec. lectio difficilior; Ἀγὰρ may have been carelessly inserted from ver. 24, but it was even more likely to have been carelessly omitted after $\gamma\alpha\rho$.—The exegetical difficulty is as great as the critical. Of the three English renderings given above, I. follows reading I., II. and III., the Rec. See EXEG. NOTES.—R.]

¹⁰ Ver. 25.—[Rec. δέ; followed by Vulgate, E. V., but weakly supported. N. A. B. C. P. read γάρ; so modern Editors.—R.]

¹² Ver. 28.—The reading ὑμεῖς—στε is, with Lachmann, Tischendorf and others, to be preferred to the common text ἡμεῖς—στεν, since the latter appears to be a correction from ἡμῶν (ver. 26) and ὑμεῖς is more lively on account of its application to the readers" (Wieseler). N. however has ἡμεῖς. [Both are well supported, but ὑμεῖς is adopted by most Editors on internal grounds.—R.]

¹³ Ver. 30.—[Lightfoot follows N. B. D. in reading κληρονομῆσαι (apparently a correction from LXX).—The double negative οὐ-μή is rendered by Ellcott, "in no wise."—R.]

¹⁴ Ver. 30.—Τοῦ νόου is omitted in N., but inserted by the corrector. [Instead of τῆς ἐλευθερίας we find also μου ἱσάκ (from the LXX).—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 19. My little children.—[LIGHTFOOT: "A mode of address common in St. John, but not found elsewhere in St. Paul. Here the diminutive expresses both the tenderness of the Apostle and the feebleness of his converts. It is a term at once of affection and rebuke."—R.] It is more natural to make a break here (the very suddenness of the appeal implies this) and to join "my little children" with "tell me" (ver. 21). It cannot at all events be connected with the preceding context, but the connection with ver. 20 is only possible on the assumption of an interruption of the discourse (comp. δέ). [The presence of δέ in ver. 20 is urged as a reason for connecting our verse very closely with ver. 18, as is done by many commentators. The course of the thought would then be: "I have a right to ask for constancy in your affections. I have a greater claim on you than these new teachers. They speak but as strangers to strangers; I as a mother to her children with whom she has travailed" (LIGHTFOOT). But there is something so sudden in the address, that it is better to separate the verses (so MEYER, ALFORD, ELLICOTT).—R.] On the other hand the contents of ver. 20 fit very well into the discourse as a parenthetical remark. In the "am again in travail" the wish presses itself upon him, rather to be present with them—and this he then expresses—before going on, in ver. 21, to attempt to change the minds of his readers, as being his children, and to bring them back. It is true "tell me," after this interruption, does not connect immediately with ver. 19; the "little children" receives a particular definition in "ye that desire to be under the law," but this only indicates how far a travelling again is necessary, in order to prepare for a continuance of this διδόνειν through the following exposition, as indeed all that precedes had been nothing else than such a travail.

[This view of the connection of the passage is open to serious objection. Two vocatives are joined together, which are separated both in position and in tone. Ver. 20 which contains the wish to be present is sundered from ver. 18, where the thought of his presence is introduced. The idea of travelling is joined to a passage of argument by illustration, and separated from the more personal part of the discourse. If there be a difficulty about δέ (ver. 20) as introducing an "opposition," and hence a parenthesis be deemed necessary, this "opposition" may be found (MEYER) "in the tacit contrast between the subject of his wish to be present with them, and his actual absence and separation." It seems best then to connect vers. 19 and 20 together—detaching them as a burst of tenderness from both the preceding and subsequent context, though joined in thought more closely with the former.—R.]

With whom I am again in travail.—i. e., the second time.—The labor of his spirit on the hearts of the readers he here compares with the travail of a mother (elsewhere with the begetting of the father), in which the point of comparison is the activity directed to the coming of a child into the world; with the mother—of a natural child; here with the Apostle—of a spiritual child. This image is continued with the expression until Christ be formed in you.—It is a ripe, completely developed child that is in contemplation—in which the life has come to perfect manifestation. Such a child, and only such a one, renders a mother's pangs of labor effectual, for only such a child lives, and therefore only in such a one has she a child. So long as the birth is not that of a perfect child, so long must she ever look forward to new pangs of labor, before she can have this, her wish granted. [ELLICOTT: "The idea is not so much of the pain, as of the long and continuous effort of the travail."—R.] —With justice therefore is the complete formation of the child represented as the aim of the labor, and there is here nothing like an inversion of the physiological process, in which the formatio takes place ante partum. This is not here the point in question. The natural child is completely developed, in that the natural life, as it were the spirit of life, comes in it to perfect manifestation, gains an actual, corresponding form. What this natural spirit of life is in the natural child, Christ is in the spiritual child, as the principle of spiritual life, and hence the expression of the Apostle: Christ is μορφωθῆναι in them—the inward principle is to come with them to manifestation to gain a form in an established, assured, evangelical conviction of faith; only when this takes place, has Paul as spiritual mother actually a spiritual child. But since this is wanting, as is shown by their apostacy, he is therefore now bearing them once again, in the hope that this perfect formation may come to pass. (If it had not, he would have needed to travail in birth still again, but here, as is natural, he only speaks of a second travail.) That in nature a completely developed child is not hoped for from a second bearing of the same child, is a self-evident incongruity between the fact and the image, but it answers the purpose that the activity is the same—in both cases there is a travail of birth.*—WIESELER incorrectly finds in πάλιν ὥδινεν the doctrinal conception of the new birth, and takes πάλιν therefore as antithetical to the natural birth. In the first place the Apostle's lamentation over the alteration that had taken place in the readers, brings almost necessarily to our thoughts the probability of a renewed activity among them; and secondly he could well designate the labor bestowed by him upon the Galatians as a bearing of spiritual children, but not as a regeneration in the doctrinal sense, for this appertains to God alone. Paul's travelling in birth with them, it is true, had as its end, their becoming regenerate children of God, but the one is not therefore to be identified with the other.

Ver. 20. I could wish indeed to be present with you.—[This rendering, though not literal, brings out the force of the passage, and the "tacit contrast" in δέ. See above.—R.]—And to change my tone.—This, in its immediate connection with a wish to be present with them, appears to signify: I should be glad to give my language such a form as suits with oral intercourse; from the written style, with its more formal, unpliant character, less suited to make an impression on the heart, I should be glad to pass over into oral discourse. But φωνὴν ἀλλάξαι does not on this account mean: to interchange discourse with any one—to converse together, as WIESELER singularly assumes. Why he should like to be with them, and to vary his discourse, he then expressly declares: For I am perplexed about you.—Εἰ, the perplexity has its ground chiefly in them, in their state of mind.† He knows not with what arguments he can find access to them and dispose them to a return. Therefore he thinks now he could more easily accomplish something by oral discourse with them. MEYER understands φωνὴν ἀλλάσσειν of a wish of Paul, instead of the rigorous tone used in his last visit, to essay a milder tone. But this is far from evident.—RIEGER justly remarks that in a certain sense Paul does immediately after in ver. 21 what he wishes in ver. 20, namely, varies the form of his language, and speaks as if he were present with them: λέγετε μοι κ. τ. λ. [For the various interpretations of the phrase "change my voice" see MEYER in loco. The view given above seems tame, but the reference to the tone during his second visit is doubtful. So also the interpretation: "to modify my language from time to time as occasion demands." Certainly it is improper to think of a desire to change his tone to a more severe one (in contrast with the mild τεκνία). On the whole it seems best to conclude 1) that the desired change was from the severe to the milder address; 2) that the severe tone referred to is that of the present Epistle (so ELLICOTT and many others).—R.]

Ver. 21. Tell me, ye that desire to be under the law, do ye not hear the law?—"Hear" is hardly to be taken precisely as implying that the law was publicly read by the pseudo-apostles among them, but generally: Do you not give heed to what is written in the Law? The second time νόμος, according to the Jewish use of תורה = the Pentateuch. From the law itself, on which you lay so much stress, you might discover that you are not, and are not meant to be under the law. [MEYER:—"At the close of the theoretical part of his Epistle, Paul now appends a very peculiar allegoric argument from the law itself, intended to destroy the influence of the false Apostles with their own weapons, and to root it up out of its own proper soil."—R.]

Ver. 22. For it is written.—Γάρ = I must inquire: do ye not hear the Law; for if you really heard the law, you would find in it that which might convince you how unsound and dangerous it is to "desire to be under the law." That to which Paul refers the Galatians, as being found in the law, is the narrative in Genesis, of the two sons of Abraham, Ishmael and Isaac, the one by the bondmaid, Hagar, and the other by the free woman, Sarah. As is known, he had Ishmael first, and he is therefore mentioned first. They were therefore indeed both Abraham's sons, but they had not merely different mothers, but mothers also of entirely different conditions; the one was the son of a bondmaid, the other of a free woman.

Ver. 23. Yet even with that they might have been begotten in like manner, but (ἀλλὰ) this was far from being the case, the son of the bondmaid was begotten after the flesh, and the son of the free woman through the promise.—Κατὰ σάρκα = entirely in the ordinary way of natural generation, of carnal intercourse; διὰ τῆς ἐπαγγελίας = formally also, it is true, in this way, but materially (by the side of which the other is a vanishing factor), by virtue of the divine promise, which Abraham had received, inasmuch as God in a miraculous manner, restored the long-lost capacity of Sarah to conceive, so that in truth the efficient factor was God. [The preposition διὰ denoting the causa medians (ELLICOTT).—R.]

Ver. 24. Which things are allegorical, ἀτινά ἐστιν ἀλληγοροῦμενα.—Paul thus introduces his interpretation of the narrative which he quotes. He states what the Galatians might learn from it. [ELLICOTT has a valuable note on the distinction between ὅς and ὅστις. His view of ἀτινά is thus expressed: "all which things viewed in their most general light." This wider meaning will guard against the assumption that the narrative itself was a mere allegory and not historical.—R.]—Ἀλληγορεῖν = ἀλλο ἁγορεύειν: to say something else than is expressed by the letter, to say something in figures; passively: to have a tropic sense, ἀλληγοροῦμενον εἶναι = to be something that has such a sense. That Paul understands what is related in Genesis of Abraham, Hagar, Sarah, etc., as history also, needs no proof: but undoubtedly at the same time he

* [WORDSWORTH mentions a curious exposition and extension of this metaphor in the Epistle of the primitive churches of Gaul "who say that by means of the martyrs much joy accrued to the holy Virgin Mother, the Church of Christ, receiving back alive those whom she has lost as abortions, and also because through means of the martyrs, very many of her children who had fallen away by apostasy, were again conceived in her womb, and were being brought forth again to life."—R.]

† [Hence ἀπροσώμα is to be taken, not as passive, with dependent sense (ELLICOTT), nor middle (LIGHTFOOT), but middle with passive signification (MEYER, ALFORD); "the condition of perplexity is conceived of as wrought upon, suffered by the subject."—R.]

sees in the history an intimation of something else, something higher, than the simple history relates. In what sense, see below, in the DOCTRINAL NOTES. [The precise meaning of ἀλληγορεῖν must be noted. It may be made to cover the thought: to be treated as having an allegorical sense, but here we must insist on the more definite and strict meaning: to have an allegorical sense. "Which things viewed in their most general light have an allegorical meaning;" this interpretation will guard against the assumptions and errors which are based upon a looser view. See DOCTRINAL NOTES.—R.]

To what the history points is then stated: for these are two covenants.—Αἱται seems not to refer immediately, i. e., grammatically, to the women, but, according to ordinary Greek usage, to stand for ταῦτα; it would be somewhat different if in ver. 23 the women were the subjects. Substantially no doubt it refers to the two women, in whom he sees types of the two covenants—not however in the twofold marriage covenant of Abraham with Hagar and Sarah (as JATNU assumes, who, in order to sustain this view, is obliged to give an exceedingly forced interpretation of "which is Agar"). It is peculiar, and renders the understanding of this passage somewhat difficult, that Paul, in the first place, designates the women and not the sons themselves as symbols, more particularly as prophetic symbols of the two covenants; and in the second place, it even more perplexes the matter, that he finds in them the two covenants = of God with men, which were typified or prophesied (that is, in general, the Old and the New Covenant), and takes these themselves as mothers, and then from these first passes over to the two diverse churches, whose motherhood appears more clearly when viewed in connection with their members. Of course, however, the covenants stand in intimate relation to the churches; it is not only they that confer on them their peculiar character, but also that properly constitute them; without the covenants the churches would not exist.—The one from Mount Sinai, etc.—A pregnant expression = the first covenant is that which originates from mount Sinai and bears unto bondage. Γεννώσα, feminine, because it corresponds to the mother Hagar. The expression εἰς δουλείαν γεννώσα is itself to be supplemented so that it = bearing, sc. children, as it were into bondage = and translating them into bondage, of course by subjection to the law, for the covenant from Sinai is the covenant of law.—Which is Hagar.—This is = this covenant is typified by Hagar, for she too as "bondmaid" bore children "unto bondage." This is of course primarily the ground why he compares the Sinaitic covenant with Hagar; of both alike the "bearing children unto bondage" was an attribute. But this abrupt assertion: the Sinaitic covenant is Hagar, or, Hagar signifies the Sinaitic covenant, because it as well as she "bore unto bondage," is of itself too bold and startling, and Paul therefore in a parenthesis intimates that Sinai and Hagar, far apart as they might seem to be, yet even independently of this "bearing," stand of themselves related to one another.

VER. 25. The words setting forth this relation are, according to one reading: τὸ γὰρ Σινᾶ ὄρος ἐστὶν ἐν τῇ Ἀραβίᾳ: according to the other: τὸ δὲ [or γὰρ] Ἀγὰρ Σινᾶ ὄρος, &c. Accepting the first reading, Paul points to the fact that Mount Sinai is situated in Arabia—that therefore the Sinaitic covenant has one home with Hagar, and so far a relation to her. Both originate from Arabia—are not at home in the Holy Land; while yet they both came in near relation to the people of God; Hagar to Abraham, bearing him a son; the Sinaitic covenant to Abraham's posterity, raising up children to this; for Israel by the Sinaitic covenant first became an organized theocratic people, possessing the principle of self-preservation and hereditary continuance.—Accepting the reading: τὸ δὲ Ἀγὰρ, κ. τ. λ. in which δὲ is exceedingly well suited to introduce an elucidation, which indeed it properly is, rather than a demonstration [γὰρ being however the more probable reading, on critical grounds, see critical note.—R.], the Apostle points out that even as to name there exists a relation between Hagar and the Sinaitic covenant,—that it is not therefore so arbitrary as might seem on his part, to interpret the former as a type of the latter; for that among the Arabians, Mount Sinai has just this name of Hagar, and that—as Paul undoubtedly assumes—after Hagar. It is true we have no other proof of Sinai's having this appellation, and it would have to be assumed that Paul had learned, perhaps from his sojourn in Arabia, that Sinai bore this name also among the Arabs, which he referred back to Hagar. It is certainly probable, that the Arabs named Sinai Ἀγὰρ; for this is = Rock, and so corresponds precisely to the character of this mountain chain, and probably also to the signification of the ancient name "Sinai" itself, which etymology renders by "Rock."—Paul would then, only err in the reference of this name Ἀγὰρ to the Hagar of the Old Testament, but at all events the name would be the same, and this, in the first instance would be the main thing. Yet this circumstance will always make this reading suspicious.

[In addition to these interpretations, which may be distinguished as I., II., another (III.) must be considered, viz., that of CALVIN, BEZA, ESTIUS, WORDSWORTH (and LIGHTFOOT, if the correctness of the Recepta be established): "For this Hagar (is) represents Mount Sinai in Arabia."—I. is comparatively free from grammatical difficulty, forming a parenthesis, which introduces a geographical remark, the point of which is obvious, though on the whole it seems much tamer than the other views. Besides the critical grounds for preferring the longer reading (not the least strong being this absence of grammatical difficulties), it may be objected 1. That since a mere geographical remark would be unnecessary, the emphasis must lie on ἐν τῇ Ἀραβίᾳ; but to convey such an emphasis, the Greek order should be ἐν τῇ Ἀρ. ἐστὶν (ALFORD). 2. MEYER intimates that this view must press as the essential point, the fact that the mountain was "outside of the land of Canaan," and yet this essential point is only implied. Still there is not much force in this objection, since the positive statement "is in Arabia," the land of bondsmen, is after all the main thought, the other being a negative antitheses, that may well be omitted.—II. is adopted by MEYER, ELLICOTT, ALFORD, and many older commentators (CHRYSOSTOM, LUTHER, et al.). This may be called the etymological view. Here the grammatical difficulties are not great, for it may readily be conceded, that rō 'Aγap means "the word Agar," ἑστῶν, "means"—and ἐν τῇ Αρ. either "among the Arabians" or "in the Arabian (supply δι' αἰθέρος) dialect," and the objection that "the word Agar" cannot properly be the subject of συστοιχεί is met by putting a semicolon at the end of this clause, or throwing it into a parenthesis. The real difficulties are far graver. 1. It is extremely doubtful whether "Agar" did mean "in Arabia, Mount Sinai." The testimony of travellers is not strong, that of philology even less so. Granting that the Arabic word for "rock" is similar in sound, we are far from settling the question of identity of name. 2. "If in writing to a half-Greek, half-Celtic people, he ventured to argue from an Arabic word at all, he would at all events be careful to make his drift intelligible" (LIGHTFOOT). Was it likely to be intelligible to them, when in these days of philological and geographical research, this interpretation is still doubtful? 3. The argument or illustration seems fanciful when resting on this identity of name, especially as Hagar had a meaning in Hebrew, and Sarah also, which meanings could well have been used here, were it a question of names.—III. "For this Hagar represents," etc. This may be called the typical or allegorical interpretation, and for that very reason more likely to be correct in this connection. It avoids the objections against I. on the score of emphasis, and tameness; with II. follows the reading which seems more correct, but avoids the fanciful and doubtful features of that view. MEYER considers the neuter article an insuperable objection. But this may be met 1) as is done by WORDSWORTH, by joining the article with Σανά ὅρος not with 'Aγap. He contends that this is allowable and that no other order was admissible. Still this seems unnatural. Or 2) by understanding rō 'Aγap, "the thing Hagar," not the woman, for ver. 24 passes over into allegory, but the allegorical Hagar,—her position as set forth in ver. 24. This is less objectionable. As this is the only real difficulty (ἑστῶν, "represents," is of course admissible), we may adopt III. as perhaps the safest view, seemingly that of E. V. As regards punctuation, a comma then suffices after this clause, and 'Aγap is the grammatical subject of συστοιχεί.—R.]

Ranks with.—Συστοιχεῖ δέ might be connected with ἦν (ver. 24) or back of that with μία, sc. διαθήκη. [So DE WETTE, LIGHTFOOT.—R.] "For she is in bondage" is given as the proof of "ranks with," and this evidently refers to "bearing children unto bondage" (ver. 24). The covenant "bearing children unto bondage" "ranks with the present Jerusalem, for she is in bondage with her children." Συστοιχεῖν, to stand in one row with something else, to belong to the same species, to belong together with anything. The Sinaitic covenant, says Paul, and the present Jerusalem, although separated in time and place, yet belong essentially together; the former brought into "bondage," the latter is in that very bondage. The object is to show that an internal relation exists between the Sinaitic covenant and the present Jerusalem. [This is certainly preferable to the view of CHRYSOSTOM and most of the Fathers, LUTHER et al., which takes Σανά as the subject, and renders the verb either "is contiguous to" or "joined in a continuous (mountain) range" with Jerusalem. The thought is irrelevant, and we should then have Mt. Zion, rather than Jerusalem, following the verb. LIGHTFOOT thus shows the exact meaning of the verb: "In military language συστοιχία denotes a file, as συνῆγία does a rank of soldiers; comp. Polyb. x. 21. 7. The allegory of the text may be represented by συστοιχία thus:

Hagar, the bond woman.	Sarah, the free woman.
Ishmael, the child after the flesh.	Isaac, the child of promise.
The Old Covenant.	The New Covenant.
The earthly Jerusalem, etc.	The heavenly Jerusalem, etc. "

Accepting this meaning, it is necessary to take exception to embracing the idea of type in the word. Those in each list are συστοιχίαι with each other, but ἀντιστοιχοῦσι to those in the opposite list.—R.]—It seems however more accordant with the context to make 'Aγap (ver. 25) the subject. For Hagar is a type of the present Jerusalem, "ranks with"—stands in the same row with it, or better, fits as a type to the antitype [?] Moreover Hagar was "in bondage with her children, just as the present Jerusalem." Besides in this connection there is significant reference to the fact that "the present Jerusalem" corresponds to Hagar alone—and not to Sarah: the special proof of which is, what is affirmed of "the present Jerusalem," viz.: "for she is in bondage with her children." [So that not only the proximity of the word 'Aγap, but the closer correspondence also, supports the view that "Hagar" is the logical subject of the verb. See MEYER.—R.]

The present Jerusalem.—Jerusalem represents here as it always did in the Old Testament, the Jewish people; but this as a collective personality, and moreover a maternal one, the individual members of the people being viewed as children of this mother. Ἡ νῦν Ἱερουσα. is the present Jerusalem in contrast with the μελλ. Ἱερουσα. as it shall become through the Messiah, i. e., through faith in Him, the Jerusalem, which has not, and so long as it has not, received the Messiah. "The present Jerusalem" meaning thus the historical Israel, the Jewish people, its children are of course "born after the flesh" and Paul presupposes this as self-evident.—Is in bondage.—This cannot apply to the yoke of the Romans, for this has nothing at all to do with the Sinaitic covenant, but applies to the being in bondage under the Mosaic law. A state of bondage in this sense Paul predicates of the existing Jewish church without further proof, as something which the readers after the preceding exposition of the nature of the law (comp. iii. 23; iv. 3-7), must concede, and indeed that the Jews were strenuous observers of the law was a matter beyond doubt.

Ver. 26. But Jerusalem which is above is free.—Paul does not continue the course of thought begun in ver. 24 with "for these are two covenants." He names the first covenant only, not the second one also, but to make the contrast more palpable, opposes at once to the present Jerusalem, which is in bondage, another Jerusalem which is free. Now the present Jerusalem is in a condition of bondage because the first covenant, which is a covenant of bondage, came in her to manifestation. So the freedom of the other Jerusalem would have its ground also in the character of the second covenant, which comes into manifestation in her, and we have a right to find implied a second covenant bearing children unto freedom, which is typified prophetically by Sarah, just as the covenant of bondage by Hagar. If we inquire what this second covenant is, according to the previous context, the answer cannot be doubtful; over against the covenant of law stands a covenant of grace or promise. WIESELER's parallelism goes too far, where he wishes to supply: δευτέρα δὲ (διαθήκη) ἀπὸ δούλου, εἰς ἐλευθερίαν γεννώσα, ἥτις ἐστὶ Σάρρα. τὸ γὰρ Σιών ὅρος ἐστὶν ἐν τῇ γῇ τῆς ἐπαγγελίας, συστοιχεί δὲ τῇ ἀνω Ἰερουσαλὴμ. ἐλευθερία γάρ ἐστι μετὰ τῶν τέκνων αὐτῆς. ["The second covenant from Mount Zion, bearing children unto freedom, which is Sarah. For Zion is a mountain in the land of promise, and ranks with Jerusalem above, for she is free with her children." This follows from his view of ver. 25, and is objectionable besides for the reason that it forces an allegory beyond the point to which it has been carried by the Apostle himself.—R.] Somewhat too definite also is MEYER's view: The other covenant is the one established in Christ (see afterwards on ἡ ἀνω Ἰερουσαλὴμ). Paul has not waited till now to give the proof that the covenant of grace is a covenant of promise, and that on this account Jerusalem above is also free. This is in part clear from what precedes and in part results from the nature of the case, since a covenant of promise given of grace, because it has nothing to do with any law, can have no connection with "bondage" either. In addition he now demonstrates to the Galatians this only, that they are children of that Jerusalem which is free, and that therefore it would be preposterous for them to wish to be under the law. "Free" of course = not being under the law.

The main question is, what ἡ ἀνω Ἰερουσ. signifies. "Jerusalem" here also means a church taken as a collective personality, her individual members being conceived as her children. But ἡ ἀνω Ἰερουσ. is of course not the "ancient" Jerusalem, the Salem of Melchisedek, nor yet the mountain of Zion, which in Josephus is called ἡ ἀνω πόλις. [LIGHTFOOT: "The Apostle instinctively prefers the Hebrew form Ἰερουσαλὴμ here for the typical city, as elsewhere in this Epistle (i. 17, 18; ii. 1) he employs the Græcised form Ἰερουσόλυμα for the actual city. 'Ἰερουσαλὴμ est appellatio Hebraica, originaria et sanctior: Ἰερουσόλυμα, deinceps obvia, Græca, magis politica,' says Bengel on Rev. xxi. 2, accounting for the usage of St. John (in the Gospel the latter; in the Apocalypse the former), and referring to this passage in illustration."—R.] On the other hand LUTHER is right in his decided protest against the reference to the ecclesia triumphans, for the Christians of this world are here designated by Paul as children of this ἀνω Ἰερουσαλὴμ. (Only so much is correct, that with the παρουσία it is no other than this very ἀνω Ἰερουσ. that comes to perfection, so that the Church after the παρουσία is essentially identical with that before it. But the eye is not at all directed here to the παρουσία; and the very reason why the expression ἡ μέλλουσα Ἰερουσ. is not chosen is, that after Christ had appeared upon earth this must be referred to the παρουσία. WIESELER is therefore also incorrect in asserting not only that the church of the perfected is meant, but in insisting as he does that these are expressly comprehended.)—But yet ἡ ἀνω Ἰερουσ. must at all events signify a Jerusalem that is above, an upper Jerusalem, and this "above" can only refer to Heaven. Here again LUTHER has a right understanding of it, in the main point at all events, when he remarks that this "above" is to be understood not of place but of character: "when St. Paul speaks of a Jerusalem above and the other here below upon earth, he means that the one Jerusalem is spiritual, but the other earthly. For there is a great distinction between spiritual and corporeal or earthly things. What is spiritual, that is above, but what is earthly, that is here below. Therefore says he then, that the spiritual Jerusalem is above, not that in respect to space or place it is higher than the earthly here below, but in that it is spiritual." The upper Jerusalem would therefore = the spiritual Jerusalem. This explanation, it is true, does not appear to do full justice to the material idea "above," but it leads in the right direction for this, and needs only to be completed by including also the conception of space which is contained in ἀνω. That is, ἡ ἀνω Ἰερουσ. is not = the Jerusalem that is localiter, externally situated above (this is refuted by LUTHER), but the Jerusalem, that as to its essential character is an upper, heavenly one, and therefore neither originates from earth nor belongs to earth, but originates from Heaven and belongs to Heaven, let it be situated where it may, of which nothing is expressly said. (In reality Luther also means this and nothing else by his spiritual Jerusalem, and his explanation, therefore, only apparently incurs the reproach of spiritualizing.) Whether the expression is immediately founded upon the rabbinical doctrine of the ירושלים של מעלה "which according to Jewish teaching is the archetype existing in Heaven of the earthly Jerusalem, and at the establishment of the Messianic kingdom will be let down from Heaven to earth, in order, as the earthly Jerusalem is the central point and the capital of the old theocracy, to be the same for the Messianic theocracy" (MEYER), cannot be affirmed with certainty; that Paul did not share the crude and sensuous rabbinical conceptions of this heavenly Jerusalem, but had a scripturally purified idea of it, is in any case clear; so that from the Jewish schools he only derives the expression rather than the substance of the idea. At the most he had only the fundamental conception, which was then essentially modified. [LIGHTFOOT: "With them," i. e., the rabbinical teachers, "it is an actual city, the exact counterpart of the earthly Jerusalem in its topography and furniture: with him it is a symbol or image, representing that spiritual city of which the Christian is even now a denizen (Phil. iii. 20). The contrast between the two scenes, as they appeared to the eye, would enhance, if it did not suggest the imagery of St. Paul here. On the one hand, Mount Zion, of old the joy of the whole earth, now more beautiful than ever in the fresh glories of the Herodian renaissance, glittering in gold and marble; on the other, Sinai with its rugged peaks and barren sides, bleak and desolate, the oppressive power of which the Apostle himself had felt during his sojourn there—these scenes fitly represented the contrast between the glorious hopes of the new covenant and the blank despair of the old. Comp Heb. xii. 18-22.”—R.]

And she is our mother.—If we seek to define still more distinctly the idea of the ἡνω 'Ιερουσα., we shall find that here also LUTHER had the right sense of it, when he peremptorily declares, and in opposition to the transcendental fantasies, which overlooked the actually operative heavenly forces in the word and sacraments, so strongly insists that: “the heavenly Jerusalem, which is above, is nothing else than the dear church or Christendom, that are in the whole world here and there dispersed, who all together have one gospel, one manner of faith in Christ, one Holy Ghost, and one manner of sacrament.” Only here again he makes the idea too special. The upper Jerusalem, which essentially springs from Heaven and not from earth, and belongs to Heaven and not to earth, is in the first instance nothing else than the true Church and people of God in its entire generality; for this has its constitution not in the covenant of law, but in the covenant of grace or promise, and its essential character may therefore with full right, nay must be denominated by Paul a heavenly one.—As certainly now as Paul dated back the covenant of grace as far back beyond the covenant of law as Abraham’s time, so certainly did this “upper Jerusalem” properly begin with Abraham himself, although at first indeed rather in the way of promise, in idea, as it were, but yet realiter, as certainly as God’s covenant of grace was one really concluded. This “upper Jerusalem” then, it is true, first came to full manifestation with the advent of the Messiah, as with this God’s covenant of grace first found its true actualization; and so far is the upper Jerusalem=Christendom; but yet even now it must not be identified with it. It is a higher, more general idea, precisely =God’s congregation [Gottesgemeinde] which the idea of the church does not altogether exhaust, but which continues to rise above it, lying at the foundation of the church, which is its concrete manifestation, but yet to be distinguished from it; and indeed this idea of the congregation of God will never attain its completely adequate expression in the church of this dispensation, but only with the παρουσία will such a complete coincidence of ideas and phenomenon be realized (as indeed on the other hand the present Jerusalem which is in bondage was also not absolutely coincident with the Jewish community, but many members of it raised themselves above this bondage, although no doubt in this case the coincidence was far more nearly complete). [MEYER’S interpretation: “the Messianic theocracy, which before the παρουσία is the church, and after it Christ’s kingdom of glory” is substantially correct, provided we sufficiently extend the meaning of the word “Church.” Our conceptions of her, “who is our mother,” must here be large enough to include all her children, in the Old and the New Dispensations, as militant and triumphant. See DOCTRINAL NOTES.—R.] What Paul now wishes to show is, that Christians are children of this true congregation of God, that is grounded upon the covenant of grace, and therefore of course is free, and not merely that they are children of the Christian community, which certainly would have needed no proof.—From the foregoing we see still more evidently (what has already been touched upon above), that the expression ἡ μέλλουσα 'Ιερουσα., although it would have corresponded with ἡ νῦν 'Ιερουσα., would not have been suitable here. On the other hand nothing stood in the way of designating the natural Israel as ἡ νῦν 'Ιερουσα., inasmuch as every one would refer this expression to the right object; in this sense a κάτω 'Ιερουσα. would have sounded strange, and would have been less intelligible, so that the want of correspondence in the expressions is not at all surprising.

Vers. 27 and 28 contain the proof of the proposition that “Jerusalem which is above” is the mother of Christians,—in syllogistic form, only not quite exact, since ἡμεῖς is the more probable reading in ver. 28. Ver. 27, major premise: To the “Jerusalem which is above,” although she does not bear, there are many children promised, who therefore, as Isaac, must have been born purely in virtue of Divine promise.—Ver. 28, minor premise: But now are we, or rather, says the Apostle, with definite application to the readers, for whom particularly the proof is intended, ye are the children of promise, after the analogy of Isaac;—therefore (conclusion) ye are children of the Jerusalem above.

For it is written, Rejoice, thou barren that bearest not, etc.—For the major premise Paul appeals to Isaiah liv. 1. The theocratic nation is addressed during the Babylonian exile, and told that though aforetime in the bloom of Israel’s prosperity she was like a woman “who hath a husband,” who had by her husband numerous children, she now resembled a woman that is “desolate” = without a husband (for it had been repudiated by God), and in consequence—for στυγεῖν is here to be taken in this sense—is “barren,” “not bearing,” “not travelling,” bears no children. (God is to be conceived as the husband, if this part of the figure is also to be interpreted, according to the familiar Biblical image of God’s marriage covenant with Israel.) But yet is she to rejoice, and loudly to express her joy (ᾠήσον sc. φωνήν, rumpe vocem, let loose the voice), for she shall become richer in children than before! This therefore not in the way of natural generation, but through the immediate extraordinary operation of God: they are therefore children not “after the flesh,” but born “through the promise.” (Only, so to speak, the natural, carnal relation of God to the people as begetting natural posterity, was dissolved; God yet remained, in the exercise of a higher energy, devoted to the people as His people, for the very end of bringing in something higher than before.) Evidently in this the image of Sarah hovers before the prophet, of that barren one who was “desolate,” that is, at least as “barren” could have no conjugal intercourse with her husband, and therefore was so far without husband, and who yet became a mother of a numerous progeny in virtue of the Divine energy. Thus even the prophet sees in Sarah a type of the theocratic nation—not, it is true, in her condition of freedom, but at least in her becoming a mother by promise, and therefore is she a type of the theocratic people, inasmuch as this increases not in the natural way—through natural descent, but through the addition of spiritual children.—Herein also is found Paul's justification for referring this passage immediately to "Jerusalem which is above." Primarily, indeed, it applies to the theocratic people as a whole. But even here, to the natural children, =to such as become members of the theocratic people by natural descent, are opposed spiritual children=such as become such in virtue of Divine operation, without natural consanguinity. The sense therefore cannot be merely: The now depopulated Israel shall again become populous, yea, even more than before, by renewal of the now interrupted conjugal intimacy; but from that people of God which increased by natural descent, there is distinguished the people of God in the higher, completely true sense, whose existence does not depend on natural descent, but on Divine operation, that is of course, the operation of the Spirit, inasmuch as God through His Spirit produces faith, and so raises up children to His people, regarded as mother, or to Abraham their first ancestor. There is thus contrasted with the natural, empirical people of God, the one ἐξουσα τὸν ἄνδρα, which is now continued in the present Jerusalem, a higher spiritual one, the one which is "barren, bearing not,"=not naturally maintaining and increasing itself, i. e., in short the "Jerusalem which is above."—The fulfilment of the promise then, took place, i. e., numerous children, without being naturally begotten by the theocratic people, were born to it, in particular, through the appearance of the Messiah, for all, who came to believe on Him, became thereby, and not by natural descent, members of God's people (comp. ver. 28).—But it must here be remarked in addition, that Paul's design is not strictly to declare positively of the Jerusalem above (as even MEYER assumes), that it had first been barren, therefore first unpopulated, childless, and had then become the mother of children (with the origin of the Christian people of God); but he means thereby only to distinguish it from the theocratic people that is maintained and continued by natural means. In distinction from this the Jerusalem above is in its nature—and remains therefore barren, not bearing, not travelling, desolate, for she obtains children indeed, but by no means through becoming fertile, τίκτειν, ὠδίνειν=not by such natural processes, as if these had only failed for awhile, and had then again become operative; on the other hand the children are given to her in a way not to be naturally explained, not as bodily offspring, but spiritually by Divine operation; for she is and remains not "having a husband" (=who does not stand to God in this natural and carnal relation). [ALFORD:—The "husband" of the E. V. may mislead "by pointing at the one husband (Abraham) who was common to Sara and Agar, which might do in this passage, but not in Isaiah: whereas ἐξ. τὸν ἄνδρα means, 'her (of the two) who has (the) husband,' the other having none: a fineness of meaning which we cannot give in English.—R.] This goes to sustain the view of Schmoller.—R.] We need not be perplexed because this would create a divergence from the type of Sarah, with whom certainly, after her barrenness, a bearing and travelling took place. But although Paul undoubtedly knew this well, he yet (vers. 23, 29) denies explicitly and roundly that Isaac was born after the flesh and vindicates to him only a being born through the promise, after the Spirit; and he can very well apprehend the contrast thus absolutely, because he looks only at the essential thing, the determining, generative principle, and this was purely "the promise," "the spirit," even though the act did not proceed without the medium of the "flesh." Sarah, in his meaning, did not obtain her son Isaac, because from a naturally unfruitful woman she had become a naturally fruitful one; her obtaining the son was therefore only, as it were, formally, not essentially, a τίκτειν, &c. (see on ver. 23). But if Paul expresses himself thus even respecting Sarah, with whom nevertheless in a certain sense a τίκτειν, and the like, did take place, the same of course holds good in its full sense of the antitype, the true people of God, as Jerusalem above. This is precisely its specific quality, that it obtains children without "bearing" as "barren," and in this very way approves itself as the true people of God, for which God begets children; therefore we have only: "many are the children of the desolate," not: she will bear many children. Of course "barren" varies a little; at first it is one who cannot bear, because she is deprived of the husband; but from that it becomes one, who does not bear and is to bear, i. e., does not in this way obtain children, and is to obtain them, but in another way. But this variation is already implied in the original sense of the passage, which as it were says: "Barren hast thou become, that cannot bear; well, so shalt thou be and remain, but not to thy hurt, but to thy good," &c.—Many are the children of the desolate more, etc.—MEYER rightly explains: not=π. εἰσὶν αἱ, which would leave the numerosity of the children wholly undetermined, but it expresses, that both have many children, but the solitary one, more=numerous are the children of the solitary, far more, than of her who hath her husband.

Ver. 28 places the Galatians, as Christians, among the children of the Jerusalem above, promised her in ver. 27. As Isaac was.—Κατὰ Ἰσαάκ, in conformity with, according to the type of, even as Isaac. The antitype of the mother, Sarah, was named ver. 26; even so are Christians antitypes of her son, Isaac.—Children of Promise.—opposed to σαρκὸς τέκνα, therefore properly children whom the promise has born—who are born in virtue of the promise of God, not through carnal generation.—So was it with Isaac; he was born to Abraham as son in this way. Even so is it with you: you have in this way been born, i. e., become members of God's people. This needs no proof, for on one side, it was certain that they as Christians were members of God's people, and on the other side also, that they were not so by nature, by carnal descent, but in a spiritual manner, namely, through their knowledge of Christ, to which God had led them by His Spirit, thereby fulfilling His promise. It therefore follows from this, that they belong, because members of the theocratic people, and yet not such by natural descent, to "the children of the desolate" (ver. 27)—have her (to whom, although desolate, children are promised by God) as their mother, as was affirmed in ver. 26.

Ver. 29. Still as then he that was born after the flesh.—Why will you nevertheless be under the law, and so in the condition of bondage? Paul had brought home to his hearers, You are like Isaac, not like Ishmael. This he had deduced from the manner of the birth of each. But now he adds—looking at the subsequent lot of each—a warning, that it is dangerous to place themselves in a position like Ishmael's, for he had been shut out of the inheritance. Even so will it fare—Paul gives them to understand, with those that are like Ishmael—those that are under the law. Ἀλλὰ: for the thought which Paul first expresses, is in opposition to that in the foregoing verse, where he had described Christians as having a possession, as children of the free woman, because children of the promise. Yet Paul does not affirm this in order to frighten them back from the condition of freedom, as one of persecution, but on the contrary (ἀλλὰ, ver. 30) in order to set forth immediately after the evil lot of the children of the bondwoman, as persecutors, and thus to hinder the Christians from placing themselves, through bondage to the law, in a like position with them.

Persecuted.—In Gen. xxi. 9, Ishmael is mentioned only as a scoffer: Paul here then either uses διώκειν in a more general sense, or he follows a more developed tradition, traces of which are found in the Rabbinists. [διώκειν is a strong word, and we are not justified in altering or extending its meaning to meet a difficulty, arising from the interpretation of another passage. The question then is: Is this statement of the Apostle based only upon the Scriptural narrative (Gen. xxi. 9), or also upon some other reliable source of information, supplementing the Old Testament narrative. The chief objection urged by most modern commentators against the former of these views is, that there is no thought of "persecution" either expressed or implied in the passage referred to. It tells us of Ishmael's "laughing" (ᾠκίζε: which the LXX. expands into παίζοντα μετὰ Ἰσαὰκ τοῦ υἱοῦ αὐτοῦς)]; this has been interpreted as in play awakening Sarah's jealousy, and as mockery, arousing her anger. Obviously the latter is more in accordance with the context and is a legitimate rendering of the Hebrew (see LANGE'S Com. Gen. in loco). But is it said that even this view of the narrative will not justify the assertion "persecuted." WORDSWORTH, accepting the meaning "playing," remarks: "The temper in which Ishmael played with Isaac, may best be inferred from the comment which Isaac's mother made upon it. Sarah's words interpret Ishmael's act. If his play had been loving play, she would not have been displeased by it. It must have been the spirit of spiteful malice, made more offensive by its pretence to sportiveness and love,* which extorted from Sarah the words which the Holy Spirit, speaking by St. Paul, here calls a verdict of Scripture. And Almighty God Himself vouchsafed to confirm Sarah's interpretation of Ishmael's play, by commanding Abraham, although reluctant, to hearken to Sarah's voice in that matter." It would seem that an inspired Apostle, reading the Old Testament narrative in the full gospel light, could interpret the spirit of that occurrence, without relying on tradition. If however the objection urged by MEYER, DE WETTE, JOWETT, and others, be deemed valid, as even ELLICOTT admits them to be, the following remarks of LIGHTFOOT may well be taken into account. "1) This incident which is so lightly sketched in the original narrative had been drawn out in detail in later traditions, and thus a prominence was given to it, which would add force to the Apostle's allusion, without his endorsing these traditions himself. 2) The relations between the two brothers were reproduced in their descendants. The aggressions of the Arab tribes on the Israelites were the antitype to Ishmael's mockery of Isaac. Thus in Ishmael the Apostle may have indirectly contemplated Ishmael's progeny; and he would therefore be appealing to the national history of the Jews in saying 'he that was born after the flesh persecuted him that was born after the Spirit.'"—R.]

After the Spirit.—The one born according to the Spirit. The Spirit of God was the power by which the generation of Isaac took place. The Spirit however is here conceived not as the power, but as the norm, according to which the generation took place—he was begotten in the way and manner in which the Spirit begets. "After the flesh" is to be interpreted in the same way.

Even so now.—Those born after the Spirit—"the children of promise" are persecuted by those born after the flesh—the natural members of the theocratic people, the Jews. But the main point is not the suffering of persecution by the one, although the thought of it occasions the ἀλλὰ, but the persecution of the others. See ver. 30.—To what this specially refers, is hard to say: that there was no lack of persecutions on the part of the Jews, is indeed well known. That the plotting of the Judaizers against the Christians are also meant, is probable; for these Judaizers believed themselves to have a preëminence, precisely as those born after the flesh, and, as our whole Epistle shows, took a position, which though professedly in the interest of others' salvation, was nevertheless really hostile towards those who were only "born after the Spirit," or only set a value on this, and denied to them a title to membership among the people of God. A similar self-exaltation over others and a disposition to suppress them, took place also, he says, in the case of Ishmael with respect to Isaac. But it turned out the other way.

[WORDSWORTH: "St. Paul's comparison here is peculiarly apposite and relevant to the subject before him. The Judaizers, with whom he is dealing in this Epistle, were like Ishmael, the son of the bondwoman Agar, the representative of the Old Covenant not spiritually understood. They professed friendship for the Galatian Christians, who were the spiritual Isaac. In semblance they were playing with the offspring of the free woman, but in reality they were persecuting him. The Judaizers were endeavoring to rob the Galatian Christians of their Evangelical inheritance derived from Abraham. Thus Ishmael pretended to be playing with Isaac, but was in fact persecuting him. The Apostle, therefore, who had just been comparing himself to an affectionate mother, comes forward as a vigilant Sarah, and interferes to part the Jewish Ishmael from the Christian Isaac; and to rescue the children of the promise and of freedom from the treacherous flattery and tyrannical sport of the children of the flesh and of bondage." This beautiful comparison is of course marred by any reference to tradition in our verse.—R.]

Ver. 30. Cast out the bondwoman and her son, etc.—Paul here cites the words of Sarah Gen. xxi. 10 according to the LXX., only instead of μετὰ τοῦ υἱοῦ μου Ἰσαὰκ, he substitutes, because the expression is severed from the context, μετὰ τοῦ υἱοῦ τῆς ἐλευθερίας; therewith stating expressly the meaning of Sarah; for it is from this very point of view, namely, that her son is the son of the free woman, that she comes forward so decidedly against Ishmael, as the son of the bondmaid, declares that he is not entitled to be co-heir with her son, and demands his expulsion. It is not the personal behavior of Ishmael therefore which she urges against him, but his position, although, it is true, she is moved to do it by his behavior. As he is in himself not entitled to be co-heir, this right possessed against him is now urged—and as the narrative shows, made good. The application with an "even so now," Paul leaves to the readers as being obvious, because through the whole argument he desires that they themselves may see the perverseness of the position which they are on the point of assuming. It would be thus supplied: Even so now—will it fare with the children of the bondmaid; they have as little right of inheritance as the son of the bondmaid had then, and this want of title will be brought into force against them on account of their persecution (so that in this particular also they will prove themselves antitypes of Hagar and Ishmael). The reference to the expulsion of these does not as yet apply immediately to the readers, but if they suffer themselves to be made children of the bondmaid—and what that signifies is clear—by going over to the legal Jewish position, they lose at all events their right of inheritance, and are on the way to lose also the inheritance itself. Paul specifies the persecution primarily because the Divine exclusion from the inheritance was historically occasioned by that. A searching admonition, "to hear the law better" (ver. 21)—to take better note of the intimations which are contained therein—and therefore not to place themselves under the law.

[LIGHTFOOT: "Shall in nowise inherit! The Law and the Gospel cannot coexist; the Law must disappear before the Gospel. It is scarcely possible to estimate the strength of conviction and depth of prophetic insight which this declaration implies. The Apostle thus confidently sounds the death-knell of Judaism at a time when one-half of Christendom clung to the Mosaic law with a jealous affection little short of frenzy, and while the Judaic party seemed to be growing in influence and was strong enough, even in the Gentile churches of his own founding, to undermine his influence and endanger his life. The truth which to us appears a truism must then have been regarded as a paradox."—R.]

The course of thought begun in ver. 21, concludes therefore with our verse in a complete and satisfactory way: Take heed then to the law, and learn from it: (1) that ye are free as Christians and (2) that ye, if ye do not persevere in this freedom, forfeit the inheritance—so that necessarily the conclusion must be drawn with ver. 30, and ver. 31 cannot be viewed as an immediate deduction from what precedes, nor as a conclusion, but only as a sentence summing up once more the foregoing result and introducing a transition to what follows, on which account it is to be joined with it.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The personal relation between teacher and congregation. The significance which attaches to the personal relation between teacher and congregation (see on the former section, the first remark), comes most evidently to view in this, that the teacher must regard it as his commission, to beget spiritual children (and that truly living ones)—as father, nay, yet more: to bear them also—as mother. There is thus of necessity constituted an inner bond of personal fellowship between him and the souls on which he labors; but it is true, the existence of such a bond is not to be presupposed as a matter of course, or demanded even where the condition of such a loving labor of spiritual begetting and bearing is wanting.

2. "Christ is formed (1) in the understanding of man, when he receives a truly living and spiritual knowledge of Christ's person, offices, and benefits; (2) in the will of man, when (a) in regeneration faith in Christ is not only kindled, but also attains to its fit form, so that he hangs simply and solely on Christ, which faith then in justification apprehends and puts on Christ, and unites itself inwardly with Him; (b) in renewal, when Christ's Divine mind is daily more and more formed in men, so that the lineaments of Christ's image become ever more discernible.—It reads moreover: Till Christ be formed in you, not, Till you or I form Him in you, because regeneration is no human work."—STARKE.

3. The allegory. What view are we to hold of the interpretation of the two wives and sons of Abraham in this section? Is Paul a representative of that allegorical interpretation which presupposing a double, yes, multiplex sense of the Biblical text, long prevailed in the church, to the prejudice of the sound historical understanding of the contents of Scripture? The appearance is strongly for it, but in truth it is not so. Paul to be sure allegorizes here, for he says so himself. But with the very fact of his saying this himself, the gravity of the hermeneutical difficulty disappears. He means therefore to give an allegory, not an exposition; he does not proceeded as an exegete, and does not mean to say—after the manner of the allegorizing exegetes—that only what he now says is the true sense of the narrative, conceded in the letter, the only sense really worthy of God's word. The question then is only (1) whether this allegorical interpretation is merely a subjective fancy of the Apostle, or whether it is grounded in the actual facts; (2) what use he makes of this allegory. Commonly these two questions are not kept distinct from each other. Respecting the first, no one can speak of a mere arbitrary fancy (of a play of allegorical sharp-wittedness, rabbinism, and the like), who pays the least attention to the typical significance which according to Paul appertains to Abraham and his history,—and who allows any justice whatever in this the Apostle's view of Abraham. We well know that for Paul Abraham himself is typical by his faith, and in immediate connection with that, Isaac is typical by his birth through the power of the Divine promise, and not of the flesh; he is the type of the true children of Abraham, i. e., of the true theocratic people, whose origin is not that of natural birth alone (comp. Rom. ix. 16 sq.). This of itself then gives on the other hand the converse, namely, the typical character of the carnal son, Ishmael. But now, in this section, Paul goes yet a step further. To him not only the manner of birth of the two sons of Abraham is typical, but also the condition in which they were born: the bondage of the one and the freedom of the other. Isaac is thus the type of a theocratic people, that (1) does not become such by natural birth, but by Divine operation; (2) and is also in possession of freedom, is the spiritual and free Israel; on the contrary Ishmael is the type of a merely natural and enslaved theocratic people; that is, the natural people of God is enslaved by its being under the law, something which is not true of the spiritual, genuine Israel. Respecting the warrant for a typological apprehension of the Old Testament generally, WIESELER justly remarks: "Since the whole of the Old Covenant is a σκη of the New Testament dispensation, the single facts, persons and truths have therefore a prefigurative character, according to the measure in which each has within this whole and in relation to the New Covenant, a conspicuous and central significance." That this applies to the person of Abraham is clear, and equally to the manner in which children were born to him, for through Abraham's children the progress of the history of redemption is determined. But if even with an Isaac it is primarily only the manner of his birth to which this signification attached, yet the condition in which he was born, was an inseparable element of that; for from the legitimate, and therefore free, wife of Abraham, came naturally also the legitimate son, the son of promise; the freedom of Isaac was therefore not an accidental but an essential quality of him who was born in virtue of a Divine promise, and so Paul has a right to attribute to the fact of his freedom also, a typical importance, and to attribute the same to the opposite condition of Ishmael. If this prefigurative character of Abraham and his sons is acknowledged, it is clear, that the Apostle's allegory is not arbitrary or accidental, but that it has a point of attachment in the actual history. But—and this is commonly overlooked—the allegory is not on this account eliminated from the passage; the allegory has its ground in the typical relation of Abraham's two children to the two congregations of God, but yet for all this it is in form allegory. For αἱ τὶς γὰρ εἰσι δύο διαθήκαι is allegory, not typology; the two women were certainly not prophetic types of the two covenants. Something like this might be said, that the two women are, as mothers of the two diverse children of Abraham, types of the two churches of God, the external and the spiritual, conceived as collective personalities, as mothers of their members, although even this would be strained; but to say outright that the two mothers are prophetic types of two covenants, yields no rational sense. Only by allegorizing can Paul see in the two mothers two covenants, but the allegory is taken from the facts themselves, inasmuch as it is the covenants by which the character of the antitypes of the sons of those mothers is determined. It is necessary to acknowledge this mingling of Type and Allegory, or the passage will not be rightly apprehended. We feel that it is not merely allegory, and look for the type, and again we feel that it is not purely type; the two, in truth, are interwoven with each other.

If we could venture to draw from our section a general conclusion, it would be this: (1) that allegorizing portions of Scripture is not forbidden, provided only that it is acknowledged as such, and not given forth as exegesis proper; (2) that it is warranted in proportion as it has a typological basis which itself is authorized. What this is may be judged by the remarks above.—While we should acknowledge, therefore, that our allegory has an objective foundation, that Paul does not interpolate something into the narrative of Genesis at his own fancy, it is not on the other hand (to come to the second inquiry, as to the use he makes of it), correct to say that "he ascribes to it an objective value as proof." For that he is too sober-minded, for he undoubtedly is, as was remarked, far removed from that allegorizing exegesis which bona fide declares: This and this is meant in the passage besides the letter [? See below.—R.], and which therefore upon this assumption proves the "higher truth" by means of allegorical explanation from a Scripture passage. If we look more closely, we find moreover, that he does not at all argue his proposition of the freedom of Christians from the narrative of Genesis; he does not infer any thing like this: Sarah signifies the upper Jerusalem, Isaac the Christians, therefore Christians are the children of the upper Jerusalem; moreover Sarah is free, therefore the upper Jerusalem is free, and Christians are children of the free congregation, and therefore likewise free. On the other hand he asserts the freedom of the Jerusalem above as self-evident, and resulting from the previously assumed ground of the covenant of grace, on which it rests, as opposed to the covenant of works, and then first expressly demonstrates from a prophetic passage that Christians are children of the Jerusalem above, and so comes to the conclusion that they are free (see the exegesis above). If it is inquired: Why then is the narrative of Genesis adduced, a narrative of type interwoven with allegory? the answer is simple: in order, by reference to the simple relations of things in the beginning of the theocratic people, to illustrate the higher relations of the present, or better: in order to furnish a confirmation of the latter by pointing out the relation between type and antitype—see, at the very beginning it was the same! For that typology may serve, with or without the application of allegory, which of course makes no difference, but not for strict proof; and still less bare allegory, when and where it is acknowledged as such.—We cannot draw a different conclusion from the remark, ver. 21: Do ye not hear the law? The sense is simply: Do ye not then see that matters stood just the same with the ancient typical personages? The spiritually begotten Son was born in the condition of freedom and that should dispose you to give credit to my previous argument! Here the expression sounds, it is true, as if every reader of the law would be constrained to deduce this from the narrative in Genesis, as if this therefore simply signified the higher truth which is now under discussion, and merely expressed it under the veil of history; still whoever gives even cursory attention will not be tempted to press these words, but will recognize in them a rhetorical drapery.

4. [Paul's treatment of the Old Testament narrative. A reference to the exegesis of ver. 24 will justify the following conclusions: 1) Paul does not regard the Old Testament narrative as in itself an allegory. He is careful to use a subject (ἄνθρωπος) which is general enough to prevent our making such an unwarranted assumption. 2) His interpretation is not "subjective, fanciful or rabbinical."* The predicate ἀλληγοροῦμενα means "to have an allegorical meaning." Hence the meaning inheres in the nature of the "things," and does not depend on his acute speculation respecting them. On exegetical grounds, Schmoller is not warranted in affirming that Paul does not imply: "This and this is meant in the passage besides the letter." In his proper anxiety to guard against "allegorizing exegesis" he gives some room for assumptions respecting the "subjective" character of this allegory of the Apostle. Against such attempts to represent the interpretation of St. Paul as subjective, i. e., to speak plainly erroneous, ELLICOTT properly remarks: "It would be well for such writers to remember that St. Paul is here declaring, under the influence of the Holy Spirit, that the passage he has cited has a second and a deeper meaning than it appears to have; that it has that meaning, then, is a positive, objective and indisputable truth."—3) This passage gives no countenance to "allegorizing exegesis" of the Scriptures. This error, once so common, may have a different origin from attempts to make the Bible narrative a mere allegory, but it tends in the same direction, destroys the true knowledge and perverts the true use of the Scriptures. He may properly allegorize, who has the inspiration Paul had, but only when that inspiration shows him that "these things have an allegorical meaning." On this point CALVIN says: "As the Apostle declares that these things are allegorized, Origen and many others along with him, have seized the occasion of torturing Scripture, in every possible manner, away from the true sense. They concluded that the literal sense is too mean and poor, and that, under the outward bark of the letter, there lurk deeper mysteries, which cannot be extracted but by beating out allegories. And this they had no difficulty in accomplishing: for speculations which appear to be ingenious have always been preferred, and always will be preferred by the world to sound doctrine. For many centuries no man was considered to be ingenious, who had not the skill and daring necessary for changing into a variety of curious shapes the sacred word of God. This was undoubtedly a contrivance of Satan to undermine the authority of Scripture, and to take away from the reading of it the true advantage. God visited this profanation by a just judgment, when He suffered the pure meaning of the Scripture to be buried under false interpretations. I acknowledge that Scripture is a most rich and inexhaustible fountain of all wisdom; but I deny that its fertility consists in the various meanings which any man, at his pleasure, may assign. Let us know, then, that the true meaning of Scripture is the natural and obvious meaning; and let us embrace and abide by it resolutely."*—R.]

*[LIGHTFOOT gives Philo's allegory of this same passage, and compares it with Paul's: "Philo's allegory is as follows. Abraham—the human soul progressing towards the knowledge of God—unites himself first with Sarah and then with Hagar. These two alliances stand in direct opposition the one to the other. Sarah, the princess—for such is the interpretation of the word—is divine wisdom. To her therefore Abraham is hidden to listen in all that she says. On the other hand Hagar, whose name signifies 'sojourning,' and points therefore to something transient and unsatisfying, is a preparatory or intermediate training—the instruction of the schools—secular learning, as it might be termed in modern phrase. Hence she is fitly described as an Egyptian, as Sarah's handmaid. Abraham's alliance with Sarah is at first premature. He is not sufficiently advanced in his moral and spiritual development to profit thereby. As yet he begets no son by her. She therefore directs him to go in to her handmaid, to apply himself to the learning of the schools. This inferior alliance proves fruitful at once. At a later date and after this preliminary training he again unites himself to Sarah; and this time his union with divine wisdom is fertile. Not only does Sarah bear him a son, but she is pointed out as the mother of a countless offspring. Thus is realized the strange paradox that the barren woman is most fruitful. Thus in the progress of the human soul are verified the words of the prophet, spoken in an allegory, that 'the desolate hath many children.'"

But the allegory does not end here. The contrast between the mothers is reproduced in the contrast between the sons. Isaac represents the wisdom of the wise man; Ishmael the sophistry of the sophist. Sophistry must in the end give place to wisdom. The son of the bondwoman must be cast out and flee before the son of the princess.

Such is the ingenious application of Philo—most like and yet most unlike that of St. Paul. They both allegorize, and in so doing they touch upon the same points in the narrative, they use the same text by way of illustration. Yet in their whole tone and method they stand in direct contrast, and their results have nothing in common. Philo is, as usual, wholly unhistorical. With St. Paul, on the other hand, Hagar's career is an allegory, because it is a history. The symbol and the thing symbolized are the same in kind. This simple passage of patriarchal life represents in miniature the workings of God's Providence hereafter to be exhibited in grander proportions in the history of the Christian church. The Christian Apostle and the philosophic Jew move in parallel lines, or as it were, keeping side by side, and yet never once crossing each other's path.

And there is still another point in which the contrast between the two is great. With Philo the allegory is the

*[Every proper theory of inspiration must admit that Paul's early education had its influence on his character as teacher. But the word "rabbinical" contains a moral or rather immoral implication, which cannot be allowed.—R.]

5. The two covenants and their children. The fact that the Apostle recognizes a significance in the Scripture narrative of the twofold character of the wives and sons of Abraham, is a sign of his clear-minded way of viewing the Scripture; by the less reminded of the greater, in the germ already seeing the fruit. It is at the same time a sign of his pedagogic wisdom, that to those who boasted themselves of their descent from Abraham, he so simply discovers the insufficiency, and particularly the perversity of this boast, by referring to the twofold relation of sonship to Abraham, of which the one is so entirely destitute of ground for boasting. On the other hand, he shows here also again, as in chap. iii., his deep and clear view into the economy of salvation, and its guiding principles, in the first place by definitely distinguishing the two covenants in the history of redemption, and then by the way in which he characterizes them. There is a covenant of law and a covenant of grace; and both are mothers, that bear children, only in different wise and with different consequences. The first covenant bears children in the way of natural generation, for it finds its concrete manifestation in the carnal Israel and its members. All the natural children of Israel have part in this covenant; but it is simply a covenant which brings to the participants in it bondage and only that, for it imposes on them the law. It is widely different with the covenant of grace. This also has children, yea a great number of them, but these children God Himself brings to it through the operation of the Spirit (it does not obtain them, as it were, of itself), for this covenant finds its concrete manifestation in the spiritual Israel, which obtains its children in a spiritual way, and not by outward descent. This is the first covenant which brings to its members freedom, and does not transfer them into bondage under a law; for it does not make the attainment of God's blessing dependent on the keeping of legal commandments and prohibitions, but secures it to its members as a pure bestowment of Divine grace. Intimately related therefore as Paul knows these two covenants and communities to stand to each other (for they are still like children of the one father), yet again he keeps them sharply and clearly apart.—Especially noticeable is the conception of the upper Jerusalem, the signification of which has been explained above. In the first place, therefore, Paul distinguishes the spiritual from the carnal Israel, the ideal from the empirical. With the external Israel the idea of the theocratic people was as yet by no means realized as to its true substance; on the contrary this was a conception of much higher range. Therefore all vaunting by the Jews of their nationality, as alone entitled to be reckoned God's people, is ungrounded. Above the theocratic people in its national manifestation within the Jewish community stood yet again the true people of God, that even in this community already found individual members, for under the Old Testament all were not children of Ishmael's, and under the New Testament all are not children of Israel's sort. And indeed from Abraham down, the true people of God was never quite extinct, but yet, so long as the covenant of law, and therewith the carnal Israel were in the ascendant, it could not yet come to developed existence. This it attained only through Christ. It is noticeable, secondly, that Paul in this conception of the Jerusalem above, has a conception, which stands still higher than that of the Christian body; the Jerusalem above is the mother. Christians are only the children. Unquestionably, however, they are actually the children, and so far even in this expression their rank is declared—they are children of no lesser one, and should therefore not forget what they owe to themselves and their rank, should not unworthily lower themselves. But on the other hand, they are only children, and are what they are, only through their mother. The Christian community is not of itself in its empirical manifestation already—the spiritual Israel, but has continually in this its spiritualis nutrix. We see how that which Paul expresses with his "Jerusalem above" is what dogmatic theology has endeavored to embody in its conception of an ecclesia invisibilis, by which it strives to guard the church against a false emphasizing of her empirical manifestation, and as it were to preserve to her her ideality. Only that the conception of the ecclesia invisibilis is in the first place a narrower one, limited more to the church since Christ, and still more, it is a secondary and negative one, first formed by abstraction from the mixed condition of the church on earth, while the idea of the Jerusalem above is a positive, primary one, grounded in the biblical economy of salvation itself.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 19. LUTHER:—The Apostles, all devout preachers and also schoolmasters, are (in their peculiar way) also our parents. For like as we from our natural birth have from our parents the form of our bodies, so do these men help thereto, that our heart and conscience attain within us to a perfect form. Now the perfect form which a Christian heart should have, is faith, whereby we lay hold on Christ, cleave to Him alone and to no other thing besides.—BERLENB. BIBLE:—In nothing do more pangs of travail come to pass, than in the ministration of the gospel. The ministration of the law is a mere nothing compared with it. Evangelical preaching excludes all works accomplished in a merely outward way to which men nevertheless cleave.—"Until" points to a troublesome delay, that falls between the beginning and the accomplishment of a matter; not as if God would not at once proceed to the formation of us, but because on the side of man a bolt is interposed, and yet God does not give over.—LANGE:—Even, as in many men, especially in their outward habit, gestures, words and actions, we find such a fashion of the world, that as it were we see in them even personally the vanity, wantonness and folly of the world, and whole substance of his teaching; with Paul it is but an accessory. He uses it rather as an illustration than an argument, as a means of representing in a lively form the lessons before enforced on other grounds. It is, to use Luther's comparison, the painting which decorates the house already built."

The very pleasing character of Philo's allegory is a warning against such interpretations. They always aim to be as captivating as his, and often succeed, only to be most unlike Paul's "in tone and method."—R.]

are inwardly troubled at it; so on the other hand, in believers who come to their proper vigor, the new birth from God appears in all about them, saving their yet remaining weaknesses, in such a manner, that we see in them a true form of Christ in their weakness, humility, simplicity and uprightness, and are moved to inward joy thereby.

Ver. 20. LUTHER:—The living voice is to be counted as an empress. For this can amplify or condense the matter, and suit itself to all occasions of time, place, persons and the requirement of any necessity.

Ver. 21. RIEGER:—The will has very great influence in the belief and unbelief of men. Even in falling back under the law, the will of the flesh seeks its advantage. The law is indeed the world's crafty covering, under which it slinks away from the truth of Christ; which covering must be withdrawn from it.—FRANTZ:—In the law there is contained more than the commandments; more than the ways and usages, ceremonies and ordinances enjoined in the worship of the Jews. There is also more contained therein, than many after the letter read therein. There is contained therein also a revelation of the ways of God, which God hath chosen, to carry out His everlasting purpose among men. There is contained therein a history, which has come to pass from its beginning to its accomplishment on earth, that therein, as in a mirror, should be made known the thoughts of peace and salvation, which God has towards men and which in due time He will carry into execution.

Ver. 23.—Nature assists us not to salvation, but grace alone. We are all according to our natural birth born flesh of flesh; but according to His promise hath God regenerated us through the bath of holy baptism.

Ver. 24. RIEGER:—This example serves to guard us against dealing too slightly with the history of the Old Testament.—BERLENB. BIBLE:—All that Moses has described are figures of the inner spiritual and genuine life in Christ.—SPENER:—“Bringeth forth unto bondage.” Those that will be saved by the law and its works and therefore reject the gospel, are not God's children, nor heirs of eternal life, but at their highest are only servants and therefore under sin and the curse.

Ver. 26. LUTHER:—The holy church bears and genders children continually, even to the last day, in that she exercises the ministry, that is, teaches and diffuses the gospel which is her manner of bearing. Now the gospel teaches that we are redeemed and become free from the curse of the law, from sin, death and all manner of ill, not through the law and works, but through Christ. Therefore is the holy church not subjected to the law or works, but free is she, a mother without law, without sin and death. But what she is as a mother, so are also her children.—“Free.”—Even the ten commandments have no right to accuse, nor to terrify the conscience, wherein Christ rules by His grace and moreover outwardly: the civil laws of Moses concern us no longer. Yet the gospel does not therewith make us free from all other civil laws, for so long as we are in this natural life, the gospel subjects us to the civil laws which the government of each land has. But since our mortal life must forsooth have some ceremonies, we can by no means dispense with them. Therefore the gospel admits that we may make in the Christian Church some special ordinances concerning holy days, times, places, etc.—but not in the thought that those who observe such order, should thereby merit forgiveness of sins.

Ver. 27. Although the little flock, i. e., the dear Christian Church, that receives the doctrine of the gospel, and earnestly cleaves thereto, appears altogether unfruitful, forsaken, weak and despicable, and moreover outwardly suffers persecution, and is constrained to hear herself accused of teaching heretical and seditious things, she is nevertheless alone fruitful before God, and brings forth through the ministry innumerable many children, who are heirs of eternal life.

Ver. 28. In STARKE:—Natural birth has with God no preëminence; He chooses Abel before Cain, Jacob before Esau, Ephraim before Manasses, etc.; whoever feareth Him and worketh righteousness, is accepted of Him, and whomever cleaves in true faith to the promise, is a child of one promise, and shall attain to the promised everlasting inheritance.—If we are like Isaac in his birth, let us also become like him in his virtues.

Ver. 29. LANGE:—Whatever church oppresses and persecutes another in matters of faith, such an one is not the true apostolic church; therefore also she neither stands in the true filial relation to God, nor has part in the inheritance of eternal life.—LUTHER:—It is ever thus, that Ishmael persecutes Isaac, but on the contrary the good Isaac leaves Ishmael in peace. Whoever will be unpersecuted by Ishmael, let him profess that he is no Christian.—SPENER:—The church's condition is in some particulars ever the same; it may always be said: As it was at that time so is it now.

Ver. 30.—SPENER:—Persecutions harm in fact not the persecuted but the persecutors. To the persecuted there remains yet God's grace, love and heaven, but the persecutors load themselves with God's wrath.—BERLENB. BIBLE:—The whole natural man must, as a scoffer and wild man such as Ishmael was, be set aside from all righteousness of birth, and devices of his own through a renewed obedient will. And although that involves a dying and giving up, inasmuch as the false nature sinks into the death of its own desires and so becomes powerless, yet the new awakened sense makes no account of that, because it has a hatred against the old man, and renounces therefore courageously all impulses of nature, let them have as holy a seeming as they may. Thereby the scoffer becomes in his turn a scoffing before the new man.

Vers. 21–30. Two sorts of children of Abraham: to which dost thou belong? To the children of the bondwoman or of the freewoman? Law or grace? Either—or? 1. The two stand indeed in relation to each other (one Father), but yet are 2. essentially distinct (two widely different mothers). a. Law—Flesh (= the lawman still the carnal man), Grace—Spirit (= the carnal man has no part in it); b. Law—Bondage, Grace—Freedom.—Christians are children, not of the bondwoman, but of the freewoman. 1. Rejoice! 2. Consider well!—The Jerusalem above 1. a mother, 2. a mother through promise, 3. a free mother.—The covenant of law a fruitful mother. (Many depend on it, because the natural man remains thereby natural), but yet the covenant of grace has the promise of God.—Christians are children of the Jerusalem above. 1. How? Because children of the promise. 2. What do they obtain thereby? They participate in her condition of freedom.—The Jerusalem above free: 1) not bound to the law = not held to obtaining salvation by works of the law; 2) not obnoxious to its curse. The children of the promise, i. e., 1. They are members of God's people not by nature but only through promise; 2. they attain heavenly inheritance, only in consequence of promise, not by their own works.—Christians have their type in Isaac; 1. Born as he through promise (see above); 2. Persecuted like him, by Ishmael, 3. but for all that children of the freewoman and therefore alone heirs.—Who obtains the inheritance? 1) not the natural man, but the spiritual; 2) not the son of the bond woman but of the freewoman.—Human self-will (Hagar, Ishmael), divine counsel; 1) The latter permits the former, 2) but still gains the victory.

E. Admonition to perseverance in Christian freedom—with a threatening allusion to the pernicious consequences of the opposite course.

CHAPTER IV. 31—V. 6.

31 So then [Wherefore],¹ brethren, we are not children of the [a] bondwoman, but IV. 1 of the free. Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free [Stand fast therefore in the liberty for which Christ made us free, or For freedom Christ made us free. Stand fast therefore],² and be not entangled again with 2 [in] the yoke of bondage. Behold, I Paul³ say unto you, that if ye be circumcised 3 [i. e., submit to circumcision],⁴ Christ shall [will] profit you nothing. For [Moreover, ὁ δὲ continuative] I testify again to every man that is circumcised [who has him- 4 self circumcised], that he is a debtor to do the whole law. Christ is become of no effect unto you [Ye are separated from Christ],⁵ whosoever of you are justified [being 5 justified] by [in] the law; ye are fallen [fallen away] from grace. For we through 6 [by] the Spirit wait⁶ for the hope of righteousness by [from] faith. For in Jesus Christ [Christ Jesus] neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision; but faith which worketh by [working through] love.

F. Renewed lamentation over the apostasy of the Galatians. Sharp testimony against the misleading misrepresentations of his preaching on the part of the false teachers.

CHAPTER V. 7-12.

7 Ye did run [were running] well; who did hinder⁷ you that ye should not obey 8, 9 the truth? This [The] persuasion cometh not of him that calleth you. A lit- 10 tle leaven leaveneth⁸ the whole lump. I [I, for my part] have confidence in [as regards] you through [in] the Lord, that ye will be none [in nothing] otherwise 11 minded: but he that troubleth you shall bear his judgment, whosoever he be. And [But] I, brethren, if I yet [still] preach circumcision, why do I yet [still] suffer 12 persecution? then is the offence of the cross ceased [the scandal of the cross done away with]. I would they were even cut off which trouble you [I would that they who are unsettling you would even mutilate themselves, or would even cut themselves off from you].¹⁰

¹ Ver. 31.—Ν, δε. [So B. D^l. Lachmann, Tischendorf, Meyer, Ellicott, Alford, Lightfoot. 'Απα (Rec.) is feebly supported; as also ἡμεῖς δε.—R.]

² Ver. 1.—The correct reading is probably that of Lachmann: τῇ ἐλευθερίᾳ ἡμᾶς Χριστὸς ἠλευθέρωσεν στήκετε οὖν. So Ν, which also begins chap. v. with στήκετε. [This reading is supported also by A. B. C. D., and adopted by Usteri, Meyer (4th ed., Schmoller mentions the other reading as his) and Alford. Τῇ ἐλευθερίᾳ. ἥ ἡμᾶς Χριστὸς ἠλευθέρωσεν, στήκετε οὖν is supported by D.² E. K. L., the great majority of cursives, many versions and fathers, and is adopted by Griesbach, Rückert, Tischendorf, Wieseler, Ellicott, Wordsworth, Lightfoot (who differs in punctuation however). Between these two readings the choice is very difficult. The authorities are so equally divided, and as the verbal difference is slight, the critical question resolves itself into this delicate one: whether the transcriber was more likely to have omitted or inserted η, because of ἡμᾶς immediately following. Meyer thinks it was inserted, others that it was omitted. The latter opinion seems more probable, and the second reading is preferable on diplomatic grounds. The renderings given above are in accordance with the two readings, but minor variations in interpretation are noticed in the EXEG. NOTES.

We find besides, οὐν placed after ἐλευθερία, but this is feebly supported; it is put after στήκετε in κ. A. B. C. F. O. On this position of the particle, an argument for Lachmann's punctuation is based, though it is not decisive. Χριστός is placed before ἡμᾶς in C. K. L.; after it in κ. A. B. D. E. F. G.

Lightfoot not only begins a new sentence at στήκετε, but, retaining ἡ, is forced to join the first clause directly with ver. 31, and to render: we are sons "of her who is free with that freedom which Christ has given us." So Schott and Rinck. This seems forced, but Lightfoot's note on the various readings is valuable.—On the other variations from the E. V., in this verse, see EXEG. NOTES.—R.]

³ Ver. 2.—κ omits ἡ, inserted however by the corrector.

⁴ Ver. 2.—Both here and in ver. 3, the reference is not to the fact of having been circumcised, but now resorting to the rite as necessary.—R.]

⁵ Ver. 4.—[Schmoller renders: abgetrennt seid ihr von (der gemeinschaft mit) Christo. The construction is pregnant, and scarcely admits of a literal translation. Vulgate: evacuati estis a. Alford's "annihilates from Christ" is objectionable. Ellicott's paraphrase is good: "Your union with Christ became void" (so Meyer). It seems both more lively and more exact to retain the present in English, since "the aorists (κατηργήθητε, ἐξέπισατε) represent the consequences as instantaneous" (Lightfoot).—R.]

⁶ Ver. 5.—κ has ἐκδεχόμεθα, κ. δ ἀπεκδεχόμεθα.

⁷ Ver. 7.—[Rec. has ἀνέκοψε, but the correct reading is ἐνέκοψε (all MSS., most cursives, and modern editors).—R.]

⁹ Ver. 9.—δοῦλοι is a gloss.

¹⁰ Ver. 12.—[See EXEG. NOTES, on the meaning of this verse.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 31. Wherefore, brethren, we are not children of a bondwoman.—Paul, after the indirect warning in vers. 29, 30, sums up the contents of vers. 22 sq. once more, in an exact form, appealing to the Christian sense of dignity—you will therefore surely not suffer yourselves to be reduced to children of the bondwoman. [Notice the omission of the article: "not of any bondwoman," Judaism or any form of heathenism (LIGHTFOOT, MEYER, ELLICOTT). This explanation is more striking and appropriate than that of ALFORD, who is disposed to think παίδισκος is anarthrous, because emphatically prefixed to its governing noun.—R.]—But of the free,—therefore ourselves free. This Paul expressly states in the following sentence.

Ver. 1, refers the freedom of Christians to Christ; yet the main idea is no longer the fact or method of their having become free, but the end, namely: τῇ ἐλευθερίᾳ, for freedom, for being and remaining free. Then follows the admonition itself: στήκετε, used absolutely, without any modifying clause—remain firm. [Schmoller follows Lachmann, in beginning a new sentence with στήκετε; of course if a different punctuation is adopted, the verb is modified by the preceding clause, without altering its meaning however. He also takes τῇ ἐλευθερίᾳ as dative commodi, "for freedom," not instrumental, "with freedom" (so ALFORD). It must be remarked that this pointing makes the style very abrupt, and that since the stress in this interpretation rests on for freedom, the end of their being made free, so emphatic a thought would scarcely be expressed by a dative of doubtful force, for as LIGHTFOOT observes, the dative is awkward, in whatever way it is taken. Even MEYER explains the passage far more satisfactorily, on the theory that the other reading is correct. Following this reading, we render: "Stand fast therefore in the liberty for" or "with which Christ made us free." The prominent dative then denotes "the sphere in which and to which the action is limited" (ELLICOTT); and the relative ἣ is either dative commodi (WINER, ELLICOTT) or ablative (instrumental, LUTHER, BEZA, CALVIN). MEYER thinks this latter usage is uncommon with Paul. The former is safer. The sense is then: therefore stand fast in that liberty (which is our state as children of the freewoman, and) for which, to remain in which, Christ made us free.—R.]

Be not entangled again.—As Gentiles they had not formerly been under the yoke of the Mosaic law, but for all that had certainly (see iv. 8) been in bondage; having now become free from it by their faith in Christ, they ought not to allow themselves to be enslaved again by a yoke. [In the yoke of bondage.—"In" it, because the thought is of being ensnared; they were to stand upright, not to bow to the yoke (LIGHTFOOT); "bondage" was its predominant nature (ELLICOTT).—R.] All that preceded, doctrinal exposition and expostulation, pointed to this exhortation: to remain free. But just because this lies at the foundation of everything preceding, the brief, plain utterance in this verse suffices, and the Apostle at once turns to a warning menace in case the admonition should not be heeded, and the Galatians instead should go so far as to submit to circumcision.

Ver. 2. Behold I Paul say unto you that if ye be circumcised.—Rousing personal attention with "Behold" and with the interposition of his personal authority,* "I Paul," he warns them against the final step, not yet taken by them, which would bring them completely under the yoke of the law, namely, the receiving of circumcision. [It is highly probable that some of them had been circumcised, and that the present points to the continuance of this course of conduct among them (ALFORD, ELLICOTT). He does not mean that the fact of a man's being a circumcised man would prevent his being a Christian, but if after all this instruction and warning, they resorted to this rite as necessary to salvation, "Christ will," etc.—R.] They would then have had no advantage of Christ, because they would have sought salvation in circumcision and not of Christ.—Will profit you nothing.—The future is probably (as in ver. 5) to be referred to the παρουσία and the establishment of the Messianic kingdom. [So MEYER, who finds in this a reference to its nearness. But he is fond of such references. ELLICOTT with more propriety says: "it simply marks the certain result of such a course of practice;

* [WORDSWORTH finds here a reference to the false accusation (ver. 11) that he preached circumcision, and LIGHTFOOT thinks this is probably an indirect refutation of calumnies as well as an assertion of authority.—R.]

'Christ (as you will find) will never profit you anything.'"—R.]

Ver. 3. Moreover I testify again.—Paul strengthens his warning by referring to a further consequence of receiving circumcision. It obliges to the observance of the whole law; "for circumcision makes one a full participant in the covenant of law, a proselyte of righteousness, and the law demands of the one that is held to it its complete fulfilment (iii. 10)." MEYER. At the same time Paul gives with this a more precise explanation of "Christ will profit you nothing" so much the more certainly will this be the case, because a man by receiving circumcision becomes a debtor to do the whole law, and therefore is not at liberty to persuade himself, that he does not mean to erect again the law as a whole, but only to accept one point. But all, who are "of the works of the law are under the curse," iii. 10.—In view of the solemnity of the asseveration we must suppose that the false teachers designedly concealed this perilous consequence of circumcision or sought to soften it. "Again" alludes to the earlier (second) presence of the Apostle.

Ver. 4. Ye are separated from Christ.— "Paul by speaking asyndetically and recurring to the second person speaks so much the more emphatically and vividly."—MEYER.—The verse expresses the consequence of becoming "a debtor to do the whole law" (for ἐν νόμῳ δικαιοῦσθαι is substantially identically with this). This is the κατὰρ, ἀπὸ τοῦ Χριστοῦ which completes the explanation of the declaration in ver. 2.—Καταργεῖσθαι ἀπὸ τινος, a pregnant expression = the connection in which one stands with any one is done away, and so one is loose from him.—Justification by the law and justification for Christ's sake are mutually exclusive: whoever seeks the first falls out of fellowship with Christ. Justified, here of course an expression representing the view of the persons concerned, who think "through the law we shall be justified."—Ye are fallen away from grace.—Here he expressly names the benefit the loss of which they suffer by "being justified in the law" and the resulting separation from Christ. A cutting contrast: they think that they are being justified, but by this very means instead they are fallen away from grace, so far is an actual justification from being possible in this way.* Ἐκπίπτειν τῆς χάριτος opposed to ἐστηκεῖν ἐν τῇ χάριτι (Rom. v. 2).

Ver. 5. For we by the spirit wait for the hope of righteousness from faith.— "A justification of the judgment passed in ver. 4 upon those that seek to be justified through the law, drawn e contrario, i. e., from the entirely different manner in which Paul and those like him wish to be justified." MEYER. ["We" i. e. those who have not sought justification in the law, and fallen from grace; the contrast is not very strongly marked in the subject however (ὅς is not used), for Paul addresses the Galatians, not as those who had fallen, but were in danger of falling, and the subject "we" may include them also.—R.] Πνεύματι is used neither of the human spirit in itself, nor of the spirit of man enlightened by the Holy Ghost, but of the Spirit of God as the objective principle of the Christian life. As it is from the Holy Spirit working in believers, that the whole Christian life proceeds, so in particular the persevering Christian hope is thus wrought, of the fulfilment of which he also gives pledge (2 Cor. i. 22; v. 5, Eph. i. 14; Rom. iii. 11-23). So WIESELER and MEYER. But of course this hope of future righteousness proceeds from the Holy Ghost only so far as it rests upon a right basis. This basis is then stated in ἐκ πίστεως, which is meant to express that Christians ground their hope of future righteousness not upon the works of the law, but precisely on faith alone, that they hope to be justified not in the law but by faith. [Ἐκ πίστεως does not therefore describe πνεύματι (LUTHER), but the latter sets forth the agent: "by the spirit," the former the origin or source (Schmoller says with less exactness, the ground) of their hope. "By faith" cannot qualify "righteousness," as the order of the E. V. seems to indicate.—R.] Δικαιοσύνη is here also of course, Righteousness before God = δικαίωσις. But this is here represented for Christians as something future; we are therefore not to understand it of that which takes place in time, but of the δικαίωσις which comes to completion only at the final judgment. But it is a difficulty that it does not simply read: ἐλπὶς δικ. ἔχοντες, but ἐλπ. ἀπεκθ. whereby the hope itself is presented in turn as an object of hope. Ἐλπίς is therefore here to be understood as the object of hope, res sperata, as in Col i. 5; Tit. ii. 13, and δικαιοσύνης as genitive of apposition. Ἀπεκδέχεσθαι is more precisely not = ἐλπίζειν itself, but = to wait for, to expect perseveringly (WIESELER). [This view of the passage, which is that of WIESELER, avoids the seeming pleonasm, "wait for the hope," but is open to one serious objection, viz. that the genitive is never thus used with ἐλπίς (MEYER). Besides ἐλπὶς ἀπεκδέχμεθα is not pleonastic, but forcible and almost poetical, the accusative being cognate (ELLCOTT). The genitive may be regarded as 1) subjecti; the hoped for reward of righteousness, sc. eternal life (so Beza, Bengel and most older commentators). This avoids the seeming difficulty of every other interpretation, viz. : making "righteousness" future, but it is not in keeping with the context, as it introduces and gives prominence to an adjunct of "righteousness," while the passage treats of "justification." 2) It seems best then to take it as genitive objecti, i. e. the hope of being justified (so MEYER, ELLICOTT, ALFORD, also the versions of Tyndale and Cranmer). This is strictly grammatical and in keeping with the context. The objection that it makes "righteousness" future is easily met, see below.—R.] That Paul should here speak of the (complete and final) justification, as something to be expected first in the future, is entirely accordant with the context. In ver. 4 he speaks of such as, being already justified by faith, now turn to the law and thereby suffer the loss of grace. In order to illustrate the latter, he now enforces the truth, that a Christian must remain in faith, because only then can he have, the hope of justification at the judgment; faith remains the condition of the state of grace, for even at the final judgment it is the condition of gracious acceptance. [This view contrasts Christianity with Judaism, and represents "justification as one of those divine results, which stretches into eternity, conveying with it and involving the idea of future blessedness and glorification" (ELLICOTT).—R.]

Ver. 6. He now proceeds to justify the writing "for the hope from faith" on the part of the Christian. For in Christ Jesus = for him that is in Christ Jesus, for the Christian, neither circumcision availeth anything = has no influence in the attainment of justification (in the sense of ver. 5), nor uncircumcision (while the Galatian false teachers laid so great stress upon this distinction); but faith working through love, faith which shows itself operative through love.—Ενεργεία is always middle in the New Testament. The passive meaning is made in this display of the activity of faith through love, in view of the following section ver. 13 sq., the theme of which is given in our verse. [LIGHTFOOT: "These words bridge over the gulf which seems to separate the language of St. Paul and St. James. Both assert a principle of practical energy, as opposed to a barren, inactive theory." Against the use made of this passage by modern Romanist commentators who give up the passive sense, such as WINDSCHMANN, MÖHLER, Symbolik, see ALFORD and DOCTRINAL NOTES below.—R.]

Ver. 7. We were running well.—Short, emotional, and therefore asyndetic propositions respecting the unhappy alterations which had taken place with the Galatians.—The comparison of the Christian walk to a race is, as is well known, a favorite one with Paul. The running well consisted in obedience to the truth, that is, in their going in the true=evangelical, way, seeking their righteousness in faith.—Paul asks in surprise: Who did hinder you?

Ver. 8. He here answers the last assertion to himself and them. Certainly, it is not God that has turned you away, has brought you upon this other way! The intriguing of the false teachers is represented as something ungodly. Ἡ πείσμη, κ. τ. λ., therefore, is to be translated; The persuading is not from your caller=God. The calling and the persuading are opposed to each other as distinct in character; the former is divine activity, the latter not, but essentially human with human intention, art, importunity (MEYER).—In itself "persuasion" could have also a passive signification=the being persuaded, disposition to follow; and so many interpreters take it here also=obsequiousness towards the false teachers. [In favor of the latter meaning we have the support of the Greek expositors, and perhaps the paranomasia (πεισθεταί, ver. 7). But MEYER, ALFORD, ELLICOTT prefer the active meaning, both because it is better established, and because it suits the active meaning of "calleth." It seems to accord better with ver. 9 also.—R.]

Ver. 9. A little leaven.—It is disputed whether this refers to doctrine or persons; a little leaven of doctrine, as a few bad men, false teachers. Manifestly the former. It is not the number of the false teachers that is of account, but the influence of their teaching, not the πειθόμενοι but the πείσμονή. Plainly nothing else is meant by "leaven" than the immediately preceding "persuasion," for of this, "leaven" is an image. As the leaven works into the lump, so does the "persuasion," the persuasive, seducing word into the soul (or into a whole community): therefore—even an influence in itself apparently insignificant, may nevertheless be ruinous to the whole man (or whole community of men). [The proverb (quoted also 1 Cor. v. 6) is undoubtedly true both of doctrines and persons. To which it refers here is extremely doubtful. In support of each view the best commentators may be cited, and the context is not decisive, for while ver. 8 may favor the former reference, ver. 10 with its individualizing turn, favors the latter. Leaven is, as usually, a symbol of evil.—R.] This of course contains a warning to be on their guard, and to turn back in time, and remove the leaven.—The Apostle, in order the easier to win them to him, expresses the confidence which he still continues to have in them.

Ver. 10. I, for my part,—even though the false teachers believe you already won over to them.—He knows his confidence to be grounded in the Lord. The Lord will doubtless bring it to pass and give you the right mind—in the interest of His cause.—Ὁὐδὲν ἄλλο φρονήσεις is best taken absolutely—that you will not be otherwise minded than hitherto, that you will not alter your conviction, will not apostatize. It is true, a giving way had indeed already begun; but it was as yet only in its incipency; evidently Paul deals with them throughout as those that are yet wavering, and therefore it may well be hoped of them that matters will not come to an actual ἄλλο φρονεῖν=change of conviction. Up to the present time they are only, as is immediately expressed, "troubled."—He that troubleth you=every one, who, &c. The supposition that the Apostle refers to a leader among his opponents well known to himself (ERASMUS, LUTHER, BENGEL and others), or even to Peter (JEROME), is supported by nothing in the Epistle. Therefore also whosoever he be ought to be understood as entirely general, and not referred to any eminent consideration enjoyed by the false teachers. Undoubtedly, however, Paul means to signify, that no consideration whatever could cause him to waver in this judgment.—Κριμα=God's sentence of condemnation (e. g. Mark xii. 40, Lc. xx. 47; Rom. ii. 3; xiii. 12); this is conceived as something exceedingly irksome, a burden, therefore βαρύνει.

Ver. 11. But I, brethren, if I still preach

* [The verb here used means "to break up a road," so as to render it impassable. It originally took the dative of the person, but in the New Testament is followed by an accusative. LIGHTFOOT seems to think ἀνέκοιτος (Rec.) would suit the metaphor of the stadium better, its meaning being "to beat back," to hinder with the further idea of thrusting back (ELLICOTT), but the other reading is too well supported. He also remarks that the transcribers seem to have taken offence at the word ἐκόντες, since it is frequently altered, e. g. 1 Thess. ii. 18; Acts xxiv. 4.—R.]

circumcision.—Paul refutes moreover the pretence of the false teachers, invented to further their cause, that he himself elsewhere preached circumcision. They had probably appealed, in support of their charge, to the circumcision of Timothy, which had lately taken place, but which by no means took place on the ground of its necessity to salvation (Acts xvi. 3. See moreover, the explanation of ii. 4).—"Still" dates not from a period within his apostolic career itself, as though Paul as Apostle had yet at one time preached circumcision, which in view of the manner of Paul's conversion and of his whole previous course is an unpsychological and unhistorical assumption, but it dates from his conversion. Why do I still suffer persecution.—This second ἔτι is a logical one: what reason remains, etc.?—Then is the scandal of the cross done away with.—Apodosis of the conditional sentence, "if I still preach circumcision," for the purpose of demonstrating the nullity of the protasis: he would no longer be persecuted.—Τὸ ἀκινδ. τοῦ σταυροῦ more precisely = that, which is offensive in the preceding of Christ's death on the cross, namely, that it is proclaimed as the only ground of salvation. Had Paul, with this or instead of it, still preached circumcision as necessary to salvation, the Jew would have seen his law maintained in authority, and would not have taken offence at the death on the cross, and especially the preaching of it.

Ver. 12. Ὁ θελὼν καὶ ἀποκόψονται.—The ordinary explanation is: Would that they would even have themselves made eunuchs, for which partly the middle signification of the future ἀποκόψονται is cited, partly the connection, which is thought to point (καὶ) to a play of words upon περιτομή. But, as this would be a bitter turn of wit, and as the assumption, that Paul means thereby to lash the sexual intemperance of the false teachers, is arbitrary, it is not pleasant to accede to this explanation. The lexical argument, which has the most weight, is the hardest to meet; it can only be said that the passive use of the future middle, even in the classics, is by no means unknown. On the other hand the connection, which is especially adduced in support of this explanation, has not a strictly demonstrative force, as WIESELER remarks. He, it is true, lays almost too much stress on the absence of an actual paronomasia; on the fact that Paul did not at least choose ἐκτείνειν, as being a very common word among the Greeks for castration, and the paronomasia with κατατομή (Phil. iii. 23) proves at least so much as this, that Paul in opposition to such Judaizers, was not particularly tender in dealing with περιτομή, for this is a sarcastic allusion to περιτομή. On the other hand this remark of his particularly is correct, that we should then expect instead of ἀναστ. an allusion to περιτ., the more so, as in ver. 11 περιτ. is not at all alluded to in the light of a demand made by them. If we can therefore make up our minds to take ἀποκ. as passive, this would be in itself entirely suitable, especially for the final sentence: Would they were even hewn off=condemned by God (since the reference to excommunication is less congruous). Καὶ certainly is far from necessitating the reference to περιτ., as with either explanation it is alike a climactic particle. [It seems entirely incorrect to take the passive sense, for which there is no authority in the New Testament. ELLICOTT, preserves the middle sense, and yet avoids the seemingly coarse interpretation, which is usually given. He renders: "would even cut themselves off from you." Unfortunately καὶ is a climactic particle, and this view gives us an anti-climax. In fact were there no question of taste involved, scarce a doubt would arise as to the Apostle's meaning. Have we a right to adopt forced interpretations, to avoid a natural one, because it seems to us unrefined? As LIGHTFOOT remarks "If it seems strange that St. Paul should have alluded to such a practice at all, it must be remembered that as this was a recognized form of heathen self-devotion, it could not possibly be shunned in conversation, and must at times have been mentioned by a Christian preacher. The remonstrance is doubly significant as addressed to Galatians, for Pessinus, one of their chief towns, was the home of the worship of Cybele, in honor of whom these mutilations were practiced." WORDSWORTH: "There would be more hope from their ex-cision, than from their circumcision. For then they would be excluded from the Jewish congregation, they would feel the rigor of the law, they would be ashamed of enforcing it on you. Then there would be good hope, that they also would joyfully hail and accept the gracious liberty of the gospel, and would be joined as sound members to the Body of Christ."—R.]—Ἀναστατοῦντες, unsettling=to bring into tumult, stronger than ταράσσεν. WIESELER: To render seditious, namely, against the order of Christianity, or rather against its Lord and King, Christ.—[CHRYSOSTOM: "Well does he say ἀναστατοῦντες, for abandoning their country and their freedom and their kindred in heaven, they compelled them to seek a foreign and a strange land; banishing from the heavenly Jerusalem and the free, and forcing them to wander about as captives and aliens." (From LIGHTFOOT.)—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Christian Liberty. Respecting the idea of Freedom, which Paul in this Epistle maintains and vindicates for Christians with such decision (from iii. 25 on, substantially this, but more on its negative side; in express words in this section), we are to consider that it does not primarily mean freedom from the accusations and the curse of the law (wrath of God, etc.), but, agreeably to the whole polemics of the Apostle, means freedom from the claims (requirements) of the law, from the obligation of attaching ourselves to it, in order by works of the law to seek salvation (to seek it through these conjointly with faith, yes, essentially to seek it through these). Too precipitately and too prevalently does Luther, for example, take this freedom, which Christ has won, in the former sense, and in this sense eulogizes it as the most precious benefit. Undoubtedly, however, freedom in this sense stands causally connected with freedom in the other; in the first place by the very fact that only he who through Christ is delivered from the curse of the law, is a Christian, and only to him does freedom from the law itself accrue (although strictly speaking this does not belong here);—and secondly, inasmuch as only to him who does not give himself any more into bondage under the law, does freedom from its curse also remain assured, while conversely, whoever gives up the other freedom, loses also this, and thus comes into double bondage. Hence it is fully admissible to comprehend in the freedom which Paul claims for the Christian, his freedom from the curse of the law—not exegetically it is true, but at least in the practical application of the doctrine. Still more; in the reference to freedom from the curse of the law (wrath of God), an entirely just apprehension of the doctrine is involved, since Paul contends with such earnestness for the freedom of the Christians from the law, and against the imposing of the law upon them, and thus against their being brought upon the ground of the righteousness of works, for this very reason, that thereby we forfeit also our freedom from the curse of the law, and so come under this curse, losing thereby the advantage that we have in Christ, the certainty of the grace of God. His strong emphasizing of the freedom of Christians has its ground indeed not merely in an abstract pride of freedom, leading him to feel: Christians now have no longer need of allowing themselves to be held in bondage by a law, but it is grounded in the doctrinal knowledge of the loss of salvation, which would result from the giving up of that freedom.

2. Either the law wholly, or not at all; either Christ or the law. The Apostle presents two momentous alternatives and thereby sets himself against all half courses and their self-deceiving effect. The first is: “Either the law wholly—or not at all.” Whoever once places himself in one particular on the legal ground, cannot stop short with that one. For in the first place the law, although a whole consisting of many members, is yet a whole in which one member depends on another. And secondly for this very reason the blessing of God is not promised to the observance of one or the other part of it, but only to the observance of the whole; whoever therefore will become partaker of the blessing in the way of law, must observe the whole law. But if he shrinks from undertaking the whole, either because he recognizes much of it as abolished for the Christian, or because much of it is burdensome to him, or as he thinks of the impossibility of fulfilling all aright, and of the curse which is denounced against all short comings, then let him give up the legal position altogether. This suggests then the other alternative: “Either Christ or the law.” The two “do not match,” i. e. whoever will be justified by works of law, thereby renounces virtually, and ought therefore to renounce formally the consolations of grace in Christ; for in so doing he does not seek his righteousness in Christ, but rejects Him. Commonly however man would be glad to take the latter with the former, would at least, without building upon it, be well content with the free grace of God, as the complement of his imperfect righteousness of works; but in vain—the sentence is: Fallen away from grace!—“This text, vers. 2 and 4, is a true touchstone, by which we may securely and certainly judge all manner of doctrines, works and ceremonies of all men.

Whoever now, be they Papists, Turks, Jews, sectaries,—or whoever they may be, teach, that anything is necessary to salvation besides faith in Christ, they hear in this place the sentence of the Holy Ghost pronounced against them by the Apostle, namely, that Christ profiteth them nothing. But if St. Paul can venture to pass so terrible a judgment against the law and circumcision, which God Himself has given, what kind of judgment would he utter upon the chaff and the dross of men's ordinances? Wherefore this text is such a thunderclap, that by right the whole papal realm should be astounded and terrified thereat.” LUTHER.

3. “Waiting for the hope of righteousness.” Justification, on one hand, is a benefit to be obtained even now, but on the other hand, that which we now obtain is not yet the whole, not yet the consummation. But the justification of the Christian in the present is not on this account in any way an illusion, nor is the joyful certainty, which faith has, of being justified in Christ, prejudiced. On the contrary the believer knows very well that at first he can only have this benefit in a measure corresponding to the imperfection of the present dispensation. The joyfulness of faith would be beclouded if the hope of consummation in eternity, in spite of all present imperfection, did not essentially appertain to faith, as certain hope. Hoping and waiting include, it is true, a negative element, a not yet having; but they also include essentially a positive element, the certainty that what is not yet possessed will nevertheless be attained, and this positive element is derived from nothing else than faith. Hope is grounded in faith—but never in our works; faith is therefore not only necessary in the beginning, but remains so perpetually; if we lose it, we lose hope also.

4. Faith, Hope, Love. Faith, that has hope, is the one thing that characterizes the Christian, to which is added Love. As in hope faith becomes a waiting faith, πίστις ἀπεκδεχομένη, so through love does it become an active faith, π. ἐνεργουμένη, i. e., the ἐνέργεια does not first through love come into faith, but rather faith manifests in this love its own indwelling energy; had it no such ἐνέργεια in itself, there would be no such result as love, and where this energy is wanting to it, because it is a mere nominal faith, there is no such result. Even so the capacity of waiting does first come into faith, not through hope, but on the contrary, because this inheres in faith, from faith emanates hope.—The Catholic doctrine of a fides caritate formata, as the condition of justification, has of course not the least support in this passage; for the simple reason that “working through love” affirms something entirely different: “non per caritatem formam suam accipere vel formari fidem, sed per caritatem operosam vel efficacem esse ap. docet.” CALVIUS. Nor can it be concluded from this passage that the Apostle would make love the principle of justification together with faith. See the EXEGETICAL NOTES above, but especially LUTHER, who has so truly apprehended the significance of our passage: “Paul treats not in this place of what Faith accomplishes before God, as how one becomes righteous before God; for this he has done at full length above; but he says just here at the end, as it were for a short conclusion, what is a true Christian life; in Christ such a faith alone avails, which is no feigned, hypocritical one, but a true living faith. Now such a faith is one that exercises itself and perseveres in good works through love. For this is nothing else than to say: Whoever will be a true Christian man and in Christ's Kingdom, he must forsooth have a true faith. But now assuredly the faith is not sound, where the works of love do not follow after. Therewith he shuts out from the Kingdom of Christ all hypocrites, both on the right hand and on the left; on the right all Jews and work-saints, but on the left all slothful and secure folk, who say: If faith without works makes righteous, then God requires nothing of us than only that we believe, therefore we are permitted to do what we list."

5. Love does not overlook perversion of doctrine. Certain as it is that faith, active through love, is part of the Christian life, yet over against those, who destroy faith by perversion of doctrine, indulgence for love's sake, is not in place, but earnestness and severity (comp. the remarks of LUTHER upon this, in the HOMILETICAL NOTES, ver. 10).

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1. LUTHER:—Let us learn to count this our freedom, most noble, exalted and precious, which no emperor, no prophet, nor patriarch, no angel from heaven, but Christ, God's Son, hath obtained for us; not for this, that He might relieve us from a bodily and temporal subjection, but from a spiritual and eternal imprisonment of the cruellest tyrants, namely, the law, sin, death, devil, &c.—Those that will be secure and snore on without care, these will not keep this freedom. For Satan is to the light of the Gospel hostile above measure, i. e., to the doctrine of grace, freedom, consolation and life. Therefore, where he is aware that it is about to dawn, he keeps no holiday, but sets himself speedily with all might against it. [CALVIN:—He reminds them that they ought not to despise a freedom so precious. And certainly it is an invaluable blessing, in defence of which it is our duty to fight, even to death. If men lay upon our shoulders an unjust burden, it may be borne; but if they endeavor to bring our conscience into bondage, we must resist valiantly, even to death. If men be permitted to bind our consciences, we shall be deprived of an invaluable blessing, and an insult will be, at the same time, offered to Christ, the author of our freedom.—R.]

[COWPER:—This is a liberty unsung
By poets, and by senators unpraised;
Which monarchs cannot grant, nor all the powers
Of Earth and Hell confederate take away:
A liberty which persecution, fraud,
Oppression, prisons, have no power to bind;
Which whose tastes can be enslaved no more.
'Tis liberty of heart, derived from Heaven,
Bought with His blood who gave it to mankind.
* * * The oppressor holds
His body bound; but knows not what a range
His spirit takes, unconscious of a chain,
And that to bind him is a vain attempt,
Whom God delights in, and in whom He dwells.—R.]

Ver. 2. LUTHER:—Under the sun there is no more hurtful or poisonous thing, than the doctrine of human laws and works, that are received in the imagination of thereby obtaining forgiveness of sins. For they take away in one heap the truth of the gospel and Christ Himself.

Ver. 3. "A debtor to do the whole law." If we overlook this chance, and Moses begins in one particular to rule over us, we must thereafter be wholly and entirely subject to his power, whether we will or not. Therefore, to be brief, we cannot, yea, ought not, nor will not suffer, that any one should hang any one fraction of Moses' law [Gesetzlein Moses] upon our neck.

Ver. 4. "Ye are separated from Christ."—How could one speak more powerfully against the law? What can or will any one bring up against this mighty thunderclap? It is not possible that the gospel and the law can dwell and rule in one heart at the same time with one another, but of necessity either Christ must yield to the law or the law to Christ. Therefore, when thou fanciest that Christ and confidence in the law might dwell together with one another in thy heart, thou art of a certainty to believe and know, that in thy heart not Christ, but the very devil dwells and keeps house, who under the form of Christ accuses and terrifies thee, and demands that thou through the law and thine own works shouldst make thyself righteous; for the true Christ has not that way.—Even as one that falls out of a ship, let it happen as it may, must certainly drown in the sea; even so can it not be otherwise than that whoever falls away from grace, must be condemned and lost.—If those fall away from Grace, that will be justified by the law of God, beloved, whither will those fall that will be justified through human ordinances, their vows and merits? Into the deep abyss of hell, to the devil.

Ver 5. SPENER:—Faith is not merely the beginning of our salvation, so that we must receive the first grace from God, and afterwards earn the rest ourselves, but all remaining gifts of grace and glory are alone expected and bestowed from faith.—LUTHER:—This is an admirable, noble consolation, wherewith all wretched, perplexed hearts, that feel their sin and are terrified thereat, are mightily helped against all the fiery darts of the devil. For when the conscience has to wrestle and strive in such distress and perplexity, it becomes terrified and anxious, and the feeling of sin, of God's wrath and of death is so great that it seems as if there were neither righteousness nor salvation to hope for. Then is it time to say: Dear brother, thou wouldest be glad to have such a righteousness, as might be felt, whereof thou mightest have joy and comfort, even as sin lets itself be felt and stirs up terror and despond; now that cannot be done, but do thou labor on, that the righteousness, which thou hast in hope, and which is yet hidden, may surpass the sin which thou feelest; and know, that it is not such a righteousness as lets itself be seen or felt, but as to which one must hope that in is time it will be reached. Therefore thou art not to judge after the feeling of sin, but according to the promise and doctrine of faith, through which Christ is promised to thee, that he may be thy perfect and everlasting righteousness.—STARKE:—Waiting comprehends in it; a believing assurance of certain attainment of the thing hoped for, a high estimation of the same, a continual remembrance thereof, an ardent longing thereafter, a joy in the apprehension of future felicity, a patient expectation, an abstinence from all that stands opposed to the purity and steadfastness of such hope.—Those that will be righteous by the law have nothing more to expect of Christ but believers have yet glorious benefits to hope from him.

Ver. 6. LUTHER:—St. Paul points out here what is the fashion of the Christian life, namely, that it is nothing else than, inwardly, faith towards God and, outwardly, love and works towards our neighbor, so that a man becomes perfectly a Christian, inwardly by faith towards God, who does not need our works, and outwardly by works towards men, whom our faith can help nothing, but our works and our love.—Of faith, what it is, what its inward hidden nature, power, work and office is, has he treated above, where he says that faith makes us righteous before God. But here he conjoins it with love and works, i. e. he speaks of its works and office, which it outwardly and publicly accomplishes, that it is the stirrer up to good works and to love, yea not alone the stirrer up, but the true doer and workmaster of all good works.—There stands St. Paul and says outright, that faith, which worketh by love, makes a Christian, says not that cowl, fasts, distinct attire or genuflections make a Christian.—Anything else, be it called what it may, makes no one a Christian: only faith and love do so. See also above in the DOCTRINAL NOTES.

Ver. 7. In STARKE:—Running in religion is good, running well still better, to accomplish the race best of all. To a Christian life there appertains standing and walking: standing, that one may not fall, walking, that one may not stand still, which is commonly linked with a going back.—LUTHER:—These words are very comforting, for Christians have ever this temptation, to imagine that their life is an idle and sleepy matter, it seems more a creeping than a running. But so far as they remain steadfast in the wholesome doctrine, walk in the Spirit and wait on their vocation, they should in no wise trouble themselves, although it seems as if their work and doing went slowly on, and crept rather than walked. But our master, God, judges far otherwise. What seems to us slow walking, seems to Him quick and swift running, item, what we count for mournfulness, suffering, death etc., that is with Him joy, laughing and blessedness.—“Who did hinder you?” And now they supposed, forsooth, that all their matters were going most prosperously and most swiftly along.—HEDINGER:—Have a care, pilgrim! on the way to heaven there are many stumbling blocks.—Hearest thou the sirens sing and the robbers whistle? Finish thou thy course with joy, let not the threatening and flattering of the world lead thee astray! The Lord is with thee!—LANGE:—Beware of all credulousness, especially in spiritual things, which concern the well-being of the soul! Let a doctrine wear ever so good a guise, it must nevertheless be tested by God's word.

Ver. 8. LUTHER:—The devil is a prince of persuaders. He can so blow up and magnify the very smallest sins, that he who is tempted, thinks nothing else than that they are so great and terrible sins, as are worthy the punishment of eternal death. Then is it high time that we comfort such a disturbed soul in such wise as St. Paul has here done, saying to it, that such persuasion is not of Christ, since it gainsays the word of the gospel, which depicts Christ to us, not as an accuser, but as meek and compassionate, a Saviour and Comforter.

Ver. 9. HEDINGER:—The least particle of evil infects, a single spark kindles a forest. Away with it! But O ye careless! is it a small thing to you, to be corrupted through idle talk and companyings, through poison of lies against Christ?

Ver. 10. LUTHER:—Has St. Paul done right in saying: I have a good confidence towards you, while yet the Holy Scripture forbids that we should have confidence in man? Answer: Faith and Love both believe, yet is the belief of the two not directed upon one thing. The faith is directed towards God, therefore it cannot be deceived: but love believes man, therefore is it often and greatly deceived. But yet the faith that love has is such a needful thing in this present life, that without it this life cannot at all continue. For if no man trusts nor believes another, what would this life upon earth become? Christians out of love believe people easier than the subtle children of the world are wont to do. For that believers trust people and expect good of them, that is beautiful fruit of the Holy Ghost and faith. But the Christian adds: In the Lord—so far do I trust you and expect good of you, as the Lord is in you and ye in Him, that is, so far as ye abide in the truth.—We must diligently distinguish doctrine from life. Doctrine is heaven, life the earth. In life there is sin, error, discord. Here love should pass by and overlook, should forbear; here should forgiveness of sins bear sway, yet so that one should not wish to uphold such sin and error. But with doctrine it is quite another thing, for it is holy, pure, unmixed, heavenly, divine; therefore can we not suffer it, that any one should distort it even in the least particular. Whoever will alter or adulterate it, against such a one there is neither love nor compassion.

Ver. 11. St. Paul holds that for a certain sign, that it is not and cannot be the true gospel, if it is preached in peace and in quietness and is not gainsayed nor persecuted. On the other hand, the world, when it sees that from the preaching of the gospel great rumors, divisions, scandal and tumults follow, holds that for a certain size that such teaching is heretical and seditious.—To murderers, thieves and other evil-doers grace is shown; on the contrary the world deems that no more evil, mischievous people are to be found than Christians; therefore it also persuades itself that they can never have punishment and torment enough inflicted on them.—As long as persecutions and suffering endure, the state of the church is good. The church must suffer persecution, if the gospel is purely preached. For the gospel goes about to preach alone God's compassion, grace, glory and praise, and on the other hand discovers the devil's craft and malice. Where the gospel comes it cannot be otherwise, there must follow the scandal of the cross; where that does not come to pass, there certainly the devil is not yet fairly hit, but only a little grazed.—May God be surety that the offence of the cross do not cease, which would soon come to pass, if we only preached, what the prince of this world with his members would be glad to hear, namely, how to be justified and saved by one's own works. [The offence of the cross. 1. It asks men to humble their pride and take salvation as a free gift; this is a great scandal. 2. It sometimes seems to cease: 3. It never does.—R.] The homiletical uses of the single verses, especially 1-9, are easily suggested by the sententious character of the greater part.

Vers. 1-6 From Lisco:—The care taken by the Christian, to stand fast in the true freedom.—Vers. 7-12. How are we to rescue those who stand in danger of apostasy? 1. By bringing to their minds their earlier life in communion with God; 2. by warning against the destruction to which they are hastening, vers. 9, 10; 3. by the testimony of our own walk and perseverance in fellowship with God through Christ, ver. 11. For vers. 1-6 at New Year. FRANTZ:—A good counsel at the New Year for all, who will strengthen their inward life: 1. Stand fast in the freedom, wherewith Christ hath made us free; 2. lose not Christ and fall not away from grace; 3. wait in the Spirit through faith for the righteousness that is to be hoped for; 4. walk in faith which worketh by love.

G. Extended exhortation to the Galatians, instead of turning back from Faith to works of the Law, to give activity to their Faith (in a right understanding of Christian freedom) by ministering Love, as the best fulfilment of the Law.

CHAPTER V. 13—VI. 10.

1. More general—reverting to the principle of ethical opposition between Spirit and Flesh, in a discussion, partly didactic.

(Chap. v. 13-24.)

(Vers. 16-24.—Epistle for 14th Sunday after Trinity.)

- 13 For, brethren, ye have been called unto liberty [ye were called unto liberty, brethren];¹ only use not liberty [or your liberty] for an occasion to the flesh, but
- 14 by [or by means of your] love serve one another. For all the [the whole] law is
- 15 fulfilled² in one word,³ even in this; Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.⁴ But
- 16 if ye bite and devour one another, take heed that ye be not consumed one of an
- 17 other. This I say then [Now I say], Walk in [by]⁵ the Spirit and ye shall not ful-
- 18 fill the lust of the flesh. For the flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit
- 19 against the flesh: and [for]⁶ these are contrary [opposed] the one to the other; so that
- 20 ye cannot do the things that ye would [that⁷ ye may not do what things ye would].
- 21 But if ye be led of [by] the Spirit, ye are not under the law. Now the works of the
- 22 flesh are manifest, which are these [of which kind are],⁸ adultery [omit adultery],⁹
- 23 fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness [wantonness], idolatry, witchcraft [sorcery],
- 24 hatred [hatreds], variance [strife],¹⁰ emulations [jealousy], wrath, strife, seditions,
- 25 heresies [caballings, dissensions, factions], envyings, murders,¹¹ drunkenness, revel-
- 26 lings, and such like: of the which I tell you before, as I have also told you in time past
- 27 [I forewarn you as I did forewarn you], that they which do such things [as these]¹²
- 28 shall not inherit the kingdom of God. But the fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace,
- 29 longsuffering, gentleness [benignity], goodness, faith [or trustfulness], Meekness,
- 30 temperance: against such [as these] there is no law. And [Now]¹³ they that are
- Christ's have crucified the flesh with the [its] affections and lusts.

⁷ Ver. 17.—[Ἰνα is considered telic here as usually, by the best commentators. "So that" must be rejected. See EXEG. NOTES.—R.]

⁸ Ver. 19.—[Ἀτινα has here a classifying force (Ellicott).—R.]

⁹ Ver. 19.—Μοιχεῖα of the Rec. is to be rejected with Lachmann, Tischendorf. [So N. A. B. C. Meyer, Alford, Ellicott, Wordsworth, Lightfoot.—R.]

¹³ Ver. 24.—[Δέ must be rendered "now" or "but," not "and." The two classes of deeds have been set forth, and this verse is a practical application.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 13. For ye were called unto liberty, brethren.—"For": Paul justifies the strong expression, he has used in ver. 12, against the false teachers. They deserved this rebuke, for—they seek to deprive you of your freedom, and yet—ye are called to that (by God through your conversion to Christ); therefore they strive against the counsel and will of God Himself.—To this thought: "ye were called unto liberty," Paul however now adds a restriction, a warning against misunderstanding and misuse of this liberty (which in all that precedes he had vindicated with such decision for Christians, and which he had made it their duty not to surrender): only use not your liberty for an occasion to the flesh, μόνον μὴ κ. τ. λ. We must supply, say τρέπετε=Turn not, use not liberty as a pretext for the flesh=let not the flesh (your sinful human nature) obtain in this freedom (from the law) an occasion to pretend that it is therefore now allowed to man to do what he will, and therefore it also may claim indulgence with its sinful lusts. This of course would be an entire perversion of Christian freedom, were the flesh thus allowed to take advantage of it. The antithesis shows distinctly, what Paul regards as the essence of the sarcal state; not by any means the corporeal nature, properly so called, but the selfish Egoism. For he exhorts: but by your love serve one another; love being conceived as the means of serving.—δοῦναι in happy antithesis to the ἐλευθερία of Christians. Christians are not to be servants to the law; in this sense they are free; but on the other hand this freedom does not exclude but includes δοῦναι in the sense of "serving one another. [Lightfoot: "Both ἀγάπης and δοῦναι are emphatic. St. Paul's meaning may be expressed by a paraphrase thus; 'you desire to be in bondage: I too recommend to you a bondage, the subservience of mutual love. Temper your liberty with this bondage, and it will not degenerate into license'."—R.]

With this verse a new section, of course, begins, but it is incorrect to begin here, as is variously done, a second or third main division. Above all it is not to be supposed that the Apostle henceforth addresses himself to those Galatian Christians who had held fast the principle of evangelical freedom; on the contrary he has throughout the whole Epistle the same individuals in mind, namely, those led astray by Judaism, and his present exhortation also is immediately connected with the leading thought of the Epistle. How nearly? This he, himself, plainly sets forth in the first place with μόνον μὴ: the energetic admonition to the maintenance of freedom receives its needful complement in the warning against misuse of the same, by the reference to its ethical character.—But this is unquestionably only one side, hardly more than the mere point of attachment. Paul gives his exhortation to serviceable love not merely as a precaution in case the Galatians, perceiving the inadmissibility of the legal position, should desire to return to the freer one, but this also belongs, together with the entire explication which it receives in the following verses, to the polemics against their present erroneous view. To that legalism, which he combated, as slighting faith, and surrendering itself into false bondage, he opposes as the truth, "the fulfilling of the law" by the activity of faith in love (comp. ver. 6), where we make ourselves servants, more generally in a walk by the Spirit, in which one is free from the law in the very "fulfilling" of it (vers. 14, 18, 23). He is the more earnest in holding this up to them, because the Galatians especially, in spite of (or on account of) their legal zeal, were wanting in this fulfilment of the law through a walk by the Spirit, a fulfilment which obliges Christians also (comp., especially ver. 15). The same persons who wanted to impose the law upon themselves, were content to be lacking in that which is the heart of the law; those who wished to make themselves servants to the law, would not be servants to one another. It was therefore of moment, to exclaim to these: Behold, what you need, is not in any way to turn yourselves away from faith, as if this were too little, to the law, but simply to make faith active through a walk in the Spirit, in love. Comp. ver. 6, and also chap. vi., where the more detailed exhortations follow. We thus see plainly how impossible it is to disconnect this section from the preceding one, how on the other hand it concurs with the entire polemics of the Apostle, nay, how these find in it their true, convincing culmination.—It is of course incorrect to oppose this section, as hortatory, to the preceding part of the Epistle, as didactic, for this reason that the preceding part also includes exhortation (especially ver. 1); this however was dogmatic, and now comes ethical exhortation. Unquestionably therefore this section might with some propriety be called the Ethical part, in distinction from the Doctrinal; but if by this were meant, as commonly, that Paul now leaves the controversy concerning the relation of the Law to Faith, and, having no longer in mind the defection of the Galatian churches, merely proceeds to exhort to a walk of Christian morality, with reference to ethical short-comings, this too must be deemed incorrect according to what has been remarked. Moreover, even if such a distinction into a dogmatic and an ethical part is not unwarranted in fact, it is at all events not exact in form; this section cannot be formally contrasted with all that precedes. For certainly the discourse proceeds without interruption; Paul is speaking hortatively to the Galatians (especially from ver. 1 on), but on the ground of the doctrinal exposition, and now he merely gives a sudden ethical turn to this exhortation, bringing, as has been remarked, the whole to an appropriate conclusion.*

Ver. 14. For the whole law is fulfilled.—It is not easy to determine either the meaning of this clause, or its connection with what precedes. The first explanation, which offers itself on account of ἐν ἐνὶ λόγῳ, taken πληροῦται as ἀνεκεφαλαιοῦται, comprehenditur, as Rom. viii. 9. [So LUTHER. CALVIN, OLSHAUSEN, et al.—R.] But this must be rejected as lexically untenable. Besides with the reading [now generally adopted], πεπλήρωται it becomes at once incorrect.—As little does νόμον πληρ. have here the same sense as in Matt. v. 17—to bring out, to make evident the deeper sense, the ideal substance in distinction from the literal form. Doubtless it is not a πληροῦν in the doctrine that is here in question, and in reality, if πληρ. were taken in this sense, the explanation would come back again to the one already disapproved, namely, that the commandment of love to our neighbor is the substance of ὁ πᾶς νόμος, since that which is substance, in another aspect, is also foundation. Πληροῦν is to be understood of fulfilment by deed, conformity, satisfacere legi. [ELLCOTT: "The perfect πεπλήρωται suitably points to the completed and permanent act."—R.] It is peculiar then, no doubt, that this is said to be in one word, ἐν ἐνὶ λόγῳ, and this to be regarded as an abbreviated expression for: By conformity to the one word, precept (from Lev. xix. 18), immediately follows: Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.—[MEYER: "Neighbor is for the Christian, who rightly (Matt. v. 17) applies this Mosaic command to himself, his fellow-Christian (comp. ver. 13, ἀλλήλους), as for the Jew it was fellow-Jew; but how little this is to be taken as excluding any one whatever, is shown by the whole spirit of Christianity, which finds its most beautiful expression in the case of the Samaritan (Luke x.); Paul himself was such a Samaritan toward Jew and Gentile."—R.] But how far does Paul declare obedience to the one commandment of love to our neighbor, an obedience to the whole law? Not in the sense in which Love is styled πλήρωμα νόμου (Rom. xiii. 8-10). Nearly related as the two passages appear to be, they must by no means be confounded. For in Rom. xiii. it is expressly stated what is to be understood by νόμος, namely, the individual commandments of the Decalogue which respect conduct towards our neighbor, and love is called the πλήρωμα of those, because, whoever has the dispositions of love, and in truth only such a one, will of course fulfil also the duties of love commanded by the law. But that "the whole law" in this passage is not to be arbitrarily turned into "second table of the Decalogue," nor even interpreted generally = Moral law, is plain; on the contrary, it doubtless signifies nothing else than: the whole Mosaic law. But in the second place it is also clear, that Paul cannot mean to say, that in love to our neighbor is found the pledge of the fulfilment of the whole law. For this latter Paul has not at all in mind, it is precisely the opposite that he is aiming at; his meaning is, that on him who does this there is no future requirement made in respect to observance of the law, that from this he is free. The sense of πεπλήρωται can therefore only be: He is to be regarded as if he had fulfilled the law, and therefore the law can exact nothing further of him. By no means therefore is the commandment of love to our neighbor regarded by Paul as the summary of the whole law; this would be entirely incorrect. He will rather say this, that if any one fulfils this, all the rest comes no more into account; of course, with reference to his emphatic demonstration in what precedes, that the law has lost its binding force for the believer. If the believer now does not take this faith to be a dead one, but quickens it through love, he has done all; there can be of further claims of the law upon him no mention, but he ought on the other side to have and exercise love, for only then can he regard himself as free from the claims of the whole land besides, only then, in fact, is he a believer.—If it is asked how Paul could view the whole law as fulfilled in love to our neighbor, especially without even mentioning love to God, this question is mostly raised with the understanding that he means to designate the commandment of love to our neighbor as the summary, or the fulfilment of it as the condition and principle of the fulfilment of the whole law; and if he meant it so, his assertion must unquestionably be declared unwarranted.* (Where the former is in question, Jesus in Matt. xxii. 34 sq. places the two commandments together; and where the latter, Paul, Rom. xiii., restricts the law to the second table.) But this understanding of his proposition has been already designated as incorrect. He doubtless means to say: Of him who has love to his neighbor the law can exact nothing more. The question, rightly stated, is therefore only this: How could Paul attribute to love towards our neighbor so eminent a position, that he designates him who should fulfil it as free from all else? Must he not also, nay, above all, demand of the believer a fulfilling of the commandment of love to God, and could he, except on condition that both were found in a man, esteem it equivalent to a fulfilment of the whole law? As to this it is simply to be remarked, that (1) he conceives Faith as essentially comprehending love to God, and (2) cannot conceive love to our neighbor without love to God, and therefore in demanding the former from Christians, he of course does not mean to release them from the latter. He does not, however, mention love to God, for his exhortation has not respect to a merely inward fulfilling of the law, belonging to the disposition, but to that fulfilling of the law which comes into manifestation, and shows itself forth in the walk, to the true ethical conduct of the life, and especially of the common life, and this rests upon love to our neighbor. Therefore this only is made the subject of discourse.—If now the Apostle uses this proposition to establish the preceding exhortation ($\gamma\acute{\alpha}\rho$), this is not in the sense that he means thereby to represent the "serving by love" (ver. 13), as a divine duty because commanded by the law; after he has previously denied so decidedly that Christians are under the law, he cannot make the fact that it is commanded in the law a motive for the exercise of love. The principal emphasis lies rather upon $\pi\acute{\alpha}\varsigma$ and $\pi\epsilon\pi\lambda\eta\rho.$, on the circumstance that through serving love the whole law is fulfilled, in the sense given=enough has been done for the law, i. e., negatively, they are therewith absolved from the rest of the law. Therefore nearly=Love one another: for therewith the whole ground of controversy, respecting the observance of the law, whether this or that precept is to be observed, is taken away. The whole sentence, therefore, serves rather to strengthen his exhortation than to give, strictly speaking, a reason for it. The commandment of love to our neighbor, although expressed by a citation from the law (Leviticus): $\alpha\gamma\alpha\pi\acute{\iota}\eta\sigma\epsilon\iota\varsigma\ \tau\acute{\omicron}\nu\ \pi\lambda.$ κ. τ. λ., does not therefore come into consideration as a particular commandment of the law, as if Paul from the other commandments, as being abrogated, excepts this one as remaining in force; only the commandment to exercise love towards our neighbor remains in fact valid for the Christian (and if it is done, the law has no further claim upon him); but to him it is a commandment not on account of the law, but because he is a Christian, on account of his faith in Christ, or because (ver. 6) "in Christ" alone "faith working through love" "availeth anything." Into the question how far the faith in Christ obliges to love, Paul does not enter, but he then goes on to show that this love is the operation of the Spirit, which faith brings. —While the proposition serves primarily to commend the exhortation, and while such an argument must have had the more weight for this end with those zealous for the law, yet of course at the same time it deals a blow against this zeal for the law, and exhibits its emptiness; for all the rest, the many observances are, according to it, purely superfluous; with the one thing, Love to our neighbor, all is done. [MEYER: "Paul looked down from a lofty spiritual level, and saw all other commands of the law subordinated to the law of love, that whoever had fulfilled this command, must be treated as having fulfilled the whole." The fact that Paul chose this particular expression, "the whole law is fulfilled," places his teaching in opposition to antinomian tendencies, just as the Sermon on the Mount shows Christ's position to the law, viewed as a purely ethical rule of life. "The whole law," i. e., the Mosaic law, regarded in this light, was fulfilled in the case of the believer by this love to his neighbor; for the whole law of Moses had an ethical purpose, which purpose is now fulfilled to its full extent only when the believer, because he as a believer, is living "by the Spirit" has that temper of heart to God, which enables him to obey this "one word."—Schmoller insists too strongly on the idea that "all the rest are superfluous." It is doubtful whether this is implied even in ver. 18. The DOCTRINAL NOTES show his meaning more clearly.—R.]

*[On the division of the Epistle, see Introd. § 4. While we must guard against too formal division of the Epistle, we may distinguish it into parts without separating them or breaking the current of thought. The memory is much assisted by the convenient division of LIGHTFOOT: personal, doctrinal and practical. Whether the last named part begins with ver. 1, or here, is perhaps immaterial, since such distinction into parts involves neither the supposition that the Apostle made such formal distinction, nor an arbitrary view of the Epistle as a whole. We may mark the unity quite as much by insisting on too strict sub-division into sections.—R.]

Ver. 15. But if ye bite and devour one another.—This is—if ye intend of serving one another through love, do just the opposite: bear ill will towards and hate one another, and let this come into act, plot mischief against one another, yea, seek to destroy one another; something like this is the sense of these strong expressions borrowed from ravening beasts. Then take heed, adds Paul with incisive words, that the result be not the opposite of what you intend, that ye be not consumed of one another.—Each might be disposed to supplant the other, but in the end it will come to this, all will be wasted away. The sentence thus coöperates per contrarium to the establishment of ver. 12. The explanation: "your Christian community will go to pieces," I am inclined to regard as too special. It is not improbable, indeed, that this influence of the Judaizers occasioned divisions among the Galatians, and threw them into controversies upon the question of the law; yet I should not be disposed to refer this $\delta\alpha\kappa\upsilon\epsilon\iota\nu\ \kappa\alpha\iota\ \kappa\alpha\tau\epsilon\phi\acute{\alpha}\gamma\epsilon\iota\nu$ so definitely to that, as is commonly done. For this is at least intimated nowhere else in the Epistle.

Ver. 16. Now I say, walk by the Spirit.—With $\lambda\acute{\epsilon}\gamma\omega\ \delta\acute{\epsilon}$ Paul conducts his exhortation to serve one another by love (agreeably to the warning already given in the first half of ver. 13.) back to a more general, fundamental exhortation to walk by the Spirit (for in the Spirit he sees the Agent that leads to love), and then designates Spirit and Flesh as the two ethical principles opposite to one another, expressing themselves in opposite workings.— Πνεύματι περιπ. Dative of instrument; properly: walk through the Spirit, so that He is (not the path in which—WIESELER, but) the power, through which they walk= $\text{πνεύματι ὑποκινετοί}$, ver. 18. [The dative may be instrumental, as in ver. 18, but it is better, perhaps, with MEYER, ALFORD, ELLICOTT, to consider it a normal dative, that by which, according to which they are to walk (almost =κατὰ πνεῦμα), for the reason that "Spirit" is contrasted in this passage not merely with "flesh," but also with "law," and the double contrast is best brought out thus, since under the idea of the normal dative, that of rule or direction is included. WIESELER brings out the same meaning, but takes the dative as instrumental.—R.] Πνεῦμα is here also doubtless =The Holy Ghost; it is this, that overcomes the σὰρξ. He enters, it is true, into the hearts of believers, and works only by impelling and determining the walk, as He who dwells in the believers. But yet πνεῦμα is not on this account—the new disposition of the believer himself, sanctified by the Spirit, but remains ever distinct from the individual human spirit as Divine, transcending it. [MEYER adopts this view, and remarks that the absence of the article is not against it. "The distinction affirmed by HARLESS, that τὸ πνεῦμα means the objective Holy Ghost, πνεῦμα without the article the subjective, cannot be justified, since πνεῦμα has the nature of a proper name, and always, even when it dwells and reigns in the human spirit, remains objective, as the Divine πνεῦμα specifically distinct from the human (Rom. vii. 16)."]—R.]

And ye shall not fulfil the lust of the flesh.—We are led to construe this clause, as one of result, both by grammatical considerations (καὶ with οὐ μὴ and the subjunctive or future after an imperative has this force commonly) and by the context. In "walk by the Spirit" he indicates the means of victory over "the lust of the flesh." [On the grammatical point urged above, see the note of ELLICOTT in loco. He claims that the clause might be imperative, but "as there is no distinct instance of such a construction in the New Testament, and still more as the next verses seem more naturally to supply the reasons for the assertion than for the command, it seems best to adopt the future translation." (So E. V. MEYER also in 4th ed., and above.) This view with οὐ μὴ is strong: "shall in no wise" (LIGHTFOOT).—On the word "flesh," see DOCTRINAL NOTE 4.—R.]

Ver. 19. For.—This introduces, in the first place, simply the proof of a "lust of the flesh" (ver. 16)=of such an one I speak, for the flesh lusteth. Paul does not stop, however, but is led further to the antagonistic idea ἐπιθυμεῖν ἡγεῖνα.—Against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the flesh.—Each principle combats the other, and seeks to wrest the dominion from it, and on the other hand to place itself in the possession of this. [It is scarcely proper to supply the verb ἐπιθυμεῖν with ἡγεῖνα, but the Apostle's meaning is obvious. LIGHTFOOT suggests "strives," "fights against."—R.] This is explained by what follows: these are opposed the one to the other, that ἵνα—with the design, that ye may not do what things ye would, bring into effect precisely the desire which you have admitted into your will. "Ἀν θέλητε is neither to be restricted to the good nor to the evil will. The inquiry whether the two powers in the cases in question, attain the object desired by them or not, is not proposed here, since the only purpose is to bring vividly to view the irreconcilable antagonism of their tendencies. WIESELER. ἵνα is therefore not at all to be understood in an ecabatic sense. [ALFORD: "The necessity of supposing an ecabatic meaning for ἵνα in theology is obviated by remembering, that with God results are all purposed.—R.] The contest moreover is by no means to be conceived as an interminable one. The context shows that on the contrary there is expected of the Christian a complete surrendering of himself in order to be actuated by the one principle, the Spirit, and a refusal to give way to the lust of the flesh, whose motions, it is true, must still be experienced. The passage therefore, is entirely different from Rom. vii. 17 sq. [The reference is to "the free-will in its ordinary acceptation, subject only to this necessary and obvious limitation, that this conflict must be only predicated in its full extent, of the earlier and more imperfect stages of a Christian course. The state of the true believer is conflict, but with final victory." ELLICOTT.—R.]

Ver. 18 then speaks of the victory of this principle: But if ye be led by the Spirit—if the combat becomes a victory, and that on the right side; if the ἐνθ. of the πν. becomes an ἄνεν. [BENGEL: ubi vero spiritus vincit, acie res decernitur. The dative here is instrumental.—R.] —Ye are not under the law.—This is according to ver. 14: there it was only stated specially of love, here generally of the "being led by the Spirit," which correspondence makes evident, how Paul regards its relation to the exercise of love; the two are to him essentially one, that is, the former is the principle of the latter. What in ver. 14 is called somewhat enigmatically a fulfilling of the whole law, is here simply and literally described as "a not being under the law." The latter is essentially identical with the former: the sense is: The law then can exact nothing more of you; implying naturally: for you are then in the right ethical condition befitting the Christian, even though not carrying out every detail prescribed in the law. But if you—is the thought implied—are not led by the Spirit, you are then still under obligation to the law; for you are then in fact not yet all in Christ. [MEYER: "Through the impelling power of the Spirit you find yourselves in such a moral condition of life ('newness of life,' Rom. vi. 4) that the law has no power to find fault with you, to condemn and punish you. This explanation is the only correct one according to ver. 23: and this freedom is the true moral freedom from the law." So ELLICOTT, who remarks: "The more obvious conclusion might have seemed, 'ye are not under the influence of the flesh,' but as the law was confessedly the principle which was ordained the influences and works of the flesh, the Apostle (in accordance with the general direction of his argument) draws his conclusion relatively rather to the principle, than to the mere state and influences against which that principle was ordained." It must be borne in mind that Paul's use of the phrase "under the law" usually regards the law as a judge and pedagogue; here the Christian is viewed as one led by the Spirit, and thus taken from "under the law," but so led according to the law, as a guide to our new life of gratitude, that of the fruit of the Spirit it is ever true "against such there is no law" (ver. 23).—R.]

Ver. 19-21. Now the works of the flesh are manifest.—φανερά, evident=plainly conspicuous and therefore of course undeniable. This φανερά is the main point, and therefore placed first. For Paul wishes to furnish the Galatians inducement for being "led by the Spirit," and therefore he not only calls the works of the flesh "evident," but moreover carefully enumerates them, portrays them before their eyes (puts them in the pillory); so that every one may know, what conversely belongs to being led by the Spirit, that one may not practice such things, if he will be one led by the Spirit and not under the law. The positive side is then given ver. 22 sq.—That Paul does not mean to say that all of these things are found among the Galatians, is easily understood.—"Works of the flesh"—"that which is brought to pass when the flesh, i. e., the sinful human nature, and not the Holy Ghost, is the actuating principle." MEYER. Therefore naturally many sins are here enumerated, which are by no means carnal sins in the common acceptation, but rather in a very special sense sins against love, agreeably to the context. There are four classes: 1. Lust (πορν.—ἀσελγ.) 2. Idolatry (εἰδωλολ., φαρμ.) 3. Contentiousness (ἐχθραί—φόνος). 4. Intemperance (μεθαι—κόροι). The third class is treated the most in detail. [While we must not regard this specification as a charge against the Galatians in particular, it is extremely improbable that the Apostle would not choose such sins as most "easily beset" his readers. LIGHTFOOT very properly observes: "From early habit and constant association a Gentile church would be exposed to sins of the first two classes. The third would be a probable consequence of their religious dissensions, inflaming the excitable temperament of a Celtic people. The fourth seems to be thrown in to give a sort of completeness to the list, though not unfitly addressed, to a nation whose Gallic descent perhaps disposed them too easily to these excesses."—R.]—Uncleanliness, ἀκαθ., lustful impurity in general after the special fornication, πορνεία; wantonness, ἀσελγ., lustful wantonness. [LIGHTFOOT: "The same three words occur together in a different order, 2 Cor. xii. 21. The order here is perhaps the more natural: πορνεία a special form of impurity; * ἀκαθάρσια uncleanness in whatever guise, ἀσελγεία an open reckless contempt of propriety. A man may be ἀκαθάρτος and hide his sin; he does not become ἀσελγής until he shocks public decency." As the reference in the New Testament is usually to sensuality, "wantonness" is the best rendering, "standing as it does, by the double meaning which it has, in remarkable ethical connexion with this word" ἀσελγεία. See TRENCH, Syn. New Testament § xvi.—R.]—The transition from the first class to the second is easily found in the fact that with idolatrous worship many forms of unchastity were connected; but idolatry is not on that account to be considered as a species of lustful indulgence. [Yet the two forms of sin are so frequently joined together in the New Testament and the latter is so common a metaphor for the former in the Old Testament, as to suggest a more intimate connection than the simple fact that sensual excesses usually accompanied idolatrous worship. This fact must be regarded as an indication of some underlying affinity.—R.]—Φαρμακεία, here apparently, in juxtaposition with idolatry=Sorcery, not poisoning. [LIGHTFOOT: "Idolatry," the open recognition of false gods, 'sorcery,' the secret tampering with the powers of evil. It is a striking coincidence, if nothing more, that φαρμακείαι were condemned by a very stringent canon of the council held at Ancyra, the capital of Galatia, about A. D. 314."—R.]—Third class: the substantives up to ἀλπίσεις have reference to dissension, the first four as shown in individual conduct, among which however, jealousy, ζήλος and wrath, θυμοί, refer to the inner aspect, the source. [The latter is rendered "displays of wrath" by ELLICOTT, and thus referred to outward manifestations, which seems preferable, since the plural is used, serving to denote the concrete form of the abstract sin (so too the plurals which follow); were the reference to the source the singular were more appropriate. See TRENCH, Syn. New Testament, § xxvii., on the precise meaning of the word.—R.] The three following, caballings, dissensions, factions refer to the dissension of bodies of men.—Envyings, murders follow these, evidently named together mainly on account of the paronomasia, since φόνος would otherwise belong with ζήλος; "murders," however, fittingly closes the list as the culmination of discord. Besides, the two are perhaps put in juxtaposition with reference to the concurrence of envy and murder in the first murder, comp. 1 Jno. iii. 12. [LIGHTFOOT: "A principle of order may be observed in the enumeration: 1. ἐχθραί, a general expression opposed to ἀγάπη, breaches of charity in feeling or in act; from this point onward the terms are in an ascending scale: 2. ἐρις 'strife,' not necessarily implying self-interest; 3. ζήλος 'rivalry' in which the idea of self-assertion is prominent: 4. θυμοί 'wraths,' a more passionate form of ἐρις; 5. *ἐριθείαι 'factious cabals,' a stronger development of ζήλος; 6. 7. hostility has reached the point where the contending parties separate; such separation is either temporary (διχοστασίαι 'divisions'), or permanent (ἀλπίσεις 'sects, heresies'); 8. φόνος, a grosser breach of charity than any hitherto mentioned, the wish to deprive another of what he has; 9. φόνος, the extreme form which hatred can take, the deprivation of life."—On drunkenness, revellings, ELLICOTT remarks: "the latter is the more generic and inclusive, to which the former was the usual accompaniment."—R.]—In order to brand still further "the works of the flesh," and to restrain from them, he points moreover to the punishment decreed against them, in words which are meant to express: that however often one might come to speak of them, he would always have to render the same judgment, and to express moreover that this judgment might be rendered in advance with perfect distinctness.—Προ in προλέγω and προείπον=before it comes; the preterite in προείπον=during my presence among you.—Shall not inherit the kingdom of God.—Just as in 1 Cor. vi. 9 sq.; Eph. v. 5, of course with the pre-supposition: If no conversion intervenes.

* ["Observe the prominence always given to condemnations of this deadly sin, it being one of the things which the old pagan world deemed as merely ἀδιάφορα."—ELLICOTT.—R.]

Vers. 22, 23. After the negative exposition, Paul now states explicitly in what the being led by the Spirit consists, or, more particularly, reveals itself.—The fruit of the Spirit.—Καρπὸς τοῦ πνεύματος, essentially the same as ἔργα, "works," ver. 19: That which comes to pass, which is brought into effect, when the Holy Ghost is the impelling principle. But in what follows it is only qualities that are mentioned, and not works, and so of course ἔργα was not appropriate. And certainly it is not unintentional, that Paul in the first place names only the inward "fruit of the Spirit," consisting in the disposition of the soul, for the reason that the Spirit primarily and principally changes and must change the inward disposition. When this is done, there is a genuine leading by the Spirit, living by the Spirit, which then finds external manifestation also in a walking by the Spirit.—The singular καρπὸς also is significant, "proceeding from the conception of the inward unity and ethical continuity of all that the Spirit works." As "Spirit" in this connection is conceived as the principle from which serving love proceeds, the enumeration of precisely these virtues is easily explicable. That many things besides are effected by the Spirit, does not need to be said. At the head stands Love, as the most general, and at the same time the chief virtue of Christians (comp. vers. 13, 14). Χαρά, one is inclined to take as Joy with the brethren, opposed to ζήλος, ὀφθαλμοί. It is no objection that this incidental idea is not contained in the word itself; the connection might easily indicate in what particular sense χαρά is here to be taken. Yet the explanation of it as the inward joyfulness of the Christian in the consciousness of the love of God may also be justified, as this too stands in close connection with his conduct towards his brethren, and is incompatible with an unloving behavior. At all events the following words from εἰρήνη to παῖδες belong together, as designating the fruits of "love," unselfish love; εἰρήνη therefore denotes peace with others, μακροθυμία patience under injuries, χρηστ. gracious, friendly character, ἀγαθ. is nearly related to this: Benevolence (LUTHER); not so generally as, good dispositions (the special meaning is quite frequent in the Septuagint): πιστες here of course not=justifying faith, but either trustfulness, as opposed to mistrust, or faithfulness.—Finally, temperance, ἐγκράτεια, is added in antithesis particularly to the sins of lust and intemperance (vers. 19-21).—[Here again LIGHTFOOT is excellent: "The difficulty of classification in this list is still greater than in the case of the works of the flesh. Nevertheless some sort of order may be observed. The catalogue falls into three groups of three each. The first of these comprises Christian habits of mind in their more general aspect, 'love, joy, peace.' (The fabric is built up story upon story. Love is the foundation, joy the superstructure, peace the crown of all.) The second gives special qualities affecting a man's intercourse with his neighbor, 'long-suffering, kindness, beneficence.' (This triad is again arranged in an ascending scale; μακροθυμία is passive, 'patient endurance under injuries inflicted by others'; χρηστότης, neutral, 'a kindly disposition towards one's neighbors' not necessarily taking a practical form; * ἀγαθωσύνη, active, 'goodness, beneficence' as an energetic principle.) The third, again general in character like the first, exhibits the principles which guide a Christian's conduct."—ELLICOTT: "Ἐγκράτεια, 'temperance,' is distinguished by Diog. Laert. from σωφροσύνη as implying a control over the stronger passions, whereas the latter implies a self-restraint in what is less vehement."—R.]—Against such as these there is no law.—Τοιούτων is neuter, as in ver. 21, and the sense is: Such virtues the law condemns not. This, however, implies of course: Against those that possess such qualities the law is not, and this is the same thought, only more specially conceived, as in vers. 14, 18. The law requires nothing more of them, and therefore also it can bring no accusations against them. [Or rather, because the law can find nothing to oppose or restrain in such things (which fulfil its ethical purpose), the law has no power over those who bring forth the fruit of the Spirit. Schmoller presses too strongly the implied thought. BEZA and others make a meiosis here: these are pleasing to God, but as MEYER remarks: Paul wishes to explain only what he has said in ver. 18 of those led by the Spirit. He sets forth the fruit of the Spirit and says: against virtues and states such as these the law is not, and he thus makes clear, how those led by the Spirit by virtue of their moral condition are not subject to the Mosaic law. For whoever is so circumstanced, that a law is not against him, over him it has no power.—R.]

Ver. 24. And they that are Christ's.—Another proposition weighty in itself, and especially also in the connection. It joins on well to what precedes, with which it is probably better to connect it, although on the other hand what follows naturally connects itself with this. That is, as Paul went back from the exhortation to the exercise of love towards our neighbor to the exhortation to a walk in the Spirit, as the principle of love, so now he goes back beyond that again, and shows how this walk in the Spirit is itself grounded in fellowship with CHRIST. As thus, in the first place he spoke of the fruit of the Spirit, and then says: Now it is those that are Christ's, who have crucified their flesh, etc.; who therefore have crucified the very disposition opposed to the aforesaid fruit of the Spirit, the disposition from which the works of the flesh proceed, so that the opposite disposition, the fruit of the Spirit, can find a place. [ELICOTT: "The connection of the whole paragraph appears to be as follows:—'The Spirit and the flesh are contrary to each other; if the flesh prevail, man is given over to all sin, and excluded from the kingdom of God; if the Spirit be the leading principle, man brings forth good fruits, and is free from the curse of the law. Now the distinguishing feature of the true Christian is the crucifixion of the flesh; consequently, it must be obvious from what has been said, the living in and being led by the Spirit'.—R.]—Have crucified, ἐσταύρωσαν.—This is conceived as something accomplished, and is therefore apparently to be referred to an individual act, the act of becoming a Christian through faith and baptism. The meaning, to be sure, is not, that now the flesh, with its affections and lusts, is not any longer present at all with those that have become Christians. But yet at least a walk in the flesh should not any longer exist in the case of Christians; we may declare to these that such a walk is in contradiction to their essential character as Christians, and that a walk in the Spirit may rightly be expected of them; yet this is only possible because we may urge this upon them: You now have crucified the flesh. It is to be noted also, that the language is not: slain, but, crucified. The former could not so well be said, as it is conceived rather as a task of the Christian to be accomplished only by continual effort (Col. iii. 5). In "crucified," however, the simple slaying is not the main idea, but the condemning, giving sentence, surrendering to infamous death; and this has necessarily taken place in becoming Christ's. [ELLICOTT: "Though this ethical crucifixion is here designated as an act past, it really is and must be a continuing act as well. This however the aorist, with its usual and proper force, leaves unnoticed; it simply specifies, in the form of a general truth, the act as belonging to the past, without affirming or denying any reference to the present. In all such cases the regular reference of the tense to the past may be felt in the kind of summary way in which the action is stated,—the sort of implied dismissal of the subject, and procedure to something fresh."—R.]—Ἐσταίρω, naturally alludes to the cross of Christ, and the fellowship with Christ involves a crucifixion of the flesh for the very reason that it is fellowship with Christ's death on the cross; for through this the fact that men's σάρξ deserves condemnation and is obnoxious to death, is demonstrated and set forth in a way of irresistible force; for Christ indeed has only suffered what men have deserved on account of their sinful "flesh," and therefore what this itself has deserved. Whoever therefore appropriates to himself in faith Christ's death upon the cross, regards the "flesh" in himself no longer; for him in Christ's death this has been crucified. (Comp. Rom. vi. 6.) [MEYER: "'Have crucified the flesh,' expresses: to have divested themselves of all vital fellowship with sin, whose seat the σάρξ is, so that, as Christ was objectively crucified, we, by means of the entrance into the fellowship of this death on the cross, crucify the σάρξ subjectively, in moral consciousness of faith, i.e., have made it entirely lifeless and inoperative through faith as the new vital element, to which we have passed over. To Christians considered ideally as here, this ethical slaying of the flesh is something which has taken place, in reality however, it is also something taking place and continuing."—R.] Ἡθιμῶτα are passions, aroused by the σάρξ in the sensibility; these then show themselves active in definite sinful lusts, ἐπιθυμίας. In the παθ the man is, as is implied in the word passive; but this passivity becomes activity in the ἐπεθυμίας. [Comp. Col. iii. 5, and see TRENCH, Syn New Testament, 2d series, § xxxvii.—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Men are pointed away from the law and to faith, first and above all, because only faith in Christ and not the keeping of the precepts of the law, or the doing of works of the law, is the way to the attaining of justification and of the divine inheritance (subjectively: to the attaining of the comfort of the forgiveness of sins, of the adoption of children and the hope of the eternal inheritance). For him who has this faith, the law loses its importance, for the reason that a usus justificatorius it has not, while it has already fulfilled its usus pedagogicus, of impelling to faith, in the case of such a one.—But nevertheless the Apostle is the farthest possible from meaning that the believer on Christ is dispensed from giving a truly moral (ethico-religious) character to his inward disposition and his life (from the doing of "good works"), and is entitled to persevere in sin, that is, to indulge the "flesh." So far is this from being true that this, despite his faith and despite the fact that faith is the condition of salvation, nevertheless excludes him from the kingdom of God and from eternal life (v. 21; vi. 8). And, indeed, this cannot be the opinion of the Christian, for this his faith in Christ involves not merely an impulse and power to the avoidance of sin, to the willing and doing of good, but because it is a coming into fellowship with Christ's death, it immediately involves also the arising of a hatred against sin, a condemning of the flesh (ver. 21), and because it is a receiving of Christ, it involves also the beginning of a life for God (comp. ii. 19 sq. and the DOCTRINAL NOTES on that section). The latter fact, the new life, which arises or is given with faith on Christ, receives in this section its exact expression; there begins in man a working of the Spirit (πνεῦμα), who, overcoming the flesh (ver. 16), brings forth fruit in an ethically good, God-pleasing disposition of heart and life (ver. 22 sq.). Nay, it is only this faith in Christ which leads to this goal, as it is only this which leads to the other goal of justification. The law cannot effect this second, and quite as little can it effect the first. On the contrary, it arouses the σάρξ (and the ἀμαρτία dwelling therein), but does not assist to the receiving of the Spirit (comp. iii. 2, and Rom. vii. 8). So little therefore does faith in Christ dispense from a disposition and course of action pleasing to God, that it is just this, nay more, only this which leads thereto. If any one is disposed to call this disposition and activity to the Christian, thus conformed to God's will, a "fulfilling of the law," he does not name it wrongly; only in doing it he is to keep in mind (1) that it is not to be understood in a formal, but only in a material relation: a doing of that which the law commands, yet not because the law commands it, but in the strength and on the impulse of faith, or more properly, of the Spirit, something therefore entirely different from what Paul calls "works of the law;" it is that which he so often names ἔργα ἀγαθὰ, works of the Spirit, rather than of the law; (2) that in this appellation law is taken in a quite restricted sense, of the properly ethical commandments (see Rom. xiii. 8 sq., where it plainly appears what Paul means by the νόμος; when he speaks generally, he uses the expression ἐντολαὶ θεοῦ, 1 Cor. vii. 19). "Fulfilling of the law" will therefore always be an only partially adequate expression for a Christian life, a conformity of the life to God's will. Entirely abandoning the Old Testament point of view therefore, Paul speaks directly of an ἀναπληροῖν τὸν νόμον Χριστοῦ (vi. 2).*

2. But it is true that the "doing of good works" the making faith active in a walk and mind pleasing to God, does not come to pass, as it were, of itself (as might appear from what precedes), even with the believer (even though, as of course is pre-supposed, his faith is an actual one of inward persuasion, and not merely nominal, is actually equivalent to a τοῦ Χριστοῦ εἶναι, and therefore bears within it the energy perfectly adequate to a moral renewal of the life). Even with the believer the σάββ has not disappeared. Therefore, although abstractly we must say: the believer cannot dispense himself from a genuine ethical renewal of his life, yet in concreto we are rather to say: He ought not. The "thou oughtest" comes back even to him who stands on the foundation of faith. This appears in the case of the believer, in a twofold manner. In the first place and chiefly on the side of the πνεῦμα, which he receives in faith; for this works not merely as it were physically, in the form of an energy of nature, converting the will of man into agreement with the mind of God (and the figure of the καρπὸς must be understood cum grano salis: a bare growing up it certainly is not); the result is brought about ethically and not physically; the πνεῦμα also approaches the will with requirements, which it is true are far more intensive, which have as it were a quite different power of bending the will from the requirements of the law or of the conscience (the law of the letter or of the conscience); for they are strengthened by the persuasion which is received along with faith into the heart, of the condemnation of sin as well as the forgiveness of it, of the holiness, as well as the compassion inhering in the grace of God in Christ. But it is with an "ought," however intensive, that the πνεῦμα in the believer approaches the will of man, and seeks to determine it to let itself be guided by him, to determine it to the ἀρεθὰς and then also to the πνεύματι περπατεῖν; and in doing this he meets with many hindrances on the side of the σάρξ (ver. 17).—This is the immediate, inward "ought" that has place and is needful even with the believer. But to this inward monition and impulse of the Spirit, there must be added, in order to keep it ever alive and guard it against all impure admixture, one coming from without. Of this we have in this very section the speaking proof. The Apostle sees occasion given him to admonish the Galatian Christians with earnest words to a disposition and course of life answerable to their faith; he approaches them with an "Ought:" "So ought it to be with Christians = because you believe in Christ!" And his admonition here and elsewhere holds good also for us; it is the testimony of the Spirit conveyed through the word—testimonium externum (in distinction from internum)—the comprehensive exposition of which is the function of New Testament ethics.

3. That even the believer is not and cannot be spared the earnestly admonishing and impelling "ought" because even with him there is not found a steady will (on account of the old Adam), is the meaning of the church doctrine of the tertius legis usus, the usus legis with the renatus (the us. didact. or normat.), and understood in this sense it is correct. But as it is expressed it is distorted and incorrect, and is in conflict with the indisputable Pauline doctrine, that the believer is not ὑπὸ νόμον, that he may not be placed nor place himself under it. He is indeed under a law of the Spirit, so far as the Spirit admonishes, requires, rebukes, yet the Spirit does by no means merely this, but far more; this is the very least that he does. But especially is the believer in no sense whatever under the law of the letter, the Old Testament law, the proper lex, and with all its generalizing of the conception of lex, the Formula Concordiæ, nevertheless, in the section touching this matter does not really go beyond the Mosaic law. It does not arrive at the conception of the law of the Spirit (the law of faith), whether this is entirely inward, or expressed also in the word of Scripture (in the New Testament word of Scripture, which for the fulfilment of the ethical requirement pre-supposes the faith in Christ with what it has and gives). The law of the letter (the proper lex), has, it is true, its great significance for the believer, but it has its place not, so to speak, after Faith, but only before the same, as pedagogus (see above on chap. iii. 19 sq.); and in this sense it permanently retains its importance, and is indispensable for faith. That is, the sinfulness and imperfection of the new life even in the believer, make it needful that the law should not once only, but ever afresh, awaken in him the knowledge of sin and the impossibility of himself attaining salvation and eternal life, and by that very means drive him to assure himself of it in faith in Christ; and so ever impel him anew to faith. So far, therefore, as a usus of the lex, strictly so called, can be predicated even as to the renatus, it falls under the usus pedagogicus, as usus secundus. But in this pedagogy its function is continually exhausting itself again; this function only does Paul ascribe to it, and another, the function docere, ut in vera pietate vivemus et ambulemus, we have no right to attribute to it, especially as we thereby come into conflict with the definite assurance that the law only stirs up sin and the σάρξ, and of itself continually hinders anew the Spirit's gaining dominion and therewith the attainment of the vera pietas. The law contributes directly neither to justification nor to the new life, and cannot therefore be directly the means of maintaining the latter. What it can and should do, was and is, to open the way for that which does lead to justification and to the new life, namely, Faith. As this is its work at first, so is it ever after. The accomplishment of these two things it must then leave to faith, first as that which lays hold of God's grace—for justification, then as that which has laid hold of it and therewith receives the Spirit. This Holy Ghost now, and not the νόμος, is alone in condition as the spirit of faith to assist to ever renewed victory over the σάρξ, partly through His teaching, partly through His monition, partly through His persuasion and drawing. For if the believer did right because admonished by the law, he would only attain again to ἔργα νόμου, but not to veritable ἔργα ἀγαθά.—Only so much is true, that in concreto very many a Christian, because faith has been with him from the beginning or has become only a name, allows himself to be guided merely by the law of the letter, at least if he has moral earnestness of temper, and thereby accomplishes nothing more than ἔργα νόμου, as to which he simply deceives himself, in accounting them perhaps for ἔργα τοῦ πνεύματος. More or less, moreover, does he seek in these ἔργα νόμου his justification also, and his hope; half-way at least, reckoning as the other half the merit of Christ, yet more in name than in reality. [It is only necessary to remark here, that Paul uses the word νόμος as covering the whole Mosaic law. That this whole Mosaic law has not the third use, of "teaching us how we may live and walk in true piety," is very evident. So also, that the new life of the believer is only a new life, in so far as it is through the teaching, monition, persuasion and drawing of the Spirit, must be believed and felt by the Christian. Still what does that Spirit teach and admonish us to do? To "walk even as he walked," all will agree. And how did He walk, that Master whom we follow?—He fulfilled all righteousness, He obeyed the law for us. Clearly then the Spirit, which receives of the things of Christ and shows them unto us, will show us as our duty, what Christ did, the complete obedience to God's requirements, and this will include all of permanent ethical value in the Mosaic law.—That may be but a part, yet it is a part, for what was in itself right at Sinai's foot is right at the foot of the cross. The Spirit is the Holy Spirit, Holiness is opposed to sin, Sin is opposition to God, it expresses itself in disobedience to His moral law,—the Holy Spirit must teach, admonish, persuade and draw us to the observance of whatever has been at any time an expression of God's moral law. The law cannot have a usus pedagogicus still, did it not convict us of sin; it cannot convict us of sin, unless its requirements are holy, and just and good; and as such the Spirit of Holiness must teach us the moral law still.—The controversy about the third use of the law, between the Lutherans and Reformed, seems to be one of terms. The only practical question that can arise out of it, is one respecting the obligation to observe the Fourth Commandment.—R.]

* [Whether theologians agree about terms or not, they all must recognize the fact that in so far as any law of God has a directly ethical purpose, it must continue to be binding on those who are Christ's, not binding as a law, with condemnatory power, so as to bring us again into bondage, after Christ has made us free, nor even binding on the conscience, so far as its punitive functions are concerned, but binding us with the cords of love, the bands of a man, a rule for the loving children of a Father, a guide for the glad gratitude of those whom Christ has made free. Thus far all that was of permanent ethical purpose in the Old Testament law must remain "the law of Christ;" to admit a change in God's ethics is repugnant to our souls. How much this includes is the practical question, which the New Testament itself answers in the life of Christ and the teachings of His Apostles. That it includes the Decalogue, that each and all of those Commandments are still in force, as a law, in the sense indicated above, there can be no reasonable doubt.—R.]

4. Spirit and Flesh. Πνεῦμα and σάρξ are the two polar antithesis, as the Apostle most vividly shows in this section, ver. 17. Πνεῦμα is the Holy Ghost, the Divine principle, that enters along with faith in Christ into the man, generating in him a divine temper and divine life, and that in conflict with the σάρξ and its παθήματα and ἐπιθυμίας. Σάρξ is in itself simply (in antithesis to the Divine principle), human nature, of course the whole because the living nature, and embraces therefore body and soul. But it is not human nature on the side of its relation to God, but on the side of its alienation from God, on which side man with relation to God draws himself back upon himself, seeks himself and takes honor to himself, withdrawing it from God; in short human nature as sinful.—The use of "flesh" to denote human nature in general, is grounded in the Hebrew idiom, according to which כֶּסֶף is used by synecdoche for the whole man, and this idiom itself is in its turn, without doubt, grounded in the experience and Scriptural doctrine of the frailty of man, which induced the sacred writers to derive the designation for man generally, from that part of man in which his frailty is most conspicuous. As this frailty again has its ground, according to Biblical teaching, in man's alienation from God, there became connected with σάρξ, the established designation of human nature, the accessory idea of alienation from God=sinfulness. This took place in the proportion in which this view into man's alienation from God even from birth, as the deepest ground of his frailty, became clear, and in the New Testament, therefore, more than in the Old.—The expression σάρξ, therefore gives us no right whatever, to think of the bodily organism more than of the soul, and (with reference to the accessory notion of sinfulness,) to find intimated in the expression either the view of the derivation of sin from the body, or an especial reference to so-called fleshly sins more than others. (Comp. WIESELER'S thorough exposition of this conception.)—The essential element in the idea of the σάρξ is the turning away from God and referring ourselves to ourselves, the self-seeking, egoistic element. This is primarily in respect to God, but immediately connected with it is the fact that a man in reference to other men also seeks himself, his enjoyment or his gain. It is easily explicable therefore why love appears as the first effect of the πνεῦμα, being the temper and act opposed to selfishness. In this section the Apostle has, it is true, special occasion to exhort to the love of our neighbor, but his speaking of love is not on this account merely casual. [Comp. on σάρξ, J. MÜLLER, Christian doctrine of sin.—R.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 13. LUTHER:—The natural man understands nothing of the doctrine of grace; therefore comes it, when he hears this doctrine, that he straightway draws it down to his own lust and lewdness, and concludes on this wise: If the law concerns us not and has no right to us, then will we live as we list.—How we at this time have seen in all ranks that all will fain be evangelical and enjoy the Christian liberty, and yet nevertheless the great crowd goes its own way; this one follows his avarice, the other his lewdness, the third his pride and haughtiness, etc.—RIEGER:—The liberty to which we are called by the gospel, is not so intended that we may tear ourselves loose from the law at our own will and please the flesh.—Into such a freedom the law can with honor dismiss man; for through Christ and the curse borne on the cross the law has its highest honor, and sin or the flesh wins thereby no advantage. For precisely that which was impossible to the law, namely, to bring to pass an inward enduring hatred against evil and an inward cleaving to good, from a willing heart, is accomplished by faith in Christ, and therefore the liberty of faith is not against the law.—HEUBNER:—By the side of the highest good stands the highest evil, by the side of freedom, lawlessness. No word has been so abused and desecrated, as Freedom.

LUTHER:—"By love serve one another." We must diligently teach in religion both sorts of doctrine, of Faith and Works; yet so that we carry neither too far. Else, where one teaches Works alone, he loses Faith, but if one teaches concerning Faith alone, forthwith gross, carnal men begin to dream that works are not necessary. Yet must the doctrine of Faith be planted first, or it cannot be understood what good works really are.—Although we have been justified, yet have we still sin in us, which rhymes as ill with good works as with faith, but draws us away from both. Besides flesh and reason is so disposed that it has by nature all its delight and pleasure in Pharisaic and superstitious works, and does those works with far greater earnestness which itself has chosen, than those which God has commanded. Therefore have rightminded preachers as much to do, in admonishing the people to genuine love and really good works, as in teaching genuine faith.—Christians must consider thus, that in their conscience they are indeed free from the curse of the law, sin and death, but as to the body they are servants, for therein should one serve another by love.

Vers. 14. It is needless for any one to trouble you with circumcision and Moses' ceremonies; see to this before all things, that you remain steadfast in the doctrine of faith. Will you after that do good works, as indeed you should, I will with a single word point out to you the noblest and greatest of all works, which ye should do, that ye may fulfil all laws: Love one another! Therefore the true, perfect doctrine and Christian theology of Faith and Love is in long and in short this: Believe on Christ, love thy neighbor as thyself! It is most short, to look upon the words, but if it is to be practical, it is broader, higher and deeper than heaven and earth.—The reason imagines it a very low thing, to say nothing of its being an act of God's service, for one to help the other by love, i. e., for one to instruct and set aright a wanderer, comfort a mourner and afflicted, support the weak, for every one to help his neighbor, as he can, and make up for that which he lacks; item, for one to be obedient to government, hold his parents in honor, to have patience at home and bear with a whimsical, strange-tempered yoke-fellow, with ill-mannered servants, etc.; all which amounts to this: By love serve one another. But believe me, they are not contemptible and mean, but excellent and precious works, because God has commanded them and they please Him. It is of no concern therefore, whether the world looks upon them as mean and contemptible or not.—It is a short word, but excellently and powerfully spoken: Love thy neighbor as thyself! We cannot give any one a better, more certain and more exact example, how he should love his neighbor, than if we say to him that he should love him so as he loves himself. Nor can one have a better, nor nobler virtue than Love, and this high virtue can be directed towards nothing better than towards our neighbor.—If thou wouldst know how thou shouldst love thy neighbor, consider diligently how dear thou art to thyself, that thou wouldst gladly have help and counsel given thee, if thou wert in distress and necessity, as much as all creatures could. Therefore needest thou no book, out of which to learn how thou shouldst love thy neighbor.—RIEGER:—The call of the gospel to Christ and the grace which has come by Him, the sense of being one Spirit with Christ, brings us under the law of Christ, where in love we have all at once, and assumes also the willingness to serve one another through love. The warding off the claims of faith in the gospel with the pretext of love to man, is a critical sign of our times.

Vers. 15. STARKE:—Hatred, envy and reviling are as the teeth of snakes and lions. What shame, that among Christians there is such an evil kind of people!—What mean these wearisome, and mischievous lawsuits?—LONGE:—Each vice brings in time some punishment with it, as every virtue has in advance some recompense. For even as love does him good that cherishes it, so does hatred and contention bring nothing but disquiet and ill-content, and indeed injures the body also in health.—RIEGER:—The biting begins on good pretexes; but men easily go further, to do mischief to the property, to disparage the merits, etc.—ROOS:—To bite and devour one another, is not only the wont of the populace, but also the way of many learned men, whereof their learned journals, reviews, etc., bear witness. And so do they devour one another mutually, i. e., they destroy altogether one another's credit and the usefulness which each yet had, perhaps also a part of their life. Their esprit is flesh, what may then the rest be?

Vers. 16, 17. LUTHER:—Paul means by lust of the flesh not alone unchastity, but also all other sinful cravings, whereby the saints are tempted.—It is impossible that you can follow the Spirit in all things whatever and not also feel the flesh, and that you should remain unhindered by it; yea, it will hinder you and so hinder you that you will not be able to do what you gladly would do. In this all that you can do is to withstand the flesh, which quickly becomes inflamed with anger, impatience, etc.; murmurs, hates, bites, becomes angry against God, falls into doubting; and to follow the Spirit, which admonishes you to peace, patience, hope, faith. To know this is for believers most profitable and comforting.

When I was yet a monk, I often thought that I must be lost, when I felt an evil temptation. Then undertook I many kinds of discipline, confessed every day, and yet it all helped me nothing. For the same temptations evermore recurred; therefore tormented I myself perpetually with such thoughts: See, there you have committed such and such a sin, etc., therefore there is no help for you, all your good works are come to nothing. Had I then rightly understood St. Paul's words, I would not have tormented myself so severely, but would have considered with myself, as I am now wont to do: Dear Martin, it amounts to nothing, your leading an angelical life here on earth; so long as you live in the flesh, it will not give over its way. Yet do not therefore despond, but withstand it through the Spirit, that thou mayest not fulfil its lust, and it cannot hurt thee, because thou art in Jesus Christ.—Whoever thinks that a Christian must have no fault at all in him, and yet feels that in himself there are many and manifold shortcomings, such a one must at the last be consumed of melancholy. But whoever understands it, him must such temptation of the flesh, i. e., evil, serve for his best good. For when the flesh will tempt to sin, he is led with earnestness to pray, to seek forgiveness of sins through Christ, to lay hold of the righteousness of the law, after which perhaps he would never have so greatly longed.—It is to Christians profitable and good that they feel such troublesomeness of the flesh, that they may not become proud over the supposed righteousness of their works, as if they were in favor with God on account of the same.

STARKE:—The contest of the flesh and the Spirit exists alone in the regenerate. The conflict which exists in an unregenerate man, so that he does not fulfil all evil lusts that stir in him, is only a conflict of the reason with its natural impulses and gross sensual desires. This is to be carefully distinguished from the former, that one may not, because he feels within himself a struggle against sin, immediately reckon himself regenerate.—The strife of the Spirit against the flesh is an infallible token of regeneration and a state of grace, and is distinguished from the strife which is waged by the mere powers of reason in this, that the former always wins the victory.—These words are misused by the children of the world to this effect, 'that it is vain to strive after a holy character, because we cannot, after all, do what we would. But mark, what the regenerate, who are spoken of here, will according to the Spirit, and what according to the flesh. They are not aiming first to obtain the dominion over sin, for this they have already, but they would fain quench and be rid of everything sinful; but this, on account of the flesh cleaving to them, they cannot do. According to the flesh they would fain let sin come to dominion again, but that they do not, because the Spirit strives against it and overcomes the flesh. Therefore it follows from this, that a believer can by all means live holy, but here can arrive at no perfection.

RIGGER:—The flesh and the sin which cleaves to the same, lust and its allurements and enticements we indeed experience, nay more, there may also occur cases where it is not as plain as we could wish that the lust has not been admitted and treacherously taken the will with it. But by renewal in the spirit of the mind one may always count himself to be no debtor to the flesh, to fulfil its lusts, but may take the curse from Christ's cross and hang it upon the flesh, and from Christ's Spirit may gain the willingness to separate therefrom. Between the strivings of the Spirit and of the flesh against each other it must become evident, which way the man, after receiving sufficient strength, is bending his will, and on which side he takes his stand. If the Spirit's impulses and leadings continue with a man and if he is honestly minded to obey the Spirit and its holy opposition to the flesh, he does not indeed deny the law the right to show him his imperfections, but he is not under it, and is not at the last judged by it. Christ has taken the believer under His atoning shield against the curse of the law, and has moreover bestowed on him His spirit, which impels him as to all other good, so also to combat for this faith, although there is many a conflict and many a doubt before he can without ceasing so believe and act.

Ver. 19. LUTHER:—It is a very different thing to be tempted by the flesh, and yet not to follow its lusts, but to walk in the Spirit and strive against them, from what it is to consent to the lust of the flesh and abide therein and nevertheless to make great boast of the Spirit, and to make as though one lived Christianly. The former St. Paul comforts, in that he says: Because they are ruled by the Spirit they are not under the law; but the others he threatens with everlasting damnation, in that he declares: They that do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of heaven.—SPENER:—By works of the flesh, Paul, it is true, understands principally actual outward, out-breaking deeds, but he does not thereby exclude inward vices, which are also rightly called works of the flesh. Nay, as respects the outward sins themselves, their sinfulness consists not merely in the outward deed itself, but in the evil and prevailing inclination thereto. Therefore is one guilty of adultery, fornication, gluttony, drunkenness, quarrelsomeness, etc., who allows such vices to gain the upper hand in his soul, even though from want of opportunity, or fear of infamy or trouble he restrains himself from the outward act; for God looks on the heart and its longings.

"Drunkenness, revellings." In STARKE:—The Apostle is not speaking merely of the habit and custom of drinking; therefore it is a false excuse if any one thinks that a debauch is no sin if only one does not make a business of it. The devil invented this excuse. When any one so overfills himself that he is unfit for prayer and the business of his calling, that is drunkenness; what then are we to think of the respectable world with its sinful and damnable Christian drinking bouts? and what too of this continual drinking of healths, than as of a temptation to swallow down liquor?—"They which do such things." It is not said: They that do such things daily; for even though one does any such thing only now and then, on certain occasions, yea even only once, but voluntarily, he forfeits the kingdom of God, so long as he remains under the dominion of this work of the flesh. Nor is it said: They that do all this. It is not needful for a man to do all these sins or many such, to fall under the penalty, but it is enough, if a man lets one single sin rule over him, let it be what it will. Now it rules over him, not only while he is committing it, but so long as the purpose never to commit it again, is not yet fully fixed.—They shall not only not procure eternal life by their works of the flesh (as may well be supposed), but, if they set their hopes, not upon earning eternal life by their works, but receiving it as a gift to be received by faith, they will not, leading a dissolute life, inherit it any more than earn it.—He inherits not the kingdom of grace, still less the kingdom of glory, even though his funeral sermon extols him as blessed, surely, very, or even most blessed.

VER. 22. It is not enough to flee the manifest works of the flesh, but we must bring true virtues to take their place. The Spirit of Christ must water and warm the hearts of men with His heavenly consolation, if they are to be fruitful to good works.—“Works of the flesh,” said Paul, as being what comes into view and can be apprehended by reason alone, as to what they are, and that they are evil; but he does not use this term of the fruits of the Spirit as being for the most part internal, and although they express themselves in outward works, yet they cannot be comprehended and judged by the mere reason; nay, reason, should she pronounce a judgment, would be more apt to pronounce a judgment against them. Indeed, the fruits of the Spirit often exist in good measure in those, who yet in true poverty of Spirit complain of the lack of them.—ROOS:—All these fruits are found in every spiritual man, although in one this, in another that fruit is more richly possessed.

LUTHER:—Joy. This means the loving discourse of the bridegroom and his bride, i. e., the joyful, loving thoughts, which a believing heart has concerning Christ, the wholesome admonitions, the joyful hymns, thanksgiving psalms and songs of praise, with which Christians admonish and cheer one another. The Scripture testifieth once and again, that God had no pleasure in the sadness of the spirit, but wills, that we be joyful in Him. Therefore also He sent His Son, not to make us perturbed and mournful, but joyful. Therefore do the Prophets, Apostles and Christ Himself admonish, yea, command us, that we be glad and joyful. Where this spiritual joy is, there does the heart inwardly rejoice through faith in Christ, and moreover shows forth such joy outwardly with words and gestures; yea, it can be joyful even in the midst of affliction and death. Such joy is to the world unknown.—Patience. This is a virtue of such sort, that one does not alone endure and suffer waywardness, ill-luck, wrong, etc., but also bears long with those that do him such evil, and waits if perchance they may at some time amend themselves. The devil has this way, that when he cannot in tempting us overcome by main force and might, he watches nevertheless with wearisome continuance, and worries us out if he can, for he knows well what weak, earthen vessels we are, that cannot at the last endure violence and repeated hard strokes;

therefore he oft gains great advantage, in that he perseveres so long and diligently.—Gentleness.—This is: that one is so disposed, that every one gets on well with him and loves to deal with him. For Christians should not be unfriendly and cross-tempered people, but mild, courteous, friendly, such as every one loves to consort with, who bear with others' faults, are easy to give way to others, and can put up with the whim of others. Such a courteous friendly man was our Lord Jesus Christ, as we see in the Gospel from beginning to end.

IN STARKE:—Goodness.—All nature is to us a mirror of kindness. For where is there a creature that does not serve and do good to man? For us the sun shines, for us the earth bears fruit, us does the heaven cover, to us does the air minister breath, everything stands at our command; should we then be the only ones not to practice kindness?—LUTHER:—Faith.—He that has this faith, such an one suspects no evil of other people, but has a loving, simple heart towards every man; and although he be deceived, he yet remains long-suffering and kind, and forbears with him that hath deceived him. In summa, he believes every man and yet puts his confidence in no man but alone in God.—ROOS:—Against spiritual men the law is not, for although they are not without fault yet they are wholly under grace (Rom. vi. 14), and are partakers of the blessing in Christ Jesus (Gal. iii. 13, 14). There are people, who imagine themselves to have preached the gospel, when they encourage others, by a human persuasion, to let go the Jewish way of thinking, not anxiously to count this or that for a sin, and to entertain no scruple about permitted things. But although such persuasions, addressed to a natural man, may bring about a show of freedom, and such a man may then imagine that he is no longer under the law, though he really is, yet the great question remains, whether the law is not against him. The right of the law to curse him, is not an usurpation, but a well-founded, sacred right, to which there is nothing to oppose but Christ's death on the cross. Has then every one who boasts of freedom become a believer in this crucified Saviour? And has he also, by means of this faith, become spiritual, so that he exhibits the fruit of the Spirit within him? It is only against such that the law is not.

VER. 24. “Have crucified the flesh.”—STARKE:—This word well expresses how sin must, little by little, be disabled and slain, for the crucified man did not die at once; he was first made fast with nails to the cross and then kept there, till through the loss of blood and through hunger and thirst he became weaker and weaker, and finally died. In the beginning of repentance the old man is nailed to the cross, and then in conversion he is fastened to it anew, when he gets a hand or a foot free; the soul carefully avoiding all occasions whereby evil lusts can be aroused, until indwelling sin is more and more disabled by all manner of acts of repentance and devotion, which are contrary to corrupt nature, which acts must extend through the whole life. But now all power to crucify the flesh is to be derived from Christ's death on the cross.

RIEGER:—They that have ceased from the law and all endeavors to obtain life and righteousness therefrom, and on the other hand belong to Christ and accept Him as the source of their life and holiness, such keep their flesh crucified. They are and live yet in the flesh, to be sure, and so experience how close sin cleaves and how heavy it weighs; they experience the enticements of inward lust, but they have learned from the gospel the meaning of God in the cross of Christ, and have believed it, and can believe the judgment executed on the body of their Redeemer as in God's eyes in force also against their own flesh. And indeed they desire no rest for the flesh, but impose on it the curse, which through Christ's cross is imposed thereon, and behold this wearisome and painful dying with a hope gathered out of the gospel.

On vers. 13-15. Christianity and Freedom: (1) How little we have occasion, on behalf of freedom, to repent of being Christians and becoming Christians more and more; (2) how deeply we must rue that freedom which we do not establish and confirm by the power of Christ.—The Christian is free and yet a servant of all.—The right union of Freedom and Love (1) needful (2) difficult.—By love serve one another! (1) An actual (2) but also a blessed service.

On vers. 16-24: Walk in the Spirit, etc., ye shall not fulfil the lust of the flesh: (1) the lust of the flesh, (2) the resisting of it in the Spirit.—The walk in the Spirit: (1) is not accomplished without conflict (ver. 17) (2) but saves from destruction (vers. 19-21), (3) leads to a glorious goal (ver. 22).—With his exhortations to walk in the Spirit (1) the Apostle places us upon a fearful battle-field (ver. 17), (2) gives us the view into a frightful abyss (ver. 19 sq.), (3) leads us into a lovely garden (ver. 22 sq.). The conflict of the flesh and the Spirit: (1) in what does it consist? (2) to what should it impel?—Temptations through the flesh must come: despond not!—but must be combatted and overcome through the Spirit: be not careless!—There is no believer so holy or strong that he does not feel his flesh, but also none so weak that he cannot withstand it.—The motions of the flesh a damper to pride, a testimony against self-devised spiritualism.—Three times three fruits of the Spirit; a lovely garland.—To have crucified the flesh a token that one is Christ's.—Who can crucify his flesh? Only he who is Christ's.—The crucifying of the flesh (1) takes place indeed, when one is Christ's, but (2) does not of itself make certain that one is Christ's.

KAPFF:—Under what law is the believer? (1) Not under that of the flesh, (2) not under that of Moses, but (3) under that of the Spirit.—RAUTENBERG:—The crucifixion of the flesh: a token of true Christianity, a work of the Holy Ghost, a victory of Christian freedom, a progress to inward peace.—In LISCO:—The conflict of the Spirit with the flesh: (1) Where does it arise? Only where a life in the Spirit is begun. (2) Why is it necessary? a) On account of the inward incompatibility of flesh and Spirit, b) on account of the consequences, which proceed therefrom, good or evil fruits. (3) How should it end? By the Spirit's overcoming the flesh.—The walk in the Spirit: (1) It kills the works of the flesh, (2) it brings in its place the fruits of the Spirit.—Flesh or Spirit? Choose! (1) The flesh is thy destruction; (2) the Spirit creates divine life; (3) as Christians we are bound to the life of the Spirit.—(Fast-day Sermon): The call on Fast-day: the works of the flesh are manifest. (1) What works are works of the flesh: (2) what those have to expect, who do such works.—(Whit-Sunday Sermon): We are partakers of the Holy Spirit only when we do the works of the Spirit.—GENZKEN:—What do we yet lack of a walk in the Spirit? (1) The beginning is, that the flesh lusteth against the Spirit and the Spirit against the flesh, and many have not even advanced so far; (2) the next step is, that we no more fulfil the lusts of the flesh, and many are not even ashamed of the manifest works of the flesh; (3) the consummation is, that we bring forth the fruits of the Spirit, and from that we are all yet far distant.—GREINER:—Flesh and Spirit: (1) they are contrary one to the other; (2) their ways lead asunder in time and eternity.—ENGELHARD:—The life of that man, who is ruled by the Spirit of God: (1) He breaks with sin and mortifies daily the old man; (2) he is filled with the fruits of righteousness, which do not conflict with the law, but which can never be accomplished under the dominion of the law; (3) and receives accordingly the most excellent of all rewards, the inheritance of the kingdom of God.

Vers. 13-24. FRANTZ:—Beware that ye do not, through freedom, give a handle to the flesh, for (1) freedom in Christ is not without law; it has its law, only not in the members, but in Christ, which law is love. (2) It is not without control; but its control is exercised not by the flesh, but by the Spirit.

2. More special Admonition to the Walk in the Spirit (to serving Love), or warning against excessive self-valuation and envious selfishness.

(CHAP. V. 25, 26.—vi. 1-10.)

(Epistle for the fifteenth Sunday after Trinity.)

25, 26 If we live in [by]¹ the Spirit, let us also walk in [by] the Spirit. Let us not be desirous of vain-glory [become vain-glorious], provoking one another, envying one another.

a. Warning against unloving self-exaltation above others (vi. 1-5).

VI. 1 Brethren, if [even if]² a man be overtaken in a fault, ye which [who] are spiritual, restore such a one in the spirit of meekness; considering thyself, lest thou also [shouldst] be tempted. Bear ye one another's burdens, and so [or thus shall ye] fulfil³ the law of Christ. For if a man think himself to be something, when he is nothing, he deceiveth himself. But let every [each] man prove his own work, and then shall he have rejoicing in himself alone, and not in another [his ground of boasting only in what concerneth himself, and not in what concerneth the other].⁴ 5 For every [each] man shall bear his own load.⁵

b. Warning against envious selfishness.—Admonition to unweariedness in doing good, especially to teachers of the word (vers. 6-10).

6 Let [But let] him that is taught in the word communicate unto him that teacheth in all good things. Be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap. For he that soweth to his [own] flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting. And [But] let us not be weary⁷ in well doing: for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not. As we have therefore [Accordingly then as we have]⁸ opportunity, let us do good⁹ unto all men, especially unto them who are of the household of faith.

² Ver. 25.—["Become vain-glorious" is both a more literal and a more correct rendering of γινώμεθα κενόδοξοι.—K.]

³ VI. 1.—["Even if" preserves the force of καί.—R.]

⁸ Ver. 10.—[Ἀρα οὖν, "accordingly then," see EXEG. NOTES.—R.]

⁹ Ver. 10.—Εργαζόμεθα. The reading ἐργαζόμεθα is too weakly supported. [So all modern Editors. Lachmann at first adopted the latter reading, but soon discarded it.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Paul, after the exhortation, ver. 13 (and the more general one, ver. 16), had passed on to a more didactic exposition. But from ver. 25 on, he returns to the general exhortation to "walk by the Spirit" (which, as he means it, is essentially equivalent to exercising serving love) immediately specifying it more particularly, ver. 26; vi. 1 sq.

Ver. 25. If we live by the Spirit.—Ζῆναι πνεύματι means of course not the outward life, the realization in walk of this life in the Spirit, for the words "let us also walk," etc., are the first in which the Apostle exhorts them to stamp the life by the Spirit upon the outward walk. Zōē therefore means the inner life, and the spiritual life is here referred to, as one at first entirely internal. It is not improbable that "live" is to be taken here in a pregnant sense (MEYER)=if we are living through the Spirit, i. e., death occurs to the man, who is Christ's, with respect to the "flesh;" but in another respect precisely thus does Life come in; the death of the old man introduces the life of the new (comp. ii. 19, 20), and this latter is grounded upon the "Spirit." [There is some doubt as to the force of the dative πνεύματι here. Schmoller renders it durch den Geist; MEYER calls it ablative, and ELLICOTT says it is "here adopted rather than διὰ with the accusative as thus forming a sharper antithesis to the dative which follows." ALFORD follows the E. V., but, while objecting to the ablative dative, gives the same sense to the word. LIGHTFOOT renders "to the Spirit," after the parallel passage, Rom. vi. 2, 10: "dieuntosin," etc. But the first view is preferable.—R.]—Let us also walk by the Spirit,—περιπ. πν. ver. 16. [Schmoller thus makes the second πνεύματι an instrumental dative, but it seems better to take it as a normal dative (so ver. 16) with MEYER, ELLICOTT, et al. The verb στοιχεῖν seems to imply a more studied following of a prescribed course.—The Greek order is striking: "If we live by the Spirit, by the Spirit also let us walk." "By" has both the instrumental and normal force in English.—R.] In what this walk should consist is then shown.

Ver. 26. Let us not become vain-glorious.—The walking by the Spirit (or walking in love) should show itself thus. κενόδοξον εἶναι=vanam gloriam captare, to affect vain-glory. [Πινύμεθα, "become" vain-glorious, there being in the verb as well as in the use of the first person an intentional mildness as though the sin had not yet taken root (ELLICOTT).—R.] The sense appears to be: we should not seek glory by provoking one another and envying one another, for such glory is "vain," worthless.—Provoking one another.—Ἀλλήλους προκαλοῦμενοι, by vaunting in the presence of those to whom we feel ourselves superior, by pressing our superiority.—Envying one another.—Ἀλλήλους φθονοῦντες, not favoring one another, enviously refusing to acknowledge the good qualities that a man possesses. (φθονεῖν is to be taken in this sense here, see below on vers. 6, 10).—The seeking of vain-glory naturally goes hand in hand with provoking and envious behavior. Where the former is abandoned, the latter also disappears. The warning of this verse is nothing else than the admonition to serve one another by means of love (ver. 13), somewhat more particularly defined. The Apostle now reverts to this, in order to give it a more precise application. The remark on ver. 16, that the exhortation of the Apostle may have had a direct connection with the main theme of the Epistle, since the intrusion of the false teachers might very naturally have provoked a bitter party strife in the churches, applies also to the more special application of that admonition (ver. 13) in this section. Especially is it not improbable that through the intrusion of the false teachers the relation of the individual members to their teachers had been disturbed, thus giving occasion to the earnest admonition, vi. 6 sq. Yet this conjecture is not absolutely necessary; we need only suppose that some circumstances in the churches gave him particular occasion to direct his exhortation to this point.—[The context seems to justify the close connection of what follows with this verse. It is urged, however, that "brethren" indicates a change of topic (comp. iv. 12), and also that the change from the first to the second person favors the opinion that a new paragraph begins with vi. 1. But the thoughts are too closely linked, to allow these arguments from mere forms of expression to be conclusive against the close connection which MEYER and others defend.—R.]

VI. Vers. 1-5. These verses extend the warning of v. 26, against "provoking one another." The Christian instead of using any advantage he may possess over another, or any defect he may observe in him, to exalt himself above him (and thereby to provoke him), should, as walking by the Spirit, do just the reverse, should set his neighbor right, when he sees him at fault (ver. 1) and then help him bear the burdens which oppress him (ver. 2). Ver. 3 justifies these admonitions by the remark that a man's thinking himself to be something, when he is nothing, is self-cheatery; for it is such a vain imagining that underlies the refusal to set others right (in the spirit of meekness) and to carry their burdens. As the right means to be saved from this self-deception, Paul proceeds to commend self-examination. (On this, see below, vers. 4, 5.) [ELLICOTT thinks it probable "that the teachers are mainly addressed in vers. 1-6, and the hearers and laity in vers. 6-10." But while there are points in the exhortation specially applicable to classes thus distinguished, it seems best not to discriminate thus, for it limits the force of some parts of the exhortation, and might lead to an incorrect interpretation of ver. 1.—R.]

Ver. 1. [Brethren.—BEZA: a whole argument lies hidden under this one word.—R.]—Even if a man be overtaken.—Προλημψθῇ; πρό expresses undoubtedly the unexpectedness of the being taken=before a man is aware, or is able to offer resistance. The ἐν shows that the verb is here to be understood as=to entangle, so that in a fault, according to the frequent Biblical image, is used of the snare in which any one is caught (WIESLER). LUTHER gives the sense quite correctly: "überreilt," overtaken. [The strictly temporal reference (before the arrival of the Epistle, or a recurrence of the offence) is unsatisfactory. ELLICOTT, ALFORD and LIGHTFOOT join καί with the verb: "if a man be even surprised," i. e., caught before he can escape, flagrante delicto; thus implying an aggravation of the offence. But it is not necessary to connect καί thus, and such a meaning of the verb is rare, while the interpretation does not accord with the context so well as the common view given above. MEYER: The Apostle charitably regards the sins, which may occur among the Galatians, as peccata precipitantis.—R.]

Ye who are spiritual.—This refers back to ver. 25=ye who have the Holy Ghost, show your possession of it, your living by the Spirit, by such action. He thus describes "provoking one another," as something repugnant to their very character. In view of this exalted predicate, which he ascribes to them, they should now reflect, what demeanor is the becoming one for them as "spiritual." This implies that they are not now conducting themselves agreeably to this designation, or such admonitions would be unnecessary. [The general character of the exhortation forbids our finding in this phrase a reference to a party of more liberal views, who had taken his side against the Judaizers, and were not paying sufficient regard to the weaker brethren. Hence there is no irony, but he is giving a test for their spirituality. It is true those who would stand the test, who were really led by the Spirit, would necessarily be the adherents of Paul, as the representative of the freedom of the gospel, but there is no evidence that there was such a party when he wrote.—R.]—But to the validity of this claim to be "spiritual," it is necessary that, when a brother is overtaken in a fault, the πνευματικός should restore such a one, should bring him into his normal state, instead of turning this fall into an occasion of self-exaltation against him. [Καταρτίζετε: the verb is properly a surgical term, applied to the setting of a joint, here used in an ethical sense, the idea of amendment being more prominent than that of punishment. The figurative meaning would perhaps imply some official act of restoration, but this is forbidden by the context.—R.] This "restoring" (or the wish for it) is the main idea, and not strictly speaking, as is commonly assumed, the spirit of meekness; or at least not this alone. This latter phrase only states the manner in which the setting right should be performed. This spirit must attend the act, or there is no real restoration, only a seeming one, in which the irritating lust of praise still seeks its gratification. It is forced, to understand "spirit" of the Holy Spirit, whose character is meekness, or rather who bestows meekness; it signifies the human spirit disposed to meekness. The foregoing "spiritual" does not require us to understand the Holy Spirit here, comp. 1 Cor. iv. 21. [It does not mean merely "a meek spirit," but a spirit whose characterizing quality is "meekness," with an ultimate reference to the Holy Spirit. (See ELLICOTT.) As "spiritual," possessing the Holy Spirit, their spirit toward offenders should be characterized by "meekness."—R.]—Considering thyself.—An individualizing transition to the singular. The added clause contains a motive to "restore" (not merely to "meekness").—Let thou also should be tempted—and it happen to thee to be overtaken in a fault.

Ver. 2 makes the admonition of ver. 1 more general. It is not always by setting our neighbor right, that we may do him good; another exhibition of love is to bear his burdens.—Burdens.—Βάρη is undoubtedly in itself quite general: whatever presses our neighbor, lies heavy upon him, so that occasion is given to the vain-glorious man to provoke him. Moral delinquencies, such as are named in ver. 1, are included; but also more grievous things, such as outward distress.—Bear.—Βαστάζετε, of course, does not mean: endure (for I do not endure what oppresses my neighbor, but only that, for example, with which he oppresses me), but simply: bear—to take upon our shoulders as our own burdens, and thereby help him to bear; this includes, in some circumstances, the lightening of them; in others, their entire removal (WIESELEN).—We see that the restoring of a neighbor who has been overtaken in a fault falls under this general idea of bearing his burden.—The Apostle adds to this admonition a powerful motive for its fulfilment: and thus shall ye fulfil the law of Christ.—The expression "fulfil the law of Christ" is significant, and designedly chosen with reference to the zealots for the law. You will forsooth have a law, now see here is a law but "of Christ;" fulfil that! At the same time it refers back to ver. 14, where the duty of love to our neighbor has been designated as the commandment equivalent to the whole Mosaic law, but a "law of Christ," not of Moses. [Yet this "law of Christ" must necessarily include that "law," which He not only came to fulfil, but so fully illustrated and enforced in His teachings. The use of the future indicative instead of the imperative seems to imply, that the Christian needs "the law of Christ" only as a guide to grateful duty. "Thus shall ye fulfil" what your hearts would fulfil, "the law of Christ," "who died for us and rose again."—R.]

Ver. 3. For if a man think himself to be something, when he is nothing.—"When he is nothing" belongs to the protasis. Being nothing: not precisely in the ethical sense alone, but one, who can in truth make no claim to consideration above others, yet ambitiously assumes this. This of course involves the admission that one may be something, but such a one is least likely to assume this; it is the one that is nothing, who is most likely to lay claim to consideration above his merits.—He deceiveth himself, his "glory" shows itself to be "vain." [Λιγνυροο: ορεναπατα, 'deceives by his fancies,' Comp. Tit. i. 10. More is implied by this word than by ἀπαται, for it brings out the idea of subjective fancies and thus enforces the previous δοκεῖ. It was possibly coined by St. Paul, for it seems not to be found in any earlier writer, and at a later date occurs chiefly, if not solely in ecclesiastical authors."—R.]

Ver. 4. Paul therefore immediately after enjoins: let each man prove his own work.—Τὸ ἔργον: not collective—the aggregate of his actions; for it is not particularly an ethical self-examination that is referred to, but general, about equivalent to: His case, the way matters stand with him. [The view of MEYER, ALFORD, ELLICOTT, et al., that τὸ ἔργον is emphatic and collective, seems on the whole preferable.—R.]—The reason why he enjoins this, is then stated with: then shall he have his ground of boasting only in what concerneth himself and not in what concerneth the other.—"He will then have matter of self-gratulation only it will be in reference to himself, and not to another." [See the excellent note of ELLICOTT, the results of whose exegesis are given in the above rendering. The preposition εἰς must be translated by a paraphrasis, in order to preserve the same force in both cases. Τὸν ἑτερον, "the other"—the man with whom he was comparing himself; general in its meaning, but particular in each case of comparison. (ALFORD.)—R.] Every one, in that case, directing his look as he does in self-examination only upon himself, will refer his self-praise only to himself; will only boast of such excellences as he may discover in himself; but he will not vaunt himself on the ground of the deficiencies which he finds in others. And if this results from the very nature of self-examination, as directing the look of the man upon himself alone, it will also be sure to come to pass from the result, which every one will find from self-examination, as this is stated in ver. 5, with which Paul gives special weight to the οὐκ εἰς τὸν ἑτερον. Of course not to the εἰς ἑαυτὸν. In order to have εἰς τὸν ἑτερον καὶ ἑαυτὸν, i. e., in order to be able to make what another lacks a ground for boasting over him, one must not only have many good qualities but a pre-eminence above the other, of which he is conscious.

Ver. 5. But this is not the case. On the contrary ἐκαστος τὸ ἰδίον φορτίον βαστάσει, each man: I as well as the other, I cannot therefore make his φορτίον, a ground of vaunting myself against him.—Shall bear.—Future, expressing the result of the self-examination, because it succeeds it (not referring to the last judgment) = it will turn out, that every one has a burden of his own to bear, [i. e., now in actual life, he is appointed to bear, must bear.—R.]—His own load.—Φορτίον: although principally meaning moral imperfection, yet here it is not to be limited to this; it means imperfection of every kind, every defect which one discovers in himself. Φορτίον is in itself a vox media, it may be either heavy or light; βάρος can only be heavy. To this general declaration the more general word exactly suits; respecting the degree of burdensomeness Paul does not in the first instance mean to make a statement, but only to say that each one has his own φορτίον. It is otherwise in ver. 2: there the idea of heaviness is the main one. [CONYBEARE finds here an allusion to Æsop's fable (πῆραι δύο), but ELLICOTT thinks this not very plausible. LIGHTFOOT says: "βάρος suggests the idea of an adventitious and oppressive burden, which is not implied in φορτίον. The latter is the common term for a man's pack. Each Christian soldier bears his own kit." Still this does not sufficiently imply the idea of imperfection and consequent grievousness, which the context, with its injunctions to self-examination, seems to demand.—R.]—The difficulty in vers. 4 and 5 is, that the Apostle condenses together two thoughts: 1. "in what concerneth himself alone," 2. "not in what concerneth the other;" which to be sure are in one aspect identical, and yet must be distinguished, because the second is strengthened by the subsequent declaration, "for each man," etc., which gives it a somewhat different sense from what it has when disjoined from this and taken with what precedes. DE WETTE takes it differently: And then will he have his joy (if he has any, which is manifestly put as doubtful) for himself alone (for his own joy) and not for others (to irritate and provoke them therewith).—Self-examination is therefore the antidote to "provoking one another;" it is to oppose this that the Apostle has enjoined it.

Vers. 6-10. This division also is a specifying of the admonition v. 26; it must, although more remotely related, still have reference to it, because it is undeniably a carrying out of the admonition to "serve one another by means of love," (v. 13,) of which, as we have seen, v. 26, only gives the negative expression. More accurately considered this division opposes the second vice named in v. 26, "envying one another." It contains admonitions to an abounding, unwearyed "communication in good things," and this is the direct opposite of "envying one another"—grudgingly withholding. Only he who is unenvious will do good to all.

Ver. 6. The exhortation in this verse does not therefore come in so abruptly, as at first sight appears. Paul first opposes envious grudging in that relation in which it looks particularly ill, and yet must have occurred, in the relation of him that is taught in the word of God to him that teacheth, and in contrast with this, admonishes to communicate and that in all good things. This is of course not in all that is morally good (MEYER), but in all good things [i. e., temporal possessions of every kind.—R.]. It is expressed with the utmost generalness, and is therefore to be understood in its broadest sense; care for temporal support is included in it, but not exclusively intended; there is to be, according to the words, a sharing of all good things, that is, in a certain sense a community of benefits; he "that is taught" is to give "him that teacheth" a share in all his advantages. This is the very strongest antithesis to "envying." [The verb means literally "go shares with." It is intransitive here, followed by the dative of the person, and the thing ("in all good things") governed by a preposition. There is no lexical or grammatical difficulty. Almost all commentators refer the verse to the temporal support of ministers. MEYER gives it an ethical meaning mainly to preserve the connection, and Schmoller, for the same reason, makes the meaning general, as above. But de arrests the former topic before it passes out of sight (LIGHTFOOT), and serves here to indicate the contrast between the temporal and spiritual application (ELLICOTT). As if he had said: "I spoke of bearing one another's burdens. There is one special application I would make of this rule. Provide for the temporal wants of your teachers in Christ." Κατηχοίμενος here means simply "instructed," and is followed by an accusative of reference (λόγον), "in the word," i. e., the gospel.—R.]

Vers. 7-10. To give weight to this admonition to him that is taught in the word that he should show a generous liberality in all things to his teacher, Paul points to the last judgment, to the law of Divine retribution as one of immutable validity. This is primarily meant to strengthen only the special admonition, ver. 6, and shows how earnestly he means it, that he attributes to it an importance which we may not in any way lessen; but still this confirmatory reference to Divine retribution is expressed with such generalness, that Paul is able immediately to deduce from it an entirely general exhortation to unwearyed "well doing," which he then again specializes somewhat in ver. 10. But the main matter is still the "communicating in all good things" in opposition to "envying one another."

Ver. 7. Be not deceived.—Do not entertain the erroneous thought, even should it occur, or be presented to you, that God can be mocked (lit., to turn up the nose at), that is, with success. (All glory sought therein is vain.) This mocking would occur, if man might do what he would, if he could with impunity neglect a communication of good things to his teacher, who himself imparts that which is best to him. The declaration that this cannot occur, is established by for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap.—[Τοῦτο καὶ; "this and nothing else than this" (ELLCOTT).—R.] The essential correspondence between the seed sown and the fruit reaped, which takes place according to a law of nature and is therefore subject to no mutation, is a current image in other writings also (even in profane writers, e. g. Cicero, de Orat. II. 65, ut sementem faceris, ita metes, and others), for the exact correspondence between the retribution of God in the judgment and the moral acts of man in his earthly life.

Ver. 8. The general proposition of ver. 7 is established in this verse. For, never will it fail of coming to pass, that he that soweth to his own flesh shall therefrom reap corruption; and even so he that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting.—"Corruption" is therefore conceived as that which corresponds to sowing to the flesh, as the harvest to the seed, or "corruption" is essentially the crop into which the flesh when sown develops, and in like manner "life everlasting" is nothing else than the ripened fruit sown to the Spirit.—Ο σπείρων, it may be remarked, does not alter the figure in ver. 7b, making it the soil instead of the seed, but, as Paul has to speak of two different sorts of seeds, he only designates this difference according to the difference of the soil, on which it is sown; for seed is always chosen according to the soil that is to be sown; that which is sown upon the flesh is even thereby a different seed from that which is sown upon the Spirit. Perhaps it would be better to say: ὁ in ver. 7 is not merely to be understood of the seed itself, but of the whole manner and method of the sowing, and so to be taken as equivalent to this: According as any one sows, even so shall he also reap; and in view of this "according as" we should have in ver. 8 to understand especially the soil which is sown, inasmuch as it is especially on this that the character of the harvest depends, as good or bad. For it is this that is treated of here. Flesh and Spirit, moreover, are figuratively represented as the soil, because they are conditioning, quickening factors, and therefore to sow upon the flesh or Spirit generically—to let one's self be determined in the act by the flesh or Spirit. Πνεῦμα of course, as in ver. 16 sq.—the Holy Ghost, and therefore lacks ἑαυτοῦ, which stands with σῶς.† Φθόρα, agreeably to the contrast with ξυλὴ ἀλωσης—Destruction, Ruin, and that eternal ruin—ἀπώλεια, θάνατος, not—Transitoriness.—Ver. 8 was only a proof of ver. 7b, according to its two contrasted sides; 7b itself again was in proof of θεός οὐ μωκτηρίζεται. The sense of this is: One cannot neglect doing good, without being punished of God. But the thought is not expressed.

Ver. 9. Here, however, it is expressed affirmatively, agreeably to 8b, as an admonition (because it is true, as said in vers. 7 and 8, that what a man sows, he reaps) to do "well," in a certain sense to sow τὸ καλόν. That the admonition rests immediately upon what precedes, is shown by the continuance of the image, which we find at least in the second clause.—Well doing is to be taken in its greatest possible extension; agreeably to the signification of καλόν, about—to do what is praiseworthy, only it must not be taken so generally as no longer to fall within the sphere of unenvious exhibition of love towards our neighbor. This is the frame, within which this "well doing" also falls.—Let us not be weary.—["Behave cowardly, lose heart."—R.] It is possible to grow weary, because "well doing" is at first a sowing, which, according to the laws of nature, is not immediately, perhaps not till long after, followed by the harvest. It comes in due season, καὶρῷ ἰδίῳ, not just when we wish it: at the precise time, when it can appear according to its inward law, as ordained by God. Agreeably to the eschatological expectations of the Apostle we have here to understand particularly the Parusia.—If we faint not.—Μὴ ἐκλύόμενοι, to be taken as conditional and to be referred to the sowing: if we do not become weary in that. This is no "languid repetition of the warning against ἐγκακεῖν" (USTERY); for it is just this not becoming weary in good which Paul wishes to emphasize, as the condition of reaping the harvest (WIESELER). [BENGEL: ἐγκακεῖν est in velle, ἐκλύεσθαι est in posse. The latter is a consequence of the former (LIGHTFOOT). The verse is one of mingled warning and encouragement, and the latter element appears from the promise to those who do not "faint," for one may be "weary," and not yet have fainted.—R.]

Ver. 10. [Accordingly then as we have.—Ἀρα οὖν, "so then," "accordingly then;" ὥς, not "while," nor "according as," nor since, but "in proportion as" (ALFORD).—R.] The mention of the "season" of the harvest reminds him to warn against wasting the καὶρὸς, season, opportunity, of the sowing, because when the former is come, it will be too late for the latter. And in conclusion Paul deduces from the more general admonition (ver. 9) the more special exhortation let us do good, which is also to be taken in the widest possible extent, but still retaining the special idea of doing good. The generic interpretation of ἐργαζώμεθα τὸ ἀγαθόν—to do what is morally good (MEYER, as in ver. 6), is inconsistent especially with the distinction, which Paul makes with especially, etc. For to the doing of what is morally good, one is of course equally obliged towards all men, members of the household of faith or strangers to it (WIESELER).—To them who are of the household of faith.—Οἰκεῖοι τῆς πίστεως, doubt-

* [LIGHTFOOT calls attention to the fact that this proverb occurs in 2 Cor. ix. 6, in reference to the collection for the poor saints at Jerusalem, to which object the Galatians had been asked to contribute (1 Cor. xvi. 1); he therefore conjectures that this implies a general censure of their habitual niggardliness.—R.]

† [Perhaps as LIGHTFOOT suggests to bring out the idea of selfishness. It need not be made emphatic, but is best retained in English by "to his own flesh."—R.]

ness not merely—those belonging to faith, as an amplification of the simple term: Believers (MEYER), but kindred in faith, fellow-Christians, as constituting together one οἶκος τῆς πίστεως, one family of faith.* The emphasis rests upon the fact that believers are of one family; for this is the reason why love should be especially shown to them (WIENESELER).—The expression is of course general and comprehends their fellow-Christians as a body, but yet it refers back to ver. 6; because their fellow-Christians should be so especially the objects of the “doing good,” it follows from this, that those who teach should least of all be excluded therefrom. Paul in 1 Cor. xvi 1, 2, refers to a more specific instruction concerning beneficence which he had given to the Galatians.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Self-exaltation and self-seeking. In respect to the right conduct of Christians towards each other, Paul designates two vices as especially incompatible therewith: Self-exaltation and self-seeking. And indeed there is nothing which more undermines society in general than these two vices; while self-exaltation rends the inner bond of unity with our fellow-men, self-seeking rends besides this the outer bond. But now the maintaining of fellowship is the specific character of the relation of Christians to each other; they are meant to form an undivided whole. These two vices therefore stand in diametrical opposition to the very nature of the Christian life. And of course they must, for they are the immediate off-spring of the “flesh,” whose essence is self-seeking. But Christians should walk by the Spirit, and should prove this to each other especially by serving love.—Certain as it is therefore, that both self-exaltation and self-seeking stand opposed to the essence of Christian fellowship, and must therefore be most vigorously contended against, it is nevertheless equally certain, that they may, and do in fact, appear within the circle of Christian fellowship. For this is by no means as yet pure and free from such manifestations of the “flesh,” though not thereby necessarily losing the name of Christian fellowship. On the contrary an individual or a community may really “have the Spirit,” be possessed of a spiritual life, while yet in their walk the sarcal element still manifests itself in various ways, against which we must protest. Things must be rebuked which, looking at the ideal, and not at the concrete fact, might appear impossible to occur; admonitions must be given, which might from the ideal point of view appear superfluous. The admonitions given in this section are the simple proof of what was remarked on the former section, respecting the indispensableness of continual admonition, respecting the “shall” which the Spirit inwardly, as also the Word of Scripture from without, must continually present to the Christian. While therefore we must not be lax, as if every thing in the Christian life, including the fruits of the Spirit, came of itself, and while we must earnestly represent to the Christian the incongruity of every thing sarcal with his faith, we must on the other hand be very careful not to make rigoristic requirements of him, not to expect that no manifestation of the flesh should ever appear in him; we must not, in particular, imagine that among Christians every thing must, as it were, of itself, be serving love. And therefore, even when many virtues of the Christian life are yet very defective, we must not be quick to deny that one is “spiritual,” to dispute the sincerity of his faith and declare him to be a hypocrite.

2. Admonitions especially necessary for those busy about the law. “But was it then necessary, one might here ask, that Paul should write such admonitions to people, who were already anxious about works of the law and out of conscience were submitting themselves to the Jewish ordinances? Was there not then in their case an exaggerated piety, that needed rather to be tempered? Alas, no! The world lies in wickedness and yet is busy about works of the law. It lives in contention and envy, in turbulence and lewdness, and yet forsooth will be saved by its virtue. By what sort of virtue? By a magnanimity, which from time to time, amid many evil deeds, a man may practice toward his neighbor, by wit and lively discourse, by a decent gravity, the offspring of age and function, of interest and love of honor, by the observance of political and ecclesiastical laws, yet with many exceptions. Let no one go into raptures over this virtue.—At a distance it appears great, but near by it is mean and in God’s eyes naught. Do not such people need to have some one proclaim to them: Be not deceived, God is not mocked? The Galatians gave themselves up to the Jewish law, which did in fact contain the strictest moral teaching. They sought salvation earnestly, and sought it, not by vices, but by virtue and religious works; yet notwithstanding this Paul was constrained to warn them against all manner of gross sins, especially against hatred and envy, and to proclaim to them: Be not deceived, God is not mocked! How certain it is therefore, that he who does not live in faith on the Son of God, will be overmastered by sin, and in spite of his endeavors to be virtuous, will become ever more vicious! If then one does not come into the right way, he at last mocks God. And how does one mock Him? In this way, that one desperately imagines that He will at last take black for white, that He will let him reap wheat who has sown tares, and will reward the sin, to which men have given the name of a virtue. By such principles, which to be sure, when we read them on paper, contradict the first principles of human intelligence, the whole world is ruled, and therefore is there occasion to say it: God is not mocked; what a man sows in this world, that, and nothing else, shall he reap in the next.” Roos.

3. What a man sows, that shall he also reap. An utterance as simple, as it is true and deep. According to it, all the actions of men are a sowing, which shall have a harvest, the actions of men shall bear a fruit. This image, taken from the processes of nature, declares in the first place in general terms, that actions never stop with themselves, but that with inexorable certainty a retribution will one day follow, as certainly as the sowing is only a beginning, which according to a settled law leads at last to the harvest. This it is true does not follow at once, and therefore there is need of patience, but afterwards, when the time has come, and then without fail. And, more definitely, the seed bears a harvest, and such a harvest as corresponds exactly with itself. The actions of men therefore find a retribution fully adequate. On this account it is not so indifferent what kind of seed we sow, for the seed, that is, our acts, will bear their proper fruit, and no other. If we want then a fruit to please us, we must sow a seed that will bring it; we shall never succeed in getting a harvest that is independent of the seed; and on the contrary no one can deprive us of the harvest that answers to the seed. The harvest of our actions is nothing casual, it is that which they must produce. It rests with us, then to determine the harvest, by determining the seed. If "corruption" is the harvest of sowing to the flesh, and "life everlasting" the harvest of sowing to the Spirit, each result follows by an inward necessity. The former is only the carnal sowing come to ripeness, the latter is only the ripened seed sown to the Spirit. Thereby the character of arbitrariness and externality is removed from the Divine retribution, and objections from this side obviated. But on the other hand it must not be thought, that we can in this way set aside the positive Divine activity, and therewith retribution in a definite sense, and change it into a kind of natural process. As in the natural process of the springing of the harvest from the seed, the inner law of nature, according to which this takes place, is no other than the law of God, as it is He who gives it effect, so is it also in this spiritual harvest. His ordinance is it, that "corruption" grows up from the sowing to the flesh and the reverse. And especially is this so, in that corruption is really what it is, only as decreed by Him, as consisting in being rejected by Him, and even so, on the contrary, life everlasting; this is His gift for the sowing to the spirit, only because He gives it and gives Himself also therein. Moreover the time of harvest is in itself simply a future one for the time of sowing; when the sowing, therefore, is over, every moment may be a "due season" for the harvest, even in this world, and there are indeed many such harvests. But these are only anticipations. The proper, due season for the harvest first comes with the time appointed by God for general retribution at the consummation of the kingdom of God. Not till then will the sowing to the flesh have ripened into corruption, and the sowing of the spirit into life everlasting. Before that, the time of the sowing still continues, and it is still possible to change the character of the harvest by changing the one sort of seed for the other.

4. Cure for spiritual teachers. The emphasis and earnestness, with which Paul admonishes against a selfish behavior of the church towards her teachers, are remarkable. This very estimate of spiritual good, as above all others, makes him the more impatient of selfishness concealing itself behind a pretended spiritual mind. "The support of teachers by their hearers is grounded on a divine institution, not only in the Old Testament (comp. Priests and Levites), but also in the New. Although now in the New Testament there is no definite prescription how much of their property hearers shall contribute to their teachers, yet it is certain from the New Testament that God requires an adequate and liberal support. This admonition was the more necessary in the Apostle's time, because there were not then, as now, yearly incomes definitely appointed. But now that there are such settled incomes the admonition to hearers has not lost its force, especially when they know that the regular income is insufficient. Christ's commandment binds them then to a subsidy. Men act to-day, as if their forefathers alone had been bound to care for the support of their teachers, and the hearers of to-day had nothing to add to this." STARKE.—LUTHER expresses himself very definitely and strongly respecting this duty towards teachers, e. g.: "It is indeed impossible that true Christians should endure to have their pastors pinched and in want. But because they do not only suffer this, but laugh in their sleeve at it, it is certain, that they are worse than Turks and Heathen."

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 25. HEUBNER:—The internal and the external must harmonize, must be one. The outer life is the reflection and thereby the sign of the inward life.—RIEGER:—To keep the flesh crucified is the only way to give room for the spirit, whose life appears in growing strength in a spiritual walk. Although walking is a consequence inseparable from life, yet the Apostle exhorts thereto, as to a duty, on account of the danger of slothfulness creeping on, as indeed one cannot walk without taking some special thought about it.—BROWN:—If we are spiritually alive, let us show that we are so by being spiritually active.—R.]

Ver. 26. LUTHER:—Love of vain glory is a common vice the whole world through, in all conditions. No village so small but there be one or two peasants therein, that will fain be taken for wiser and better than the rest. It is so pleasant to be pointed at with the finger and hear it said: See there is a man that is fit for anything! This vice is common, yet nowhere does it such harm, as to those who fulfil a spiritual function and service in the church.—CALVIN:—It is not lawful for us to glory but in God alone. Every other kind of glorying is pure vanity. Mutual provocations and envyings are the daughters of ambition.—R.—STARKE:—To seek honor with a proud spirit, is a token of a carnal man and an abomination to God. Lust of praise leads many sins together, held in one leash, as the huntsman leads hounds. Nothing is more opposite to the love of our neighbor, than high-minded self-love; wherefore it is of no use to commend the latter where the former is not eradicated.—HEUBNER:—The stoic pride of virtue also is the worst kind of vain-gloriousness.

Chap. VI. Ver. 1. LUTHER:—The forgiveness of sins belongs to those who are weak and frail in faith and life, and yet acknowledge their sins and pray for forgiveness; but to those who pervert the doctrine, it does not belong.—RIEGER:—The very words, in which the Apostle describes what behavior be seems us in regard to others' faults, are so chosen, that they insensibly incline us to the more merciful side. A man (how easy for a man to fall) is overtaken by the suddenness of temptation, by the concurrence of many circumstances, that have beclouded his vision. In such circumstances admonition, rebuke, persuasion, consolation, etc., may do the work of restoration, even as a dislocated limb may be again set in place. But for this there is needed the Spirit, and therefore on the one hand not blind love, not a careless disparagement of the fault, and on the other hand not severity, but insight into the gospel, to draw from thence motives for forbearing admonition, such as shall advance the crucifixion of the flesh and the strengthening of the inward man.—HEIDINGER:—Are we ourselves pure and blameless as angels, that our neighbor's fault drives us so quickly to arms? Was it Christ's way to break the bruised reed? Let us do as He did! The Lord is in the still small voice, although mighty winds sometimes herald his coming.—AUGUSTINE:—Rebuke administered in bitterness, profits not. Quidquid lacerato animo dictis, penitentis est impetus, non caritas corrigitis; dilige et dic, quod voles.—[CALVIN:—Nothing is more difficult than to bring us to examine or acknowledge our own weakness. Whatever may be our acuteness in detecting the faults of others, we do not see "the wallet that hangs behind our own back."—Whenever we have occasion to pronounce censure, let us begin with ourselves, and, remembering our own weakness, let us be indulgent to others.—R.]

Ver. 2. LUTHER:—A Christian must have strong shoulders and stout legs, in order to bear the flesh, i. e., the weakness of his brethren; for they have vices that are troublesome and annoying. Therefore must love pass by and overlook, and endure much. We must learn, since we can so easily endure and overlook our own sins and faults, many of which we daily commit, to bear also other people's sin.—In STARKE:—What is our whole religion, but a burden-bearing? We have our own and also others' burden to bear. We are all on a journey; if one is like to give way, the other must refresh him; if one is likely to fall, the other must help him up.—If it is not to be answered for, that we should not help another bear his burden, how unchristian must it be, to double his burdens for him.—[WORDSWORTH:—Poverty is the load of some, and wealth is the load of others, perhaps the greater load of the two. It may weigh thee down to perdition. Bear the load of thy neighbor's poverty, and let him bear with thee the load of thy wealth. Thou lightenest thy load by lightening his.—R.]—[The law of Christ is the law of mutual love.—R.]

Ver. 3. STARKE:—Self-conceit and haughtiness have cheated many a man. Pride is the harbinger of a heavy fall. It is often a grace, when God allows the presumptuous one to fall, that he may come to a knowledge of his own nothingness.—[BROWN:—Those who in their own estimation have little to learn, have in truth learned but little.—The greater advances a man makes in true Christianity, the more humble he becomes.—R.]

Ver. 4. LUTHER:—He that faithfully discharges his function, does not inquire much what men say of him, it is all one to him, whether the world praises or reviles him, but he has his honor within himself, that is, the testimony of his conscience, and the honor before God. It will doubtless in time come to pass, that your honor, which you have within yourselves, will be acknowledged also by other people. But if you have your honor only from others, it will surely come to pass, that the shame and ignominy, which you have now inwardly concealed in your heart, will in time become manifest to other people also.—STARKE:—Daily self-examination is one of the most important of all the duties of a Christian. A Christian must always look more at himself than at others, and examine his own life more than another's; for God will judge each man according as He finds him to be in himself and before his own conscience.—RIEGER:—To seek one's glory by self-comparison with others, or even, it may be, by disparagement of others, by divulging their faults, is a perilous course, and will avail nothing, when hereafter each one shall have to give account of himself before God.

Ver. 5. HEIDINGER:—Every genuine self-examination will certainly always have humiliation as its result.—[WORDSWORTH:—We cannot make the burdens of our own sins lighter by imputing a heavier burden of sins to others. Praise of ourselves, whether it proceeds from our own lips or those of others, cannot lighten our burdens. Because we are heavy laden, Christ exhorts us to take His light burden. Thus he converts our heavy burdens into light wings. The wings of birds are their weights, which they bear and which bear them. Let thy soul have the weight of Christ's burden; it has the pinions of peace and the wings of charity, and will bear thee to heaven. Thus bear thy own weight and it will bear thee.—R.]

Vers. 6-10. The more carefully one avoids judicial severity and other unwarranted assumptions in regard to others, the more room there is to make our intercourse with one another profitable for love and good works.

Ver. 6. LUTHER:—I do not love to expound such sentences, which speak for us, that are ministers of the Word; moreover, it may look, if one is zealous to treat such texts before the people, as if he did it on account of avarice. But one must nevertheless instruct the people thereabout, that they may know what degree of honor and support they owe to their teachers. This is also good for us, that are in the ministry, to know, that we may not take our deserved recompense with uneasy conscience, and as if we had no right thereto.—RIEGER:—The Scripture has not accounted it superfluous, to put into His Word, that remains good for all time, the admonition to communicate in all good things with him who teaches. But it is to be left wholly to this same Spirit and His prompting, when he will bring the observance of this admonition so into effect, that it exercises faith and strengthens faith.—STARKE:—Between teachers and hearers there should be a lovely exchange and joyful barter. A hearer needs not to complain as though he suffered disadvantage in this exchange. Whoever will not give our Lord God a penny, gets his due, when he is forced to give the devil a dollar.—In general the world requires the very greatest benefits bestowed upon it with the very basest unthankfulness.—[CALVIN:—It is one of the tricks of Satan to defraud godly ministers of support, that the church may be deprived of their services. Paul's recommendation arose from a desire to preserve a gospel ministry.—BROWN:—It had been well for the church and for the world, had Christianity been sustained and extended solely by the voluntary exertions and the voluntary contributions of those who themselves had experienced its invaluable blessings, and who felt the obligations under which both duty and gratitude laid them to supply the temporal wants of those who ministered to their spiritual necessities. Here, as in every other case, the foolishness of God is wiser than men.*—R.]

Ver. 7. IN STARKE:—Mock on: God will endure it for awhile, and will not send a thunder-bolt at once; yet will He not always be silent, but early enough will hold discourse with thee in wrath.—Whoever under any manner of apparent excuses seeks to deceive his neighbor, such an one mocks the omniscient God and does himself the greatest conceivable injury.—HEUBNER:—Besotted man would fain persuade himself that God's severity, His threatenings and judgments are not to be taken so very much in earnest. God is directly mocked when He is blasphemed, indirectly, when His commandments are presumptuously neglected.

Vers. 7, 8. IN STARKE:—The realm of nature has many vestiges of Divine wisdom, goodness, righteousness in it, which show forth and reveal themselves yet more gloriously in the realm of grace.—It is undoubtedly agreeable to the Divine order, as in the realm of grace so in that of nature, that every one should enjoy what he himself sows or does, whether good or evil. But whoever does evil and yet hopes for good, opposes himself to God's order in vain, and his hope is lost.—The sowing to the flesh cannot possibly be followed by anything but an evil harvest, unless such a harvest before it ripen, be uprooted by true repentance.—Our whole life is nothing but a seed-time, with which the future harvest in eternity is inevitably connected. Ah! let every one take heed that he scatter not tares and yonder be compelled to reap the curse.—Corruption does not really come from God, either directly or indirectly, but from the flesh.—RIEGER:—How slight and insignificant good and evil often appear when first sown! But how steadily they grow day and night, unnoticed by man. How late, but how infallibly do they reappear at the harvest! How irrevocable is the neglected seed time! Who can force it into being an unsown harvest?—HEUBNER:—Future and present stand in the strictest connection. Our future state will not only follow our present, but will be in the very strictest sense its product; the two will stand in as real a nexus as the seed sown and the harvest.—There is a double seed-time and harvest! Sowing to the flesh does not consist merely in a gross carnality of life, such as is followed by the most wretched want and pain, but in all living and working, even that which, materially considered, is the most beneficent and laudable, when it proceeds from an impure motive. Sowing to the Spirit is not merely the spiritual vocation, but every sowing, which is done at the leading of the Spirit.—[CALVIN:—Our liberality is restrained by the supposition that whatever passes into the hands of another is lost to ourselves, and by the alarm we feel about our own prospects in life. These views Paul meets here.—BUNKITT:—The Spirit of Him that raised up Jesus from the dead, will also raise us up at the great day, and reward our present parting with the things of this life which we cannot keep, with eternal life which we shall never lose.—R.]

Ver. 9. STARKE:—This admonition is uttered as an encouragement, as a way which has the least appearance of authority assumed over others. It is a way therefore which preachers should incline to use.—Christians may become weary in the race, for they find many an assault and many a hindrance. Happy are they who encourage themselves with this word: Let us not be weary in well doing! The more laborious the seedtime has been, the richer shall the harvest be. The harvest comes hereafter; the first fruits of the present time are a small matter compared with what is to come.—Christians are not greedy for reward, and do not demand it from God on the ground of merit, but they do suffer their work to be sweetened, and themselves spurred up to activity and faithfulness by the prospect of the reward.—[Fatigue is not weariness.—In well doing we are more apt to be weary than fatigued.—Weariness may come from habits of slothfulness.—The due season is God's season.—If we work on, feeling weary, yet not fainting, we shall reap.—R.]

Ver. 10. HEUBNER:—The incalculable value of the present life consists in this, that we have opportunity to do good. The fleshly minded cannot hereafter make up the good which he had the vocation and opportunity to do, e. g., the hard hearted rich man, the negligent father or pastor, etc.—STARKE:—One should not put off remembering the poor till death. Quod moriens das, ideo das, quod tecum ferre non potes; da igitur, dum vis, et mercedem habebis.—[BROWN:—The Christian knows no limits in doing good, except those which are fixed by his power and opportunity of doing good.—For a Christian to be unkind to a Christian is not only wrong, it is monstrous.—R.]—RIEGER:—As the house of God, the church, is of two kinds, the visible and the invisible, so are also those of the household of two kinds, namely, those who belong to the visible church, and then the true believers, whose faith and sincerity of heart are invisible. From this it follows, that one owes more love to his fellow-believers, even such as are so but in profession, than to those of another religion; but most to really believing fellow-members, to whom the appellation: they of the household of faith, especially applies. In the present day it is our business to seek out those who have pressed through from the service of the letter into the life of religion, into the service of the Spirit, and to count them for the members of the household of faith chiefly commended to us.—SPENER:—The more closely one, besides the general bond, is connected with any one by a special bond also, the more is he under obligation towards such a one. Thus a man is bound to his wife, parents to their children, brothers and sisters and blood relatives to one another, masters to their servants, citizens of one town or dwellers in one house to each other, in respect to works of love, more than they are to others; yet always without prejudice to the general love of our neighbor.

On the whole Section:—Wherein Christians' walk in the Spirit should especially show itself in their conduct towards one another: (1) In this, that no one exalts himself above others, but that one helps another up when he falls and assists him to bear his burdens: (2) in this, that no one grudgingly withholds what is his from another, but willingly lets him share in all and is unwearied in doing good (especially towards those who impart to one the bread of life in the word of God).—SARWEY:—If ye live in the Spirit, then walk in the Spirit; if ye walk in the Spirit, then walk in humility and forbearance, and in thankfulness towards your teacher and in liberality towards your brethren; and if ye walk therein ye walk in blessing.—GLÖCKLER:—Concerning the spirituality of the children of God: (1) What people are in the word of God called spiritual; (2) what their duties are towards others and those of others towards them; (3) whether it is necessary for all that wish to be saved, to be spiritual men; (4) how and when then one is to set about becoming a spiritual man.—HENGSTENBERG:—Christian love of neighbors as a chief part of a walk in the Spirit: it shows itself: (1) in loving converse with our neighbor, and that (a) in unambitious humility; (b) in helpful long-suffering; (c) in enduring patience; (2) in loving activity for our neighbor's good: (a) in willing advancement of church and school in our own dwelling place, see ver. 6; (b) in ready zeal for giving and helping for the sowing of the gospel in still wider circles (vers. 7, 8); (c) in general, in untiring doing of good of all kinds, especially to those of the household of faith (vers. 9, 10).

On vi. 1-5: Self-exaltation. (1) Wherein it shows itself. In this, that it does not do, what is mentioned in vers. 1 and 2. (2) What secures against it: Self-examination.

The single verses of the whole section almost all afford a theme at once, especially as several have the character of apothegms.

Ver. 25. Text and theme of a Whitsunday sermon in NITZSCH (Auswahl I. p. 177):—(1) The grounds of this Whitsuntide declaration. (a) The spiritual life requires to be demonstrated and revealed in the walk, or it does not exist; (b) it requires to be maintained and augmented by the walk or it is lost. (2) The substance of this requirement: not=abandon the world and kill the body; nor yet=no longer esteem the word and violate the law; but=in the power of the atonement pursue after holiness.

Ver. 2. Suitable text for a wedding discourse; vers. 7, 8, Fast-day, or New Year's eve, or harvest text; ver. 9, also a harvest text.

CONCLUSION OF THE EPISTLE.

Written by the Apostle with his own hand. He portrays himself in contrast with the False Teachers. An entreaty for future quiet out of regard to his sufferings. BENEDICTIONS.

CHAPTER VI. 11—18.

11 Ye see how large a letter I have written [See in how large letters I have written, 12 or with what letters I write] unto you with mine own hand. As many as desire to make a fair shew in the flesh, they constrain you to be circumcised; only lest they 13 should [that they should not]² suffer persecution for the cross of Christ. For neither they themselves [not even do they] who are circumcised³ keep the law [themselves]; but desire to have you circumcised, that they may glory in your flesh.
14 But God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by 15 whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world⁴. For in Christ Jesus [omit in Christ Jesus]⁵ neither circumcision availeth⁶ anything, nor uncircumcision, but 16 a new creature. And as many as walk [shall walk]⁷ according to this rule, peace
17 be on them, and mercy, and upon the Israel of God. From [omit From] henceforth let no man trouble me: for I bear in my body the marks of the Lord [omit the Lord]⁸
18 Jesus. Brethren, the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit [The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit, brethren]. Amen.

² Ver. 12.—[ἢ is misplaced in Rec. after ἵνα. It should follow Χριστοῦ. Διόκωνται is the reading of B. D. E.

adopted by Griesbach, Schulz, Lachmann, Meyer, Alford, Ellicott, Lightfoot, Wordsworth. Tischendorf (with A. C. F. G. K. L.), ἐκκορται: an improbable solecism, arising from the frequent interchange of ω and σ .—R.]

⁵ Ver. 15.—Ἐν γὰρ Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ is probably an explanatory gloss from ver. 6, though N. has it. We should read simply: οὕτε—γάρ. [The MSS. authority for the longer reading is very great, but so many old versions follow the shorter one, and the probability of an importation from ver. 6 is so great, that Tischendorf and almost all editors adopt it.—R.]

⁸ Ver. 17.—Κυρίον is omitted by Lachmann and Tischendorf. [Meyer, Alford, Ellicott, Lightfoot, on the authority of A. B. C.—R.; probably imported from ver. 18, but N. has τοῦ κυρίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ.] [Wordsworth, with his usual conservative tendencies, follows the Rec.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 11. See with what letters I write [or in what large letters I have written (see below)—R.] unto you with mine own hand.—Paul as a rule dictated his Epistles; but attested them by adding at least the conclusion in his own hand (comp. 2 Thess. iii. 17). So also in this Epistle. But as it is the first letter which he has written to the Galatians, he begs them to notice* his handwriting. This is the sense of πῆλικοίς γράμμασιν, which is therefore simply = with what sort of letters. Ἐγγραφα, according to the familiar epistolary usage; the aorist does not therefore refer back to the portion already written, but Paul means what he is just beginning to write in conclusion. So LAURENT, zur Kritik der Briefe des Apostles Paulus, in the Studien und Kritiken, 1864 H. 4, p. 643 sq.—His interpretation seems to have more in its favor than that of WIESELER (adopted in the 1st edition of this work), who renders it: "See with how great letters," etc., referring the words to the whole Epistle, in this sense, that he means to give his readers a token of his special love in having written to them in quite large, and therefore unusually legible, characters, and that, not through an amanuensis, as ordinarily, but with his own hand. Against this LAURENT remarks: How is it conceivable that immediately after so profound and earnest a discourse, the Apostle should have reviewed the characters he had already written, and have made so trivial a remark about their appearance? Besides the letters were not at all large; not much larger than ours. In Paul's day cursive writing was already in use. While therefore the amanuensis probably wrote in uncial letters, Paul himself wrote cursively[?]+—But his purpose in adding the conclusion with his own hand was in this case not merely to attest the Epistle. For the conclusion is unusually long. Paul was also impelled to write by the desire of impressing more deeply on the minds of the Galatians a notice respecting his own person, in opposition to the false teachers.

[Two questions arise in the interpretation of this verse: 1. to what does the Apostle call attention; 2. to how much does he refer. The answer to the first question turns upon the meaning of πῆλικοίς γράμμασιν, that to the second mainly, though not exclusively, upon the force of ἔγγραφα. 1. We may determine with comparative certainty the meaning of πῆλικοίς γράμμασιν. Πῆλικος, occurring only here and in Heb. vii. 3 (where the reference is to magnitude, though in an ethical sense), is not synonymous with ποσος, "how many;" hence "how many letters"—how large a letter, is incorrect: nor does the plural γράμματα mean "letter," for which Paul invariably uses ἐπιστολή. Besides the phrase γράφετε γράμματα, in the sense of "write a letter," is nowhere found. Nor is πῆλικος identical with τοιός (so Schmoller and others), "what kind;" ELLICOTT justly characterizes this interpretation as arbitrary. It means "how large," referring to the size, implying that, for some cause, what Paul himself wrote was written in larger characters than usual (or perhaps than an amanuensis was in the habit of using). There is no necessity for finding a reference to shapelessness. It is no valid objection to say that this reference was trivial, for other things that Paul has written may be thus spoken of with equal propriety (comp. 2 Tim. iv. 13). See MEYER, ALFORD, ELLICOTT, WORDSWORTH and LIGHTFOOT. 2. To how much does he refer? In other words, did Paul write the whole Epistle with his own hand, or only these concluding verses. The aorist indicates the former, unless it be an epistolary aorist. But the burden of proof rests with those who maintain this. Besides if the reference be exclusively to what follows, it seems singular that the epistolary aorist should be chosen. We cannot perhaps decide the question from this word alone, but there are other considerations which may be urged in favor of the autographic character of the whole Epistle. a) Attention may have been called to the size of the letters, as a proof that Paul had written the whole, not using an amanuensis, who would probably have written more rapidly, hence in smaller characters, and this would be a proof of his earnestness and affection. b) The Epistle is largely a personal vindication, and hence was more likely to be an autograph. c) ALFORD finds a similarity, in style and in use of words, between this and the Pastoral Epistles (which he regards as autographs), see Vol. III. New Testament Proleg. pp. 4, 79 sq. d) WORDSWORTH refers to the passage in Habakkuk cited in this Epistle, (iii. 11), and finds in the injunction to the prophet to write "the just shall live by faith" in large characters, an implication that this Epistle on the same theme was written in similar characters. (This however is not of much weight.) Although the use of ἐγρῶσα is not decisive, yet taken in connection with the meaning of πῆλικοις, and whatever of weight attaches to the considerations mentioned above, it is much safer to assume that Paul wrote the whole letter; the probabilities are strongly in favor of this view. (So ALFORD, ELLICOTT and WORDSWORTH most decidedly.) There is a conjecture that the size or shapelessness of the letters arose from Paul's weakness of vision, but it must be regarded as only a conjecture. Comp. iv. 15. Paul could not have been unskilful in writing Greek.—R.]

* ["Ἰδετε is imperative; "see" not "ye see" as E. V.—R.]

Ver. 12. As many as desire to make a fair shew in the flesh.—In condensed sharp language the Apostle (vers. 12, 13) characterizes the intrigues of the false teachers. They are people who want to have a good repute (εὖπροσωπήσαι), but for all that live in the flesh, according to the lusts of the flesh,* and shun suffering. Therefore they constrain you to be circumcised.—(Ἀναγκάζουσιν ὑμᾶς περιτεμεσθαι—"are busied with forcing a circumcision upon you.") For this is done only that they should not suffer persecution for the cross of Christ.—τῷ σταυρῷ not: on account of the cross, but: by the cross; the cross of Christ is itself represented as the persecutor—a significant image for these people's fear of the cross, because it brings persecution. But the cross of Christ brings with it such persecution, sc. on the part of the Jews, only when it is preached and confessed as the sole condition of salvation, which is not done when circumcision is regarded as a condition of salvation. Therefore they insist upon this, in order to escape persecution. [It seems better to take τῷ σταυρῷ as the dative of the ground or occasion (so MEYER, ALFORD, ELLICOTT and many others). Schmoller actually presents this view in his explanatory remark. It cannot mean "with the sufferings of the cross" (WINER). The objection to both is that "the cross of Christ" means "the atoning death of Christ upon the cross" (BROWN), and this meaning will not admit of these interpretations.—R.]

Ver. 13. Paul immediately explains the strong μῶνον, "only" (ver. 12). They have in this no other view than the one assigned—the purely egoistic one—they are not concerned for the law on its own account; for not even do they who are circumcised keep the law themselves.—Of the circumcised, or those who receive circumcision, [the reference being to the Judaizing party; the perfect would perhaps point more to the leaders, the present to the party as one which was then enforcing this rite, —R.] with all their zeal for circumcision, it might be expected that they kept the law. But their conduct is hypocritical. When they de- sire to have you circumcised, it is not in the interest of the law, but only that they may glory in your flesh, that they may be able to boast themselves; and it is moreover the σάψ of the Galatians, that is to be the subject of their boasting: to be taken either physically, with reference to the circumcision to be performed in their flesh; or in a sense similar to ver. 12, because if the Galatians should receive circumcision, they would follow the σάψ and its suggestions, would display a carnal weakness and pliability of which these men would then boast as their own work. [The latter view is preferable.—R.]

Ver. 14. But God forbid that I should glory.—To this sinful boasting of the false teachers, to whom the cross of Christ is more or less a scandal, and who are unwilling to suffer any persecution for its sake, Paul opposes his own boasting, whose subject is this very cross of Christ.—Save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ.—MEYER incorrectly supposes that Paul wishes to mention the subject of his official glorying over against the official vauntings of the false teachers, and hence understands "the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ" of the preaching of the cross of Christ, not of the fact itself. [In the 4th Ed. MEYER says: Only the cross of Christ should be the subject of his καυχᾶσθαι, viz.: that nothing other than the Redemption accomplished on the cross by Christ was the ground, contents and Divine assurance of his faith, life, hope, labor, etc.—Surely this is not open to Schmoller's objection.—R.] WIESELER:—Paul will, in contrast with these Judaizers, not boast at all of what he is or has or does, and therefore also not of his official labors, but of the cross of Christ.—By whom or which.—Δι' οὗ is then most naturally referred to the main idea, "cross," not to "our Lord Jesus Christ." [The meaning is evidently the same, whether the relative be referred to one or the other; "by which" would mean through the cross of Christ; "by whom," through Christ crucified. Still there is much force in the suggestion, that the subject immediately preceding, "so fully and triumphantly expressed, so important and so emphasized, throws the other word into the shade." (It is not necessary to suppose that in this case we would find ἐν ᾧ.) Besides, the idea of sundered fellowship with the world, which follows, seems to imply here more of a fellowship with Christ than with the cross. See MEYER, ALFORD and ELLICOTT, and on the other side CALVIN, BENIGL, BROWN and LIGHTFOOT.—R.]

The world is crucified unto me.—By this Paul does not mean to state, for instance, why he cannot any longer boast of anything else, viz., because nothing else exists for him (MEYER), but he gives in a few yet pregnant words a glimpse into the significance which the cross has for him, on account of its operation. It is of course only because the cross is for me the object of faith, because I stand by faith in inward fellowship therewith (comp. ii. 19), [or, better, with Christ Himself as the Crucified One.—R.], that a crucifixion has been accomplished in my case also. Paul, however, is here speaking not simply of the fact that he or his old Ego has been crucified. Recognizing as he does his old Ego as one entangled with the world, and recognizing this entanglement with the world as its distinguishing character, he says, that the world, to which it clung, has been crucified to him, i. e., the world had become in his eyes condemned, yea dead = had utterly lost all significance, all attractive power for him, and that therefore his fellowship with it had been wholly broken off. Of course Paul's fellowship of faith with the cross of Christ [or Christ crucified—R.] involved no direct action upon the world itself, but only upon it so far as it appertained to him, i. e., upon his fellowship with it.—And I to the world.—And even so had he been crucified to the world. A crucifixion of him had naturally been the consequence of his fellowship of faith with the cross of Christ (comp. ii. 19), but calling to mind his former entanglement with the world, he declares himself crucified "to the world," says, that in its eyes also he is one dedicated to death, yea, a dead man, so that he has no longer any attraction for the world, that the world will have nothing more to do with him, that its fellowship with him is also fully dissolved. This double statement thus expresses in the strongest manner, the absolute dissolution of every bond between him and the world. To him this result appeared a gain, and he saw in this a new reason, for glorying in the cross of Christ. The second clause, καὶ γὰρ τῷ κόσμῳ, appears to imply also the positive statement, that not only does the world no longer regard him as one of its own, but also hates and persecutes him, and thus does precisely that which his adversaries seek to avoid (ver. 12); yet Paul accounts it as nothing, but glories in the cross of Christ, although it brings these consequences with it; so highly does he value the gain, which he has from it.

Ver. 15. For.—He immediately gives the reason for his determination to boast exclusively of the cross of Christ (not for the δὲ οὖν, MEYER).—Neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision, but a new creature.—Everything depends on the last, nothing on the first. But it is the cross of Christ which leads to this new creation, and that through the operation of it described by δὲ οὖν in ver. 14. This reciprocal crucifixion of the world and the old man to each other is the death of the old man and the beginning of a new one. [Καὶνὴ κτίσις is probably passive, the thing created, resulting from a new creation on the part of God.—R.]

Ver. 16. And as many as shall walk according to this rule.—In ver. 15 Paul stated a principle; here he designates this as the standard, according to which one should walk. Upon all who shall thus walk (the future applies to the time from the receipt of the Epistle thenceforward; Paul hopes that the Epistle will have a converting and confirming effect upon the readers) he invokes peace (see on i. 3) and mercy, thereby indicating the high importance of this standard. As this belongs to the conclusion, it is best to take it as a benediction: others understand it as a statement, supplying ἔσται.—The correct interpretation of and upon the Israel of God is the explicative one = that is [for they are the Israel of God.—R.] For there is here no reason for bringing the Jewish Christians into especial prominence; besides, the comprehensive ἅσπαι does not admit of a national distinction being now first made in addition, and others named, who, it would even appear, had not to walk according to this standard. On the other hand, "the designation of all those, who walk according to this Anti-Judaistic standard, as the Israel of God, the true theocratic people, at this solemn close, is, as it were, the triumph of the whole Epistle."—MEYER. [ELLICOTT doubts whether καὶ can have so strong an explicative force, and prefers to take it as copulative, as if the Apostle's thought turned to his kindred according to the flesh; but the exegetical objections to this view are great, and the other interpretation is so suitable that it must be adopted.—R.]

Ver. 17. Henceforth let no man trouble me, i. e., by still listening to the false teachers; for I (ἐγὼ) and not the persecution-shunning false teachers) bear in my body the marks of Jesus, the stigmata of Jesus, i. e., the proofs, that I am a real servant of Jesus (στίγματα with reference to the marks which masters had branded upon their slaves), namely, in all the traces, scars, wounds, and the like, of the maltreatments and persecutions, which I have endured in my apostolic calling. [Of Jesus, i. e. my Master, Captain, God, for slaves, soldiers and votaries bore such marks. See WORDSWORTH and LIGHTFOOT in loco.—R.]

Ver. 18. The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with your spirit.—Μετὰ τοῦ πνεύματος ὑμῶν; we are not to understand a special intention in his not writing the simple μετ' ὑμῶν; yet we should not overlook what is significant in the expression. Grace operates and is meant to operate upon the πνεῦμα of the man; only so does it operate truly and fully, and just such a full, truly salutary operation of grace does he wish for them.—Brethren—Ἀδελφοί: "The Epistle, so severe in its prevailing tone, concludes with this address, in which unaltered brotherly love expresses itself." MEYER. [BENGL: Ita mollitur totius epistolæ severitas.—R.]—Amen.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

Christ's cross is the touchstone of true Christianity. What Paul says in this section of the Judaistic teachers, applies strikingly mutatis mutandis, to the great mass of nominal Christians.* They by no means wish to keep the law in its whole extent, that is much too burdensome for them; on the contrary they appeal to the fact that they forsooth believe on Christ, and therefore are free from the yoke of the law. But now on the other hand they have as little mind to believe on Christ in the whole extent of faith; what is inconvenient in this, they leave behind, and that is the cross of Christ, i. e., so far as it is a means of quieting the conscience, it is willingly accepted, but so far as it includes a dying of the old man, and the entering into a fellowship of the cross with Christ, they will none of it. Instead of this men turn rather to the otherwise despised law, and arbitrarily make the law to consist in this or that particular, some practice, some abstinence,

* [WORDSWORTH remarks that this is the only place in the New Testament where εἰρήνη is placed before ἔλεος.—R.]

and imagine themselves there to be satisfying all the severer requirements of God, while yet they are far from this utterance: The world is crucified to me and I unto the world!—Christ's cross is the touchstone of true Christianity; it is in this, that salvation and comfort is to be sought, and so far it would not be so very hard to glory in the cross of Christ, which many are willing to do. But salvation and consolation are to be sought exclusively in that, no longer in the world, no longer in one's self, everything else is to be accounted loss, and on the other hand the fellowship with the cross of Christ is to be counted no loss; in brief, there must come into being a new creature. This is the "Canon" (ver. 16) for a Christian; only he who guides himself according to this becomes and is in truth a Christian. This is hard and yet not impossible. God will help therein by the pedagogy of his law, and will lead to faith, and to faith will give the Spirit, which helps through to the new creature.—Comp. also Roos: "Paul shows, that it is not so completely indifferent, what a man thinks of Christ and His cross. Now-a-days, as many of the people say: I pray, read, hear, and am none of the worst. A clever man of the world says: I do much evil, but I have a good heart with it all, and between my evil works I also do some good ones. God will look at me on my good side. What now shall we make of Jesus of Nazareth? Here the world boggles. At last it says: Let Him pass for a good teacher, who has told us, that God is not the God of the Jews only, but also of the Gentiles, and that He loves such virtuous persons as we. Let Him be also an example for imitation. Finally, let Him be also, if one will so have it, the Redeemer, who has acquired for us freedom to hasten on a broad and easy way, with a trifle of virtue, light-mindedly to eternity, and notwithstanding our wickedness to fear no punishment. Now consider, whether this is the gospel of Paul, and whether he so preached Christ. Can such a man say that he boasts only of the cross of Christ, and that through it the world is crucified to him and he unto the world? Has he experienced a new creation? Is the culture, which age, office, intercourse with men, has given him, worthy of this lofty name? Is he in Christ Jesus? Has he the confidence, as he is, to stand before the holy God? Let him, in moments of reflection, put this question to himself and hear concerning it the answer of God and the Bible. Perhaps God will be so gracious as yet to reveal to him the gospel which Paul preached, and if this is so, he will be astonished to find that before this, he, without his knowledge, had a false religion. Mercy and peace be upon every one that is thus brought right."

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 12. RIEGER:—In every age there are points in which the world insists upon being yielded to, agreeing then to leave other points untouched. And whoever does not consent to this impure commingling, must not only suffer persecution, but also bear the reproach, that he himself is to blame, that he suffers only on account of his own self-will.—HEDINGER:—How many thousand brethren have ye, ye clerical placemen, in Galatia? The handful of barley, the merry countenance, the assured friendliness, the favorable patron your comfort; flattery and trimming the sails, you think, will bring a man on. I do not agree with you. Moses' course and choice is the best. Christ's reproach before the purple of Egypt.—STARKE:—Love must, indeed, cover and excuse a neighbor's faults, but from hypocrites and seducers one must, for a warning, tear away the mask; especially should those do it to whose office it appertains.—SPENER:—The doctrine of Christ preaches Christ's cross, and brings a cross to him who preaches it.

Ver. 13. HEDINGER:—To preach to others and be one's self a reprobate, to lade others with burdens, and not one's self to touch them with a finger, what hypocrisy!—STARKE:—It is an attribute of false teachers and zealots for religion, who are only concerned with the outside, to proselytize a man to the religion, let him believe afterwards as he will. This is a carnal zeal with abundant craving for notoriety.

Ver. 14. In STARKE:—Christians must not be ashamed of the cross of Christ, but rather glory in being justified and saved by that alone. Faith in Christ, the Crucified One, brings commonly such a fellowship of suffering with Him, that one has to bear his cross after the Lord Christ.—As soon as the union of a soul with Christ through faith takes place, so soon is the tie which holds it to the sin prevailing in the world, loosed.—A Christian may have much which even the world esteems, but the heart must not rest upon it.—LUTHER:—The world is crucified to me, i. e., I account, that the world is damned; and even so am I in turn crucified unto the world, i. e., it accounts, that I am damned. Thus we condemn one another. I anathematize all its human righteousness, doctrine, and work, as the very devil's poison, and it in return anathematizes also my doctrine and work, counts me for a mischievous man, etc.

Ver. 15. LUTHER:—"A new creature" does not mean, that one clothes himself differently, and puts on a different air, from before, but it means the renewal of the mind, which is brought about by the Holy Ghost. From that there follows an alteration of the outer life. For where the heart through the gospel obtains a new light, there it never fails that the outward senses also are altered. The ears have there no longer pleasure, in hearing human dreams and fools' tidings, but God's word alone. The mouth no longer boasts of a man's own works, righteousness and monastic rule, but of God's compassion in Christ Jesus. This then is an alteration, which consists not in words, but in work and in power.

Ver. 16. [BURKITT:—1. Christianity is a walk: a free and voluntary motion, an uniform and even motion, a progressive motion, a constant motion. 2. This walk is a walk by rule. A Christian is not a lawless person to range up and down as fancy leads him. 3. The rule is the law of the new creature. The new creature, in the principles and workings of it, is made the ground, the pattern and direction of our obedience, and we frame and square all the actions of our lives according thereunto. 4. The blessed privileges belonging to those who thus walk:

peace and mercy. 5. Such are the true Israel: a thousand times greater privilege than to be the children of Abraham's flesh.—R.]—RIEGER:—Even if one cannot accept the ungodly peace offered by those who make a fair show in the flesh, yet one by steadfast abiding within the limits of his faith, has the enjoyment of a Divine peace, and mercy is shown us in recompense of what many a one will lay upon us with an unrighteous judgment.

Ver. 17. In STARKE:—The burdened servant of the Lord has a claim to be unmolested.—It is not necessary to be ever anew entering into argument with unprofitable chatters in defence of the truth, especially where it has been once and again vindicated against them.—LUTHER:—Because I am Christ's servant and walk after the right rule, i. e., because I publicly confess, that out of Christ no man can attain to salvation, therefore also must I wear my Lord's livery, which does not consist in marks and scars that I have inflicted in will worship as presumption on myself, like Francis, but such as are without my thanks or will inflicted on me by the world and Satan for Jesus' sake.

Ver. 18. In STARKE:—Grace is the beginning, middle and end in Paul's writings. As the beginning of religion is grace, so does its progress depend upon grace. Dost thou, O Christian, in thy solicitations from men, find neither grace nor comfort? Be not dismayed! The grace of thy Lord Jesus remains assured to thee.—Let every one see to it, that he be and remain a dear brother of Paul, i. e., a true child of God; so may he also appropriate to himself the wish that God's grace may remain with him, with a believing Amen.—[BROWN:—Thus does the Apostle conclude this admirable Epistle, and show us, by his example, what it is to do all things in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks to God the Father by him.—R.]

Fleeing the cross, or boasting of the cross? The decisive question in religion.—In LISCO:—The incomparable worthiness of the cross of Christ to be gloried in: 1. That a man can only refuse to acknowledge this out of unworthy motives. a) That such a refusal exists; b) why many refuse: a) because one will only make a fair show in the flesh, β) because one is not willing to be persecuted with the cross of Christ, γ) because one will have glorying for himself and by means of himself. 2. On what account the cross of Christ is thus solely worthy to be gloried in: a) for the sake of that, which came to pass thereon; b) for the sake of the fruit which the cross of Christ bears in the hearts and lives of His people: a) as respects their demeanor toward the world, β) as respects their temper towards others: they cherish warm love towards those of like mind; they condemn the assaults of those, that are not so minded; they wish that all may become and remain sharers in His grace.

[The Apostle had first vindicated his apostleship, then his gospel, but was it for his own glory? Nay, in one sense ver. 14 is a summing up of the whole Epistle; all this defence, this earnestness, this boldness, this tenderness, was but a glorying in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ.—Many see the cross, some trust in it, not all of these glory in it. Why not? Because their fellowship with Christ is not yet such, that the world is crucified to them and they to the world.—Those who gloried in the cross of Christ have gotten glory to Christ and His cross.—Among the many celebrated sermons on ver. 14 may be mentioned those of Bishops ATTERBURY and BEVERIDGE, also of McLARIN, SUMMERFIELD and MCCHEYNE.—R.]

EPISTLE OF PAUL TO THE EPHESIANS.

INTRODUCTION.

§ 1. CONTENTS OF THE EPISTLE.

1. SYNOPSIS.*

ADDRESS AND SALUTATION (I. 1, 2).

PART FIRST:

The Glory of the Church of Christ (I. 3—III. 21).

A. THE GROUND AND GOAL OF THE CHURCH (I. 3—23).

a. Grateful praise of the decree of grace (i. 3-14). After the opening verse (ver. 3) the triple foundation of the praise, through the election of eternal mercy (vers. 4-6), the carrying out of the eternal election (vers. 7-12), the personal appropriation of salvation (vers. 13, 14).

b. Exhortation springing out of the Apostle's supplication for the Church as the Body of Christ, who is the Head (i. 15-23). With thanksgiving for the reader's faith and love (vers. 15, 16) there is joined the petition, that God would make known to them the glory of their calling and inheritance as well as of His power (vers. 17-19), which glory is manifest, actual and efficient in the exaltation of Christ over all as Head of the Church, that as His Body is the fulness of Him who filleth all in all (vers. 20-23).

B. THE EXTENT AND MISSION OF THE CHURCH.

a. Reminder of the previous condition of death and the glorious new creation (ii. 1-10). From the Resurrection and Exaltation of Christ the Apostle arrives first at the thought of the similar condition of death in the case of the Gentiles (vers. 1, 2) and the Jews (ver. 3), and then of God's mercy, which has quickened and blessed these miserable ones in, with and through Christ (vers. 4-7), of grace through faith (vers. 8, 9), as new creatures in Christ (ver. 10).

b. Extolling comparison of the previous and the present condition (ii. 11-22). After a detailed description of the previous condition without Christ, promise and God (vers. 11, 12), Paul sets forth the fundamental trait of the present status as nearness to God (ver. 13), explaining the nature and origin of the same in and through the Person and sufferings of Christ (vers. 14-18);

* [A popular summary is: I. The doctrinal part (chaps. I.—III.): The Church is chosen, redeemed, united in Christ. II. The practical part (chaps. IV.—VI.): Therefore let the Church walk in unity, in newness of life as regards personal and relative duties, in the strength of the Lord and the armor of God.—The reader is referred to the able Synopsis of Dr. LANGE in the general Introduction to the Pauline Epistles, Romans, pp. 15, 22. In accordance with his view of the twofold theme in each Epistle, he finds the fundamental theme of this Epistle in chap. i. 20-23, the final theme in chap. iv. 1-6.—R.]

sketching the present condition as that of citizens in the kingdom of God, members in His family, as built into the temple and house of God (vers. 19-22).

C. THE OFFICE AND SERVICE OF THE CHURCH (III. 1-21).

a. The office in and for this church (iii. 1-13). In spite of bonds (ver. 1) it is an office of that grace (ver. 2), in which God has made known the mystery of Christ (ver. 4), now made manifest (ver. 5): The acceptance of all nations into the kingdom of God through the Gospel (vers. 6, 7); to the humble minister the riches of Christ are entrusted (ver. 8), that thus on earth and in heaven the wisdom of God might be manifested in the Church (vers. 9, 10), according to God's eternal purpose (ver. 11), and that we might be comforted (ver. 12, 13).

b. The Apostle's petition with an exhortation for the church (iii. 14-19). Addressed to the Father (vers. 14, 15), it respects strengthening in the inner man (ver. 16), and Christ's dwelling in the heart through faith, in love (vers. 17, 18 a) unto the comprehension of love (vers. 18 b, 19).

c. Conclusion in the form of a Doxology (iii. 20, 21), praising the might of the merciful God (ver. 20), who makes the church in Christ glorious unto eternity (ver. 21).

PART SECOND:

The Spirit ruling in the Church of Christ (IV. 1—VI. 20).

A. THEME OF THE WHOLE PART (iv. 1-3): Walk worthy of the calling in love and unity.

B. THREE MOTIVES to the preservation of the unity in the Spirit (iv. 4-6).

a. The working of the Triune God in the church (iv. 4-6);

b. The gift of Christ to individuals (iv. 7-10): Each one is cared for (ver. 7), Christ has the requisite power (vers. 8, 10): He came from heaven and is exalted thither again;

c. The organization and organism of the church (iv. 11-16): The immediate end of the different offices (ver. 11) is the edification of the church (ver. 12), the ultimate aim is likeness to Christ (ver. 13), the operation depends on independence and growth through genuineness in love to Christ (vers. 14, 15), from whom as Head, the Body, richly furnished with members, knit together, grows in the reciprocal service of love (ver. 16).

C. GENERAL CHRISTIAN DUTIES (iv. 17—v. 21).

a. Principle of the new walk with reference to the antithesis of the old and the new man (iv. 17-24): The conduct of the heathen is a type of the natural conduct in general (vers. 17-19); after a reminder respecting Christ and Christian instruction (vers. 20, 21), he speaks of Christian conduct in its putting off the old man and putting on the new in deeply inward renewal (vers. 22-24).

b. Special traits of the new walk (iv. 25-32). The general basis is: no lie, but truth (ver. 25), the particular points refer to temper, disposition. Anger without sin (vers. 26, 27); as respects act, honesty even to beneficence (ver. 28); as respects speech, no corrupt word, but gracious speech unto edification (vers. 29, 30). The comprehensive conclusion (vers. 31, 32) refers to the evil that must be removed, and to the forgiving love that should exist in the church.

c. Three points of view for the new walk (v. 1-14):

(1) Look above thyself to follow God (vers. 1, 2)!

(2) Look into thyself and think of purity (vers. 3-5)!

(3) Look about thyself and be independent as respects evil men and deeds, and be benevolent (vers. 6-14).

d. Exhortation to a walk with careful consideration of the Christian position (v. 15-21): Wise carefulness, zealously using the time, precisely the evil time (vers. 15, 16), clear as to the will of God (ver. 17), avoiding drunkenness (ver. 18), but inspiring with social song, with private melody, continued thankfulness, and mutual submission (vers. 19-21).

D. SPECIAL CHRISTIAN DUTIES in domestic relations (v. 22—vi. 9) :

- a. Wives and husbands (v. 22-33), to which is added a comparison with the church and Christ, in order to enjoin love upon the husbands and submission upon the wives ;
- b. Children and parents (vi. 1-4) : the former should honor and obey ; the latter should in self-discipline train and admonish them for the Lord ;
- c. Servants and masters (vi. 5-9) : the former should obey as the servants of Christ, in hope on Him, and the latter should deal with them without threatening.

E. CONCLUDING EXHORTATION (vi. 10-20) to be strong in the Lord (ver. 10), to contend in the armor of God, needed on account of the adversary the devil (vers. 11-13), but sufficient with its particular pieces (vers. 14-17), if prayer and supplication be added (vers. 18-20).

CLOSE OF THE EPISTLE (VI. 21-24).

A. Personal Intelligence respecting Paul and those with him is carried by the bearer of the letter (vers. 21, 22).

B. Two-fold salutation (vers. 23, 24) : Peace and Love with Faith in and among the members of the church—and grace upon and with them.

2. FUNDAMENTAL THOUGHT.

STIER is undoubtedly correct in taking "the church which is in Christ Jesus" as the fundamental thought of the Epistle ; his plan, however, on account of its trinitarian division, based on ground, course and aim, in each larger and smaller group, is rather artificial than masterly. The church of Christ has its root in eternity, in God's fatherly heart with its thoughts of peace toward a wicked yet beloved world, and lifts its head into eternity again by the throne of God, ramifying into all the institutions given in creation, even the most special, through all the centuries of developing history, and all this in Christ.

Such being the contents, it will not suffice to find in the Epistle only the carrying out of the simple grand thought, that God according to His gracious decree formed from eternity in Christ, has called the Gentiles out of the deepest darkness into His light and into fellowship with His ancient covenant people (VON GERLACH). [So HODGE substantially.] Still less is the main matter of the Epistle to be sought in opposition to the prejudice of the Jews, who did not wish to admit the Gentiles into the church (Berlenburger Bible).

[STIER's view is adopted in the main by ALFORD, who accepts the threefold division in all the parts of the Epistle. "But in fact the trichotomy respecting the church rests upon another and sublimer yet. Everywhere with him: the origin and foundation of the church is in the will of the Father, τοῦ τὰ πάντα ἐνεργοῦντος κατὰ τὴν βουλὴν τοῦ θελήματος αὐτοῦ,—the work and course of the church is by the satisfaction of the Son, by our νιοθεσίαν διὰ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ,—the scope and end of the church is the life in the Holy Spirit,—δυνάμει κραταιωθῆναι διὰ τοῦ πνεύματος αὐτοῦ εἰς τὸν ἔσω ἀνθρώπον."—R.]

§ 2. THE CHARACTER OF THE EPISTLE.

1. The language and tone of the Epistle, as is obvious in the first part (i. 3, 15, 16 ; iii. 1, 13 ff.), are essentially governed by the fact, that we have here no scientific exposition nor even a dialectic development, but the thoughts roused in the praying soul of the Apostle are uttered in the continuing emotion. The thought did not then appear gradually in its parts and divisions, but as is the rule in contemplation, in its integrity and fulness. The language accordingly has difficulty in compassing the thought, struggling in a fulness and flow of words, in linked sentences, with the presentation of an idea that transcends it, as the first part repeatedly shows us.—Besides it is evident that the church was gathered mainly from among the Gentiles (ii. 1, 2 ; iii. 11-13 ; iv. 17-22), and the writer, as the Apostle to the Gentiles, confronts them in the full joyous consciousness of his office (iii. 1, 7, 8).

[BISHOP ELLIOTT, the most grammatical of English commentators, says that "in this Epistle the cases, especially the genitive, present almost every phase and form of difficulty ; the uses are most various, the combinations most subtle and significant." While the use of particles is simple, "the intertexture of sentences, and the connection of clauses, especially in the earlier portions of the Epistle, try the powers and principles of grammatical and logical analysis to the very uttermost.—In the first chapter more particularly, when we are permitted as it were to gaze upon the evolution of the archetypal dispensation of God, amidst those linked and blended clauses that, like the enwreathed smoke of some sweet-smelling sacrifice, mount and mount upwards to the very heaven of heavens, in that group of sentences of rarest harmony, and more than mortal eloquence, these difficulties are so great and so deep, that the most exact language and the most discriminating analysis seem, as they truly are, too poor and too weak to convey the force or connection of expressions so august, and thoughts so unspeakably profound.”—So DEAN ALFORD (Vol. III., Prolegg. pp. 24, 25): “These characteristics contribute to make our Epistle by far the most difficult of all the writings of St. Paul. All on the surface is smooth, and flows on unquestioned by the untheological reader: but when we begin to inquire, why thought succeeds to thought, and one cumbrous parenthesis to another,—depths under depths disclose themselves, wonderful systems of parallel allusion, frequent and complicated underplots; every word, the more we search, approves itself as set in its exact logical place; we see every phrase contributing, by its own similar organization and articulation, to the carrying out of the organic whole. But this result is not won without much labor of thought,—without repeated and minute laying together of portions and expressions,—without bestowing on single words and phrases, and their succession and arrangement, as much study as would suffice for whole sections of the more exoteric Epistles.”—R.]

2. What is wanting in no other Pauline Epistle will be missed most of all in the Epistle to the Ephesians, viz., historical references. Only two facts are noticed: the imprisonment (iii. 1; iv. 1; vi. 20) and the sending of Tychicus with oral intelligence (vi. 21, 22). This omission in view of the lively interest the writer takes in the church, and desires on the part of the church (i. 15-18; iii. 1, 13-19; vi. 10, 19-22), is all the more remarkable, since he had labored with great zeal in Ephesus for nearly three years (Acts xx. 18, 19, 31) and, on taking leave of the elders of the church in the summer of A. D. 58 or 59, had referred to false teachers about to arise (Acts xx. 29, 30). Of this we find no trace here. No member of the church is saluted either by the Apostle or his companions. Not the slightest hint is given of any false doctrine. For iii. 4 does not refer to opponents attacking his apostolic authority, while iv. 15, 16, relates only to general experience, and v. 6, to moral temptations, not to any particular false teachers.

3. The Epistle is distinguished by its Universalism. This will appear most strikingly from a comparison with the Epistle to the Colossians; other characteristics will thus also become unmistakably evident.

16.	i. 20, 22.

In this grouping of the parallel passages in the two Epistles, regard has been had to the list of DE WETTE and MAYERHOFF. The relationship and connection of the two Epistles is greater than the similarity between the Gospel and first Epistle of John (see Introd. 1 Jno. § 3, 2. Biblework, pp. 7 ff.) and between the second Epistle of Peter and the Epistle of Jude (see Biblework on the former, § 4, p. 7). But the thorough diversity is even more surprising than the similarity. We often find the very same word, the same form of speech, and yet a different thought; and then, too, the same thought but modified by a special manner (iv. 22-24; Col. iii. 9, 10), or in an entirely different connection (i. 7, 10; Col. i. 14, 20), now presenting different motives, again presented under different motives (i. 3-14; Col. i. 3-8; Eph. i. 16-ii. 10; Col. i. 15-ii. 18). If it be remembered that an agreement consisting merely in single words or phrases is very common indeed, so much so that a comparison between our Epistle and 1 Peter has been attempted with a view of maintaining the dependence of the former on the latter (WEISS, Petrin. Lehrbegriff, p. 426 ff.), a considerable number of parallel passages must either be omitted or declared unworthy of consideration, in deducing a conclusion. If, with DE WETTE, reference is made to the ἀπας λεγόμενα in our Epistle, to these we may oppose a long list from the Epistle to the Colossians (RUECKERT, p. 300 f.) [comp. ALFORD, N. T. Vol. III. Prolegg. p. 40], while the Epistles to the Corinthians, recognized as genuinely Pauline despite the most acute criticism, have more than any other. Particular attention, however, should be paid to the phrase: ἐν τοῖς ἐποικιστοῖς, which is peculiar to this Epistle (i. 3-20; ii. 6; iii. 16; vi. 12), especially in the last passage. Following up those sections which our Epistle alone has, either with a very faint verbal echo in the Epistle to the Colossians or without any parallel whatever (i. 3-14; iii. 10-21; iv. 5-15; v. 1, 2, 7-14, 23-31; vi. 10-17), we find passages containing the most important, profound, and comprehensive thoughts, sometimes in a throng of streaming words, again in the most delicate and exact coloring. Finally, it must not be overlooked that, while in the Epistle to the Colossians only a single passage can be found (ii. 21) with a reference to the Old Testament (Lev. v. 2), in our Epistle we find: iv. 7-10, a definite quotation with an explanation (Ps. lxxviii. 19); v. 13, an indefinite citation (Isa. lx. 1; xxvi. 19); v. 31, a reference to Gen. ii. 24; vi. 2, to Exod. ii. 12, and also allusions, in iv. 25, 26 to Zech. viii. 16 and Ps. iv. 5, in i. 22 to Ps. viii. 7, and in ii. 17 to Isa. lvii. 19. Accordingly we are not at all warranted in inferring from the relationship of the two Epistles, a dependence of this Epistle upon that to the Colossians. If the individuality and independence of the latter cannot be denied, and this we attempt to prove in the Introduction to that Epistle (§ 1, 2), then they certainly cannot be denied in the case of the former. We thus reach the conclusion that both Epistles were written at the same time by the same Apostle. Comp. RUECKERT, pp. 291-305; HARLESS, Introduction, lxxvii.-lxxviii.

DR. LANGE (Romans, pp. 21, 22) has accurately noted the difference and peculiarity of the two Epistles. In the Epistle to the Ephesians there obtains a grand universalism in entirely peculiar independence: Here, without any reference to personal, temporal, or local relations and circumstances, we are directed on all sides to the glory of the Church of Christ and the true Christianity given in her for each and every nation, without polemics or apology, purely from her origin and appearance, her growth and consummation, her ground and aim,—so that even after the pressing entreaty for the readers' prayers in his so trying position (vi. 19, 20) and the brief reference to Tychicus, who will give further oral intelligence (vi. 21, 22), the conclusion entirely universal in its scope, reverts to the brethren, to those who love the Lord (vi. 23, 24), not αὐτοῖς, wishing them grace and peace as in the beginning. Besides the references to the Old Testament remarked above, the well-considered interchange of "ye" and "we" is a manifest proof of the universal tendency, embracing both Jews and Gentiles. The Epistle to the Colossians, on the contrary, concerns itself with one single local congregation, its special relations and circumstances.

[On the difference between the two Epistles, see Introduction to Colossians, § 2, also WORDSWORTH and ALFORD on that Epistle; the latter accepting the priority of the shorter Epistle, speaks of this one as "the flower and bloom of his moments, during those same days, of devotion and rest, when he wrought not so much in the Spirit, as the Spirit wrought in him"—"the free outflowing of the earnest spirit—to the mere surface-reader, without system, but to him that delves down into it, in system far deeper, and more recondite, and more exquisite: the greatest and most heavenly work of one, whose very imagination was peopled with the things in the heavens, and even his fancy rapt into the visions of God."—R.]

4. The language of this Epistle is also for the most part conditioned by this universalism. Hence BENGEL, after his note in i. 3, remarks: Paulus scribit effectu per adversa sublimato: et singulare hæc epistola specimen præbet tractationis evangelicæ IN THESI, huius que capituli v. 3-14 compendium ea evangelicum exhibet; inde nullum speciatim errorem aut vitium refutat aut redarguat, sed generatim incedit; et quantumcunque lucis in epistola ceteroquæ parallela ad

Colossenses ex historia ecclesiastica petatur, in hac epistola minus opus est—and on iii. 4: Est hic liber valde sublimis et tamen omnium lectioni commissus; in hac epistola apertius et sublimius scripsit Paulus, quam antehac in ulla. The Epistle does not concern itself with matter limited by given historical relations and particular phenomena or individualities, which by its concrete character would lead to shorter sentences and simpler statements. The universality of the subject, preparing from eternity down through the centuries and now developing itself through all centuries and circumstances unto the consummation in eternity, and the enthusiasm of the spirit possessed by this thought, reflect themselves in the fulness of language and the wonderful interlacing of sentences (see especially i. 3–14). The remarkable interruptions and resumptions (as ii. 1–5; iii. 1, 13) can be readily accounted for, with such a subject and in such enthusiasm, by the Apostle's habit of dictating his Epistles. In those parts where the Apostle touches upon given relations, as in the second part (chaps. iv.–vi.) the language and construction, though terse and precise, are yet simple and clear. RUECKERT: "We do not indeed find here the language of scientific statement, or that of sharp censure against prevailing faults, or that of deeply wounded personal feeling, as in the Epistles to the Romans, Corinthians, and Galatians, nor yet that of hearty affectionateness, as in the Epistle to the Philippians; there is nothing of all this in our Epistle, and in these respects no comparison can be instituted."

5. The opinions respecting the character of this Epistle stand in remarkable agreement with each other as a whole, aside from isolated exceptions. CHRYSOSTOM: Ἐστὶ δὲ νοημάτων μεσστή ἡ ἐπιστολή, ὑψηλῶν καὶ δογματῶν· ὑψηλῶν σφόδρα γέμει τῶν νοημάτων καὶ ὑπερόγκων· ἃ γὰρ μετὰ τοῦ σχεδὸν ἐσθὲξαστο, ταῦτα ἐνταῦθα δηλοῖ. ERASMUS: "Stylus tantum dissonat a ceteris Pauli epistolis, ut alterius videri possit, nisi pectus atque indoles paulinæ mentis hanc prorsus illi vindicaret." GROTIUS describes the Epistle as "rerum sublimitatem adæquans verbis sublimioribus, quam ulla habuit unquam lingua humana." WITSIUS characterizes it with special accuracy and excellence: "Ita universam religionis Christianæ summam divina hac epistola exponit, ut exuberantem quandam non sermonis tantum evangelici παρρησίαν, sed et spiritus sancti vim et sensum, et caritatis Christianæ flammam quandam ex electo illo pectore emicantem, et lucis divinæ fulgorem quandam admirabilem inde elucemtem, ut ebullientem potius, animadvertere liceat; idque tanta copia, ut superabundans illa cordis plenitudo ipsa animi sensa intimosque conceptus autem verba prolata, verba autem priora quæque subsecuentia premant, urgeant, obruant."—With this the most important of the latest exegetes agree. [LUTHER (in the editions of the New Testament up to 1537) reckons this Epistle among "the best and noblest books of the New Testament, which show Christ to thee and teach all that is necessary and blessed for thee to know, even if thou shouldst never see or hear another book or doctrine." COLERIDGE (Table Talk, p. 82): "In this, the divinest composition of man, is every doctrine of Christianity, first, those doctrines peculiar to Christianity, and secondly, those precepts common to it with natural religion." Bishop ELLICOTT (Preface to 1st Edition) pays a tribute to the character of the Epistle, in confessing how far his labors fall below what it demands, using language that finds an echo in the heart of every faithful student of this stupendous revelation." Comp. SCHAFF, History of the Apost. Church, Am. ed., p. 326.—R.]

On the other hand the opinion advanced by DE WETTE is altogether untenable: that the Epistle to the Ephesians is really nothing more than a verbose expansion of the Colossian Epistle without individuality in purpose or reference, without position because without respect to false teachers, unworthy of the Apostle, poor in thought with its wordy style, overloaded with parentheses and additions, without connection. [Similarly RENAN (St. Paul, p. xx.), proving how the Epistle strikes a "surface reader." Comp. on the contrary SCHAFF, Apost. Church, p. 327: "As to style, in no other Epistle do the ideas flow in such an unbroken stream and such involved periods, as in that to the Ephesians. The perverted taste of some modern critics has pronounced this 'diffuseness,' 'verbosity,' etc. GROTIUS understood the matter better, when he said: 'Rerum sublimitatem adæquans verbis sublimioribus, quam alia habuit unquam lingua humana!' The first chapter has, so to speak, a liturgical, psalmodic character, being as it were a glowing song in praise of the transcendent riches of the grace of God in Christ and the glory of the Christian calling."—R.] BEYSCHLAG's passing remark (Christologie des N. T., p. 201), that our Epistle, through its dependence on that to the Colossians as well as through the lack of freshness and terseness of style connected therewith, can raise doubts, but that still it must be regarded as a working up of the Epistle to the Colossians by the Apostle for a wider circle of readers, as well as HAUSRATH's (Der Apostel Paulus, 1865, p. 2) unproven opinion that the Epistle is "a letter to the Laodiceans wrought over by another hand," Rom. xvi. 1-16, being an accompanying letter to Ephesus,* are answered by the facts adduced above (under 2), taken from the two Epistles.

§ 3. THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE EPISTLE.

1. The exalted significance of the Epistle for all time lies in the fundamental idea and thought of the Epistle: The Church of Jesus Christ a creation of the Father through the Son in the Holy Ghost, decreed from eternity, destined for eternity; it is the ethical cosmos, which Redemption purposed and has realized in the cosmos instituted in creation; it is the family of God, gathered in the world and in history and still further to be gathered, the object of His nurture and care in time and eternity.—"This age of ours so lost and wandering in every direction respecting the idea and nature of the Church" (STIER), which has stumbled about from the ultra-montane ecclesiasticism demanding unconditional obedience to all its precepts and dogmas, "clear through the rationalistic troops, who prefer to build a Pythagorean ὄμακοεῖον (common audience hall) in the place of the ἐκκλησία, as far as the free churches and churches of the future, which in Rupp's fashion leaves only a ὄμαδος and ὄχλος without ἀκοή" (STIER), accepting even a mere religious fellowship by the side of others,—this erring age must find its bearings, be consoled and uplifted by such a thought as this.

2. The ground and goal of the Church is Christ: everything depends on the relation to Christ, according to which the relation to the Church is first determined. Where Christ is, there is the Church, even though in incipency, and where the Church in truth is, there also Christ is and works. Christ and the Church of Christ are indeed there only, where His super-terrestrial eternal Personality is apprehended, where this is neither opposed nor in any way denied. [Hence Rationalism can flourish where the ministry is "a moral police," sustaining some Erastian petrifications, but confessedly cannot found a Church; nor is this Epistle with its profound ecclesiology any favorite with "liberal Christians." This results not so much from the failure to conceive of the Church, as from the inability to sound the depths of the added and essential phrase: "in Christ."—R.] "In Christ!" is the qualification necessarily and involuntarily joined to all truth and all life.

3. The Church is to be recognized as one, invisibly visible, thoroughly ethical life-sphere of the Holy Ghost. As above the different national churches of the same confession, variously formed, or deformed and loosely organized, one confessional church [denomination] is to be sought and found, so above the different confessional churches, each professing to be a Christian Church, perhaps the Christian Church, there is the one Church of Jesus Christ. From this super-terrestrially eternal life-sphere the Church lives and labors and blesses, in the world and in time, among the nations. In her there is carried on an ethical life-process, moving the individual in his inmost and tenderest centre, away from an ever more deceitful estrangement from God to a blessed nearness to God, from enmity and bondage to sonship and heirship with God, from lust of sin through pardon of sin to glorious purity.

4. As means of grace we have the word of God becoming personal in the individual as well as in the communion, re-echoed in faith and prayer and song, in the heart and in the Church. Yet the word of God is not made so prominent, that the Sacrament is on this account to be lightly esteemed, as the position of baptism (iv. 5) shows.

5. As regards polity, it is only required, that the organs for the ministry of the word be efficient, that the members of the congregation stand in affectionate helpfulness toward, over and under each other. For the former it is necessary, that both the susceptibility to receive it, and the activity toward the congregation be unimpaired and unincumbered. Of presbyters and

* [PROF. HAUSRATH does not enter into critical questions, but Dr. HITZIG, of Heidelberg, is understood to be preparing a critical work in which the same view will be defended. This theory considers Rom. xvi. 1-16 to be genuine, but addressed to Ephesus before our Epistle was written. RENAN advances the same view in connection with his theory respecting Romans as a circular letter (p. lxxiii.). See my note, Romans, p. 425. Against the Laodicean destination, see below, § 5, 3, c.—R.]

bishops already existing nothing is said; nor is there the slightest hint which can be turned against the lay element, but rather every living Christian is regarded as a saint, a sanctified one, and as a member of the Body, whose Head is Christ. [It is significant that this most churchly Epistle has so little to support the exclusive claims of any form of church government. This ought to humble the pretensions of jure divino sectarianism. Indeed all Christians should be humbled, as we feel how little any one body of Christians fulfils the conception here given of the Body of Christ. It is through such humility that the true church of the future, not indistinctly alluded to here (iv. 13), will be ushered in.—R.]

6. The natural institutions, marital and domestic, established in creation, the status æconomicus, as well as politicus, find support, dignity and blessing with the status ecclesiasticus in the church, so that salvation redounds to their advantage; in fact they thus first attain their rights, in order to serve in turn the growth and good estate of the church. All that is essential for these and for moral relations in general (which have their home in the church, and like all that is human going to rack and ruin in homelessness without her) is here clearly recognized in a profound and extended view, and sketched in grand outline with wonderfully pregnant force.

In these points the exalted significance of this Epistle for all ages of the church will make itself felt.

[7. The character of the Epistle involves certain results in regard to commentators, which are obvious to one who carefully reviews their labors. "As the wonderful effect of the Spirit of inspiration on the mind of man is nowhere in Scripture more evident than in this Epistle, so, to discern those things of the Spirit, is the spiritual mind here more than any where required" (ALFORD). As one example, DE WETTE is cited, who, though so able, has allowed his prejudice against the Epistle (see § 4, 3) to make his commentary on it "hardly better than works of third-rate or fourth-rate men." But the same principle operates in another class of commentators: those who approach it in a believing spirit, but with minds ever on the alert to prevent Paul from saying anything contrary to their pre-conceived theological opinions. This class includes those of the most opposite views. Certainly this mode of dealing with "the writing of men inspired by the Third Person of the adorable Trinity" (ELLICOTT) is unwarrantable. It finds no warrant in the conception of the church here presented, for this implies growth, precluding the notion that in any given post-apostolic century all theological truth was exactly stated, however valuable such statements may be.—R.]

§ 4. THE AUTHOR OF THE EPISTLE.

1. The Apostle Paul is designated as the author in the Epistle itself, not only in the address (i. 1), but also in the body of the Epistle (ii. 1), with great emotion, just as in 2 Cor. x. 1: αὐτὸς δὲ ἐγὼ Παῦλος ἀπόστολος παρακαλῶ; Gal. v. 2; ἰδε ἐγὼ Παῦλος λέγων ὑμῖν, and yet without imitation in a way entirely peculiar: ἐγὼ Παῦλος ὁ δέσμιος τοῦ Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ ἐπὶ τὰ ὑμῶν τῶν ἔθνων. He thus refers to two things which are well known in his life: His imprisonment, mentioned in iv. 1; vi. 20, also, and that he is the Apostle to the Gentiles (iii. 7; Acts ix. 15; xxii. 21; xxvi. 17, 18). As he speaks in 1 Cor. xv. 9 with humility, and in Gal. i. 1, 12 with confidence and certainty of having received revelations from God, so here also he speaks humbly and yet as certain of his calling and illumination, of the revelation which has been imparted to him (iii. 3, 8, 9), referring explicitly to ἀνεῖναι μου (ver. 4). Those traits may be perceived here, which are found in the Epistles to the Romans (i. 1, 5, etc.) and Galatians, and in his life.—Still another fact is to be noted: the sending of Tychicus, who is commended to the church as a beloved brother and a faithful servant in the Lord. This agrees entirely with what is known respecting him from other sources (see on vi. 21).—Finally the character of the Epistle in thought and language confirm the Pauline origin (§ 2).

2. The testimony of the ancient church points without exception to the Epistle to the Ephesians as an Epistle of the Apostle Paul. No weight can be laid upon one passage in the Epistles of IGNATIUS, who suffered martyrdom in Rome between A. D. 105 and 108, since in the briefer recension of the text, it is said that Paul remembered them ἐν πάσῃ ἐπιστολῇ (i. e., in every letter, except in later Greek it cannot mean: in the whole letter, see on ii. 21); in the longer recension, however, the passage reads very differently (πάντοτε ἐν ταῖς δέξεσιν αὐτοῦ μνημονεύει ἡμῶν), while in the shortest (the oldest) it is wanting altogether. The allusions to our Epistle (ii. 8; iv. 26) in the letter of POLYCARP (who suffered martyrdom A. D. 168) to the Philippians (Cap. 1: εὐδοτεῖς ὅτι χάριτι ἐστέ σεσωσμένοι, οὐκ ἐξ ἔργων; cap. 12: ut his scripturis dictum est; irascimini et nolite peccare, et sol non occidat super iracundiam vestram) can however be regarded as the earliest witness for our Epistle; although the first is slight, the second is quite definite and cannot refer in its conclusion to Deut. xxiv. 15, as MEYER* supposes. The testimony of the Canon Muratori belongs to the same period. According to WIESELER (Stud. u. Krit., 1847, pp. 815-857) and TISCHENDORF (When were our Gospels written, p. 6); this was composed in the year A. D. 170, according to LAURENT (Neutest. Studien, p. 193), before A. D. 160. This authority refers to what was then generally acknowledged, and hence to a much earlier period. It names among the Epistles to seven churches written by Paul, ad Ephesos as secunda. Nor are definite citations wanting in IRENEUS, who suffered martyrdom A. D. 202: Eph. v. 30 [Adv. Hæc. v. 2, 36; also Eph. v. 13 in i. 5, 8, where it is implied that the Valentinians accepted the Epistle as authentic.—R.]; in CLEMENS ALEX. († 220): Eph. iv. 17-19; v. 21 ff., etc. [Strom. iv. § 65, Pæd. i. § 18.—R.]; while ORIGEN († 254) names ἡ πρὸς Ἐφεσίων as Paul's [Philos. 6, 54]. Finally EUSEBIUS cites our Epistle among the homologoumena.

In addition to this testimony from the church that from the heretics must not be overlooked. MARCION (about the middle of the 2d century) has our Epistle in his Canon, though under the title: To the Laodiceans. Comp. § 5, 1. VALENTINUS, "the most profound, most rich in esprit, thought and imagination of the Gnostics," who died about A. D. 160, cites it as a Pauline Epistle, and also as "Scripture" (see BLEEK, Vorlesungen über Kolosser, p. 187, f.): [Comp. ALFORD, Prolegg., pp. 6 ff.—R.].—Even DE WETTE acknowledges that the ecclesiastical recognition of the Epistle opposes powerfully the grounds for doubt on this subject.

3. Doubts respecting the genuineness of the Epistle were first published by USTERI (Paulin. Lehrbegriff, 1824), occasioned by oral expressions of SCHLEIERMACHER, who however in his lectures on the Introduction to the N. T. (pp. 165 ff., 194) only suggests the conjecture, that the Epistle to the Ephesians was written by an attendant of Paul in accordance with his suggestions. DE WETTE in his Einleitung, § 146, and yet more decidedly in his Commentary, sought to establish these doubts, and to prove the author to have been a gifted disciple of the Apostle in the Apostolic age. His proof did not however find general sympathy, even among the "liberal" theologians, such as RUECKERT (see § 2, 2), who makes the following apt remarks in opposition to this view: "We find in this Epistle again that man, who, exalted high above his times, could have as his equal only a few, and according to history had none such, since its silence would have been impossible, had there been yet another to stand beside him or to walk in his footsteps. Only such a man as Paul can be the author. If then he is not the author, show me the spirit in those times who is equal to him! Such an one could not walk through this world and leave no trace behind; I ask then, who is he and where? In the ranks of the imitators, the copyists, the counterfeiters, he is not to be found; where then shall I look for him? It is Paul and no one else!" The attack of DE WETTE contains also in itself a peculiar contradiction, since it regards the Epistle to the Ephesians as a wordy expansion of the Epistle to the Colossians, denying the author's independence, ascribing to him poverty of thought, and then charges him with the ἀπας λεγόμενα and ἀπας νοούμενα, which evidence originality and fertility.

[ALFORD meets DE WETTE's objections thus (Prolegg., p. 9): "Let every one of DE WETTE's positions be granted, and carried to the utmost; and the more in number and stronger they are, the more reason there will be to infer, that the only account to be given of a writing, so unlike St. Paul's, obtaining universal contemporary acceptance as his, is, that it was his own genuine composition. Then we should have remaining the problem, to account for the Apostle having so far departed from himself: a problem for the solution of which much acquaintance with himself and the circumstances under which he wrote would be required." But ALFORD by no means admits that the problem is reduced to this form by DE WETTE's objections. Rarely

does even "subjective criticism" offer so contradictory a theory. Comp. HARLESS (Einleitung, pp. lxvi. ff.); MEYER, Einleitung (4th ed., pp. 22 ff.); DAVIDSON, Introduction, I., p. 352 ff. —R.]

The assertion of EWALD, that the Epistle is more rhetorical than Paul was in the habit of writing, yet as a whole very worthy of the name it bears on its face, placing it nearer to the Apostle than the Pastoral Epistles, and yet ascribing its authorship to a friend and pupil of the Apostle between A. D. 75–80, has no external support and this internal refutation, that no friend and pupil of the Apostle could possibly play such a prank as to represent himself as Paul, the Apostle to the Gentiles in bonds, honored with revelation, praying for the church, and requiring their supplications (see I, above): This is an entirely different matter from the question respecting the Epistle to the Hebrews, left anonymous.

That this Epistle should be rejected by the Tübingen school (SCHWEGLER, Nachapost. Zeitalter, ii. p. 330 ff., and by Master BAUR, ZELLER'S Theolog. Jahrbücher, 1844, 2, p. 378 ff.; Paulus, p. 418 ff.) as a Montanist or Gnostic production, was to be expected from the animus of this school, but in the present state of exegesis and information respecting the character of both Gnosticism and Montanism, can create no uneasiness as far as the Epistle to the Ephesians is concerned. The terms πλήρωμα, ἀρχή, αἰών, κοσμοκράτωρ, κ. τ. λ. in this Epistle are not to be taken according to the Gnostic terminology, and, however it may be wished by some, it is not possible to discover in the phrase πολυποικίλος σοφία τοῦ θεοῦ (iii. 10), the σοφία returning into the Pleroma, or in iii. 21 the doctrine of the Æons, or in v. 28 the Syzygies of the Gnostics, especially of the Valentinians, or in iv. 13 the Montanist point of view. For there can be found in our Epistle by considerate exegesis as little of the universalistic character of Gnosticism, which is pervaded by the most adventurous theosophic and dualistic views, teaching about a physical-life process instead of a moral one, as of the opposite Montanism, which on the basis of a prophetic system, ecstatic in form and chiliastic in origin, substitutes asceticism for morality, running off into rigorism; so that the Tübinger are peculiar enough to rest on no other basis than their own assertions, especially as the Epistle to the Ephesians existed before Montanism and even before the Gnosticism of Valentinus, while these systems stand in the most complete antagonism to the fundamental thoughts and detailed statements of the Epistle (see 2). Comp. LANGE, Apostol. Zeitalter, I. 1, p. 119 ff.; KLÖPPER, De origine epp. ad Ephes. et Coloss., 1853; RAEBINGER, De Christolog. Paulin., p. 42 ff.

[RENAN calls this Epistle "doubtful." He wavers between the theory of the later origin (on the ground of Gnostic features and the conception of marriage presented here differing from 1 Cor. vii., etc.) and one similar to that of EWALD: "That it was composed during his (Paul's) life, under his eye, in his name, is not improbable." He suggests Timothy as the writer, especially as his name is omitted here, joining with this the notion of a circular letter, afterwards called Ephesians, because coming first to Ephesus, etc. The two theories contradict each other. As for the latter, if RENAN regards the Epistle as "chargée de mots inutiles et de répétitions" (p. xix.), such a quasi-forger would scarcely employ useless words and repeat himself as he does in chap. iv. 25, where he not only forbids lying, but commands to speak the truth. Still the whole theory accords better with the character of the St. Paul of Renan than with that of the St. Paul of history. There is as much truth as ever in the remark of ELLICOTT: "The objections have been so fairly and fully confuted that they can no longer be considered to deserve any serious attention."—R.]

§ 5. THE READERS OF THE EPISTLE.

1. The address (i. 1) contains a definition of the place, to which the Epistle is directed: ἐν Ἐφέσῳ. The circle of readers is accordingly the Church in Ephesus, if this definition be correct. It is wanting, however, in N. B., which belong to the fourth century, and in cod. 67 of the twelfth. In the first, the Sinaiticus, it was originally omitted, but it is added by the otherwise skilful corrector, whom TISCHENDORF designates with C. In the Codex Vaticanus the original omission was modified at a later date, as TISCHENDORF has shown in opposition to HUG (Stud. und Krit., 1847, p. 133); in cod. 67 it was found originally, but afterwards erased. It is found besides in A. D. E. F. G. K. L. and others. The versions from the Peshito (simple Syriac) and the Itala, which may have existed in the second century, all sustain this definition in the address. Our Epistle has been called the Epistle to the Ephesians since the middle of the second century (see § 4, 2).

In favor of the Ephesian destination of the Epistle we have also the testimony of TERTULLIAN (contra Marcion, 5, 11): prætereo hic et de alia epistola, quam nos ad Ephesios præscriptam habemus, hæretici vero ad Laodiceos; (and the same 5, 17): ecclesiæ veritatem epistolam istam ad Ephesios habemus emissam, non ad Laodiceos, sed Marcion ei titulum aliquando interpolare gestiit, quasi et in isto diligentissimus explorator; nihil autem de titulis interest, cum ad omnes apostolus scripserit, dum ad quosdam. From this it follows: Since the middle of the second century the same Epistle, which the ancient church designated and cited as the Epistle to the Ephesians was designated and used by Marcion, and not by him only but by the other heretics, (hæretici), as the Epistle to the Laodiceans. TERTULLIAN regarded Marcion as the author of this alteration (interpolare gestiit), which related chiefly to the title only (ἡ πρὸς Ἐφεσίους) agreeing, as it of course did, with the address (τοῖς οἰσιν ἐν Ἐφέσῳ), and not to the exact contents of the Ephesian or Laodicean letter, from which the materials for the discussion were drawn. Such a proceeding is easily explicable from the passionate, energetic and proud character of Marcion; besides he accepted Paul alone among the Apostles, and only ten of his Epistles in a very mutilated form, feeling himself entitled from his Asiatic origin to decide on this point. In the relations of the Apostle Paul to the Church at Ephesus, and in the universal character of this Epistle (§ 2, 1, 2), beside the parallel Epistle to the Colossians, and in the mention of an Epistle to Laodicea (Col. iv. 16), Marcion had occasion enough to recoin the Epistle to the Ephesians into a suitable support for his opinions and tendencies. With this agrees remarkably what is said in the Canon Muratorianus (see WIESELER, Stud. u. Krit., 1847, p. 828; LAURENT, Neutestamentl. Studien, p. 198): Fertur etiam una ad Laodicensis alia ad Alexandrinos Pauli nomine fictæ ad hæresim Marcionis et alia plura, quæ in Catholicam ecclesiam recipi non poterant; fel enim cum melle misceri non congruit. When then EPIPHANIUS cites Eph. iv. 5, 6, from Marcion's πρὸς Λαοδικέας, and TERTULLIAN opposes Marcion out of a common text, the acceptance of a partial mutilation and alteration of the text by Marcion best meets the facts of the case, and it seems better to accept with WIGGERS (Stud. und Krit., 1841, p. 429), that ἐν Λαοδικείῳ was written and read by Marcion instead of ἐν Ἐφέσῳ (i. 1) to conform with the title (ἡ πρὸς Λαοδικέας), rather than with TISCHENDORF and MEYER, that all closer local definition was wanting [i. e. in Marcion's text]. For some kind of local statement is indispensably required after τοῖς οὖσιν, as will appear from a comparison of the Pauline inscriptions which enter into the discussion here (Rom. i. 7; 1 Cor. i. 2; 2 Cor. i. 1; Phil. i. 1). As regards Rom. i. 7, the words ἐν Ρώμῃ are wanted only in isolated manuscripts. So that the omission of every local definition seems rather to have arisen in consequence of this manipulation of Marcion and in view of the remarkably universal tone of the Epistle.* It was not until the fourth century that BASIL THE GREAT (Contra Eunom. 2, 19) announced himself as convinced by manuscripts, that the address of the Epistle to the Ephesians read as follows: τοῖς ἁγίοις τοῖς οἰσιν καὶ πιστοῖς ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ. JEROME, who for his part reads ἐν Ἐφέσῳ in the text, remarks on chap. i. 1: quidam curiosius quam necesse est, putant, ex eo, quod Moysi dictum sit: hæc dices filius Israel: qui est misit me, etiam eos, qui Ephesi sunt sancti et fideles, essentia vocabulo nuncupatos, ut ab eo qui est hi qui sunt appellentur. Alii vero simpliciter non ad eos, qui sint, sed qui Ephesi sancti et fideles sint, scriptum arbitrantur. The former attempts to prove from the fact of Christians being called οἱ ὄντες, that Christ is first really ὁ ὢν; the latter refers, as TISCHENDORF (N. T. ed. 7, maj. I. p. 441), affirms, to the explanation and opinion of ORIGEN.—Accordingly this Epistle is to be regarded as addressed to Ephesus.

2. The Epistle itself and Paul's relation to the Ephesian Church are at least not in opposition to this view. During the second missionary journey, A. D. 53 or 54 (Acts xvi.-xviii. 22) on his return from Corinth, Paul came with Aquila and Priscilla to Ephesus; these he left there

* [MEYER (Einleitung, p. 9) suggests, too, the influence of the incorrect inference from passages in the Epistle, that it was addressed to those unknown to the Apostle who were moreover beginners in Christianity. On these points see below (2). The propriety of this suggestion will appear when we consider that "subjective criticism" found favor in early days as well as now. The "critical" as well as "theological" discourses of the present time are often enough those of the "seething" post-apostolic centuries.—R.] and hastened to the feast at Jerusalem. This excellent pair in connection with Apollos labored still further for the gospel. During the third extended journey from A. D. 56 or 57-59 Paul came again to Ephesus and remained there nearly three years (Acts xix.). Although he at first found some sympathy among the Jews, he was obliged to yield to his opponents and betake himself to the Gentiles, until Demetrius, the goldsmith (silversmith), excited an uproar against the Apostle, which drove him from the city. He won both Jews and Greeks for Christ (Acts xix. 10; xx. 21). An intimate relation was formed between Paul and the church, as is shown in the farewell at Miletus (Acts xx. 17-38), on his return to Palestine, when he fell into the imprisonment at Cesarea, A. D. 60 and 61. The church comprised both Jews and Gentiles, but the latter were in the majority, since the tumult which was excited by the silversmiths in their anxiety about their gains, was far more considerable than the Jewish opposition. The city of Ephesus, being the capital of proconsular Asia and celebrated for trade, art and science as well as on account of the temple of Diana, was a place well adapted for the formation of a church of extended activity. It now lies in ruins, and in its place stands a little village called Ajasoluk from ἁγία θεολόγου, the holy place of the theologian, in remembrance of the labors of John the Theologian.*

Just such a city as Ephesus would give occasion to the Apostle in his imprisonment, to present his universal and cosmical view in a letter to the dear church. Even though a "more personal than official character" (SCHENKEL) may not be found in the address (i. 1): τοῖς ἁγίοις τοῖς οὖσιν ἐν Ἐφέσῳ καὶ πιστοῖς ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ, which is similar to that to the personally unknown church in Rome (Rom. i. 7), and to Phil. i. 1, still the whole Epistle is pervaded by a lively interest in this church, the main elements of which are Gentiles (§ 2, 1). The universalism pervading throughout the Epistle throws the special references into the background and refers to the sending of Tychicus for oral communications. When the Apostle (i. 15) writes, he had heard of their faith and love to all saints, this is to be explained by the separation for years; he does not say that he had only heard of it. From iii. 2 we can by no means infer the non-acquaintance of the church with the Apostle, nor from iv. 21 the non-acquaintance of the Apostle with the church (see Exeg. Notes in loco, and RINCK, Stud. u. Krit., 1849, p. 953 f.)—It might have been expected, that Paul would mention or hint at some special personal relatives in this Epistle; but he does not do it, though the Epistle is one addressed to a beloved church and full of lively sympathy. Yet at the same time he gives no ground for a justifiable doubt, whether this Epistle was written to Ephesus. No fact in the Epistle compels or justifies a belief that it was not intended for Ephesus, as the historical evidences require.

[The Ephesian destination of this Epistle has been denied by CONYBEARE (C. and HOWSON, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, Vol. II., pp. 486 ff.). Owing to the great popularity of this work, DEAN ALFORD has answered its arguments in detail (Prolegg. pp. 13-18). The same popularity required at least a summing up of the question at this point, before passing to the theories mentioned below, so that the reader may see how little real ground there is for the view which these charming authors have made so current. On external diplomatic and historical grounds, only thus much is proven: that so early as the time of BASIL copies existed without having the words ἐν Ἐφέσῳ in the inscription, as indeed these are now wanting in κ. B., but not even he, much less the other fathers, doubted that the true title was "to the Ephesians," as it reads in all the older Uncials; that MARCION (not the best authority) called it the Epistle to the Laodiceans. This scarcely amounts to more than a state of things just short of absolute unanimity. The most probable explanation of the fact of this omission is that of ALFORD, who thinks it was occasioned by the catholic subject of the Epistle, made "very possibly by churches among whom it was read, and with a view to generalize the reference of its contents." On internal grounds but one objection deserves an answer, viz., that it is scarcely possible that Paul could have written to such a church where he was so well-known without sending personal greetings. A sufficient answer is this, that in the Epistles addressed to those churches where he was personally unknown (Romans, Colossians) there are most personal greetings to and from individuals; and in every case where he was known few or none (see the close of the various Pauline Epistles). It is to meet these two difficulties that the theories enumerated below have been suggested, though MARCION's position has involved Col. iv. 16 in the problem.—R.]

* ["The city stood on the south of a plain about five miles long from east to west, and three miles broad, the north boundary being Mount Galesius, the east Mount Pactyas, the south Mount Coressus, and on the west it was washed by the sea. The sides of the mountains were very precipitous, and shut up the plain like a stadium or race-course." (LEWIN, quoted in ALFORD). It was, in the time of the Apostle, an influential centre, a point of importance to be won for Christ. It is highly probable that the churches of Colosse and the neighborhood (Col. ii. 1) were founded as the result of intercourse with Ephesus (see Introd. to Colossians, p. 6). As regards its history, present condition, the temple of Diana, and the worship of that goddess, see SMITH'S Dictionary of Geography, and his Bible Dictionary, WINER, Realwörterbuch in all three under the article "Ephesus;" but especially the interesting and vivacious description in CONYBEARE and HOWSON, Life and Epistles of St. Paul, Vol. II., chap. 16; comp. EADIE, pp. viii. ff., and the authorities there cited. The classical references are given by ALFORD, Prolegg. p. 11. The main facts are as follows: The city was wealthy and well-known, its chief attraction, aside from its importance as a trading point, being the temple of Diana, to whom the city was sacred. This wonder of the world, a Greek building of the Ionic order, was burnt by Herostratus, to gain immortality for himself, on the night of the birth of Alexander the Great (B. C. 355), but was rebuilt at great cost in the course of centuries, one may say, contributions having been made by all Greece and Western Asia. "A many-breasted idol of wood, rude as an African fetich, was worshipped in its shrine, in some portion of which a meteoric stone may have been inserted, the token of its being 'the image that fell from Jupiter'—τοῦ διανοητοῦ" (EADIE). "Oxford in England is not more Oxford on account of its University, than Ephesus was Ephesus on account of the temple of Diana" (HODGE). On the title νεωκόπος, "temple-sweeper," the most honorable designation of the city, see CONYBEARE and HOWSON, li. p. 76. The effect of the preaching of the Apostle Paul on this idolatrous worship is stated in Acts xix. 17 ff. It is not necessary to find any allusion to this temple in certain passages in our Epistle (iii. 20, 21), yet it does seem that it is quite as fair to adduce such a possible allusion in favor of the Ephesian destination of the Epistle, as to advance such internal grounds against it as have gained considerable acceptance. At all events the character of the city is not against the genuineness of the commonly received title.—R.]

3. The attempts to explain what is singular in this fact, which must always be recognized, fail in four directions.

a) Many, following a few manuscripts, some of them important, and BASIL (see 1) reject all local designation, as SCHNECKENBURGER: "to the saints, who really are such," MATTHIES: "to all the saints who are there," CREDNER: "to the saints who are also real believers;" so also WEISS (HERZOG's Real encykl. 19, p. 481). This is not only against the usage of the language (see 1), the attempts at translation themselves showing that the words are incomprehensible and meaningless without a local definition, but it also stamps the Epistle as a Catholic Epistle, for which it has never been held by the church, not even by WEISS, who limits it to the totality of the churches in Asia Minor, and considers it encyclical (see ibid. p. 482). Were this letter a companion to the πρὸς Ἐβραίους, it should have been entitled πρὸς Ἐλλήνας rather than πρὸς Ἐφεσίους.

b) Others consider it an encyclical letter, addressed to Ephesus and yet intended for the vicinity in a narrower or wider circle. JACOB USHER (Annales V. et N. T. ad a. 64, p. 686) started this theory, and claimed that Paul has inserted no local name, leaving it to the bearer to add it. [EADIE (p. 24 f) gives his language in full, as well as a long list of the supporters of his theory.—R.] Following him are a great many authors who suggest the most various modifications of his view. Some consider it a circular letter for Ephesus and its affiliated churches (HARLESS and others), others for Ephesus and the churches connected with it (BEZA and others), or for the Gentile Christians of Asia (STIER, HOFMANN, Schriftbeweis I. 1, p. 372) or for these exclusive of Ephesus (KOPPE and others), or for Laodicea and the neighboring churches, such as Hierapolis (BLEEK). [Among the supporters of this "limited encyclical" view which implies the general correctness of the title: To the Ephesians, we must class some of the most judicious of modern historians and commentators, such as TURNER, HODGE, SCHAFF, ELLICOTT, LANGE. Dr. LANGE with some positiveness says (Introd. Romans, p. 16) that in Col. iv. 16: "We are to understand rather the Epistle to the Ephesians as intended also for Laodicea, the last of the Ephesian Cycle of congregations." HODGE merely says: "Perhaps the most probable solution of the problem is, that the Epistle was written to the Ephesians and addressed to them, but being intended specially for the Gentile Christians as a class, rather than for the Ephesians as a church, it was designedly thrown into such a form as to suit it to all such Christians in the neighboring churches, to whom no doubt the Apostle wished it to be communicated." ELLICOTT, while holding that the Ephesian destination "is not open to very serious doubt," is led by the authority of κ. to adopt the view of USHER, regarding the Epistle as "left studiously general in form, and free from distinctive notices." OLSHAUSEN, MAC-KNIGHT, and many others, especially CONYBEARE (see above under 2) adopt the encyclical view, without admitting that Ephesus was the primary destination.—R.] But Paul has already shown in Gal. i. 1: "Unto the churches of Galatia," 2 Cor. i. 1: "Unto the church of God which is at Corinth, with all the saints which are in all Achaia," how he designates a circular letter, and gives an example in 1 Cor. i. 2, how he writes when in the address to a local church he has still in mind the adjacent churches, and one in particular. But of this there is no trace to be found here; hence the view that the Epistle to the Ephesians is an encyclical letter seems to be unfounded, and only an arbitrary means of avoiding a greater difficulty, all the more so, when the modern modification is added, that the Apostle had entrusted several copies to Tychicus, so that he could insert the name of the place on the spot (BENGEL, RUECKERT and others). Besides in that case another riddle is proposed: how does it happen that only copies for Ephesus have become known? [Nor does this theory meet the internal difficulty, since Paul in just such an encyclical letter (2 Cor.) goes into details to an extent that forbids our supposing the wider destination to have been any reason for the absence of personal greetings.—R.]

c) The opinion, based on Col. iv. 16, and Marcion, that our Epistle is that to Laodicea, is very peculiar, if it be claimed at the same time that it was intended for Ephesus also (GROTIUS, AUGER). The same Epistle could not be addressed to two so different churches. [Comp. Col. iv. 16, pp. 85, 86. The acceptance of "Laodiceans" and "Laodicea" in the title and address is altogether unwarranted,—a mere fiction to meet a single fact of no great importance, and involving various assumptions; and this strange inconsistency that Paul wrote two letters at the same time, one to Laodicea and the other to Colosse, sending no greetings to Laodicea in the letter intended for that point, but in the other one (Col. iv. 15) sent elsewhere. Even RENAN rejects it most decidedly. Still this view has been supported by MILL, WETSTEIN, the younger VITRINGA, PALEY, HOLZHAUSEN, and others.—R.]

d) Finally we can put on record as pure hypothesis the view of MEYER: Paul, with whose circumstances the Asiatic Tychicus, who is used again as "emissary" (2 Tim. iv. 12) and mentioned together with the Ephesian Trophimus (Acts xx. 4), was entirely entrusted, might have had special motives (the Jewish accusation, Acts xxi. 28, 29, and the avarice of Felix, Acts xxiv. 26) in the circumstances of his imprisonment and the watch kept on him for composing (on the score of prudence) a letter to this very church, with which he stood on the most confident footing, without presenting any personal reference or special circumstances. [This theory of MEYER is based on his opinion that the letter was written during the imprisonment at Cesarea (see § 6). But it ought to be added that MEYER is very positive in accepting the genuineness of the words ἐν Ἐφέσῳ as well as the exclusively Ephesian destination of the Epistle, views which he distinctly re-affirms in the preface to his 4th edition.—It is perhaps well to close this section with a list of some authors who agree with the view advocated by Dr. Braune: viz., that this Epistle was addressed to Ephesus and to no other church: CALVIN, BUCER, WITSIUS, LARDNER, PROF. STUART of Andover, MEYER, DAVIDSON, WIESELER, ALFORD, WORDSWORTH, EADIE, SCHENKEL and very many others.—R.]

§ 6. TIME AND PLACE OF THE COMPOSITION OF THE EPISTLE.

The time and place are dependent on each other. Paul writes as prisoner (iii. 1; iv. 1; vi. 20), hence between A. D. 59 and 64, either at Cesarea or at Rome. As a starting-point we must remember that the three Epistles, to the Ephesians, the Colossians, and to Philemon, were written at the same time. The Epistle to the Colossians (iv. 10-14) shows us the Apostle surrounded by the same companions sending salutations as in that to Philemon (vers. 23, 24). In the Epistles to the Ephesians (vi. 21, 22) and to the Colossians (iv. 7-9) we find the same messenger with the same commission; this, in connection with the many almost verbatim parallel passages, places the contemporaneousness of the Epistles above doubt. Now according to 2 Tim. iv. 12, the Apostle sent Tychicus from Rome to Ephesus. At that time Luke was still with him, Demas had forsaken him, Mark was expected, and to Timothy he was writing. This points evidently to some other time than that required by our Epistles. According to Col. i. 1, Timothy was with Paul, as in Phil. i. 1. According to Col. iv. 7-14, as well as Philemon 23, 24, Aristarchus, Mark, Jesus Justus, Epaphras, Luke, Demas were with him. Aristarchus went with them from Cesarea to Rome (Acts xxvii. 2). Timothy, Aristarchus, Tychicus journeyed to Je-

Jerusalem with the Apostle (Acts xx. 4). Hence we can infer nothing definite respecting the time of the composition of this Epistle from Paul's companions. The Apostle was a person of great power of attraction, restlessly active, using his helpers as became necessary. Hence constant change. That the coming together of these men about Paul, who was the centre of all missionary activity would be more easily brought about in Cesarea than in Rome, decides nothing; they did come with him to Rome, to him at Rome, and thence were sent out to return thither again. Accordingly special attention has been directed to one point, viz., the passages respecting Tychicus (Eph. vi. 21, 22; Col. iv. 7-9).

The mention of Onesimus in the latter passage is of special importance. The remarks of LANGE (Romans, p. 15) against SCHENKEL, who with MEYER [THIERSCH, HAUSERATH] and others, following the lead of SCHULZ (Stud. und Krit., 1829, pp. 612-17), holds that the Epistle was written from Cesarea, are quite correct. Even WIGGERS (Stud. und Krit., 1841, pp. 436-450), who after weighing with great circumspection the arguments for Cesarea and for Rome, decides for the former, does not find those drawn from the companions sufficient. It cannot be perceived why Onesimus should have fled to Jerusalem rather than to Rome; since from the intercourse with Rome, and the sea route and the prospects in the metropolis, this was much nearer. Nor can anything be inferred from the expense, since this would scarcely be reckoned with much care. The fugitive would have been afraid of the fugitivarii, but not have fled from them. Nor is any proof to be based upon the position of the cities, Colosse and Ephesus. Even the custodia militaris does not help us to decide: the confinement in Cesarea would hardly have been stricter than in Rome. Two reasons are decisive in Wiggers' opinion: 1) that, if Tychicus travelled with Onesimus through Ephesus to Colosse, and hence came from Rome, Onesimus would have been mentioned in the Epistle to the Ephesians also; he is not named, and hence was no longer with Tychicus, but separated from him, left behind in Colosse. It is inconceivable however, why Paul ought to have mentioned in a letter to the Ephesians a slave entirely unknown to them, just as in an Epistle to Colosse, where he belonged. 2) Paul could not have said that he had sent Tychicus to Ephesus (vi. 22), if he in going from Rome [to Colosse] must of necessity pass through Ephesus; in that case the route would have led him to Ephesus, not Paul's sending of him. This remarkable reason is rejected even by Meyer, who agrees with Wiggers.

If on the contrary we call to our aid the situation of the Apostle in his imprisonment, it is clear, that in Rome, the capital of the Empire, to which he had already addressed his most important Epistle, the importance of Ephesus, the capital of Asia, would appear with especial strength to his mind, and at the same time the universality of the Gospel, the importance of the Gentile Christian Church there, the fundamental thought of our Epistle. The place of composition, therefore, indicates the time, probably the beginning of the imprisonment. Paul was in Cesarea from A. D. 59, and from the spring of 61 or 62 in Rome. Hence the Epistle to the Ephesians was written in A. D. 61 or 62. [With the usual variations in chronology the great majority of commentators and historians agree in assigning this Epistle to the early part of the imprisonment at Rome. See MEYER for the best defence of the other view. RENAN, mainly on internal grounds, thinks this group of Epistles, if genuine, was composed at Rome toward the close of the Apostle's life (p. ix.).—R.]

The priority of the Ephesian Epistle to that to the Colossians will doubtless be accepted as most probable (see Introd. to Colossians, § 2, 1, p. 8). It is certain that nothing can be inferred in regard to this point from καὶ ὑμεῖς (Eph. vi. 21), because the contrast with the Colossians, as those to whom Tychicus first came, is not indicated at all, nor can it be proven from the context (See Exeg. Notes in loco). Nor can the priority of the Colossian Epistle be concluded from the ungrounded opinion that Rome was the first and immediate goal for Tychicus.* We may rather suppose, that with the universal thought respecting the Church in Jesus Christ, which impelled Paul to the Ephesian Epistle, the application of the universal complex truth to the special necessities of the Colossian Church might first have come into full view, than to claim that through his writing to the church at Colosse, whose needs had been made known to him by Epaphras and

* [These two grounds are advanced by MEYER, who considers the internal, psychological grounds to be altogether inadmissible. But the second reason falls to the ground with the theory that the Epistles were written at Cesarea. Were our Epistle referred to in Col. iv. 16, then it was certainly written first.—R.]

Onesimus, Ephesus as capital of Asia had suggested itself to him and the universalism of the Christianity of the Gentile churches, and that he was thus led to write the Epistle to the Ephesians. The former supposition is supported further by an incidental notice. In the address to Colosse Timothy is mentioned with Paul (Col. i. 1); in the Epistle to the Ephesians he is not mentioned and this is the more remarkable, since Timothy was well known in Ephesus (1 Tim. i. 3). Hence it is scarcely probable that he was at Rome when Paul wrote to Ephesus, but he must have been there when he wrote to Colosse. The most simple theory is that Paul had already finished the Epistle to the Ephesians, when Timothy returned from some errand at a distance.* The Apostle then writes to Colosse, and both letters are sent away, the former written probably towards the end of the summer, the latter at the beginning of autumn. Finally HUTH's proof for the probable priority of the Colossian Epistle, deduced from the fact that in the Ephesian letter "an unmistakable fullness of language prevails," while the Colossian Epistle is distinguished "by a compact brevity," proves rather the opposite: the briefer form is usually the later one, as the shorter catechism follows the larger. Comp. my remarks on the Epistles of John, LANGE's Comm., p. 16. [HAUSRATH thinks that both were written at one sitting as it were, but the whole question involves conjectures merely. The view which accepts the priority of the Epistle to the Colossians admits of the beautiful theory respecting the Apostle's state of mind in writing the two, which ALFORD sets forth (Prolegg. pp. 41, 42) but aside from this there is no advantage whatever to be derived from a decision of the question. As to the argument from the contents of the Epistles, it is manifestly inconclusive, since A-LAPIDE, BÖHMER, CREDNER, SCHNECKENBURGER, LARDNER, and many others agree with Braune in assigning the earlier origin on this ground to our Epistle, while SCHLEIERMACHER, HARLESS, NEANDER, WIGGERS, DE WETTE, BLEEK, SCHENKEL reach the opposite conclusion. So too ELLICOTT, DAVIDSON, ALFORD; EADIE is very cautious in accepting this view.—R.]

§ 7. LITERATURE.

Among the numerous commentaries on all or a number of the Epistles of this Apostle we mention:

KOPPE: Nov. Testam. Vol. VI, Eph. ad Galatas, Thess., Ephes., Göttingen, 1778. (The 2d and 3d editions, 1791 and 1824, were revised by Tychsen).—J. D. MICHAELIS: Paraphrase und Anmerkungen über die Briefe Pauli an die Galat., Ephes., Philip., Koloss., Thess., Tim., Tit., Philemon., Göttingen, 1750 (2d edition, 1769).—DE WETTE: Exegetisches Handbuch über das Neue Testament, Band 2, Theil 4, 1843 (2d edition, 1847).—MEYER: Kritisch-exeget. Commentar über das N. Testament, Abtheilung 8, 1843; 3d edition, 1859. [The fourth enlarged and improved edition (1867) of this invaluable commentary has been used in preparing the additions in the present volume; and Dr. Braune's citations have been carefully compared with it.—R.]—OLSHAUSEN: Bibl. Commentar über das N. Testament, Band 4, 1840. [Accessible to the English reader through the translation of Prof. Kendrick].—SCHENKEL in Lange's Bibelwerk, 1862. [A second edition appeared in 1867. The work shows the author's ability, but in point of grammatical accuracy leaves no room to doubt the propriety of translating in its stead the commentary of Dr. Braune, altogether aside from the change of theological position on the part of Dr. Schenkel, which made it necessary to offer to the German public a choice between two separate works on the three Epistles to the Ephesians, Philippians and Colossians.—R.]—FLATT: Vorlesungen über Gal. und Eph., published by Kling, 1828.—BAUMGARTEN-CRUSIUS: Commentar über die Briefe Pauli an die Epheser und Kolosser, published from his manuscripts and reports of his lectures by Kinnel and Schauer, 1847.—EWALD: Die Sendschreiben des Apostels Pauli übersetzt und erklärt, 1857.

Among the special commentaries the following are to be noted: RUECKERT: Der Brief Pauli an die Ephesier erläutert und vertheidigt, 1834.—G. CH. A. HARLESS: Commentar über den Brief Pauli an die Ephesier, 1834; 2d unaltered edition, 1858. [Pronounced by Ellicott: "one of the best, if not the very best commentary that has ever yet appeared on any single portion of Holy Scripture." Largely used by both author and editor in the present volume.—R.]

*[So HUG, but SCHOTT argues precisely the other way: that Timothy was present when the Colossian letter was written, and after he had been sent on some errand, Paul wrote to the Ephesians; so inconclusive is this circumstance.—R.]

STIER: Die Gemeinde in Christo Jesu. Auslegung des Briefs an die Epheser. Two vols., 1848, 1849.—Extracts from the same great work for popular use: Der Brief an die Epheser. Lehre von der Gemeinde für die Gemeinde. [Elaborate and diffuse, attempting to retain and combine as many interpretations as possible, yet exceedingly valuable.—R.]—MATTHIES: Erklärung des Briefs Pauli an die Epheser, 1834.—[HOLZHAUSEN: Der Brief des Apostels Paulus an die Epheser übersetzt und erklärt, 1833].

The following should be compared: LUENEMANN: De epistola, quam Paulus ad Ephes. dedisse perhibetur, authentica, 1842.—KLÖPPER: De origine epp. ad Ephes. et Col., 1853.—J. P. LANGE: Geschichte der Kirche, I. 1, p. 117 ff.—[W. F. RINCK: Disput. ad authenticam epist. P. ad Ephes. probandam, 1848.—Also the histories of the Apostolic times by REUSS, LECHLER, THIERSCH, SCHAFF, etc.—R.]

For practical exegesis we name: CHRYSOSTOM: 2d Homilies on our Epistle.—SPENER: Erklärung der Episteln an die Epheser und Kolosser, 1730.—RIEGER: Betrachtungen über das N. Testament, Theil 3, 1833.—[PASSAVANT: Versuch einer praktischen Auslegung des Briefes Pauli an die Ephesier. Basle, 1836]. HEUBNER: Praktische Erklärung des N. Testaments, Band 4, 1859.—KAEHLER: Auslegung der Epistel Pauli an die Epheser in 34 Predigten.—On Eph. vi. 1-9, AHLFELD: Der Christliche Hausstand, 1851.

[Comp. the lists in the Introduction to the New Testament, Biblework, Matthew, p. 19, in the Introduction to the Pauline Epistles, Romans, pp. 27 f., 48 ff.—Of special value here are the commentaries of CALVIN, BENIGL, MEYER, ALFORD (the 4th edition has been used in preparing the additions), WORDSWORTH. Among the earliest English works on this Epistle we mention: PAUL BAYNE, London, 1643; GOODWIN, London, 1681; BOYD, London, 1652 (in Latin); ROLLOCK, Geneva, 1593 (in Latin also).—Later works—EADIE: A commentary on the Greek text of the Epistle of Paul to the Ephesians, London, 1853; 2d edition, 1861. (Full, devout, generally accurate, containing a good list of the literature on the Epistle, and abounding in practical remarks which have been largely used in the Homiletical department).—TURNER: The Epistle to the Ephesians in Greek and English, New York, 1856.—HODGE: A Commentary on the Epistle to the Ephesians, New York, 1856 (republished in London, 1863).—C. THE

EPISTLE OF PAUL TO THE EPHESIANS.*

I. ADDRESS AND SALUTATION.

CHAPTER I. 1, 2.

- 1 Paul, an apostle of Jesus Christ¹ by the will of God, to the saints² which [who] are at [in] Ephesus,³ and to [omit to] the faithful [or believers] in Christ Jesus: [.]
- 2 Grace be to you, and peace, from God our Father, and from [omit from]⁴ the Lord Jesus Christ.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

* TITLE: Σ, A, B, D, E, K and others: πρὸς Ἐφεσίους, to which F, G, and others prefix ἀρχαί, some versions ἐπιφίλ. L has τοῦ ἁγίου ἀποστόλου Παύλου ἐπιστολὴ πρὸς Ἐφεσίους. [Elzevir has Παύλου τοῦ ἀποστόλου ἡ πρὸς Ἐφεσίους ἐπιστολὴ, which is followed in the E, V.—R.]

¹ Ver. 1.—Rec. Σ, A, F, G, K, L, all cursives, some versions, read: Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ. B, D, E., some versions and fathers, Lachmann, Tischendorf, Ellicott, Alford: Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ. The latter is more usual (see Col. i. 1) and seemingly better adapted to the contents of this Epistle, which would afford grounds for deciding against it. See in Ecce. Notes, Braune's reasons for accepting the first reading.—R.]

³ Ver. 1.—[See the Introd. §5, for a discussion respecting the words ἐν Ἐφέσῳ. The words are found in all uncial and cursive manuscripts except Σ, B, 67. They are found in all versions without exception. Meyer (p. 8) defends the words as decidedly genuine, and with him a number of the best editors. On the other hand, they are omitted in the three manuscripts mentioned above, though supplied by later hands in Σ, B., and really present in 67, with marks of suspicion. To this must be added, the testimony of Basil that in his time they were wanting in old copies, Marcion's view, the possibility that Tertullian did not know of them, Origen's acceptance of the omission, and the bare possibility that Jerome did not insert them. The discovery of Σ, and its omission of them has led careful editors, such as Tischendorf, Ellicott and Alford, to bracket them, but there is at present no evidence sufficient to warrant their rejection, while the omission makes a reading so singular as to overbear the ordinary canon respecting the lectio difficilior. We must also take into the account the "subjective criticism" of the earlier centuries.—R.]

⁴ Ver. 2.—Ellicott aptly says: "The preposition in such cases as this should certainly be omitted, as its insertion tends to make that unity of source from whence the grace and peace come less apparent than it is in the Greek." For the same reason a thorough revision would remove the comma after "Father," as well as the second "to" in ver. 1.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. The Inscription (address). A. The writer (ver. 1 a). Paul. Comp. the Introduction to the Epistle to the Romans. BEZA (Acts xiii. 9) explains the fact that he thus names himself in all his Epistles, by saying that he as the Apostle to the Gentiles retains the appellation used by them. JEROME: "The name Paul is the token of victory, raised above the first spoils of the church among the heathen." [Comp. SCHAFF, Romans,* p. 58].—An apostle of Jesus Christ by the will of God.—We find precisely as here ἀπόστολος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ διὰ θελήματος θεοῦ in 2 Cor. i. 1; Col. i. 1; 2 Tim. i. 1. While in the earliest Epistles to the Thessalonians there is no qualifying phrase, Paul calls himself in Philem. 1, δῆσ- μος Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ, and writes in Phil. i. 1: Παῦλος καὶ Τιμόθεος, δούλοι Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ; in 1 Cor. i. 1 κλητός is prefixed, in Rom. i. 1 δούλος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ is added, in Tit. i. 1 δούλος θεοῦ, ἀπόστολος δι' Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ are joined together, while in 1 Tim. i. 1, instead of διὰ θελήματος θεοῦ, we find κατ' ἐπιταγὴν θεοῦ σωτῆρος ἡμῶν καὶ Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ τῆς ἐλπίδος ἡμῶν. In Rom. i. 1; Gal. i. 1; Tit. i. 1, still further amplifications are appended. In this variety there is nothing arbitrary, but a consideration of the circumstances and relations determines the special form of the inscription in each letter, as in each case must be shown and has been shown. The shortest form, used here by the Apostle, is sufficient to indicate, humbly in unfading remembrance of his wonderful conversion and calling, that he has received his Apostleship without his own merit or worthiness, through the will and grace of the Most High (Gal. i. 15, 16), hence that he had not assumed it for himself or obtained it through the mediation of others. He did not present himself to the Ephesians as a stranger, as in the case of the Roman church, nor had he to deal with opponents, as in the case of the Galatians, nor was he approaching the end of his life, as it appears in the Pastoral Epistles. Hence there was no need of such an amplification as in those letters. Still, as he was not writing about a private matter, as to Philemon, but of Church and Christianity at large, and the Epistle is an official letter of great importance, the official designation should not be omitted. Comp. the Introduction, § 1. 2, § 3.

Ἀποστόλος is an official title. [Comp. Romans, p. 59.] See Luke vi. 13 (ἀποστόλους ὠνόμασεν); Mark iii. 14: ἵνα ἀποστέλλῃ αὐτοὺς κηρύσσειν. Hence 1 Tim. ii. 7: κήρυξ καὶ ἀπόστολος and προσβέβηεν ὑπὲρ Χριστοῦ, 2 Cor. v. 20; Eph. vi. 20. As an Apostle, one sent out, he is dependent on the Sender, has his authority in Him (against HARLESS), since κατ' ἐπιταγὴν—Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ, 1 Tim. i. 1, does not describe the source, the origin of the Apostolic authority, but only the corresponding activity, the situation in accordance with the commission. It is no self-glorification, but in ἀπόστολος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ there is expressed the feeling of dependence, in κατ' ἐπιταγὴν—Ἰησοῦ that of attachment; thus in 2 Cor. iii. 5 he calls himself ἰκανός, "sufficient," but denies his ἰκανότης ἐκ τοῦ θεοῦ; his "sufficiency is of God."

The genitive Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ accordingly designates chiefly Him who sends, who gives authority; the subject of the proclamation commanded to the Apostle is indeed the same Lord; but this lies in the nature and Being and position of the Sender, not in the genitive. Paul thus marks the authority which he has in the Christian church. [ELLICOTT and ALFORD follow HARLESS in taking the genitive as one of simple possession, but EADIE thinks it indicates also "the source, dignity and functions of the Apostolic commission," as well as including the idea of authority.—R.]

Finally, the position of the words must be considered. The best and most MSS. read here Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ; the same order is found in Gal. i. 1 without variation, but in all other Pauline inscriptions Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ is the better attested reading, so that TISCHENDORF (ed. 7, maj.) reads thus in every case except Gal. i. 1, while KNAPP and others read Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, except in Philemon 1. The difference in position expresses a difference of shading in the view. "Jesus" is the personal name of Him who appeared in the form of a servant, referring chiefly to His humanity. "Christ" is the official name of the Mediator, referring to the Divinity of the Son mediating from eternity. Historically the Apostolic proclamation begins with the Jesus in the form of a servant, the Son of man, rising to the Christ, the Son of God, as He proved Himself to be. Thus it occurred in the revelation to Paul, whose question the Lord thus answered: "I am Jesus whom thou persecutest" (Acts ix. 5; xxvi. 15; xxii. 8); in the last passage "of Nazareth" is added. He refers back to this most pointedly in Gal. i. 1; hence in that passage the reading is Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ without variation. But for this very reason the prevalent designation of Paul as "an Apostle of Christ Jesus" is explicable: for the exalted Son of Man, the Christ, who had appeared in Jesus of Nazareth, had called him to be an Apostle, while He had called all the others in the form of a servant. There is, however, no perceptible reason in the church to which he writes, nor in the contents of the Epistle,* nor in the circumstances in which he writes, for giving prominence to this distinction or to the consciousness of it. Hence the better supported reading is the more to be accepted, since, the subsequent context (πιστοῖς ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ) might give occasion for substituting the more usual order.

Διὰ θελήματος θεοῦ sets forth the means, as in 1 Cor. i. 9: ὁ θεὸς δι' οὗ ἐκλήθητε; Gal. iv. 7: κληρόνομος διὰ θεοῦ (N. A. B. C.; F. G.: διὰ θεοῦ). In these cases the preposition διὰ with the genitive evidently stands in connection with the causa principalis, seeming to be entirely—παρά, ὑπὲρ. So in Gal. i. 1, ἀπὸ and διὰ are definitely distinguished, and διὰ is there applied to Christ and also to God. FRITZSCHE's remark does not meet the case: est autem hic usus ubi tantum admissus, ubi nullam sententiam ambiguitatem crearet. WINER (p. 355†) comes nearer, since διὰ does not designate the author as such, i. e., as him from whom something proceeds, but chiefly as the person through whose endeavors or favor, etc., something is imparted to some one. It is precisely the activity and efficacy of the Divine will over against the various difficulties which must be overcome and set aside, "the achieving and penetrating power, the energy" of the same, which is indicated. It does not rest nor repose, as if what comes, only came hither from Him or out of Him; He must be active, must further in the present. Hence this phrase is not merely a reference to the final and supreme ground and to the important prerogative of his calling, as one divinely authorized, in order to remove all suspicion of intrusion and unwarranted appearance or writing, but it is also a reminder of the continued energy of the free grace of God; what exalts and sustains him and what humbles him, he comprehends here in one; it is as much an expression of humility as of dignity. Here this added phrase has "still another peculiar meaning. For when an Apostle in the Holy Spirit begins to write an Epistle, he knows already with the first word, what will follow further; he has conceived and borne the whole, before he begins his greeting. If we read further, how in vers. 3-11 all the consolation of this Epistle is brought out of the revealed mystery of the gracious good pleasure and will of God, we can mark what the Apostle has already in mind: an Apostle and messenger through the will of God brings no other message than a glad one, the gospel of Redemption unto blessedness. Comp. Rom. i. 10, 11; xv. 29, 32. It is a counsel of grace creating joy and peace, this will of God, through which he also, who from Saul had become Paul, in his call to be an Apostle stands before all who should believe on Jesus Christ unto eternal life, as an example of the mercy that saves sinners (1 Tim. i. 12-16).”—STIER. [ELLIOTT gives especial weight to the latter part of STIER's view, ALFORD to the former, while EADIE clings to the single notion of authority.—R.] Accordingly the remark of MELANCTHON, although accepted by most commentators, does not cover the case: Vides, quanta cura fuerit Spiritui sancto certos nos reddere de verbo Dei, ut et secure crederemus et non aliud audiremus præter hoc verbum.

* [The contents of the Epistle, especially its fundamental thoughts, seem to me to be strikingly in keeping with the order: "Christ Jesus," so much so as to awaken additional suspicion of an alteration to that form in MSS. of an early date.—R.]

B. The recipients of the Epistle (ver. 1 b).—To the saints who are in Ephesus and the faithful [or believers] in Christ Jesus.—“ἅγιοι” is applied to Christians according to the analogy of the Hebrew קָדוֹשׁ (Exod. xix. 6; Deut. vii. 6; xiv. 2; 1 Pet. ii. 9) as those consecrated to God, as members of a sanctified fellowship, of the kingdom of God, of the Church of Christ. Although in the nature of the Christian communion there is not merely, the calling and destination but also the condition and furtherance of inward holiness, so that the latter are to be chiefly thought of in connection with an ἅγιος and can never be separated entirely from him, still they are not assumed in the word itself [HARLESS thus restricts it], so that this is not to be regarded as a moral peculiarity (ESTIUS, GROTIUS and others), nor does it express the call in the history of personal salvation and the moral destination, so as to mean: those called to holiness (SCHENKEL). If the former view includes too much, the latter includes too little. The principle of holiness has already come to them and even into them (LANGÉ); not merely is the goal of their calling held up before them, but the strength to attain to it is conceded and imparted (STIER). So that ἅγιος designates not merely a goal, a destination, but a relation into which the man is transferred and with which something is placed in himself.*

The inner side of this relation, the demeanor is here designated by πιστός, which means not merely faithful, reliable, but is also=πίσυνος (in any case from πίθω), πιστεύων, believing. Comp. PASSOW sub voce.† So that it is used, not only in contrast with ἁπίστος (Juo. xx. 27; 2 Cor. vi. 15), but without such a connection (Gal. iii. 9; 1 Tim. iv. 3; Tit. i. 6), even in the address (Col. i. 1). On this account it is not to be applied to constantia in sanctimonia (GROTIUS) or perpetuitas in evangelica fide (BAUMGARTEN). MATTHIES is as little justified in limiting πιστοί to the enlightened believing nature, and referring ἅγιοι to the sanctified affectionate walk, as is SCHENKEL in applying the latter to the destination of the life and the former to the direction of the heart. For πιστεύω is not merely a direction of the heart, but a living activity, the acceptance and appropriation of what is proffered together with the devotion of one's own person to the Giver of every perfect gift.

Kai joins πιστός with ἅγιος, as belonging together, like Col. i. 2, and thus are indicated the external relation established from above, and the demeanor of the church corresponding thereto, or “prominence is given both to the external relation and the internal condition of the Christian” (HARLESS). There is no ground for taking the conjunctive particle as epexegetical, as BEZA and others do, appealing to ii. 8; Gal. vi. 16. Although the absence of the article before πιστοί renders this admissible, it is decidedly opposed by the fact that the union of ἁγίους and πιστοίς is a description of the one church on its objective and subjective side, of the two important elements in the completion of the idea (BENIGEL: Dei est, sanctificare nos et asserere, nostrum, ex Dei munere credere): the two notions do not cover the same ground, nor does one replace or explain the other; besides, Paul, least of all, would elevate the subjective above the objective element, and that too with an apparent exaltation of the Ephesian church, as though the vocati were all fideles. Because the article is wanting before πιστοίς, it is not allowable to find indicated in the two words two different grades or parts of the church, as does STIER,* appealing to 1 Cor. i. 2, where he thinks three grades are referred to; and yet dropping “the thought of grades, which is but indistinctly present in the two words,” he applies them to two parts, the first of which is thought of in the first part of the Epistle, the other in the second part. The acceptance of such a division would be grammatically inadmissible here (we should then read τοῖς ἁγίοις καὶ τοῖς πιστοῖς), and a similar division of the matter of the Epistle is found in others also; should not then the churches to which they were written, have had these two parts just as in Ephesus, or should not Paul have so thought of them in the letters addressed to them? The distinction is artificial.

Both ideas are further defined: τοῖς ἁγίοις τοῖς οὖσιν ἐν Ἐφέσῳ, πιστοῖς ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ. The first marking the objective side of the church by a local qualification, the second, respecting its subjective side, by the life-sphere of faith; each is thus defined more closely according to its nature. On ἐν Ἐφέσῳ, see Introduction, § 5 [and Textual Note 3]. Whether it is accepted or rejected makes little change in the sense of the words.—Τοῖς οὖσιν means those who are. In Rom. i. 7; 1 Cor. i. 2; 2 Cor. i. 1; Phil. i. 1, ἐκκλησία τῇ ὁσῃ or ἁγίοις τοῖς οὖσιν stand in connection with a following statement of the place, as herewith ἐν Ἐφέσῳ. This justifies the presumption that here too it can mean only this; nor does the word admit of any other meaning. It is entirely inadmissible, to explain τοῖς οὖσιν without ἐν Ἐφέσῳ as meaning “actual” (to the actually holy); this would read: τοῖς ὄντως, BASIL (τοῖς Ἐφεσίοις ἐπιστέλλων ὡς γνησίως ἢ νομμένοις τῷ ὄντι δι' ἐπιγνώσεως—δντας αὐτοῖς—ὠνόμασεν) to the contrary notwithstanding. BENGE, who does not accept ἐν Ἐφέσῳ, renders: qui præsto sunt, referring to Acts xiii. 1; Rom. xiii. 1. But the passages cited, Acts xiii. 1: κατὰ τὴν οὐσαν ἐκκλησίαν, and Rom. xiii. 1: αἱ δὲ οὐσαι ἐξουσίαι, by the participle of εἶναι mark only present existence and validity (in the churches which are existing there at present, the powers ruling there at present), and BENGE himself shortly before explains with more exactness: qui sunt in omnibus iis locis, quo Tychicus cum hac epistola venit, so that the participle has still a local reference. Such a reference must at all events be retained, and if ἐν Ἐφέσῳ must be omitted, then there is a lacuna, either intentional on the part of the writer, as in the case of a circular letter, or occasioned by the transcribers.

* [Dr. HODGE explains it: “Those who are cleansed by the blood of Christ, and by the renewing of the Holy Ghost, and thus separated from the world and consecrated to God.” No doubt this describes the “saints,” but it is too extensive a definition of the word as here used. EADIE opposes the restriction of HARLESS, but properly says: “The appellation ἅγιοι thus exhibits the Christian church in its normal aspect—a community of men self-devoted to God and His service.” ELLIOTT has a valuable note on the word, agreeing with ALFORD, who says: “It is used here in its widest sense, as designating the members of Christ's visible Church, presumed to fulfil the conditions of that membership.”—R.]

† The classical meaning: qui fidem præstant, is accepted by ALFORD, but the particular and theological sense: qui fidem habet, is preferable here, and is adopted by HODGE, ELLIOTT, EADIE. The last author thinks the other meaning would require a simple dative after it, as Heb. iii. 2. See his notes for the authorities justifying this meaning in the N. T.—R.]

* [STIER accepts the meaning: faithful, which best accords with his peculiar view respecting the two grades in the church.—R.]

Ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ is joined to πιστοῖς. The connection with ἐν is not objectionable,* even though πιστός ἐν does not occur elsewhere; for in Col. i. 1: πιστοῖς ἀδελφοῖς ἐν Χριστῷ, the phrase qualifies ἀδελφοῖς; so 1 Tim. i. 2: γνησίῳ τέκνῳ ἐν πίστει. But πίστις ἐν Χριστῷ is found in i. 15; Col. i. 4; Gal. iii. 26: μετὰ πίστεως καὶ ἀγάπης τῆς ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ, 1 Tim. i. 14; and πιστεῖν ἐν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ, Mark i. 15. Since ἐν designates the element, the life-sphere, the principle, the inmost life-fellowship of the believer, it is not=εις (BAUNGARTEN), for it is not the object, aim or direction of the believer that is marked, but his activity and vitality.† Hence it is also not=διὰ Χριστοῦ, for the means are not here discussed, as SCHENKEL thinks, nor is it to be rendered: fidem in Christo repentibus (MEYER), since in that case we should find ἐπὶ with the dative (WINER, p. 367). The position ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ must be noticed, since at the beginning we read ἀπιστοῦλος Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, and so too in the greeting, ver. 2. "The proclamation of the messenger proceeds mainly from Jesus, preaching and proving that He is the Christ—but the faith of the saints rests mainly on the Christ, the Messiah, the giver of the gift of God, of eternal life (Rom. vi. 23). Comp. Col. i. 4: 1 Tim. ii. 5; i. 14, 15."—STIER. "In Christ" is in this Epistle the centre and heartbeat of the apostolic proclamation. Comp. vers. 3, 4, 6, 7, 10, 11, 12, 13, etc. [See EADIE's remarks in Homil. Notes.—R.] This formula corresponds entirely to the phrases "in Adam," "in Abraham," referring to the efficient fellowship of life. The connection with πιστοῖς must be retained, the more since ἀγίοις has already an added qualification. It is true ἐν Χριστῷ might be joined with ἀγίοις, as in Phil. i. 1. But it does not result from this, that it belongs here not merely to πιστοῖς, but also to ἀγίοις, as SCHENKEL, HARLESS and others think; as if Paul had written: τοῖς ἀγίοις καὶ πιστοῖς ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ!

* [ALFORD seems to reject this connection. In that case we must accept an elliptical construction: "The saints who are in Ephesus, the believers (who are) in Christ," or take the phrase as qualifying both adjectives; the objections to the latter will be found below.—R.]

† [ELLIOTT thus discriminates between πιστός ἐν Χριστῷ and πιστεύων ἐν Χριστῷ: "The latter involves a closer connection of the verb and the preposition, and points rather to an act of the will, while the former involves a closer connection of the preposition and the noun, and marks a state and condition."—R.]

One might say with the same reason, that τοῖς οὖν ἐν Ἐφέσῳ belonged to πιστοῖς, since the believers also are there.

While Paul writes τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ in 1 Cor. i. 2; 2 Cor. i. 1; 1 Thess. i. 1; 2 Thess. i. 1; ταῖς ἐκκλησίαις Gal. i. 2; in Rom. i. 7; Phil. i. 1; Col. i. 2, he says: τοῖς ἀγίοις. In the former cases he has in view the unity comprehending the Christian persons, in the latter the persons standing in this unity: this form will, therefore, scarcely support the view, that it bears in itself a more confidential character. (SCHENKEL on Col. i. 2.) For the Romans were strangers to the Apostle, while the Colossians, Corinthians and Galatians were known and dear. Still less is there to be found in this difference an indication that he had founded the church in question or some one else.

Ver. 2. The Salutation. [On the Pauline salutations, see Dr. SCHAFF's note, Romans, p. 57.] Grace be to you and peace.—Χάρις has the same root as χαίρω, χαρά, χάρις (joy), χαρτός (pleasant), from which also carus, gratus, gratia, grates are derived. It means favor, gracious character, loving, obliging devotion to another, such as that of a wife to the husband, the enjoyment of love. See PASSOW sub voce. The thought of the Scripture is aptly expressed by the German word Gnade, the original meaning of which may be perceived in the expression: die Sonne geht zu Gnaden (the sun goes down, goes under), ein gnädiger Regen (a rain that falls lightly and penetrates deeply). It is compounded of ge, with the signification of strengthening, multiplying (as in Geräusch, Geschrei, etc.), and naden (down, into the depths). Gnade, grace, is therefore condescending love and beneficent kindness of God, the Lord, condescending indeed from the heights of glory into the depths of darkness. Comp. KLING, 1 Cor. i. 3 (Biblework). [The English word grace, as will be seen from the etymological remark above, has the same root as the Greek word used here, and is its nearest possible equivalent in all its various meanings.—R.]

Εἰρήνην from εἶρω (to knit, to speak, according to PLATO, Cratylus, p. 398. D: τὸ εἶρεν λέγειν εἶρ, according to the analogy of sero, sermo, sermonem nectere) designates a union after separation, reconciliation after contest and quarrel, since then the speech is no longer against, but to and for each other, since then comes rest and joyousness, παρρησία. It is Friede, peace, because one is glad and free [froh und frei], the actual well-being, corresponding to the Hebrew שְׁלוֹמ.

[The meaning of the Hebrew word is aptly expressed thus: "Peace, plenty, and prosperity."—R.] First comes χάρις, grace, "that which is subjective in God and Christ, which the Apostle wishes to be directed and shown to his readers; the latter is the actual result, which is presented through the bestowal of grace" (MEYER on Rom. i. 7); grace is the ground of sanctification and of peace, peace is the goal of faith; the dative οὖν, "to you," viz., ἀγίοις καὶ πιστοῖς, after χάρις indicates that "grace" first of all becomes their portion, and then "peace" becomes and remains theirs more and more. The thought will be best completed from 1 Pet. i. 2; 2 Pet. i. 2, where πληθυνθείς is added,* even if this word is not in the Apostle's mind; for as ἀγιοι and πιστοι they are already partakers of these, and in Christians there is a growth both of grace and peace.

From God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ.—The preposition ἀπό designates the coming hither, without defining more closely the relation of that which comes to him from whom it comes, as is done by ἐκ and παρά, or denoting the activity of him from whom it comes, as in the case of ὑπό. On the further distinction between these prepositions, see WINER, pp. 342 f., 346 f. Here ἀπό therefore means simply from, governing both the genitives: θεοῦ πατρὸς ἡμῶν and κυρίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ. Both grace and peace come from both God and Jesus Christ; in this then God and Jesus are alike. Still in 2 Cor. xiii. 13 Paul says: "the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ," placing it before "the love of God." In the present passage the two are distinguished by closer qualifications. "Our Father" denotes the fatherhood of God; we rejoice as His children "by virtue of the adoption" (ver. 5) attained through Christ." With the word "our" the Apostle includes himself and the readers, called "you" just before, and all Christians, in humble, sacred joy. Κυρίον without ἡμῶν denotes in general the Lordship of Christ; He is such as Creator (Col. i. 16; 1 Cor. viii. 6; comp. John i. 3), as Propitiator and Redeemer (Acts xx. 28), as the exalted Son of man (Phil. ii. 9-11); and such power as Lord He has from God the Father (i. 22; Matth. xxviii. 18) until the consummation of the plan of salvation (1 Cor. xv. 24, 28), while He in His appearance as Messiah (Χριστός) has God as head (1 Cor. xi. 3) and is "God's" (1 Cor. iii. 23). Comp. HARLESS in loco. It is inconceivable how any can [as the Socinians], in opposition to the language and thought alike, make the genitive "Lord Jesus Christ" co-ordinate with "our," and thus dependent on "Father;" but what is not possible for those who are unwilling to perceive Christ in His Dignity above us, and us in our need below Him!

The importance of this benediction will be perceived from the constant repetition of it, even if in manifold forms. The briefest form is found in 1 Thess. i. 1: χάρις ὑμῖν καὶ εἰρήνη; in Col. i. 2 we have: χάρις ὑμῖν καὶ εἰρήνη ἀπὸ θεοῦ πατρὸς ἡμῶν; 2 Thess. i. 2: χάρις ὑμῖν καὶ εἰρήνη ἀπὸ θεοῦ πατρὸς καὶ κυρίου Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ. Then as here (i. 2) in Rom. i. 7; 1 Cor. i. 3; 2 Cor. i. 2; Phil. i. 2; Philem. 3. In Gal. i. 3, ἡμῶν occurs after κυρίου, not after πατρὸς, and something further is appended, together with a doxology. Tit. i. 4: χάρις καὶ εἰρήνη ἀπὸ θεοῦ πατρὸς καὶ Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ τοῦ σωτῆρος ἡμῶν. The greetings in the two Epistles to Timothy are the fullest: χάρις, ἔλεος, εἰρήνη ἀπὸ θεοῦ πατρὸς καὶ Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν. "Mercy" enters between, to indicate the activity of "grace" towards this "peace."

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Paul knows and feels himself to be an Apostle of Jesus Christ, quite as much as those who were immediately called and sent out by Jesus Himself. He too was called and ordained just as immediately in an extraordinary manner, as these in an ordinary way. On this account he adds, "by the will of God," excluding all human choice and self-will in his call. Hence he is not to be reckoned as the thirteenth, but as the twelfth chosen in the place of the traitor Judas; the election of Matthias (Acts i. 15-26), having been occasioned by Peter and consumed by the disciples before the outpouring of the Holy Ghost, is to be regarded as a work of haste and precipitancy. [On the other hand, see LECHELE, Biblework, Acts, p. 22. The question is discussed in the histories of the Apostolic times. "Paul never represents himself as one of the twelve, but seems rather to distinguish himself from them as one born out of due time, occupying a similar relation to the Gentile world, as the older apostles did to the Jewish." SCHAFF, Hist. of the Apost. Church, p. 513. The only practical use made of it in modern times has been in the interest of Prelacy, against the people's choice of ministers.—R.]

2. As Paul places himself upon an entire equality with the other Apostles, although he is pre-eminently the Apostle to the Gentiles (Acts ix. 15; xx. 21; xxvi. 17, 18; comp. LECHELE, Biblework, Acts, p. 171), he designates the Apostolate as unique in its character, in respect to the immediate call, as well as to its special position and mission in the incipient stages of the Christian Church. This refutes the error of the Irvingites, who believe in the re-appearance of actual Apostles and the re-establishment and renewal of the Apostolate in their churches (SCHENKEL, SCHMOLLER, on Gal. i. 2, Biblework). We must not, however, overlook the fact, that Paul in Phil. i. 1 calls himself in connection with Timothy only "the servant of Christ Jesus," and in Rom. i. 1, "servant of Jesus Christ," in Tit. i. 1, "servant of God," first, and then "Apostle;" thus giving priority in these passages to the general official name; including his assistant with himself in Phil. i. 1, while in the two Epistles to the Thessalonians he mentions these without any further qualification. In the Apostolate, as a specializing of the general service of the church, we must regard the general ecclesiastical office as conjoined, finding in the former the basis of all real church offices. It is in fact the historically first form of office in the church, unfolding itself further in the wider course of ecclesiastical development, according to the necessity of the congregation, in conformity with the gifts and tasks of the church. Thus the diaconate soon sprang up (Acts vi. 1-7), then other offices (Eph. iv. 11), especially that of "presbyter" in both Jewish and Gentile Christian churches. To this correspond the instructions and commissions imparted to the Apostles by the Lord Himself (Matth. xvi. 19; xviii. 18; xxviii. 19, 20, where the promise: "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world," is especially to be noted; Jno. xx. 21-23), which are still in force for the ministers of the word, and will be unto the end of the world. In addition, it may be remembered that the Apostle is writing to churches already existing, though in most cases founded by himself, so that he does not place himself with his office and ministry temporal in priority, nor as to his rank above the church, but works on and in her, as well as for her.

3. Paul regards the church from a double point of view, as consecrated to God, and believing. With the first term (ἁγίως) he sets forth its objective ground, with the second (πιστὸς ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ) its subjective life; the former marks the Divine work of salvation, the latter the human acceptance and appropriation; that indicates the relation of the church to God, this the demeanor; that defines their worth (dignity), this their worthiness; that is always first, impelling to the other, this is always second, having in the first its ground, impulse and power. In the objective factor, in God's arranging and ordering, there is constantly given the power, which will and can and should become efficient, even though only latent at times. Nothing is said respecting the degree and extent to which this power, given in connection with the assembly effected by God, has wrought and been successful in the whole body; from the first feeble beginnings on to the consummation, there are manifold, unmistakable gradations: fluctuations, too, and relapses of a very dubious character. But above the appearance in single churches and periods, the eternal and glorious basis must not be misunderstood; here Paul gives an important example to the Ephesians. The Christian must confess in humble gratitude that he is ἅγιος, and in assiduous obedience feel and show himself to be πιστὸς ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ.

4. God, who has condescended and given Himself to us as a Father ("grace be unto you from God our Father") with His gifts ("peace"), stands together with Christ ("and the Lord Jesus Christ") toward us as Giver and Dispenser. It is the will of God, who has ordered all things ("by the will of God") to this end, constantly accomplishing His purpose actively through His creatures, inanimate as well as animate and personal, willing and unwilling, yes, resisting even. Accordingly the Lord sends His Apostles, remains together with the Father the constant source of all the benefits of salvation, aye, the element, the life-sphere for all the called and believing ones. Although it remains untouched here, in what relation the Lord Jesus stands to God the Father, it is still clear, that He needs no "grace" and "peace," but is, as the sending Lord and partaker of Divinity, highly exalted above us, and we are deep below Him, poor, wretched, without peace, needing Him, but yet the objects of His mercy, who should become partakers of God.

5. Grace and peace stand related to each other: in the former God condescends to man, in the latter man lifts himself to God. In grace, the Most High comes down into the depths of misery and sin; in peace, poor sinful man, taken up, reconciled, pacified, cleansed, draws nigh to his God and Father. Neither is complete at once, each has its development and history: grace, not merely forgiveness of sin, but deliverance, enlightening, sanctification, beatification, imparts ever more fully, penetrates ever deeper and wider, exalts ever more gloriously; peace, not merely rest, quiet, but union and harmony, strengthens more and more, grows and impels ever higher and more beautifully. This is indicated by the form of the benediction. The victory is decided; it will be followed up, improved, and that more completely—and all this by the ethical mode of faith, not an indefinite and general one, but the special definite faith in Christ Jesus, the living Mediator of all blessing and salvation.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Did God make out of Saul, the persecutor of the Church of Jesus Christ, Paul the Apostle of Jesus Christ, then rejoice in humility and think that the same God who has made of thee a Christian, a joyous child of God, will help others to the same privilege; if He succeeded in doing this in your case, is it not even more likely to succeed in that of others?—Do not forget that in dealing with the Apostle of Jesus Christ, thou dealest with the will and work of God.—Take heed in thine office and calling, that thou standest there by the will of God.—Paul, so wonderfully led, so marvellously overcome and so highly favored, sees through all the defects, weaknesses, sins of his churches, their glory, the glory of the people of God, and their life of faith, however weak. Now then, do not starchy thyself in thy precious office with proud ignoring of the worth of thy flock; rejoice in the worth of thy ministry, but at the same time in the church of thy Lord; do not depreciate the church of God because of human appearances or on account of individual members, however numerous, since thou dost claim respect for thy office despite thy sinful person. The dignity of the office and the calling is to be recognized, even if the person in office or called permits himself to become guilty of unworthiness.

What is specifically Christian is this, that thou, called and trained by the Father, inwardly deniest the natural Ego more and more entirely, for the sake of the one and unique person, Jesus Christ.—He who is never satisfied in his morality, but humbly strives and believes and hopes, is near to Christ and belongs to Christ. Christless morality, irreligious virtue, or, as it was more faithfully termed in the last century and still is in this, "godless" virtue, calling and thinking itself "free," has only the outward appearance, the garment, is really foolish pride. Thou canst be a broker or agent of morality, then thy part in it is usufructuary, but thou art no owner of it.—From the fact that thou art "holy," i. e., consecrated to God, accepted by Him the Holy One, follows thy faith, which appropriates and believes what is Divine and holy, more and more inwardly to the internal personality. It is therefore not correct to say: Holiness proceeds from faith in Christ; hence Paul calls them believers, too. Nor is holiness merely the goal of Christian striving; he who has God and Christ, the Holy One, has holiness also; it is not put before us as a goal, far or near, but we, as Christians, are in it, as in an element, a sphere, that it may become ours, be in us, increasing and strengthening itself in us.—The saint consecrated to God (ἅγιος) says, first in the consciousness and confession of his faith, however: I am God's! The believer (πίστες) says: God is mine! But that we are God's always comes first, then that God is ours.—How well has Paul complemented the salutation of the Old Testament: Peace be with you (Judges vi. 23; 1 Sam. xxv. 6, etc.), by adding or rather prefixing grace, which was not wanting in the Old Testament.

STARKE:—A minister of Christ, a teacher of the Gospel, must be installed by the will of God. Mirk this, ye runners, who run of yourselves.—Where grace is, there is peace also, even though it be not felt by a believer in his state of conflict.—Since grace and peace come from Christ as well as from God the Father, Christ must be very God as is the Father.

RIGGER:—A believer is already a saint.—My God! I am Thine; therefore am I holy. Uphold me in faith on Christ Jesus!—The chief possession of the saints and believers is grace and peace. This is from the very first the life of their heart; this distributes to them their daily nourishment and strength, and with this, too, they are equipped even unto the end of their course.

HEUBNER:—The call of God to the ministry gives the proper joy in office.—The Apostolic benediction contains all that is worth wishing for.—SCHENKEL:—Neither the consummation of salvation nor the beginning of faith is to be found outside of fellowship with Christ.—Grace is the ground of our faith, peace the hope of our life.

STIER:—He whom the Lord admits among His called saints, has an inextinguishable spark of faith, that may bring him among the elect and faithful. And if there were left of the church only a lodge in a garden of cucumbers, a cottage in a vineyard, a well-nigh devastated, straitly besieged city, and the rest were as Sodom and Gomorrah—if instead of the Ephesus of the days of Paul and John, there remains only the miserable village of Aja-suluk: yet shall the besieged city of God remain His preserved city, until He Himself destroys it, and we would not regard His sacred people as rejected either in their dispersion or in their blindness.—Grace and peace, it is just this which is wanting to those who are away from Christ and without God in the world, aliens from the commonwealth of Israel. Grace and peace, it is this which is ever more and more needful for those, who have obtained precious faith in the righteousness which our God and our Saviour Jesus Christ gives. In this double yet single word we have once more: what proceeds from God and what should be effected in us. The first ground of all holiness is the grace of the Eternal One, meeting and preventing us; the final goal of all fidelity in faith is complete peace or entire salvation.

[EADIE:—"In Christ Jesus." The faith of the Ephesian converts rested in Jesus, in calm and permanent repose. It was not a mere external dependence placed on Him, but it had convinced itself of His power and love, of His sympathy and merits; it not only knew the strength of His arm, it had also penetrated and felt the throbbing tenderness of His heart—it was therefore in Him.—"Grace."—As a wish expressed for the Ephesian church, it does not denote mercy in its general aspect, but that many-sided favor that comes in the form of hope to saints in despondency, of joy to them in sorrow, of patience to them in suffering, of victory to them under assault, and of final triumph to them in the hour of death.—"Peace."—A conscious possession of the Divine favor can alone create and sustain mental tranquility. To use an impressive figure of Scripture, the unsanctified heart resembles "the troubled sea," in constant uproar and agitation—dark, muddy and tempestuous; but the storm subsides, for a voice of power has cried, "Peace, be still," and there is "a great calm:" the lowering clouds are dispelled, and the azure sky smiles on its own reflection in the bosom of the quiet and glassy deep. The favor of God and the felt enjoyment of it, the Apostle wishes to the members of the Ephesian Church.—R.]

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

² Ver. 3.—[The aorist here ought certainly to be maintained in translation, as the allusion is to the past act of redemption. The idiom of our language frequently interferes with the regular application of the rule, but it is still no less certain that the English preterite is the nearest equivalent of the Greek aorist.] A slavish application of this rule has much marred the version of the Amer. Bible Union. This section presents a number of cases where the proper rendering of the Greek tense is a matter of some delicacy, though rarely of great difficulty.—R.]

³ Ver. 3.—[The singular should be retained, as in the Genevan, Bishops', and Rhemish versions. Alford and Ellicott (following the Syriac version) render: blessing of the Spirit, but this is a correct interpretation rather than a translation. With (E. V.) need not be changed to in, but the English reader should be reminded that the Greek preposition is ἐν.—R.]

⁴ Ver. 4.—[See Exeg. Notes.—R.]

⁵ Ver. 5.—[Unto adoption through Jesus Christ unto himself; the variations from the E. V. are all necessary: the adoption of children is pneumatic; δέσθαι should, as a rule, be rendered through, and εἰς unto. Himself is to be retained, because, although the reading is not αὐτῷ but αὐτῷ, the reference is to God, and this will not appear if the simple pronoun Him is substituted. Ellicott's rendering is peculiar: having foreordained us for adoption through Jesus Christ into Himself. He justifies the last proposition by the English idiom "adopt into."—R.]

¹¹ Ver. 11.—N. B. K. L. [all modern editors]: ἐκληρώθημεν. A. D. E. F. G.: ἐλατθήμεν. which is the easier reading. [Braune takes this verb to mean: made an inheritance, not obtain an inheritance, as in E. V.—R.]

¹² Ver. 12.—[For a justification of this translation now generally adopted, see Exeg. Notes.—R.]

¹⁴ Ver. 14.—δς according to N. D. E. K. is lectio difficilior over against δ. A. B. F. [The latter is the reading of the Rec., Lachmann, Rückert, Alford. The former is accepted by Tischendorf, Ellicott, Meyer, who remarks on the readiness with which the latter reading would arise, owing to the neuter πνεῦμα.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Summary.—It is clear that ver. 3 opens the section with thanksgiving and praise for the blessing of Redemption. But in this wonderful chain of clauses (vers. 4-14), so interwoven and intertwined, the divisions and groupings are not easily perceived, so that expositors hold very different opinions. But it is evident, that the three times repeated: "unto the praise of the glory of his grace" (ver. 6), "unto the praise of his glory" (ver. 12), "unto the praise of his glory" (ver. 14), form conclusions, receiving, it is true, in the flow of language in vers. 6 and 12, qualifications for amplification and transition. Accordingly we find in vers. 4-6, the first foundation for praise: the election of eternal mercy; in vers. 7-12, the second: the carrying out of the eternal decree; vers. 13, 14, the third: the personal appropriation of salvation. Our view is directed to the Father before all time, the Son in time, the Spirit in eternity. So STRICK, who, however, artificially divides each section again into three parts, according to ground, course and goal.

[ALFORD, who follows STRICK, gives this summary: "The preliminary idea of the Church, set forth in the form of an ascription of praise, vers. 3-14:—thus arranged: vers. 3-6, the Father, in His eternal love, has chosen us to holiness (ver. 4), ordained us to Sonship (ver. 5), bestowed grace on us in the Beloved; vers. 7-12, in the Son, we have—redemption according to the riches of His grace (ver. 7), knowledge of the mystery of His will (vers. 8, 9), inheritance under Him the one Head (vers. 10-12); vers. 13-14, through the Spirit we are sealed, by hearing the word of salvation (ver. 13), by receiving the earnest of our inheritance, to the redemption of the purchased possession (ver. 14).—Dr. HONGE is less satisfactory, see ver. 4 for his exhaustive analysis of vers. 4-6.—R.]

HARLESS: I. The objective act of God, a) in the eternal decree of the Redemption of believers, b) actualized through the death of His Son (1-7: παρπατωμάτων); II. The revelation of this act in the word (7-10); III. The subjective actualization of this act in the Redemption of individuals (11-14).—MEYER takes the salvation (ver. 3) as a) foreordained (vers. 4, 5), b) effected (vers. 6, 7), c) made known (vers. 8-10), d) actually appropriated (ver. 11), by Jews (ver. 12), as well as by those who had been heathen (vers. 13, 14).—Others otherwise, always with an overlooking of the incisiveness so readily perceived.—[Dr. LANGE, who suggests the frequent occurrence of liturgical forms in Paul's Epistles, finds in these verses the most striking example. See his liturgical reading, Romans, p. 26.—R.]

Ver. 3. General opening.

Blessed be [εὐλογητός].*—First of all, we must notice the play upon the words: εὐλογητός—εὐλογία. The words εὐλογεῖν and εὐλογία have a two-fold meaning, as in benedicere and benedictio, to bless and blessing, בָּרַךְ (barach) to praise, to laud and to endow, all to be traced back to one sense, to speak or promise good. So εὐλογεῖν, Luke i. 64 (ἔδλεν εὐλογῶν τὸν θεόν); comp. xxiv. 53 (αἰνοῦντες τὸν θεόν); Jas. iii. 9 (ἐν αὐτῇ εὐλογοῦμεν τὸν κύριον); εὐλογία, Rom. xvi. 18 (διὰ τῆς χρηστολογίας καὶ εὐλογίας), decora oratio, praise, Gal. iii. 8, 9, 14; Heb. vi. 7. The German word Segen, blessing, is derived from signum, sign, i. e., the sign of the cross in pronouncing the blessing; from this is derived segnen, to bless (see JUETTING, Bibl. Wörterbuch, p. 171 ff.), and this means not only to wish well (Ps. x. 8; Isa. lxxv. 16) in coming (1 Sam. xiii. 10) or in going (Acts xx. 1), but to praise, to thank (1 Cor. xiv. 16; x. 16) and also to assign or impart good or goods (Gen. xii. 2; xxvii. 34, 36). The meaning, to praise, to thank, does indeed become the prominent one, where it is applied to men with regard to God, since man has only words, can only εὐλογεῖν; as does that of allotting good or goods, where God's dealings towards men are in question, since with God there is no resting in words, His words are or become deeds. BENGE: Antanaclassis: aliter benedixit Deus nobis, aliter nos benedicimus illi. THEODORET: εἰδέναι προσήκει, ὡς εὐλογοῦντες μὲν οἱ ἄνθρωποι τὸν θεὸν λόγους αὐτῷ προσφέρουσι μόνους, ἔργῳ δὲ αὐτὸν ἐνεργεῖται οὐ δύναται, ὁ δὲ θεὸς εὐλογῶν βεβαίως τοῖς λόγοις τῷ ἔργῳ καὶ παντοδραπὴν παρέχει φῶραν ἀγαθῶν τοῖς εὐλογουμένοις. It is otherwise, when Jethro says of God: יהוה בָּרַךְ (Exod. xviii. 10), or Laban to Eliezer, (Gen. xxiv. 31): יהוה בָּרַךְ "thou blessed of the Lord" (comp. xxvi. 29; Matth. xxv. 34, where Jesus as Judge will say to His own: "Come, ye blessed of my Father:." Luke i. 28, where Mary is called κεχαριτωμένη, "highly favored," in the same sense). Both meanings appear here in our passage, where the Apostle praises and blesses God (εὐλογητός), who has blessed us (ὁ εὐλογησας ἐν εὐλογία).

The form here chosen should be noticed, εὐλογητός, which is always applied to God,* not εὐλογημένος, since for Him there is no time when He was not and will not hereafter be "blessed," so that God is κατ' ἐξοχὴν ὁ εὐλογητός (Mark xiv. 61). Nor is this—worthy of praise, to be praised, but like בָּרַךְ in a purely passive sense, as the promiscuous use of both forms requires. The position of the words also, at the beginning, shows that the emphasis rests upon it; in Rom. ix. 5 the Person is put first for the same reason. [So ELLICOTT.] On the sense of εὐλογητός it may be remarked, that Paul begins nearly all his Epistles with praise and thanksgiving to God, and that too with a reference to the churches and persons to which, the circumstances in which, and the purpose with which, he is writing; with εὐλογητός as here, only in 2 Cor. i. 3 (so 1 Pet. i. 3), usually with ἐνχαριστεῖν, Rom. i. 8; 1 Cor. i. 4; Phil. i. 3; Col. i. 3; 1 Thess. i. 2; 2 Thess. i. 3; Philem. 4, with χάρις ἔχειν, 2 Tim. i. 3. As the received "grace" is returned again in thanksgiving, so is the εὐλογία received from the Lord, in the εὐλογητός from the praising creature: God is saluted, never blessed, with His own blessing (STIER).

The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ—ὁ θεὸς καὶ πατὴρ τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ.—Exactly as in 2 Cor. i. 3; 1 Pet. i. 3. Comp. Rom. xv. 6; 2 Cor. xi. 31; Col. i. 3; Rev. i. 6. It is most natural, since the passage does not read: ὁ θεός, ὁ πατὴρ τοῦ κυρίου, to join the genitive τοῦ κυρίου, "of our Lord," with θεός, "God," as well as with πατὴρ, "Father" (JEROME, THEOPHYLACT, RUICK-ERT, STIER), as the genitive is not necessarily required as an explanatory addition to πατρί. It is found without any qualification, in ver. 20; 1 Cor. xv. 24: τῷ θεῷ καὶ πατρί; vi. 23; 2 Tim. i. 2; Gal. i. 1: θεοῦ πατρός; 1 Thess. i. 1: θεῷ πατρί. Besides in iii. 14 many MSS. read: τὸν πατέρα τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ (though R. A. B. C. omit the genitive), while the established reading in i. 17 is: ὁ θεὸς τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, so that the Apostle, as this very Epistle shows, could join this qualifying phrase to "God" as well as to "Father." On this account MEYER is incorrect, in applying the genitive to πατρί, and not to θεός, on the ground that the former idea alone demands such complementing, and not the latter; nor should he have laid so great weight upon the notion, that the expression: the God of Christ, as an isolated one, has not obtained that currency, which it must have done, had it been found in this "solemn formula" also, since Christ's word on the cross (Matth. xxvii. 46: θεέ μου, θεέ μου) and on the day of His resurrection (John xx. 17: ἀναβαίνας πρὸς τὸν πατέρα μου καὶ πατέρα ἡμῶν καὶ θεόν μου καὶ θεὸν ἡμῶν; comp. Rev. ii. 7; iii. 12) suffice to justify this expression and this connection in our "solemn formula." We find too in B. the reading ὁ θεὸς τοῦ κυρίου, κ. τ. λ. Nor can it be asserted, with HARLESS, that if the following genitive belonged to the first substantive also, the reading should necessarily be: ὁ θεὸς τε καὶ πατρί; MEYER refers very properly to 1 Pet. ii. 25. Καὶ binds what is homogeneous; τε adds something accessory (WINER, pp. 404, 408); καὶ conjuncti, τε ad-juncti, as HERMANN says.* To be God and to be Father are not ideas which exclude each other, nor do they appear as two, but as a unity; He is here praised, who is not only the God of the Incarnate One, but is also the Father of this Lord, of the Only Begotten, whom He has given; thus is indicated the God-man by whom the blessings of Redemption are mediated. It was not necessary for THEODORET to say: δηλὸν, ὡς ἡμῶν μὲν ἔστι θεός, τοῦ δὲ κυρίου ἡμῶν πατρί. Practically this generally Christian formula has taken the place of the Jewish: the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, even if it were not so intended by the Apostle or Apostles, as RUECKERT supposes.

* [The verb is usually omitted in this and similar forms of doxology. "Understand εἰν (Job i. 21; Ps. cxli. 2) or ἴστω (2 Chron. ix. 8)." So ALFORD, ELLICOTT. It is from this word that Dr. LANGE derives his view respecting Paul's use of liturgical forms; comp. Rom. ix. 5; and the O. T. passages cited above.—R.]

* [This is true in N. T. usage. In the LXX. it is almost universally left, though in Gen. xxvi. 29; Deut. vii. 14; 1 Sam. xv. 13; xxv. 33 as ELLICOTT remarks, εὐλογητός is applied to man. The distinction is sufficiently marked to justify Dr. BRACE's remark. See HARLESS in loco.—R.]

Who blessed us [ὁ εὐλόγησας ἡμᾶς].—The active, overagainst the passive (εὐλογητός) denotes efficient, active blessing, the aorist the historical fact in the existence and condition of the Church.† Hence "us" should be taken in its wider meaning and applied to Christians, and should not be limited to the Apostle (KOPPE), who afterwards (ver. 15: ἐγὼ) begins to speak of himself and his experiences, nor to the Jewish Christians, who are first thought of in ver. 11 (comp. ver. 13); so strong rather is the feeling of the fellowship under the blessing of God, that the Apostle, as the genuine Apostle to the Gentiles, includes with himself and the Apostles as his people, all men, who have become or will become Christians.

With all spiritual blessings, ἐν πάσῃ εὐλογίᾳ πνευματικῇ.—This denotes the sphere into which He in blessing has transferred them; He has so placed us in blessing, that we are surrounded, overflowed thereby, and ἐν πάσῃ εὐλογίᾳ. According to WINER (p. 105) this means every blessing; πάσα ἡ εὐλογία would be the whole blessing; see the instructive passage, Rom. iii. 19. There is no variety of blessing, which God has not bestowed upon us, but the entire fullness of the blessing, so that we have nothing more to receive, has not yet been conferred upon us. Comp. Rom. xv. 29: "in the fullness of the blessing of Christ."

The adjective "spiritual" limits the manifold variety to the domain of the spiritual, to what the Holy Spirit effects and imparts. It is recalled also in what follows respecting the adoption (ver. 5) the redemption and forgiveness of sins (ver. 7), the revelation (ver. 9) and thus is expounded the riches of that spiritual blessing, which we already possess, but which we ever need yet more. There is no manner of occasion for supposing an antithesis to the earthly blessings and promises of the Israelites (CHRYSTOSTOM, GROTIUS and others), or to their typical possessions and the vain ones of the heathen (SCHÜTTGEN); nor should "spiritual" be explained as qui ad animum pertinet (ERASMUS, ROSENUELLER); our spirit of itself still belongs to the σάρξ. [See Romans, p. 234 f.]* The Apostle is treating of the blessings promised in Joel iii. 1, which are no longer merely promised, since their fulfilment is expressed in "who hath blessed us."

In heavenly places, ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις.

1. Besides this passage the phrase is found in ver. 20; i. 6; iii. 10; vi. 12, and in all, even in the last named, with a local sense; in the domain of the heavenly; hence in accordance with the nature of the matter, it is not to be taken in any coarse, sensuous signification as measurable, limitable space, but as domain, region.

2. The word itself has in the preposition ἐπὶ a local reference, like ἐπιχειροῦ (1 Cor. xv. 40), but as this is to be distinguished from κατάγειος, καταχθόνιος (Phil. ii. 10), so is the former from ὑπερχθόνιος.

3. Τὰ ἐπουράνια at all events is not to be taken as οὐρανός, οἱ οὐρανοὶ or βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν, but designates more indefinitely, in general, what belongs to heaven in contrast with what

* [MEYER's view: "God who is also the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," would require, if a strict construction be insisted on: ὁ θεός, ὁ καὶ πατὴρ, as ALFORD intimates. ELIENOR admits that there are no grammatical or doctrinal objections to the view defended above, but prefers the other, mainly on the ground that the phrase "the God of Christ" is singular. HODGE and EADIE join the genitive to both nouns.—R.]

† [EADIE at first took this aorist as marking "a customary or repeated act," an interpretation he seems to have given up in his 2d edition, where, however, a trace of it is found in a footnote which has no corresponding number in his text. To take it as having the sense of the present, which HODGE seems to favor (though his view would require the perfect in Greek), is untenable. The aorist participle, retaining as usual its aoristic force, "refers to the counsels of the Father as graciously completed in the Redemption."—R.]

belongs to and is on earth, as appears from vi. 12, where the contest with the powers of darkness "in heavenly places" is spoken of in antithesis to the contest with flesh and blood.

4. The connection of the phrase ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις with ἐν εὐλογία πνευματικῇ is demanded by the fact that the latter is joined with εὐλόγησας and dependent on it, and hence the latter cannot belong to the verb as a closer qualification of the act of blessing. Accordingly this added phrase says, that every spiritual blessing, which we have received, springs from a higher world, is to be sought in a heavenly region and thence to be obtained. [ELLIOTT with his usual exactness presents the view here upheld and now generally received; he takes the phrase as "defining broadly and comprehensively the region and sphere where our true home is (Phil. iii. 20), where our hope is laid up (Col. i. 5), and whence the blessings of the Spirit, the ἡ δωρεὰ ἡ ἐπουράνιος (Heb. vi. 4) truly come." We may add from ALFORD: "Materially we are yet in the body; but in the Spirit, we are in heaven—only waiting for the redemption of the body to be entirely and literally there."—R.]

Accordingly it is incorrect:

a) To understand by τὰ ἐπουράνια bona not loca, with CHRYSOSTOM, THEODORET, LUTHER and many others; the idea of possessions is already found in εὐλογία (against RUECKERT, STIER). Nor is CALVIN right in saying: Non multum refert, subaudiis locis an bonis; tantum voluit indicare presentiam gratiæ, quæ per Christum nobis confertur, quia scilicet non in mundo, sed in cælo et vita æterna nos faciat bonos.

b) GROTIUS is in error, in referring it, to a place indeed, but to the cælum summum in contrast to the regio astrifera.

c) The rendering and explanation: in heaven (MEYER, RUECKERT, HARLESS, STIER, SCHENKEL and others), is not exact, passes beyond the word itself; still less is it admissible to refer it to the kingdom of heaven, the kingdom of heaven on earth, the church (ERNESTI, TELLER and others). [With more definiteness it is explained by HODGE: cælum gratiæ, the kingdom of grace here on earth, the heavenly state into which the believer is introduced; a view to which EADIE inclines.—R.]

d) To follow BEZA in joining the phrase to God, is as unjustifiable and inadmissible, as to accept with KORPE the aorist for the future, because the believers walk in heaven already in a certain sense (Phil. iii. 20, to which JEROME and BEZA refer), or quia non in mundo, sed in cælo et vita æterna nos faciat beatos (CALVIN), or quia hæc (dona) nos et spe et iure in cælis collocant (GROTIUS). The explanation of HOMBERG, that it is = εὐλογία πνευματικῇ καὶ ἐπουρανίῳ is altogether arbitrary and groundless.

In Christ, ἐν Χριστῷ, indicates the mediation of the blessing (Segnen) which consists in spiritual blessing (Segen). Comp. 2 Cor. v. 18 f. It is not propter Christum (MORUS, FLATT, MEYER: "in Him was contained the ground why God blessed us," which is after all equivalent to: for Christ's sake). SCHENKEL: "Outside of the fellowship with the Son there is no part in the spiritual blessing of the Father (Rom. viii. 9 f.)." It cannot be overlooked in this Epistle, that this phrase: ἐν Χριστῷ, is "the centre and heart beat of the Apostle's view." It is repeated in ver. 4, 6, 7, 10, 11, 12, 13 ff.; with the Apostle it stands in the same category as: in Adam, in Abraham. Herein (ἐν Χριστῷ) is to be found the difference between the Christian and Jewish Churches, the New Testament and Old Testament people of God. In the case of the former, the blessing was not wanting, nor the "spiritual," for the law is spiritual (Rom. vii. 14); even the "every" was not lacking, since God's Word was there, the forgiveness of sins, though in incipency, in types, in shadow (Heb. viii. 5: σκιὰ τῶν ἐπουρανίων, Col. ii. 17); nor yet is ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις, "heavenly places," altogether new, as though the New Testament first found place and voice there, first established itself there, while the Old Testament pointed only to the earthly Canaan (against STIER).

[ALFORD follows Stier, in accepting a reference to the Trinity in the threefold ἐν, but ELLIOTT's treatment of the phrases seems more exact: "Εὐλόγησας contains the predication of time (Donaldson, Gr. § 574 sq.), ἐν π. εὐλογία πνευμ. the predication of manner, more exactly defined by the local predication ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις, while ἐν Χριστῷ is that mystical predication which, as Stier well observes, 'is the very soul of this Epistle,' and involves all other conceptions in itself." This accords well with Braune's view, that it expresses the distinctively Christian character of the blessing here spoken of.—R.]

THE FIRST FOUNDATION OF THE PRAISE;
VERS. 4-6:

The Election of eternal mercy. [DR. HODGE thus analyzes these verses: "Of these (spiritual) gifts for which the Apostle blesses (God) the first in order and the source of all the others is election, ver. 4. This election is 1. Of individuals. 2. In Christ. 3. It is from eternity. 4. It is to holiness, and to the dignity of sons of God. 5. It is founded on the sovereign pleasure of God (vers. 4, 5). 6. Its final object is the glory of God, or the manifestation of His grace, ver. 6." This agrees with Braune's view, except that he substitutes "the church" for "individuals" under (1), viewing the church as an organism made up of individuals. See below and also Doctr. Note 3.—R.]

Ver. 4. EVEN as he chose us in him before the foundation of the world [καθὼς ἐξελέξατο ἡμᾶς ἐν αὐτῷ πρὸ καταβολῆς κόσμου].—Καθὼς marks a relation, indicating a conformity of two facts, which correspond to one another: the εὐλογεῖν has taken place in conformity with the ἐκλεγέσθαι: He has blessed entirely as He has decreed in the choosing, the election. So MEYER also. That analogy is in question, according to which from the fact of the blessing a conclusion may be drawn with respect to the election. It is not merely indicated that there is an internal connection between the election and the blessing, but it is definitely stated that this carrying out corresponds to the eternal decree of God. BENIGL: electio respondet, et eam subsequitur, benedictio, et patefacit. Hence καθὼς is not used here as a designation of causality (MORUS, RUECKERT) [HODGE: because], as it is in other passages (WINER, p. 417: [quoniam] quippe, siquidem); HARLESS takes it as an argumentative particle (=inasmuch) and says that it is related to καθότι, the latter however designating the causa, the former the modus (Rom. i. 28; 1 Cor. i. 6). [MEYER takes it as argumentative; ALFORD and ELLICOTT as explaining and expanding the foregoing, the latter admitting its causal force at times; EADIE is most exact: "These spiritual blessings are conferred on us, not merely because God chose us, but they are given in perfect harmony with His eternal purpose." However true it may be that "election is the cause or source of all subsequent benefits" (HODGE), it is hardly safe to found such a statement on the particle καθώς.—R.]

Ἐξελεῖσά τ ο = He chose us out for Himself; * Paul uses it only three times elsewhere (all in 1 Cor. i. 27, 28). The verb ἐκλέγεσθαι corresponds entirely to the Hebrew בָּחַר, as ἐκλεκτός = בָּחֵר. In the middle form it designates, both in the Old and New Testaments, an act of God, "by virtue of which some rather than others especially belong to God" (HARLESS). Although HOFMANN (Schriftbeweis I. p. 223 ff.) will only admit, that in this word respect is had to that on account of which one is chosen, or respect to him who on that account is chosen or accepted, and that the stress is laid each time upon that which the chosen one thus becomes, and not upon the antithesis to those who do not become this, yet he perceives in the preposition a preference, even if only a preference above a mass to which he would otherwise belong. He refers to οἱ ἐκλεκτοὶ ἄγγελοι (1 Tim. v. 21), ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ θεοῦ ὁ ἐκλεκτός (Luke ix. 35), ὁ Χριστὸς τοῦ θεοῦ ὁ ἐκλεκτός (Luke xxiii. 35), remarking, that the angels are thus designated as taken by God into His service, and that Christ is not elected out of the sum of humanity, to become what the rest should not become, but chosen to be, what the rest are not. Ἐκλέγεσθαι, does then still mark a preference, a distinction from others, who are not what the chosen are, even if not an opposition to these, who do not become this.† Respecting the others, in preference to whom the elect belong to God, nothing is indicated here,—whether they are not chosen after all, or no longer do or can belong to the elect; just as it is not said concerning the elect, that they cannot fall away from such a relation to God. Since in 1 Pet. i. 1, the church is termed "elect" and in the conclusion (v. 13) "the Church at Babylon elected together with you," and "elect of God" (Col. iii. 12), "for the elect's sakes" (2 Tim. ii. 10), "God's elect" (Rom. viii. 33), etc., are applied to individual Christians, because and in so far as they are members of the Church of Christ, it may be concluded, that the act of election does not concern individuals as its immediate objects, as HOFMANN thinks. It is true that the κόσμος, out of which they are chosen (Jno. xv. 19), is not a sum of individuals, a multitude; it is rather an ethical conception. Still less is the Church a plurality, a colluvies, it is an organism, a whole. Yet God does have regard to the individuals, with Him the individual, the member, is not lost in the whole. Accordingly the explanation of HARLESS is to be sustained, only it must be remembered, that the individuals are not to be thought of as without connection, severed, by themselves alone, or the others as those who may not and shall not belong to God. HOFMANN's opposition is right only against this unjustifiable interpolation. It is evident that Paul could apply the word "chosen" only to himself and the members of the Church, because only in the case of these was this fact cognizable, and must be, or at least could be, perceptible to individuals. Hence we should here, with FRANK (Theologie der Form. Con. iv. p. 177), think of the world merely, out of which Christians are taken by virtue of their effectual calling, as in 1 Pet. i. 1; Jus. ii. 5; 1 Cor. i. 27 f., not however of the totality of those called, from whom the elect, as more numerous (Matt. xx. 16; xxii. 14), are to be distinguished. See further in Doctr. Note 3. Inadmissible, therefore, is the explanation: præcipuo in nos amore Deus fuit, because ἐκλέγεσθαι is also=imprimis amare vel imprimis beneficiis ornare (MORUS). Comp. 2 Thess. ii. 13. It is very erroneous to suppose (RUECKERT), that Paul transferred the faith of his nation, respecting the preference of their race to all the nations of the earth, to those who accepted Christianity with joy, and regarded these as the number chosen by God.

The position of the verb emphasizes this electing act of God as the main thing. It is then further defined.

First, there is added a designation of the objects, ἡ μ ᾱς, US. By this is meant the Church of Christ, the congregatio sanctorum, the "saints," who at the time make up the people of God, in whom the election, consummated in the calling, is perceptible and manifest. About the conduct of individuals, their faith, its degree or perfection, nothing is said, just as little as was expressed or indicated in ἀγιος (ver. 1). Accordingly the reference is not to individuals in themselves, to the sum of individuals at that time, but to the Church and its growth externally and internally, yet in such a way that each individual may refer it to himself.* RICHTER, therefore, correctly remarks: "God chooses for Himself, out of all, before others and for others." But it

* [ALFORD prefers to render the verb: selected, as best indicating the middle sense, and the choosing out of the world. See ELLICOTT in loco on this word.—R.]

† [EADIE also discusses HOFMANN's view, which is simply this, that the election is only a choosing for and unto something, not a choosing out of. MEYER says most emphatically regarding HOFMANN's position: "This is impossible from the notion of the word. A reference to others, to whom the chosen ones would still have belonged without the ἐκλογή, the verb ἐκλέγεσθαι always has, and as a logical necessity must have it." How true this is, will appear from the unsatisfactory and confusing character of all attempts to explain away this reference.—R.]

* [EBERARD (Christliche Dogmatik, § 560) denies the individual reference in the verb ἐκλέγει. but, as EADIE well remarks: "The choice of a multitude is simply the choice of each individual composing it. That multitude may be regarded as a unity by God, but to Him it is a unity of definite elements or members. On the Divine side the elect, whatever their number, are a unity, and are so described—πάν ὃ δέωκε μοι, John vi. 39; πάν ὃ δέωκας αὐτῷ, John xvii. 2.—a totality viewed by Omniscience as one; but on the human side, the elect are the whole company of believers, but thus individualized—πάν ὃ θεοῦ τὸν νῦν καὶ πιστεύον, John vi. 40." Paul says so distinctly that God chose us out, as to put men at their wits' end to make Him say anything else.—R.] is also correct to say: Sic nos quoque in Christo eramus, priusquam mundus fieret, vigora scilicet electionis æternæ (MUSCULUS).

Second qualification: definition of modality, in Him, ἐν αὐτῷ, viz., Christ. By this our election is more closely defined and limited: Christ the Person, in whom we are chosen, the life-sphere, the life-element, in which we are the objects of the Divine election. HARLESS may be correct, in saying that it is first stated in what follows, how He has chosen us in Him, but he is incorrect in rejecting all closer definitions of expositors here as interpolated, even if they correspond with what follows. BEZA (in ipso videlicet adoptandos) is very near the true explanation, but his view is more limited than the subsequent context authorizes. Our union, our external and internal connection, with Christ is marked as the modality of our election. But the act of choice is asserted as a fact: in Him He has chosen us, so that as humanity was made in Adam, as the people of Israel was separated in Abraham, so the Church was chosen in Christ; not, however, that He has merely determined to choose us. Accordingly it is entirely improper to read ἐν αὐτῷ (Alex., MORUS, HOLZHAUSEN), nor is it = εἰς Χριστὸν (Ethiop. Vers.), or = δι' αὐτοῦ, τούτῳ διὰ τῆς εἰς αὐτὸν πίστεως (THEOPHYLACT and others), or per Christum et Christi merita prævisa (A-LAPIDE, BULLINGER), or propter Christum (GLASSIUS, FLATT). Finally, it is arbitrary and incorrect to join ἐν αὐτῷ with ἡμᾶς, since ὄντας is wanting and εἶναι ἡμᾶς ἁγίους follows.

[OLSHAUSEN, ELLICOTT: "In Christ, as the head and representative of spiritual, as Adam was the representative of natural humanity." "In the proper and final sense this can be said only of His faithful ones, His Church, who are incorporated in Him by the Spirit. But in any sense, all God's election is in Him only" (ALFORD). HODGE: "In Christ, i. e., as united to Him in the covenant of redemption;" on the ground of the federal union which precedes the actual union. So EADIE. MEYER is less exact: "The divine act of our election has in Christ its determining ground." "Outside this connection of the divine decree of election with Christ we would not be chosen; but in Christ there lay for God the causa meritoria of our election." This is really equivalent to propter Christum.—R.]

Third qualification: a temporal definition, before the foundation of the world, πρὸ καταβολῆς κόσμου. Used by Paul only here, but found in John xvii. 24; 1 Pet. i. 20. In Matt. xxv. 34; Luke xi. 50; Heb. iii. 4: ἀπὸ καταβολῆς κόσμου; Matt. xiii. 35: ἀπὸ καταβολῆς. The preposition πρὸ denotes that the election took place before the creation, and, since καταβολή designates the foundation, the groundwork, before the beginning of the carrying out of the well-ordered plan of creation. Thus the reference to the eternity preceding time is made very strong,* stronger than in πρὸ τῶν αἰώνων (1 Cor. ii. 7; comp. 2 Tim. i. 9; Rom. xvi. 25; Col. i. 26; Eph. iii. 9, 11). The election precedes the creation: the fulfilment of the former is justified in creation and its history, in the history of the world. HARLESS: "The plainest parallel is 2 Tim. i. 9: 'who hath saved us, and called us with an holy calling, not according to our works, but according to His own purpose and grace, which was given us in Christ Jesus before the world began.'" OLSHAUSEN (with STIER also) properly rejects the idea of a real, individual existence of believers before the creation in the Divine mind, but Christ's existence with the Father before the creation of the world is unmistakably indicated (STIER). BENGL: Hæc præsupponunt æternitatem filii Dei, namque filius, ante mundum factum erat objectum amoris paterni non futurum tantummodo, sed jam tum præsens, John xvii. 5, 24. [ALFORD (after STIER): "How utterly irreconcilable pantheism is with this, God's election before laying the foundation of the world, of His people in His Son."—R.]

That we should be holy and without blame before him [εἶναι ἡμᾶς ἁγίους καὶ ἄμώμους κατενώπιον αὐτοῦ].—The infinitive εἶναι ἡμᾶς adds a supplement to the previous clause, to the phrase ἡμᾶς ἐν αὐτῷ in particular, and is to be taken as epexegetical (WINER, p. 298), giving prominence to the end, purpose and result of the election. The position of εἶναι marks the existence, the actualized reality aimed at in the pretemporal, eternal choice. Chap. iii. 4, 6 (ἐν τῷ μυστηρίῳ τοῦ Χριστοῦ—εἶναι τὰ ἱθὺς, κ. τ. λ.) is similar.

Whether we are to understand the then present realization, just begun, or the consummation, begun in the church militant, or the completed reality in the church triumphant, cannot be determined from the adjectives "holy and without blame," but must be found in the phrase κατενώπιον αὐτοῦ, "before Him." It is not necessary to write αὐτοῦ, with HARLESS, STIER and others. BENGL has remarked (App. ad Matt. i. 21), and TISCHENDORF [Præf. N. T., p. 58 f. ed. 7], corroborates it, that before αὐτοῦ αὐτοῦ, αὐτὸν we constantly find ἀπ', ἐπ', μετ', ἐπ', κατ', never ἄφ', ἰφ', μεθ', ἐφ', καθ', so that in the New Testament the reflexive form αὐτοῦ is never used, but in its stead ἑαυτοῦ. Thus too it happens that αὐτός is referred in quick succession to different subjects, as Mark viii. 22; ix. 27-29 (WINER, pp. 141, 143*). From the Apostle's point of view αὐτοῦ is quite correct, and to be understood of God, even though ἐν αὐτῷ refers to Christ: To the phrase κατενώπιον αὐτοῦ corresponds the Hebrew לְפָנַי יְהוָה, coram Deo. According to this we must accept a reference to the present life, and not to the Judgment. The context at all events gives no support for the reference to the Judgment, which He will hold at the end of days. The parallel passage, Col. i. 22: "to present holy and unblameable and unprovable in His sight," as well as the "now" (ver. 21), and "if at least ye continue" (ver. 23) refer definitely to the present state.* This is confirmed by a comparison with Jude 24: "to present you faultless before the presence of His glory with exceeding joy." We must evidently apply this to the Judgment before God in eternity, but the expression is modified in accordance with this meaning. Hence STIER is mistaken in regarding our passage as applicable "to the last flaming glance of the holy Judge, who can and will be the perfectly righteous and eternal beatifying God alone (Heb. xii. 23)." SCHENKEL too is not satisfied with the reminder that He is the knower of hearts, but refers to His great Judgment day.

* [The question respecting the use of αὐτοῦ is discussed on this page of WINER'S Grammar. The sweeping assertion that it is never used, is not accepted by WINER. It appears, however, that under the influence of GRIESBACH, this pointing became too frequent, the tendency now being against it. ELLICOTT says: "The distinction, however, between the proper use of these two forms cannot be rigorously defused."—R.]

[MEYER renders this phrase: judice Deo, in connection with his view of the forensic reference of the adjectives "holy and without blame." But the reference to sanctification is to be preferred, and hence if "before Him" does not refer to the last Judgment, it must mean: vere, sincere (BEZA, ELLICOTT; so EADIE). ALFORD: "In the deepest virtue of our being, thoroughly penetrated by the Spirit of holiness, bearing His searching eye; but at the same time implying an especial nearness to His presence and dearness to Him—and bearing a foretaste of the time when the elect shall be ἐνώπιον τοῦ Θεοῦ, Rev. vii. 15."—R.]

With our view then "holy and unblamable" cannot of course mean the complete holiness, which is the original end of the first choosing, as its attained goal before the throne of God, as STIER thinks, or humanity cleansed from all the defilements of sin, which, according to SCHENKEL, is the end of the Divine election. ἅγιος, holy, can scarcely be taken in any other sense than that of ver. 1, designating one consecrated to God. The distinction between its meaning here and ver. 1 is to be found in the qualifications: εἶναι—κατενώπιον αὐτοῦ. This state of consecration is therefore a reality, not merely a being "called," a "name" (although even this latter is not a mere sound, a non-entity), a reality too before God, and not merely before men. Accordingly ἅγιος here must in some way mark the internal effects upon the subject, connected with this state of consecration; so that ἄμωμος is very naturally added.

* ἄμωμος corresponds to the Hebrew מְרִירָה, unblemished, and is to be rendered neither irreprehensus (MORUS) nor irreprehensibilis (2 Pet. iii. 14; Phil. ii. 15, where the form is ἀμώματος), even though this is the original meaning (PASSOW sub voce). It is applied strictly to the sacrificial animal (1 Pet. i. 19) which is also consecrated to God.† The two words are joined together elsewhere (v. 27; Col. i. 22); in the first passage they are used of the church ("not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing"), in the latter, which is parallel to our verse, καὶ ἀνεγκλήτως is added. Hence we are reminded of Rom. viii. 33: "Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect? It is God that justifieth," and have to do with those who are transferred εἰς νιοθεσίαν (ver. 5), who are partakers of "redemption," "the forgiveness of sins" (ver. 7), among whom all this is inward, living truth, the vital beginning of a glorious conclusion, so that advance is ever made toward holiness (1 Pet. i. 15, 16), and the saying in the Apocalypse (xxii. 11) is verified: "he that is holy, let him be holy still," which indeed finds a further verification in eternity. Thus both a condition, a subjective state, and more especially a position, which is to be and has been occupied, a station into which they have come and live, are meant, and not merely a judgment. The words of KOPPE, which HARLESS recalls, are apt: non tum ad virtutis studium, quam potius ad dignitatem Christianorum, qua tanquam homines innocentes sibi que curos Deus eos tractat, est referendum, idem quod alias in cpp. Pauli est δικαιοσύνη παρὰ θεῷ. Accordingly ἅγιος without further qualification does not refer to inward, actual sanctification (STIER). Such limitations as: nisi confecto nostro stadio (CALOV.), quantum quidem hujus in mortali vita per Dei ipsius gratiam et carnis nostræ infirmitatem fieri potest (CALIXTUS), are as inadmissible as the explanation of BAUMGARTEN-CRUSIUS, that the final end of the matter of Christianity is found in moral worth, or RUECKERT's opinion, that it was the Apostle's peculiarity, to idealize everything.

[Modern English commentators accept the distinction of MEYER respecting these two words: the first presents the positive, the second the negative side; but there is an unusual agreement among them against the reference to justification, which BRAUNE, MEYER, OLSHAUSEN, HARLESS, KOPPE and others favor. CHRYSOSTOM, THEOPHYLACT, CALVIN, STIER, HODGE, EADIE, ELLICOTT, ALFORD and others, apply the adjectives to sanctification. And with good reason: For an ultimate result is here spoken of, and Paul who had stamped the technical sense on so many Greek words before this Epistle was written, would have made the other meaning plain by using such words here. Dr. HODGE deduces very properly these statements: "If men are chosen to be holy, they cannot be chosen because they are holy." "Holiness is the only evidence of election."—R.]

In love, ἐν ἀγάπῃ.—Of course, His, God's love. This phrase, at the close of ver. 4, must be connected grammatically with the following participle, thus standing in emphatic position. The Greek is much freer in the position of words than the German; where the latter must help out the meaning with particles, the former requires only change of position; still it never goes beyond bounds in this respect. It cannot be connected with "chose" (OECUMEN., THOMAS, FLACIUS, BAUMGARTEN, FLATT, and others), since it stands entirely too far and too decidedly removed from that verb: and must be regarded as "trailing after it." Nor yet is the connection with "holy and blameless" (AMBROSIASTER, ERASMUS, LUTHER, CALVIN, BEZA, GROTIUS [evangelii, τὸ πᾶν is in love], WOLF, RUECKERT [dubiously], MORUS, MATTHIES, HEUBNER [E.V., ALFORD, HODGE], admissible; although ἄμωμος ἐν ἀγαλλύσει (Jude 24) and ἀμώματος ἐν εἰρήνῃ (2 Pet. iii. 14) occur, yet it is in such close union as to form one idea; the phrase could be separated from its adjective by "before Him," only in case the latter were adopted to be included with the adjective as one idea, which was to be qualified; but Paul uses ἀγιος καὶ ἀμωμος without any qualification (ver. 27; Col. i. 22), and the proper exposition excludes this connection, which has mainly subserved the Romanist and Rationalistic view. Accordingly most (from the Peshito to TISCHENDORF) have upheld the connection with προορίσας as the only admissible one.

* [Dr. BRAUNE seems to refer Col. i. 22 to the future Judgment, in his notes on that passage.—R.]

† [As there is here no sacrificial allusion, direct or indirect (comp. chap. v. 27), it seems best to retain the simple etymological meaning: inculpatus"] (ELLICOTT).—R.]

[The connection with the adjectives favors the reference to sanctification in those words, giving this sense: we are chosen to be placed "in a state of moral excellence which consists in love" (HODGE). But this author is as little justified in saying that the reference to sacrificial purification occasioned the connection with the following participle, as BRAUNE is, in affirming that the connection with the adjectives has mainly subserved the Romanist and Rationalistic view. Neither of these statements affect the question. ALFORD has an able defence of the ordinary connection. Besides arguing that throughout this long sentence the verbs and particle precede their qualifying clauses, since the verbs are emphatic, giving prominence to God's act, not His attribute, he holds that this qualification is highly appropriate: "ἀγάπη, that which man lost at the Fall, but which God is, and to which God restores man by redemption, is the great element in which, as their abode and breathing place, all Christian graces subsist, and in which, emphatically, all perfection before God must be found." All which is true, but not sufficient to overcome the grammatical objections to this view. Dr. HODGE says that "predestinated" has a subsequent qualification, hence it would be tautological to join "in love," to it, but as ELLICOTT intimates, the two qualifying phrases point to two different attributes; one to the loving mercy, the other to the sovereign power of God. The view of BRAUNE is, that of the Peshito, CHRYSOSTOM, THEODORET, THEOPHYLACT, AUGUSTINE, JEROME, BENGE, KOPPE, STORR, HARLESS, DE WETTE, OLSHAUSEN, HOLZHAUSEN, STIER, TURNER, EADIE, ELLICOTT, MEYER, BLEEK; also GRIESBACH, SCHOLZ, LACHMANN, TISCHENDORF. The list might be enlarged, but is long enough to sustain the last remark of BRAUNE against HODGE's assertion that "the majority of commentators adopt the construction followed by our translators."—R.]

Ver. 5. In love having predestinated us [προορίσας ἡμᾶς].—Προορίζεν, to determine beforehand; πρὸ points out, that the determination existed before the thing or person to be destined, and is to be more closely defined only by the context: "before the foundation of the world" (HARLESS, STIER, MEYER, and others), hence beforehand, not before others (BAUMGARTEN). The participle is associated with ἐξελέξατο: ἐξελέξατο τῷ προορίσαι, or καὶ προορίσει. Thus the Greek expresses it, not indicating a chronological sequence; the temporal relation is not touched upon. The aorist indeed denotes the concluded action without reference to the past or present; the matter spoken of is before time. Similarly vers. 8, 11, 13, 20. The participle denotes, therefore, not priority of fact, but only the attendant manner (HARLESS). HOMBERG is incorrect: postquam nos prædestinavit adoptandos, elegit etiam nos, ut simus sancti. In that case we should have found at all events, πρότερον προορίσας. When the Apostle says (Rom. viii. 30): "whom he did predestinate, them he also called," without mentioning the election, we must find the latter included in the first ante-temporal act, not in the other act of accomplishment, taking place in time. Nor can it be inferred from Rom. viii. 29: "whom he did foreknow, he also did predestinate," that the predestination was preceded temporarily by a particular act, that of foreknowing, quite as little as the two notions are to be confounded.

[As regards the relation of priority, ALFORD and STIER, take the "election" as antecedent to the "predestination," the former regarding the ἐξελέξατο in this passage as ranking with the προέγνω in Rom. viii. 29. On the other hand HODGE implies just the reverse, that the election is based on the preceding predestination. ELLICOTT too regards the participle "as temporal, not modal, and its action as prior to, not synonymous with, that of ἐξελέξατο." He takes it as=quum prædestinavit, "after He had," &c., but MEYER says that "predestinatio is never elsewhere distinguished from electio, as antecedent to it." EADIE too takes the participle as synchronous with the verb, which is safest where there is no grammatical necessity for insisting on the temporal qualification (see, however, WINER, p. 321). It is not well to dogmatize about the order in the Divine mind, especially on so slender a basis as that afforded by the Greek aorist participle.—R.]

The phrase "in love," coming first, marks with special emphasis the motive of the predestination. In hac epistola regnat τὸ ἀμο, amor, amatus; ipsi principio epistolæ congruit (BENGE). This precedence is like iii. 18: ἐν ἀγάπῃ ἡ ἀρεζωμένοι. What is thus demanded by the thought, and confirmed by the form of language, is certainly not contradicted, as will appear, by what follows: κατὰ τὴν εὐδοκίαν—εἰς ἑταίρον δόξης τῆς χάριτος, which is not added tautologically, as some (MATTHIES and others) suppose.

"ἡμεῖς, "us," is the object, as in ver. 4; but it must be noticed, that we have here, not ἐκκλησία or some such collective notion, but ἡμεῖς. Hence it cannot be said with SCHENKEL: "The predestination applies to the whole of the Divine decree of salvation, the election to the individual persons in whom it is accomplished." So much only is correct, that the thought does not respect individuals as such, a colluvies, a multitudo, but the church and its members, or the individuals as members of an organism, but in the predestination, just as in the election (ver. 4). Comp. Rom. viii. 29 f. [EADIE makes a far better distinction between προορίσας and ἐξελέξατο: "The end pre-appointed—πρὸ, is implied in the one; the mass out of which the choice is made—ἐκ, is glanced at by the other." So ELLICOTT.—R.]

Unto adoption, εἰς υἰοθεσίαν. This designates, in distinction from τεκνογονία (1 Tim. ii. 15), adoption (υἱὸς θεῶν, υἱὸν θεῶν ποιεῖσθαι); we are not children by nature, like Christ, but only by grace. Adoption is a rich conception, not at all a simple matter, and its actualization has a very significant history; it did not come to maturity at once, but has a development from primary stages, preceded by grand preparatory stages, unto its completion in eternity. To the Old Testament Israel belonged the adoption (Rom. ix. 4, to which are added the glory, the covenants, the giving of the law, the service of the sanctuary, the promises); even the Christians are "waiting for the adoption, the redemption of the body" (Rom. viii. 23). An explanatory parallel to our verse is found in Rom. viii. 29: "He also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the first-born among many brethren;" ver. 30 ("he also glorified") however points yet deeper, so that we must recall the bold words of Peter (2 Pct. i. 4): "that by these ye might be partakers of the divine nature," as well as those of Paul (Rom. viii. 17): "If children, then heirs; heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ." Comp. Gal. iv. 5-7; 1 Thes. ii. 12; 2 Thes. ii. 14; 1 Jno. iii. 2. Hence it is not a formula solemnis ad Christianam religionem adducere (KOPPE), nor to be referred in general and indefinitely to the benefits, which distinguish Christians from other men (FLATT), nor yet futura beatitate ornari, adeo amari Deumque redamare (MORUS), nor can it be said: viobecia venie peccatorum morte Christi parte certa spe verissime constat (TITTMANN).

[HODGE: Sonship in reference to God includes,—1. Participation of His nature or conformity to His image. 2. The enjoyment of His favor, or being the special objects of His love. 3. Heirship, or a participation of the glory and blessedness of God. Sometimes one and sometimes another of these ideas is the most prominent. In the present case it is the second and third." MEYER has a good note in loco on viobecia.—R.]

Through Jesus Christ unto himself, διὰ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ εἰς αὐτόν.—Against the reading αὐτόν, see the close of ver. 4. Διὰ with the genitive retains the meaning per, through, marking the mediator, cannot therefore be: propter (MOLDENHAUER). Comp. John xiv. 6. The person of the Lord must be regarded as that of the mediator. Even though we find in Gal. iii. 26: τιοὶ διὰ τῆς πίστεως, there the subjective mediation which proceeds from the Object of faith, the mediator, is marked, here the objective, to which the former will not be wanting. We take αὐτόν as referring to God; should Jesus Christ be meant, the reading must be, καὶ εἰς αὐτόν. Hence the explanation is incorrect: in conformitatem ejus (Christi) per fidem et bonos mores (ANSELM and others). But the preposition εἰς must retain the sense unto or into Him, as is required by those passages cited in the last paragraph, which indicate the final end of the viobecia. Hence it is not so much an "explanatory addition" (HARLESS), as an adjoined supplement (STIER). The explanation: ad gloriam gratiae sue (PISCATOR, MORUS), is in any case insufficient. It is impossible to take εἰς αὐτόν as= the Hebrew לְךָ, sibi (GROTIVS, WOLF, KOPPE following the paraphrase of BUCER: Qui prædestinavit pridem nos, ut in filios sibi per Jesum Christum—adoptaret). PASSAVANT weakens it into: up to God. Nor is it—ἐν ταύτῃ (CALVIN, BEZA, CALIXTUS); and just as little a circumlocution for the genitive αὐτοῦ, qualifying viobecia (RUECKERT). MEYER is excellent: "How rich and entirely Grecian Paul is precisely in his prepositional expressions, by which he never represents a mere relation of case."

[Among the various opinions respecting εἰς αὐτόν, and the shadings of signification attached to it, the view of ELLICOTT seems most satisfactory: "In these deeper theological passages the preposition seems to bear its primary (εἰς=εἰς Donaldson, Cratylus, § 170) and most comprehensive sense of 'to and into' (see Rost u. Palm. Lex. s. v.); the idea of approach (τὴν εἰς αὐτόν ἀνάγονσαν, Theophylact) being also blended with and heightened by that of inward union; comp. notes on Gal. iii. 27. We may thus paraphrase, 'God predestinated us to be adopted as His sons; and that adoption came to us through Christ, and was to lead us into, and unite us to God.'—R.]

According to the good pleasure of his will, κατὰ τὴν εὐδοκίαν τοῦ θελήματος αὐτοῦ.—Eudokia can indeed mean good will, as in Luke ii. 14; Phil. i. 15; ii. 13; 2 Thess. i. 11, or wish, arbitrium, or Matt. xi. 26; Luke x. 21. Here however it is equivalent to βουλὴ, ver. 11: κατὰ τὴν βουλὴν τοῦ θελήματος, and the sense is that what was ordained in love, He ordained according to (κατὰ) the determination of His will. As ἐν ἀγάπῃ (ver. 4) denotes the principle of the ordaining, εὐδοκία here cannot mean "good will." It is the substantive answering to δοκεῖν (frequentative from δέχσθαι, Ion., δέκεσθαι), to seem good, as Acts xv. 22, 25, 28=beneplacitum, and is distinguished from βουλὴ, the inclinational* act of willing (while ἐθέλειν designates the ethical act), only in this, that it refers more to deliberation, choice. Comp. TITTMANN, Syn. I. p. 124 ff. Hence the interpretations of THEODORET (ἡ ἐπ' ἐνεργείᾳ βούλησις), STIDAS (from Theodoret ad Ps. v. 12; τὸ ἀγαθὸν θέλημα), BEZA (benevolentia), LUTHER, MORUS (pro benevolæ suo consilio), HARLESS, (according to the kindness of His will), OLSHAUSEN, HEUBNER [EADIE, not MEYER as the German indicates,—R.] and others, are incorrect.

[The two meanings of eudokia here under discussion are: 1. beneplacitum, mere good pleasure; 2. benevolentia. Undoubtedly in this case God's good pleasure was also His benevolentia, but to which does the Apostle here refer? The usage of the LXX. favors the latter meaning, but in the New Testament both occur. The context must decide. It favors meaning (1.), for (a) the idea of benevolence in the highest degree was already introduced as a qualification in ἐν ἀγάπῃ, admitting that the phrase is to be joined with this verse. (b) The phrases occurring afterwards in vers. 9, 11 point to this meaning, especially βουλὴν τοῦ θελήματος αὐτοῦ (ver. 11). (c) The reference being to the actor exclusively and not to the objects of the action, this meaning brings them less into view (ELLICOTT, after DR WETTE). The proper safe-guard against the notion of bare arbitrary decree is found in ἐν ἀγάπῃ. So substantially but with an occasional tendency to press the sense too far, GROTIUS, ERASMUS, CALVIN, BENDEL, FLATT, RUECKERT, DE WETTE, MEYER ("the free self-termination independent of all human desert is here meant"), BLEEK, HODGE, ALFORD, ELLICOTT. Nor does this view make the ground for thanksgiving the less, as EADIE implies.—We accept θέλημα here in the simple sense of "will," reserving the discussion of its precise meaning for a subsequent page.—R.] The explanation of CHRYSOSTOM (τὸ σφοδρὸν θέλημα, τὸ μετὰ ἐπιθυμίας θέλημα) is to be rejected.

Ver. 6. Unto the praise of the glory of his grace, εἰς ἐπαινον δόξης τῆς χάριτος αὐτοῦ.—Εἰς ἐπαινον points to the νοῖοι θεοῖ, who now praise, as those who have been blessed by the sonship and heirship, and renders prominent, that God's ultimate aim is the blessedness of His creatures, of His Own. For εἰς ἐπαινον is to be taken in connection with προσρίσας εἰς νιοθεσίαν—εἰς αὐτὸν as forming the conclusion; it reaches unto the praise from him who has been pardoned. The object of the praise is "the glory," but not glory in itself, or God's glory, but "of his grace" (αὐτοῦ not αὐτοῦ, see on ver. 4). Χάρις is ἀγάπη, the latter is however more general, the former more special, marking love, which condescends, like the German Gnade (see on ver. 2), or which acts upon χαίρειν, χαρὰ, making or being χαρίεις (lovely). This then is, principally, the object of the praise, which lauds indeed the glory of the grace. This glory is the object of the praise, vers. 12, 14, where we find: εἰς ἐπαινον τῆς δόξης αὐτοῦ. It is remarkable that the article is omitted here before δόξης; but δόξα is not the main idea, but ἡ χάρις αὐτοῦ, and we should render (according to WINER, p. 179): To the praise of His glory in grace (Gnadenherrlichkeit), so that δόξα τῆς χάριτος forms one conception. Still it is altogether inadmissible to explain the genitive δόξης as a Hebraism for the adjective ἐυδοξος; Paul was acquainted with that adjective (v. 27; 1 Cor. iv. 10) and did not select it here. This is equally true, whether it be joined with ἐπαινον, as meaning: to glorious praise (GROTIUS, ESTIUS), or to τῆς χάριτος: to the praise of His glorious grace (LUTHER, BEZA, MORUS, KOPPE, FLATT, and others).

[MEYER: "The glorifying of the Divine love (which however is here designated, according to its definite peculiarity, as grace, because it concerns what is sinful, ii. 1 ff.) is the final end" of the Divine predestination. ELLICOTT: "As CHRYSOSTOM appears rightly to have felt, δόξης is a pure substantive, and serves to specify that peculiar quality or attribute of the χάρις which forms the subject of the praise."—R.]

Which he freely bestowed upon us [ἣς ἐχαρίτωσεν ἡμᾶς].—On the attraction ἣς ἐχαρίτωσεν for ἣν—according to the well-known expression χαρὶν χαριτοῖν, see WINER, p. 154, and the Textual Note°. Similar cases, iv. 1; 2 Cor. i. 4. Χαριτὸν = gratia aliquem afficere; but gratia may be taken in the subjective or objective sense, so that this means either: He has made lovely, pleasing, or: He has dispensed grace, favor. The word occurs elsewhere in the New Testament only in Luke i. 28 (the salutation of the angel to Mary: χαίρε κεχαριτωμένη, where either meaning may be accepted, or both combined (STIER in loco.) [The objective sense is certainly to be preferred in Luke i. 28; for to take the other view involves at least a quasi-support of very untenable dogmas. On the force of Greek verbs in ὧ, see EADIE, HARLESS, ELLICOTT.—R.] It also occurs in the LXX. (Sir. ix. 8; xviii. 17), and in the first sense. The reading ἣς supports the first view; the reading ἐν ἡ the other. For the former was evidently accepted in the Syriac version, and aptly reproduced: quam effudit super nos, so that His grace has not remained and does not remain fruitless. So the Vulgate: gratificavit. CHRYSOSTOM: οὐ μόνον ἀναρτημάτων ἀπήλλαξεν, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἐπεράστους ἐποίησεν; THEODORET, Theophylact, EUCOMENIUS to the same effect. A-LAPIDE: Gratiosus nos reddidit, scilicet gratiam suam nobis communicando et infundendo. LUTHER: Angenehm gemacht, made pleasant. BEZA: Gratis nos sibi acceptos reddidit; so STIER and others. The second view is held by BENDEL (gratia amplexus est), BAUMGARTEN, KOPPE, FLATT, HARLESS, RUECKERT, SCHENKEL and others. At all events with the perspective reaching "unto the praise of the glory of His grace," we must not leave out of view the result of pardoning, the effect of the χάρις on the χαριτωθέντες, who become χαρίεντες; here, where the Apostle "closes his first circle of thought" (STIER), there is at the same time a reference to the goal aimed at from the pardon. Accordingly "us" applies not merely to Paul and his readers or contemporaries, but to all believers.

[The subjective sense may be involved, but the other seems decidedly preferable. ALFORD says the subjective meaning of χάρις does not seem to occur in the N. T., certainly not in St. Paul. He very properly argues for the other meaning, from the "indefinite aorist, referring to an act once past in Christ, not to an abiding state which He has brought about in us." Also from the context which is all of God's grace. So ELLICOTT, EADIE, MEYER, HODGE. The Romanist expositors find in the other sense a support for their doctrine of justitia inherens.—R.]

In the beloved, ἐν τῷ ἀγαπημένῳ.—This contains a reference to ἐχαρίτωσεν. BENDEL aptly says: Autonomasia, opportuna. Amor plus significat, quam gratia. 1 Pet. ii. 10: ubi de iis, qui misericordiam consecuti sunt, ea dicuntur, supra quae ὁ ἡγαπημένος, AMATUS longe eminet; ἔλεος necessarius praesupponit praeiuviam miseriam, sed amor non item. The Beloved, κατ' ἐξοχὴν, (Col. i. 13; Matt. iii. 17), by God the Father, not ab omnibus (PELAGIUS), is the Only Begotten, the Son of God by nature, Christ; He is the object of the love (ἀγάπη) of the Father, not needing χάρις, as we: only through the grace of God in Christ do we become objects of His love; as χαριτωθέντες. Accordingly this distinction is not to be made use of in favor of the second meaning of ἐχαρίτωσεν, as is done by HARLESS. The preposition ἐν must be retained as marking our fellowship with Christ, who is our life-sphere; hence it is not = διὰ τόν, propter (GROTIUS and others). We are rather reminded of the verse: Vor dir sonst nichts gilt, als Dein eigen Bild. [Before thee nothing passes current but thine own image.] In Him, the image of God, we have, not only objectively, but subjectively also, the grace, that we are well-pleasing to God.

[EADIE: "We, as adopted children, are indeed loved, but there is another, the Son, the own Beloved Son. It was not, therefore, affection craving indulgence, or eager for an object on which to expend itself, that led to our adoption. There was no void in His bosom, the loved One lay in it."—R.]

SECOND FOUNDATION OF THE PRAISE; VERS. 7-12.
The carrying out of the eternal decree.

Ver. 7. In whom we have [or our] redemption through his blood [ἐν ᾧ ἔχομεν τὴν ἀπολύτρωσιν διὰ τοῦ αἵματος αὐτοῦ].—Comp. Col. i. 14. "We have," "the first present tense of the whole discourse, and very emphatic" (STRICK). Hence it immediately follows ἐν ᾧ, "in whom." With this a new circle of thought begins, pointing to the already experienced accomplishment of the Divine eternal decree, even though just begun. The preposition ἐν is to be taken in its strict meaning: for only within the Person of the Beloved, Christ, are we in the possession and enjoyment of redemption. Christ's work is inseparable from His Person; we have redemption, not in His work without His Person, but in His Person, which with His work is a living unity (OLSHAUSEN). Hence it will not suffice to explain: in fellowship with Him (WINER, p. 364, note 7), while it is altogether incorrect to take it as = διὰ οὗ, ἐνεκα οὗ (FLATT, KOPPE), even though the phrase "through His blood" be adjoined, and the explanation be: cujus morti cruenta debeo; so MORUS: propter quem. SCHENKEL appears to interpolate per δι' οὗ in his explanation: by means of the fellowship with Him through faith. [HODGE seems to have lost the force of the phrase, weakening it into, "i.e., not in ourselves," and then taking "by his blood" as explanatory. ELLICOTT, EADIE, ALFORD all catch more or less of the true view so aptly expressed by OLSHAUSEN.—R.]

We are having! Believers, Christians are in possession of a property. The possession is marked, not the receiving, or having received; hence ἔχειν is not = assecutum esse, or assequi.

[EADIE is still better: "We are ever needing, and so are ever having it." The objective sense, there is for us, adopted by ALFORD, following HARLESS, underlies the expressed and emphatic subjective one; the latter is not merely "an implied import," but the prominent thought.—R.]

The subject treated of is a bonum novi testamenti (BENGEL)—τὴν * ἀπολύτρωσιν. This word points to a redemption through ransom. This idea is a prevalent one, even in the New Testament, where our Lord so uses it (Matt. xx. 28; Mark x. 45: to give His life a ransom for many), and Paul, 1 Tim. ii. 6: ὁ δοὺς ἑαυτὸν ἀντίλυτρον ὑπὲρ πάντων, Tit. ii. 14: λυτρώσθαι, 1 Cor. vi. 20; vii. 23; Gal. iii. 13: ἀγοράζειν, Acts xx. 28: περικουίσθαι. Still the expiation, indicated in the Lord's saying, appears also, as in Rom. iii. 23-25. Manifesto satis eam mortis vim indicat, quæ sa- crificio confertur piaculari (FRITZSCHE). Here indeed the thought of an expiatory sacrifice seems to be the prominent one, since "through his blood" is added (comp. Levit. xvii. 11, HARLESS). We may however take the blood of Christ as the ransom price. The powers and evils, indicated in the preposition ἀπό, from which believers are and shall be snatched, are according to STRICK, the wrath to come (1 Thess. i. 10), the present evil world (Gal. i. 4), the power of darkness (Col. i. 13), all unrighteousness (Tit. ii. 14), vain conversation after the ways of their fathers (1 Pet. i. 18); indeed the extirpation and compensation of all the evil in which we have involved ourselves with our transgressions (PRENINGER). Though the word may have in passages, such as iv. 30; Rom. viii. 23; 1 Cor. i. 30, a more general signification, the original reference being supplanted or obliterated, here this is marked by the context. HARLESS indeed is correct, in maintaining against Romanist expositors (such as A-LAPIDE), that it designates not merely a subjective condition; but he should not have based on the presence of the article the statement that abstract nouns without the article merely designate that the generic notion has become real as a subjective possession.

Through his blood, διὰ τοῦ αἵματος αὐτοῦ.—MEYER regards this as entirely like ἐν τῷ αἵματι (ii. 13), remarking that Paul was very fond of prepositional variations (2 Cor. iii. 11). The former, however, describes rather the mediation, which may be in constant movement, as here: while the latter points to an existing life-sphere or fact, in which indeed that mediation must be consummated. Hence the Apostle is not influenced by likings or beauty of diction, etc., but by a shading of the thought.—In the Person of Christ as the Only Begotten, is given to us, as to all believers, Redemption by means of His blood, as an offering and ransom-price, and now we are having such a gift. Though Heb. ix. 12-14 is to be compared with our passage, still we may not introduce here, as is done by KOPPE, the sacrificial worship of the ancient nations, according to which through a sinless offering past sins were extirpated and the angered divinity reconciled, as though Paul had made use of this.

[ALFORD: "It is a noteworthy observation of HARLESS here, that the choice of the word, the Blood of Christ, is of itself a testimony to the idea of expiation having been in the writer's mind. Not the death of the victim, but its BLOOD, was the typical instrument of expiation. I may notice that in Phil. ii. 8, where Christ's obedience, not His atonement, is spoken of, there is no mention of His shedding His blood, only of the act of His Death." This was the price, τὸ λύτρον. As EADIE well says: "The nexus we may not be able to discover fully, but"—"the death of Christ has governmental relations, has an influence on our salvation totally different in nature and sphere of operation, from its subjective power in subduing the heart by the love which it presents, and the thrilling motives which it brings to bear upon it."—R.]

The forgiveness of our transgressions, τὴν ἀφεσιν τῶν παραπτωμάτων.—LUTHER joins this with the foregoing thus: namely,

* [The article here points to something well known; if the verb ἔχομεν has a reference mainly objective, then this means the redemption promised, etc., but if it be subjective, then it means our redemption. So CONYBEARE. ELLICOTT objects to this, but sanctions it in the Revision by Four Ang. Clergymen. Such a rendering by no means implies that the ἀπολύτρωσιν is merely subjective.—R.]

the forgiveness of sins, thus taking it, and correctly, as exegetical (WINER, p. 492). [So the E. V. in the parallel passage, Col. i. 14.—R.] This implies, that the more comprehensive expression, redemption, is to be limited, contains more than is involved in the context, ἐχομεν; “the forgiveness of transgressions” renders emphatically prominent one principal element, on which indeed another depends. Accordingly it cannot be said, that the Apostle defines the nature of the “redemption” with this exegetical addition (HARLESS) [MEYER]. It is just as erroneous to extend the exegetical phrase on account of the first expression, and to explain “forgiveness of transgressions” as taking away of sins (Berleb. Bible). Paul now takes out as chief the first thing: the forgiveness of sins (STIER). FRITZSCH aptly remarks (Rom. iii. 25) on the distinction between παρεσις and ἀρεσις: * “Conveniunt in hoc, quod sive illa, sive hæc tibi obtigerit nulla peccatorum tuorum ratio habetur; discrepant eo, quod hæc data facinorum tuorum pœnas nunquam pendas, illa concessa non dicitur nullas peccatorum tuorum pœnas lues, quam ei in iis connivere placuerit, cui in delicta tua animalvertendi jus sit.” Further the genitive of τὰ παραπτώματα refers only to individual facts, and, since these can neither be undone or extirpated, we must understand pardon alone; OLSHAUSEN is incorrect in laying no weight upon the form παραπτώματα, ἀμαρτίαι (Col. i. 14), and including also the sinful condition, the inborn sinfulness, understanding here absolutely all that is sinful.† Although he is correct in saying that the appropriation of this forgiveness of sins as a fact cannot be conceived of, without the transformation of the man proceeding from it as a consequence, yet we must still maintain that nothing is said here about the latter, but only that redemption, like the forgiveness, has its complete objective reality entirely irrespective of the subjective state of the individuals (HARLESS). [Accepting this view, which is that of HODGE, EADIE and others, we must deny ALFORD's remark, that this phrase is not to be limited, but is “at least equipollent with ἀπολύτως.”—R.]

According to the riches of his grace.—Κατὰ τὸ πλοῦτος τῆς χάριτος αὐτοῦ evidently designates the grace of God, not of Christ, as the ultimate ground of the fact of Redemption, and corresponding (κατὰ) to the depth and importance of the same in its riches. Similarly ii. 7: τὸ πλοῦτος τῆς χάριτος, Rom. ii. 4: πλοῦτος τῆς χρηστότητος, Rom. ix. 23; Col. i. 27; Eph. iii. 16: τῆς δόξης. Hence it is not=gratia liberalissima (KOPPE). Instead of τὸ πλοῦτος, attested by A. and B., and to be retained here, ὁ πλοῦτος more frequently occurs. [Comp. Textual Note."] PASSAVANT aptly says: “We have in this grace not only deliverance from misery and curse, not only forgiveness—we find in it the freedom, the glory, the heritage of the children of God, the crown of eternal life.”

[ALFORD is not correct in saying this clause of itself prevents the limitation of ἀρεαν to mere forgiveness. EADIE seems to catch the spirit of the passage best. “Atonement is not in antagonism with grace. For the opulence of His grace is seen not only in its innumerable forms and varieties of operation among men, but also in the unasked and unmerited provision of such an atonement—as the blood of the ‘Beloved One.’”—R.] With the forgiveness of sin we gain access to all the treasures of Divine grace (GEBLACH). Hence the Apostle continues as in the following verse.

Ver. 8. Which he made to abound toward us [ἣς ἐπερίσσειεν εἰς ἡμᾶς].—Ἡς, referring to τῆς χάριτος, which is imparted, not parted, cannot be, as in Luke xv. 17: περίσσειονσιν ἄρτων, a partitive genitive (ERASMUS: de qua ubertim nobis impartitur); but is here an attraction for ἡ, since the ἐπερίσσειε is to be rendered, transitively in accordance with the context (ver. 9: γνώσας), and with the accusative like 2 Cor. ix. 8 (δυνατὸς γὰρ ὁ θεὸς πᾶσαν χάριν περισσεύσαι εἰς ἡμᾶς; comp. iv. 15; 1 Thess. iii. 12). THEOPHYLACT aptly says: ἀφθόνως ἐξέχει. It is not in accordance with the language or context to take it as instead of ἡ (Vulgate: quæ superabundavit) or ἣ (CALVIN: quæ redundavit). [So E. V., but such an attraction of the dative is not found in the New Testament, while the attraction of the nominative (Vulgate) is scarcely possible.—R.]—Εἰς ἡμᾶς, into us He has caused His grace to flow abundantly.

In all wisdom and prudence [*ἐν πάσῃ σοφίᾳ καὶ φρονήσει].—The word πάσῃ, without the article, designates every one there is (WINER, p. 105). Comp. ver. 2; Col. iv. 12.—Πᾶς sets forth the multiplicity, fullness, always extensiveness, never intensity, force (HARLESS); hence it is not=summa (WAIL, RUECKERT). Σοφία καὶ φρόνησις cannot be taken as exact synonyms (KOPPE), nor so distinguished, that the former is used of præterito et presenti, of his, quæ Deus facit (ver. 17), the latter of futuro, of his, quæ nos faciemus (ANSELM, BENDEL). Wisdom designates rather a normal state of the mind in the centre of intelligence, prudence the special turning of the same in different directions; ἡ δὲ σοφία ἀνδρὶ τίκεται φρόνησιν (Prov. x. 23); the latter is subordinate to the former. Besides this formal distinction, the material difference must be considered: Wisdom grasps God's doings, perceives and understands His counsels of grace, prudence is directed to what we have to do, looks at our problem and how to solve it; the former clearly sees the relations ordered by God, the latter regulates our conduct accordingly. Thus every kind of wisdom and prudence is indicated by “all,” and “in” marks that God has caused His grace to flow abundantly into us, in the gift of all wisdom and prudence. So also in the parallel passage, Col. i. 9: ἵνα πληρωθῇτε τὴν ἐπιγνώσιν τοῦ θελήματος αὐτοῦ ἐν πάσῃ σοφίᾳ καὶ συνέσει. Accordingly this is not to be taken as “manifold wisdom” (iii. 10), and, as in ἐν ἀγάπῃ

* [On this distinction, comp. TRENCH, Synonymes, N. T., § 33; COCCURUS has a special treatise, De utilitate distinctionis inter παρεσις et ἀρεσις (Opp. t. vii.) See SCHAFF, Romans, p. 128, Textual Note 6.—R.]

† [On παραπτώματα see Dr. SCHAFF's note (Rom. v. 15) p. 182, and the subsequent discussions. The positions taken there forbid any such wide reference as that of OLSHAUSEN. ELLICOTT, while not laying much stress upon the distinction between παραπτώματα and ἀμαρτίαι, takes the former as pointing more to sins on the side of commission, sinful acts, the latter to sins as the result of a state, sinful conditions.—R.]

* [ELLICOTT renders this word: discernment or intelligence, adding a very discriminating note.—R.]

προορίσας (ver. 5), to be joined with the following γνώρισας (JEROME, CHRYS., SEMLER [EADIE], and others), nor to be applied to God, to whom indeed φρόνησις (1 Kings iii. 28; Jer. x. 12) may be ascribed, but not pāsa in such a way as to mean that not only is all wisdom and prudence in Him, but that He acts, does this or that in all wisdom and prudence (HARLESS).

[The view here defended is also that of HARLESS, MEYER and ELLICOTT, the three most exact commentators on this Epistle. Comp. the note of the last named on the meaning, reference and connection of these words. ALFORD follows DE WETTE in referring them to God, taking the same view of the connection as given above, while EADIE refers them to man, but connects them with γνώρισας. HODGE joins this phrase to the object of the verb instead of to the verb itself, and inexactly renders the preposition ἐν in connection with, together with; his view of φρόνησις is also objectionable.—R.]

Ver. 9. Having made known to us.—Γνωρίσας denotes, as in vers. 4, 5, the manner of the ἐπερίσυνε (WINER, p. 322), explaining “in all wisdom and prudence.” The verb means to make known, without stating any thing as to the means used. Comp. iii. 3, 5; Gal. i. 12; Col. i. 25. [The perfect participle in English is indefinite, and serves best to express the idea of the Greek aorist participle, which here denotes an act coincident, and terminating synchronously with the finite verb (MEYER, ELLICOTT). The best paraphrase would be: in that He made known (ALFORD).—R.]—“Us” means Christians, believers, not merely Paul or the Apostles.

The mystery of his will, τὸ μυστήριον τοῦ θελήματος αὐτοῦ.—[The genitive is that of the object: the mystery concerning His will (MEYER, ELLICOTT, ALFORD and now EADIE). On θέλημα see ver. 11.—R.] This mystery is the object made known. He terms it “of Christ” in iii. 10, because He is the Mediator of the same; “of the gospel,” vi. 19, because it is thereby proclaimed; “of faith,” “of godliness,” 1 Tim. iii. 9, 16, because it is comprehended and preserved only by faith, and the fear of God in faith; here “of his will,” because it is willed by God. It is the decree of Redemption in Christ. In iii. 9; Col. i. 25, 26; Rom. xvi. 25, 26; 1 Cor. iii. 7–10, its depth and concealment as well as its revelation are described. This decree, a secret from all eternity in the fullest sense for the Gentiles, hinted and adumbrated in Israel by prophecies and types, is now manifest in Christ, to those only, however, who are true believers (1 Cor. iii. 12), to those who are lost, it remains concealed (2 Cor. iv. 3). It is a secret which has become public, ceasing henceforth to be a secret, yet ever having and still retaining in itself what surpasses all reason (HARLESS, STIER).

According to his good pleasure, κατὰ τὴν εὐδοκίαν αὐτοῦ, defines more closely the γνώρισας, “having made known.”—Comp. ver. 5. [The making known is thus defined as having taken place in strict dependence, both in time and manner, on the will of God (ALFORD, ELLICOTT). EADIE retains here the meaning benevolentia, which is quite inadmissible, more so than in ver. 6.—R.]

Which he purposed in himself, ἣν προέθετο ἐν αὐτῷ.—The determination is thus marked as an internal one, so as to give prominence to its freedom; hence we should read αὐτῷ (HARLESS, TISCHENDORF), not αὐτῶ (MEYER). [The latter reading is adopted by ALFORD, EADIE, ELLICOTT, all of them claiming that if the pronoun refers to God (and we cannot well accept any other reference) the reflexive form is necessary. In ver. 5, they urge, another idea had intervened, hence αὐτόν was there sufficiently explicit, but here the immediate connection with the verb and its subject requires the form αὐτῷ. This is opposed to the theory advanced in ver. 5, that this reflexive form never occurs in the New Testament; but it is safer to accept this reading than to refer the pronoun to Christ.—R.]

In the compound verb προτίθεσθαι, sibi proponere (BENGEL, PASSOW sub voce), the preposition πρὸ is local (MEYER): to put before one's self, not temporal=beforehand. So also in πρόθεσις, ver. 11; Rom. i. 13; iii. 25; Acts iii. 20 (προχειρίζομαι); 2 Cor. ix. 7 (προσποιέομαι). Accordingly εὐδοκία is not=good pleasure (LUTHER), gracious purpose (HARLESS), and ἐν αὐτῷ is not to be referred to Christ (CHRYSOSTOM, LUTHER: hergebracht durch Ihn, BENGEL), nor is προέθετο=ante constituit (ANSELM, apud se retinuit (CALVIN). [As Meyer remarks, this purpose is to be regarded as taking place before the foundation of the world, but the preposition does not express this.—R.]

Ver. 10. Unto the dispensation of the fullness of times [εἰς οἰκονομίαν τοῦ πληρώματος τῶν καιρῶν].—This verse follows, setting forth the goal of the πρόθεσις. Εἰς designates the tendency, the aim, as in iv. 30; Gal. iii. 17, 23 (WINER, p. 371), with a view to which He purposed in Himself; hence it is to be closely joined with προέθετο, not with γνώρισας (BENGEL), which is too remote. Of course εἰς is not =in (Vulgate), nor usque ad (ERASMUS, CALVIN), for which εἰς, μέχρι, would be used. [HODGE and EADIE: with reference to, a view of the preposition which MEYER often favors, but which fails to bring out its full force here.—R.]

Οἰκονομία, from οἰκόνομος, is stewardship (Luke xvi. 2); it is transferred to the spiritual sphere in iii. 2, 6; 1 Tim. i. 4. The original meaning is modified in two ways, according as the word in its connection “designated the activity of a governing or subordinate subject; in the first case: arrangement, disposition, in the second: management, execution” (HARLESS). Thus the context in 1 Cor. ix. 17 defines the word in the second sense, of the apostolic office and service. Here God, and that towards which He has formed a purpose, are spoken of; so it here means: unto, with a view to the disposition. LUTHER correctly renders the εἰς of the aim, but limits οἰκονομίαν too much: that it may be preached; so GROTIUS (ut suo demum tempore publicaret. THEOPHYLACT (διοίκησις) and the Vulgate (dispensatio) restrict it too much. KUECKERT's complaint about the omission of the article is entirely unnecessary, as in Rom. i. 1, which is a parallel for our passage, we read: εἰς εὐαγγέλιον θεοῦ, “unto the gospel of God.” The article is wanting on account of the following genitive, which defines our word more fully, and is to be joined most closely with it; so λόγον ζωῆς (Phil. ii. 16) = Lebenswort, "Word of life," ἡμέρα τοῦ Χριστοῦ, "day of Christ." Comp. WINER, p. 118 ff. According to this, we should take the phrase to mean: fulfilment—economy.

The genitive τοῦ πληρώματος τῶν καιρῶν defines then οἰκονομίαν more closely. [Verbo πληρῶς et πλήρωμα perscrpe utitur Paulus ad Ephesios et Colossenses (BENGEL). According to the well known investigations of FRITZSCHE (Ad Rom. II. p. 473, and a Dissertation, Rostock, 1839)—although HOFMANN (Schriftbeweis, I. 2, p. 118) denies the active and passive senses of the word, seeking to prove that its meaning is: contents, full amount, complement [i. e., the first of the following senses]—πλήρωμα signifies (1.) id quo res impletur [this is often called the active sense, but is not strictly so, see on ver. 23.—R.], (2.) id quod impletur [the strictly passive sense—τὸ πεπληρωμένον, that which is filled, or the state of having been filled and continuing so, fulness; this being the more usual meaning of verbals in μα.—R.], (3.) implendi actionem [the proper active meaning], the passive sense being more prevalent than the active. According to this view, the second signification is to be accepted here, as in Gal. iv. 4: τὸ πλήρωμα τοῦ χρόνου, that which is filled, the state of fullness, the fullness of time.

Between the two passages there is however a difference, occasioned by τοῦ χρόνου and τῶν καιρῶν. Here definite καιροί are spoken of. Although we find in Mark i. 15: πεπληρωται ὁ καιρός, because one point of time is referred to, yet in 1 Tim. ii. 6, the proclamation of salvation is said to take place καιροῖς ἰδίοις, and in Luke xxi. 24 καιροῖς ἐθνῶν are mentioned, as in Acts i. 7 χρόνους ἢ καιροῖς. And in the passage strictly parallel (ii. 7) it is said that ἐν τοῖς αἰσῶσι, τοῖς ἐπερχομένοις, God would show the riches of His grace toward the congregation of the believers. Hence we must apply the word here to different sections of time, linked on to each other, through which the plan of salvation is unfolded, since God ever revealed what and so much as was requisite, to advance the development of His Kingdom, so soon as the end of one period of time in the history of Redemption arrived, and an epoch had fulfilled its task and passed away; while τοῦ χρόνου in the passage from Galatians marks these details in their connection as a totality. The fulfilment of these definite periods and points of time, adapted for the required development, is to be understood here: ὁ ὁρισθεὶς παρὰ τοῦ πατρὸς καιρός (THEODORET), the point of time, with the entrance of which the pre-Messianic periods are closed and the Messianic ages begin.

The genitive τοῦ πληρώματος τῶν καιρῶν indicates then what belongs to οἰκονομία, the external and internal relation to it. Comp. WINER, p. 176 ff. [So ELLICOTT and EADIE: the former has a capital note on this genitive, which he calls a genitive of the characterizing quality.—R.] We have therefore here indicated, that the fulfilling of the times stands under the guidance of God Himself, who has determined and ordered the periods and brings them in according to His purpose. Hence we explain it as: dispensatio propria plenitudini temporum (CALOV., RUECKERT, MEYER, MATTHIES, STIER [HODGE, ELLICOTT, EADIE] and others). HARLESS takes the genitive as exegetical, subjoining the special to the general; but οἰκονομία, that which is arranged by the Lord, is not explained by πλήρωμα, a developing process, nor that mode of action by a fact, such as the latter undoubtedly is. SCHENKEL accepts a genitive of the object, as though "the fullness of the times" was the object of "dispensation;" but while ἤλθε (Gal. iv. 4) may be predicated of that πλήρωμα, οἰκονομεῖται cannot be, and οἰκονομία has the καιροῖς as the object of its νέμειν, the result of this being the πλήρωμα. LUTHER's rendering is too limited: dass es gepredigt würde, da die Zeit erfüllt war. It should not be explained, as if we read ἐν τῷ πληρώματι: tempore exacto (WOLF), or aliquo tempore, suo tempore (MORUS); nor should it be referred to extrema tempora (KOPPE) still less is it eorum que restant temporum, or in reliquis, i. e., novi fœderis temporibus (STIER* and others). Unpauline as well as unbiblical is USTERI's explanation, the fulfilling of that time has had its ground in the necessary development of the human consciousness, or of the religious spirit of humanity.† God's gracious design applies then to a dispensation, which ordains time and its periods, leading to a point when they are completed. This is still further defined by what follows:

To gather up together all things.—[ἀνακεφαλαιώσασθαι τὰ πάντα. BRAUNE: to gather together again for Himself all things.]—The verb is derived from κεφαλαῖον, the chief point, and means principally, to gather together in one main point, as Rom. xiii. 9, where it is said of the single commandments, that they are "briefly comprehended" in the one command of love (ἐν τῷ λόγῳ τούτῳ ἀνακεφαλαιούνται), summam comprehendere. But it is acknowledged, that the Apostle, "who does not etymologize, but follows general accords" (HARLESS), might readily have chosen the word, in order to play upon the word κεφαλῇ, the head, which according to i. 22 is Christ (CHRYSOSTOM, THEOPHYLACT, LUTHER: "comprehended together under one head," CALOV., WOLF, HARLESS, STIER, SCHENKEL, MATTHIES and others). As recapitulare passes over capitulum to caput in its meaning, so too ἀνα κεφαλαιῶν over κεφάλαιον to κεφαλῇ. [The play on the word is barely possible. Paul's usage favors it, but the context is against it, since "in Christ" follows so soon, and the idea of Christ as Head occurs much further on, the reference here being more to His atonement than to His sovereignty. He is regarded as κεφάλαιον rather than as κεφαλῇ (MEYER).—R.]

* [ALFORD argues at some length in favor of the reference to the whole gospel dispensation, "the giving forth of the gospel under God's providential arrangements." Against his view, see EADIE.—R.]

† [It is certainly true that God comprehended this development in His plan, and that it was an important factor in carrying out "the dispensation of the fullness of times," though its importance has not been recognized until lately by theologians and church historians. EADIE well observes: "The πλήρωμα is regarded as a vast receptacle into which centuries and millenniums had been falling, but it was now filled." "That fulness of the time in which this economy was founded, is the præterite period, for the Lord has appointed it; and the best period, for the act was ripe for the event." The view of Dr. Braune is so well stated and agrees so entirely with that of the most exact of modern commentators, that further supplement is needless.—R.]

Although the meaning of the preposition (ἀνα, again) does not appear in the verb, Rom. xiii. 9, since it would be too artificial to retain it with HARLESS, because of an assumed reference to the local position of the law given in detail Exod. xx. and afterwards summed up and repeated, Lev. xix. 18 (THULO renders Rom. xiii. 9, repelere), still there is no ground for not retaining it here (see PASSOW sub voce), where the reference is to a gathering of what was dispersed and a renewal of what was ruined, and not originally so. The word may indeed apply to an entirely new fact, but it still refers back to an original status and beginning (MEYER, HARLESS, STIER).* Comp. Col. i. 15-17.

Finally the middle form must not be left unnoticed: God will gather together again for Himself (sibi) what He has created for Himself; this supports at the same time the meaning again. Accordingly the following explanations are unsatisfactory: a principio renovare (Syriac), instaurare (Vulgate), giving an explanation of the character of the gathering together; ἐνυκεφαλαίωσθαι (RAPHAEL), to subject all things at once to Christ; borrowing the phrase from rhetoric, to recapitulate (JEROME, ERASMUS, BEZA), or from military usage—in unum agmen cogere (GROTIUS) or from arithmetic—in unam summam redigere (CAMERARIUS, BUCER), although in each of these there is something more or less correct.

The infinitive is to be taken as exegetical; it brings forward as an explanation the design† which obtains in the “dispensation of the fulness of times” (WINER, p. 300): in order to gather together under one head for Himself. But how? In Christ.—Nothing further is said; in the resumptive ἐν αὐτῷ we find an explanation. We must maintain however that ἐν τῷ Χριστῷ refers to the Saviour who appeared in the fulness of time (the article is in any case inserted purposely and for emphasis), thus preparing the way for the statement of the object. What then is to be gathered together? All things.

The things which are in heaven, and the things which are on earth [τὰ ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς καὶ ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς. See Textual Note ¹⁰]. Tὰ πάντα is neuter and universal, the more because this explanatory clause is added. No importance is to be attached to the plural (οὐρανοῖς), since we find in Phil. iii. 20: ἐν οὐρανοῖς—ἐξ οὐ; despite its different regions (2 Cor. xii. 2: ὡς τρίτον οὐρανόν) heaven is conceived of as a unity, over against the earth. The well-attested ἐπὶ is at all events an error of the transcriber or a provincialism, beside which the established ἐπὶ τῆς γῆς could not appear strange. The repeated article denotes the particularity of what is found in both spheres. Heaven and earth have become places of sin (ii. 2; vi. 12); indeed heaven was the first theatre of sin, when a part of the angels fell into sin and from God

(1 Tim. iii. 6; 1 John iii. 8; Jas. ii. 19; 2 Pet. ii. 4; Jude 6); thence it came to earth (2 Cor. xi. 3), in ever greater dimensions (1 Cor. x. 20, 21). Thus the state originally appointed by God and the development He wished to be without disturbance, ceased (Rom. viii. 18-24), so that a renewing of the heavens and of the earth was taken into view (2 Pet. iii. 13). The centre of this renewal is Christ and His redeeming work (Col. i. 20), which, however, has its development also, as before His appearance up to the “fulness of times,” so afterwards up to His second Advent, when the “restitution of all things” (Acts iii. 21), the palingenesia (Matth. xix. 28), will be introduced. Comp. 2 Pet. iii. 10-13.

It is altogether unmistakable that, in accordance with the views of this Epistle as well as the entire organism of Scripture truth, we must apply this to the totality of the creation (HARLESS, OLSHAUSEN, MATTHIES, MEYER, STIER, HOFMANN, Schriftbeweis, I. 216 ff., SCHENKEL and others). If we maintain with BENGEL: Omnia sub Christo fuerant; per peccatum autem facta erat avulsio et divisio; atque hæc rursus sublata est, then only such a “restitution of all things” is here treated of, as takes into the account, not the relations of the individual members, of the individuals of the τὰ πάντα, to each other, nor yet the relations of the same in their diversity over against God and Christ, but rather and only the relation of Christ to the totality. We should neither specialize and restrict too much, as does HOFMANN, who excludes good angels and evil men, and others, who apply it only to intelligence, persons,* nor accept an unspecialized thought (HARLESS), indefinitely in suspense and admitting of no specialization, respecting a totality. If it could be inferred from the fact of the angels not needing redemption, that they were excluded here, we should be finally obliged to except redeemed men from this ἀνακεφαλαίωσις and no longer regard them as under Christ, when their redemption was completed. “The reconciliation through Christ is to the Apostle a fact, whose effects permeate the universe, which affects alike the conscious and the unconscious creation, whether it be touched by sin, or not, as is the case with the good angels” (OLSHAUSEN). Here we may certainly apply what BENGEL so aptly remarks on Rom. viii. 19, that pro suo quodque genus capti, and statu may be appended, participate in this Anacephalaiosis, the evil as conquered and rejected opponents, the good angels as participating, ministering friends, the redeemed as accepted children, the rest of creation as subordinate companions, as theatre of the honors. It is precisely “the restoration of the harmony of

* [The force of ἀνα, again, should be retained, it would seem, for Rom. xiii. 9, can include such a notion irrespective of the forced assumption of HARLESS. HODGE and ALFORD indeed are timid about admitting it, lest it be turned to an improper use, but there is undoubtedly a restoration implied in Redemption, although restoration falls very far short of the latter idea.—R.]

† [HARLESS takes it as depending on “the mystery of his will.” The general idea is the same, but such a connection would give to the intervening words too much of a parenthetical character.—R.]

* [Perhaps the most restricted view is that of Dr. HODGE: “The redeemed from among men, some of whom are now in heaven and others are still on earth.” This he defends by a number of reasons, all of which I am forced to consider irrelevant. The great mistake is in his giving too wide a scope to the anacephalaiosis, insisting that it means such a gathering together as implies redemption in its fullest sense, for which there is no authority, save the assumed pannomasia in the world. Granting this position, the restriction of τὰ πάντα follows as a matter of course. It would seem to be a far better method to take τὰ πάντα in its appropriate sense, all things, even at the risk of limiting a doubtful word like ἀνακεφαλαίωσθαι, than to give it the sense of the masculine, which it never has. This restricted view seems to be adopted more from doctrinal than exegetical reasons.—R.]

the Universe" (HARLESS), which is aimed at. CHRYSOSTOM makes the excellent remark; ὡς ἂν περὶ οἰκίας τις εἰποῖ τὰ μὲν σαθρὰ τὰ δὲ ἰσχυρὰ ἔχοις, ἀνγκοδόμησε τὴν οἰκίαν—οὕτω καὶ ἐνταῦθα πάντας ὑπὸ μίαν ἡγάγε κεφαλὴν. That nothing is said of "the restoration of all things," is quite evident. (See Doctr. Note 8.)*

Ever in him, ἐν αὐτῷ, is to be joined to "things in heaven, and things on earth," as "in Christ" is with "all things," since the two clauses are entirely parallel (HARLESS). GROTIUS well says: "Sed repetendum censuit, quasi diceret: per ipsum, inquam, unum, non per ullum alium; non hoc factum per Moysen, non per philosophos." Hence it is not a Hebraism or Syriasm (RUECKERT, who acknowledges the "not feeble repetition"), nor to be joined with the following ἐν ᾧ as pleonastic. Thus, then, the person of Christ is noted as the Mediator and middle-point of this comprehensive reuniting, and that without Him such does not and shall not take place. ["Re-asseverating with great solemnity and emphasis (see Jelf, Gr. § 658), the only blessed sphere in which this ἀνακεφ. can be regarded as operative, and apart from which, and without which, its energies cannot be conceived as acting. It forms also an easy transition to the following relative" (ELLICOTT).—R.]

It is arbitrary and unscriptural (MEYER) for CALOV, and others to assume that Christ is as to His Divine nature the Head of angels, as to His human nature the Head of men. This anacephalaion is not to be applied to the completion of the kingdom of God in the resurrection of the body (THEODORET, JEROME), and still less to the moral uniting of antagonistic endeavors (KOPPE, WAHL); nor should we determine from Col. i. 20, how it is to be conceived of or to take place, but rather confess that our passage says nothing about this.

* [Comp. MEYER in loc. He says: "The doctrine of restoration, according to which even those who have remained unbelieving, and finally dead, shall yet attain to blessedness, contrary as it is to the whole tenor of the New Testament, finds no support in our passage either (against CHRYSOSTOM and others), where in ἀνακεφαλ., etc., the exclusion of the unbelieving and the demoniacal powers and their banishment to Gehenna is self-evident in connection with the Christian consciousness of faith, so that the anacephalaion does not apply to every single individual, but to the whole complex of things heavenly and earthly, which, after the anti-Christian individuals have been excluded and transferred to hell, shall be joined in unity under God in the renewed world again, as formerly before sin all in heaven and on earth was thus united. OLSHAUSEN therefore incorrectly thinks our passage (like Col. i. 20) is to be placed in accord with the general type of Scriptural teaching, by finding in the infinitive ἀνακεφ. the purpose of God, 'which, in the founding of redemption furnished with unlimited power, has in view the establishment of universal harmony, the restoration of all that is lost.' Irrespective of the fact that the infinitive is expegetical, it is altogether unscriptural to assume that in redemption there is purposed a restoration of all that is lost, even of the devils. For those passages which speak of the universality of redemption and such sayings as 1 Pet. iv. 6; Phil. ii. 10 f., leave entirely untouched the constant doctrine of the New Testament respecting eternal damnation. As regards the devils, the purpose of God in the economy of redemption was to conquer them (1 John iii. 8; 1 Cor. xv. 24), and to deliver them to the punishment of eternal torment already passed upon them (Matt. xxv. 41; Jude 6; 2 Pet. ii. 4; Rev. xx. 1 ff.; comp. BERTHOLD, Christologie, p. 223). In the New Testament there is no single thought of the restoration of devils, as this is conceived of as an impossibility in the case of the radically antithetical spirits. The prince of this world is only judged." No one can accuse MEYER of theological bias, or of ungrammatical exegesis, hence his opinion is quoted entire.—R.]

Ver. 11. In whom we were also made his inheritance [ἐν ᾧ καὶ ἐκκληρώθημεν].—A comma only is to be placed after "in Him;" "in whom," which refers to it, marks the union with Him (hence not = through whom, KOPPE, FLATT) as the way to the obtaining of the inheritance, which is rendered prominent by the καὶ; were the emphasis on the subject we should find καὶ ἡμεῖς here, as in ver. 13: καὶ ἡμεῖς. Incorrect: in quo etiam nos (Vulgate, ERASMUS). [The E. V.: "in whom also" is equally objectionable in connecting καὶ with ἐν ᾧ.—R.] Prominence is given to the fact, that the plan of God is already in the process of accomplishment, in accordance with the decree and design; καὶ is not indeed=really, it joins with ἐκκληρώθημεν, only what is to be inferred from the preceding context: we are destined, and this connection points to the actualization.

Κληροῖν is found here only; the compound προσεκληρώθησαν in Acts xvii. 4. It is derived, not from κληρονομία, but from κλήρος, lot (Matth. xxvii. 35; Acts i. 26), portion of an inheritance (Acts xxvi. 18; Col. i. 14), used in a spiritual sense, and transferred to men, to the church composed of individuals (1 Pet. v. 3; τῶν κληρῶν). Since this usage is well established, and there is no sufficient reason why the passive sense should not be retained here, we explain: we have become κληρῶς (i. e., of God, as the context requires) in Christ. BENDEL: hic loquitur per personam Israelis; eramus facti κληρῶς seu κληρονομία, sors, hereditas domini. Deut. xxxii. 9. So also STIER. The context (ver. 12: "that we should be," ver. 14: "purchased possession") supports the requirements of the language. Hence it is not to be explained with LUTHER: through whom we also have come to an inheritance, nor with most: have become partakers of the inheritance; nor yet accepimus (MORUS), contigit nobis, ut (KOPPE).

[The view here taken of the verb is ably defended by ALFORD and ELLICOTT, and the ordinary interpretation by HODGE and EADIE. The passive form calls for a passive sense, unless there are very strong reasons to the contrary. It would seem that the other sense is allowable, but the only grounds for adopting it here are (1) the objective character of the whole passage, (2) the parallel passage, Col. i. 12. But the sense: we have become an inheritance, is subjective only in form, presenting as it does something which God has become to us, quite as much as what we have become. The other reason is in itself of little weight, for the parallel is inexact in other respects. We adopt the passive sense, rejecting however the allusion to the lot as indicating God's freedom of choice, and accepting the special meaning given by BENDEL.—R.]

Finally it is clear that the subject ("we") is not put in antithesis to another one, as in ver. 14, and that no limitation is indicated either in the verb or in the following participle, so that according to the context and ver. 1, we may apply it to the Apostle and his readers, to Christians in general, but not to the Apostle alone (KOPPE), nor to him and the Jewish Christians (GROTIUS, BENDEL, HARLESS, STIER, SCHENKEL

[HODGE] and others). [BARNES restricts it to the ministers of religion. MEYER, EADIE, ALFORD, ELLICOTT, agree with BRAUNE.—R.]

Having been predestinated according to the purpose of him who worketh all things [προορισθέντες κατὰ πρόθεσιν τοῦ τὰ πάντα ἐνεργούντος].—We who have become an inheritance, are predestinated. A comparison with ver. 5: "having predestinated us unto adoption," shows us the progress and the distinction. Here it is further defined by the phrase "according to the purpose" from ver. 9 (ἣν προέθετο), that the predestinated is grounded in Him, in His design, His will. Accordingly He whose design it is, is termed: τοῦ τὰ πάντα ἐνεργούντος,* "the God, who ordains, prepares and carries forward to its goal the Redemption," who is "therein the All-efficient, Almighty" (STIER); τὰ πάντα is both what is external and historical in the world's story, as well as in the life of individuals, and what is spiritual and internal (Gal. ii. 8; iii. 5; 1 Cor. xii. 11.)

This working is further defined by the phrase: After the counsel of his will κατὰ τὴν βουλὴν τοῦ θελήματος αὐτοῦ. Similar to this is τὰς βουλὰς τῶν καρδιῶν (1 Cor. iv. 5). HARLESS compares: the desire of my heart, the joy of my eyes, the tears of my sorrow, as examples of the exchange of the simple subject into the activity, or peculiarity, or organ of the subject, which is the ground or means of a mental or sensuous manifestation, in order thus with exactness and definiteness to render prominent the close relation between the two. A similar case is 1 Pet. iii. 17: εἰ θέλοι τὸ θέλημα τοῦ θεοῦ. Βουλὴ is then the decision, the determination which God forms in His will. See above on ver. 5. It is God absolutely free (MATTHIES), His consilium liberum (BENGE). Τὰ πάντα is not ad id negotium, de quo agitur, adstringendum (GROTIUS), nor are βουλὴ and τοῦ θελήματος mere synonyms, as has been affirmed without ground of προορισθέντες and πρόθεσις also, nor yet=voluntas liberrima (KOPPE).

[The two words βουλὴ and θέλημα naturally lead to remarks upon the distinction between the verbs from which they are derived θέλειν and βούλεσθαι.† The distinction of BUTTMANN will not apply in the New Testament. He says (Lexic. sub voce): "βούλομαι is confined to the inclination, θέλω to that kind of wish in which there lies a purpose or design." But in Matth. i. 19, where both words occur, they cannot be thus distinguished; for Joseph's inclination was not to expose his wife, and this is expressed by θέλων, while his purpose to put her away is expressed by ἐβούλησθαι. It is rather in this case, as ALFORD says: "θέλω expresses the mere wish, βούλομαι the wish ripened into intention," in favor of which view he cites BUTTMANN however. TITTMANN on the other hand, while seeming to agree with BUTTMANN, and usually cited as sustaining him, really differs from him. In his Synonym. N. T., p. 184 ff. he says that θέλειν is simply to will (simpliciter velle), while βούλεσθαι denotes further the inclination. His citation of Ammonius who remarks that the latter cannot be predicated of brutes, would prove that deliberation also was implied in it. He further adds that he who does anything θέλων, does it spontaneously, while he who does it βούλομενος, determines to turn his mind to that matter. So PLATO (Laws, v.) opposes τὸ βουλήσθαι τε καὶ ἐκκοῦσαι and τὸ ἀβουλήσθαι τε καὶ ἀκούσαι. This distinction would justify the remark of BRAUNE (on ver. 5) that βουλὴ is the act of willing joined with inclination, while ἐθέλειν is the ethical act. Yet TITTMANN and others are scarcely justified in denying to θέλειν any sense of desiring, wishing, etc. With the infinitive such a meaning is common, as in the well-known formula: "I would not have you ignorant" (οἱ θέλω δὲ ὑμᾶς ἀγνοεῖν, Rom. i. 13, etc.), and in Rom. vii. 15 ff., where the antithesis is μισῶ. Besides the spontaneity of will may, after all, indicate an impulse from the side of the desire: who can decide? One thing is certain, we cannot, save by a species of anthropomorphism, apply such distinctions to God, e. g., 1 Tim. ii. 4: "who will (θέλει) have all men to be saved;" 2 Pet. iii. 9: "not willing (βούλομενος) that any should perish." We dare not, it seems to me, say that one passage refers to God's spontaneous will and the other to His inclination. In fact any discrimination between the two words for doctrinal purposes is of doubtful propriety, for there is no conflict in God, such as we find in us. Still we need not hesitate to explain "the counsel of His will" as meaning, the definite and deliberate volition of God's free, sovereign, spontaneous will. A pure voluntas on His part involves the accordant desire, purpose, determination and volition, all questions respecting priority being out of place. So ELLICOTT, whether correct in his distinction or not, is right in saying that our passage "solemnly represents the Almighty Will as displaying itself in action: θέλημα designating the will generally, βουλὴ the more special expression of it." So MEYER, ALFORD (on 1 Tim. v. 14) make this general distinction: "θέλω is the resting inclination of the will, βούλομαι its active exertion," which is valid enough here. On the whole EADIE is most judicious in his remarks, preserving TITTMANN's distinction, and yet admitting the idea of desire in θέλω. "Θέλημα is will, the result of desire=voluntas; βουλὴ is counsel, the result of a formal decision=propositum." Donaldson's New Cratylus, §§ 463, 464. Here βουλὴ is the ratified expression of will—the decision to which His will has come. The Divine mind is not in a state of indifference, it has exercised θέλημα=will; and that will is not a lethargic velleity, for it has formed a definite purpose, βουλὴ, which it determines to carry out.—R.]

* [ALFORD: "Energizes; but especially in and among material previously given, as here, in His material creation, and in the spirits of all flesh, also His creation." The same author remarks on the repetition of the notion of predestination: "Here first the Apostle comes to the idea of the universal church, the whole Israel of God, and therefore here brings forward again that fore-ordination which he had indeed hinted at generally in ver. 5, but which properly belonged to Israel, and is accordingly predicated of the Israel of the church."—R.]

† [In my note on Colossians, p. 35, I refer to Dr. Hitchcock's views on this point. While it is a matter of regret as regards this work as a whole that Prof. Hitchcock, owing to ill health, was obliged to abandon his intention to edit Ephesians, it is especially unfortunate that his studies on this distinction could not be incorporated here. His conclusions, however, agree in the main with those of TITTMANN, as given above.—R.]

Ver. 12. That we should be unto the praise of his glory [εἰς τὸ εἶναι ἡμᾶς εἰς ἐπαινον δόξης αὐτοῦ]. The Rec. inserts τῆς before δόξης on very slight authority.—[R.]—This marks the goal, which is set up for those who are “predestinated” in the “purpose,” with the further definition: “to the praise of his glory.” Comp. ver. 6. Here He Himself and His glory are the object of the praise, as in ver. 14. This expression, three times repeated, and always used at the close of a circle of thought, must be explained each time in the same way, and so that the emphasis which is laid on it be not lessened; accordingly we must retain its force as a designation of the aim or goal, remembering that εἶναι precedes it; a being is spoken of, which is attained through a becoming, and this status is that of persons (ἡμᾶς), who not merely praise with the mouth, in words, but should be themselves a praise. Hence the phrase is not all to be regarded as an incisum or as parenthetical, nor should we join “that we should be” either with “in Christ” (ZELTNER) or with “who before hoped” (KNAPP, FLATT, HARLESS, OLSHAUSEN and others), as though the thought were: the goal of the predestination is, that we who before hoped, should be in Christ, to the praise and glory of God, or that we to God’s glory, hoped before in Christ. MORUS: ut adeo in Christo spem reponere possimus in laudem honorumque Dei. This displaces the proper aim, and what it substitutes cannot be an aim; the hope of the Jews, the faith of the Gentiles.

We who have before hoped in Christ [or the Christ]. —Τοὺς προηλπικότας = quippe qui antea spem posuerunt (WINER, p. 127);* it characterizes those who have thus become to the praise of God, by pointing out the way to this. The construction is not singular (1 Cor. xv. 19: ἐν Χριστῷ ἠλπικότες; Rom. xv. 13: ἔλπεις ἐν δυνάμει πνεύματος ἁγίου, before in ver. 12: ἐπ’ αὐτῷ—ἐλπίουσιν). “In Christ,” ἐν τῷ Χριστῷ, marks this vital fellowship with Him; it is not = εἰς τὸν Χριστόν, towards Him, to Him; He is the ground of the hope.

And now πρό! It points to the state and the period before attaining the appointed goal, hence to the earthly life; it is a designation of the Christian state in the pilgrimage. Hence BENGE very properly remarks: τὸ ante refertur ad tempora V. T., but he is incorrect in referring “before” to persons as though the Jews were thus indicated (primum nacti sunt Judei deinde gentes, Acts xix. 46). So CHRYSOSTOM, ERASMUS, HARLESS, STIER, MEYER and others. But προηλπίεν ἐν τῷ Χριστῷ is not=προσδέχεσθαι (Luke ii. 25, 28), notwithstanding Acts xxviii. 20; xxvi. 6, 7. This phrase is added to what precedes in order, as in ver. 6, to furnish at the same time a point of connection for what follows, a transition; hence at the close (ver. 14) no such addition is made.

[The view developed above is that of DE WETTE,† and of EADIE (in his first edition).

* [ELLCOTT objects to this as inexact, observing that “this would imply a particle without, not as here with the article.” He refers to DONALDSON, Cratylus, § 304, Grammar, § 492 sq. It should be noticed that the perfect participle expresses here as so often a past act continuing to the present, the perfect of permanent state.—R.]

† It should be noticed, that DE WETTE, who is the principal supporter of this view, is also the chief opposer of the Nearly all modern commentators accept at this point a distinction between ἡμεῖς and ὑμεῖς, referring the former to Jewish Christians, the latter to Gentile Christians. (The other view refers the former to Christians in general, the latter to the readers.) I am constrained to differ from Dr. BRAUNE here, and adopt the common opinion. (1) No other view allows to προ its proper meaning. To refer the participle to the earthly life, seems far-fetched. The word would not be an appropriate characteristic of all Christians in this connection. Nor is the reference to before the time of writing, worthy of the context. (2) The antithetical καὶ ὑμεῖς (ver. 13) is well-nigh conclusive, especially if it be taken as the direct subject of the verb ἐσπαραγίσθητε. The Jews had in the Messianic prophecies a ground for their hoping before, but a sealing was more prominent in the case of the Gentiles to whom no such promise had come. (3) The form ἐν τῷ Χριστῷ, instead of εἰς τὸν Χριστόν, is not against this view: “to have hoped in Christ was a higher characteristic than to have directed hope towards Christ, and designated them as more worthy exponents of the praise of God’s glory” (ELLCOTT).—If this view be accepted, then we can with propriety retain the article in translating: in the Christ, as indeed BRAUNE himself insists on the emphatic force of the article in the similar phrase, ver. 10. Any emphasis upon it here would tell against his view.—R.]

THIRD FOUNDATION. Vers. 13, 14: The personal appropriation of salvation.

Ver. 13. In whom ye also.—Ἐν ᾧ, in Christ, viz., “ye were sealed,” since the repetition of ἐν ᾧ is justified by the added phrase: “after that ye heard,” etc. Comp. WINER, p. 545, 1. [For a capital defence of this view of the construction, see ELLCOTT in loc.—R.] Evidently neither ἐστὲ (MEYER) [ALFORD], nor ἠλπικατε (ERASMUS, CALVIN, BEZA [E. V., ESTIUS] and others), nor ἐκληρώθητε (ANSELM, KOPPE, HARLESS, OLSHAUSEN)* should be supplied. The last is manifestly too remote, the second could only be προηλπικατε, and the first is unnecessary. It is impossible to take the participle ἀκούσαντες as a finite verb (Syriac, LUTHER: have heard) [i. e., as the predicate of ὑμεῖς]; just as little should ἐν ᾧ be explained as ideo (MORUS).

“Ye also” refers to the readers, and places them in antithesis to “we:” that is, the Christians specially addressed, the local church, written to, over against Christendom in general, the church as a whole. There is no ground whatever for the reference to Gentile Christians, which is accepted by nearly all modern expositors, except RUECKERT; nor does the context justify it. [See my note on ver. 12. The passage is markedly antithetical, and this is a ground for the reference to the Gentile Christians. As for the context: while hearing and

Pauline origin of our Epistle. Naturally enough the latter opinion would influence his judgment on this point, for one who believes that this verse was written by a pupil of the Apostle Paul, in all probability a Gentile, would fail to see the appropriateness of giving prominence to the antithesis between Jewish and Gentile Christians accepted by most commentators.—R.]

* [So HODGE, who misapprehends the difficulties attending the construction accepted by BRAUNE.—R.]

believing and sealing belong to all Christians, there was undoubtedly in the previous circumstances of the Gentile Christians, a good reason for emphasizing these facts in their case.—R.]

Having heard the word of truth, ἀκούσαντες τὸν λόγον τῆς ἀληθείας.—This points to the external situation, in which the apostolic preaching came to them, and they accepted it. This is by no means a token that they are Gentile Christians (STIER, SCHENKEL and others), but is chiefly applicable rather to the Jews. (Acts xiii. 46, xviii. 5, 6; Rom. i. 16; xv. 8).^{*} That which is imparted, "the word of truth," is so termed on account of its contents (2 Tim. ii. 15), as it is called "of God," on account of its origin (Acts xiii. 46); "of life," 1 Jno. i. 1, on account of its effect. In Col. i. 6: "in the word of the truth of the Gospel" (comp. Gal. ii. 5: "the truth of the gospel") the shading of the thought is somewhat different; here the reference is less to the antithesis in Judaism (the "shadow" of the O. T.), as CHRYSOSTOM, STIER think, or to that in heathenism with its lies (A-LAPIDE and others), or to both (GROTIUS), than to Christ, who is the Truth, so that the word as to its contents and origin is τῆς ἀληθείας (HARLESS, SCHENKEL [EADIE, ALFORD, ELLICOTT, HODGE] and others). But the phrase is never = doctrina vera (MORUS, KOPPE), institutio in vera religione (WAHL).

The gospel of your salvation, τὸ εὐαγγέλιον τῆς σωτηρίας ὑμῶν.—This is appositional, defining what precedes, and in such a way that "word" corresponds to "gospel," "truth" to "salvation;" the latter word sets forth the power of saving, which is joined to the gospel, which operates through it (Rom. i. 16; 1 Cor. i. 18; iv. 20); hence it is the contents to be imparted; "salvation" is more comprehensive than "forgiveness of sins," redemption (ver. 7); it is "the certain, complete rescuing" (STIER). [ELLICOTT distinguishes between the two genitives; taking ἀληθείας as genitive substantivæ, σωτηρίας as "a genitive of the (spiritual) contents or subject-matter, etc., 'the gospel which turns upon, which reveals salvation,' thus forming one of that large class of genitives of remoter reference."—R.]

In whom I say having also believed, ye were sealed [ἐν ᾧ καὶ πιστεύσαντες ἐσφραγίσθητε]. 'Εν ᾧ, "in whom," stands in the anaphora and, as in the beginning of this verse and in ver. 11, refers to Christ; this is required by καὶ πιστεύσαντες, since καὶ connects with the preceding ἀκούσαντες: "the inward state of being permeated by the word of truth is expressed by the advance from ἀκούσαντες to καὶ πιστεύσαντες, they have heard it and at the same time really appropriated it" (MATTHIES); hence both words have the same reference. Although it is grammatically allowable that ἐν ᾧ be connected with πιστεύσαντες and applied to the gospel (Mark i. 15; πιστεύετε ἐν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ); yet as a matter of syntax it should be referred to ἐν τῷ Χριστῷ (ver. 12) which is dialectically justified at the same time, because the vital fellowship with Christ is the pre-supposition for the σφραγισθῆναι, and faith is only the condition, the subjective means of appropriation. "Not in virtue of faith, but by means of faith in virtue of what the word proffers to him who hears and what he apprehends" (DE-LITZSCH), comes the new life in Christ.

Πιστεύσαντες may be understood, as in Rom. xiii. 11 of the act of acceptance (RUECKERT), or taken as = διὰ τῆς πίστεως, as in ver. 7; διὰ τοῦ αἵματος αὐτοῦ; iii. 12: διὰ τῆς πίστεως αὐτοῦ, Comp. Rom. v. 2; 1 Cor. iv. 15. [It is best taken absolutely.—R.] We may then say with HARLESS: the notion of the participle as to its temporal occurrence coincides with that of the finite verb. MEYER ought not to separate and sever temporally hearing, believing, baptism, reception of the Holy Ghost, although dialectically they are to be sharply distinguished.

[These aorist participles may express either contemporaneous or antecedent action. The latter relation seems to be most in accordance with the nature of the actions referred to. ALFORD takes them as indicating the terminus a quo, rendering: since, from the time when ye heard, on your believing, remarking further that the participle is and is not contemporaneous with the verb: "it is not, inasmuch as in strict accuracy, faith preceded baptism, and baptism preceded the gift of the Spirit: but it is, inasmuch as on looking back over a man's course, the period of the commencement of his faith includes all its accidents and accompaniments."—R.]

Ἐσφραγίσθητε is more closely defined by the context. It means in iv. 30; John iii. 33; vi. 27; 2 Cor. i. 22, to seal, to confirm, as σφραγίς (Rom. iv. 11; 1 Cor. ix. 2; 2 Tim. ii. 19) is the attesting seal. By means of the faith which is joined with your hearing, ye have been also sealed and certified in Christ; referring to ver. 11: ἐν ᾧ καὶ ἐκληρώθημεν. The κληρωθῆναι moves on to the σφραγισθῆναι (CHRYSOSTOM); it is not evident, how this should be particularly true of the Gentile Christians, over against the Jewish Christians, among whom Paul reckoned himself.^{*} There is not merely an intended inheritance and an attestation thereto conceded, but this is presented with a certifying seal; since the heritage is in them, they in it, and it growing into them, they are themselves made sure as heirs, are confirmed and certified in this possession. The immediate meaning is, that they have been assured of this grace for themselves; "ye have been assured by the Holy Ghost, as by a letter and seal" (RUECKERT).

The change of person (ἡμεῖς—ὑμεῖς) marks, that they have been attested in this possession for others also, strongly enough designated, to be recognized as companions. [This is equally true, if "we," "you," be referred to Jewish and Gentile Christians, for it was precisely the gift of the Holy Ghost (Acts x. 47; xi. 17), which demonstrated to Peter, that the Gentiles should be thus recognized.—R.] THEOPHYLACT: ὥστε εἶναι ὅλον, ὅτι θεοῦ ἐστε λάχος καὶ κληρος.)

^{*}[It is difficult to see how these passages prove the correctness of Dr. BRAUNE's statement. The Jews were the first hearers, but of the ὑμεῖς "believing" also is here predicated, the reference being to the same persons; hence these passages which speak of the Jews hearing and not believing, prove rather that ὑμεῖς refers to Gentile Christians.—R.]

^{*}[The sealing was the same in the case of both, but the antecedents of the Gentile Christians, the fact that they had no previous seal of God's covenant, makes this prominent in their case, but this does not require us to find here any definite allusion to circumcision.—R.]

It is only a sequel and an inference, that they have been secured from future wrath, ruin, loss and condemnation.* The passive indicates an experience, which does not proceed from themselves, is not developed out of them, but is the act of another, of God. All this is so natural and so accordant with the use of the word, which is a common one in the Old Testament, that there is no reason for supposing here an allusion to heathen customs, such as branding slaves with the name of their master (FLATT), or the stigmata of idolatrous worship (GROTIUS), or, because the letter is addressed to Ephesus, to the σφραγίς of Diana (AMETIUS), or to Jewish circumcision (SCHOTTGEN, WETSTEIN, THOLUCK and others). Nor is it equivalent to the salvation or inheritance (in RUECKERT) is sealed to you; since they themselves are attested documents.

With the Spirit of promise, the holy One [τῷ πνεύματι τῆς ἐπαγγελίας τῷ ἁγίῳ].—The dative τῷ πνεύματι, marks that with which they have been sealed, certified; iv. 30; ἐν ᾧ, wherein “ye are sealed unto the day of redemption,” denotes the fellowship with the Holy Ghost. The Spirit is here the attesting “seal,” that God affixes to those who in fellowship with Christ have heard His word and become believers: πιστεύσαντες designates the subjective means, τῷ πνεύματι the objective. In Rom. viii. 16, without the figure: “the Spirit beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God.” [With (E. V.) as indicating that the Holy Spirit is the seal, is preferable to by (ALFORD, ELLICOTT), which might imply that the Spirit was the Sealer; God is the Sealer, we are the sealed, the Spirit is the Seal.—R.]

The phrase τῷ ἁγίῳ compels us to accept a reference to the Holy Spirit; it is added with emphasis, so as to guard against the mistake, that the spirit inherent in the promise was meant.† But because τῆς ἐπαγγελίας is emphasized, it comes first; it is otherwise in John vii. 37: ἐν τῇ ἰσχυρῇ ἡμέρᾳ τῇ μεγάλῃ τῆς ἑορτῆς. Comp. WINER, p. 488 f. Of course we cannot take it as referring to special miraculous gifts of the Holy Ghost (GROTIUS, ESTIUS), as though only those thus endowed were assured of the adoption and inheritance. Nor does it refer to the donum sanctificationis (PELAGIUS, Romanists) since τῷ ἁγίῳ denotes, not the effect, but the attribute of the Spirit.

The genitive τῆς ἐπαγγελίας accordingly cannot possibly designate the promise as that in which the Spirit is immanent, inheres, but refers to that the object of which is the Spirit, viz., the Holy Spirit. BENGL is excellent: per verbum promissionis erat spiritus sanctus; dato igitur spiritu sancto, ii., qui credidere verbo, obsignati sunt; et qui spiritum sanctum habent, omnem promissionem sibi præstitum iri sciunt. So most expositors: the promised Spirit.‡ “The promise of the Spirit”

* [HODGES combines the three meanings: (1) To authenticate or confirm as genuine and true; (2) To mark as one's property; (3) To render secure.—R.]

† [MEYER well remarks that Paul wishes to give emphatic and solemn prominence to that by means of which the sealing takes place, and hence speaks with a corresponding pathos. This should be preserved in the English rendering as above (so ALFORD).—R.]

‡ [ELLICOTT: “The Spirit which came from, i. e., was announced, by promise.” EADIE: “The genitive is almost that of ablation.” MEYER takes it as “a genitive of quality, designating the promise as a characteristic of the Holy Spirit.” ALFORD would retain the article in English: “the Spirit of the promise.”—R.]

(Gal. iii. 14) is the promise which has the Spirit as its aim, or its object. The “promise” here should not, however, be limited to Christ's last words (Luke xxiv. 49; Acts i. 4), as is done by BAUMGARTEN-CRUSIUS, nor yet to the Old Testament promises (Joel iii. 1-5; Isa. xxxii. 15; xlv. 3; Ezek. xxxvi. 25; xxxix. 29), as HARLESS supposes, following CHRYSOSTOM; it includes both what is prophetic and apostolical (Luke xxiv. 44-47). The context definitely decides against the view, that the Spirit brings the promise, or that the notion of a testimonium reddere, obsignare is found in the genitival connection (THEOPHYLACT [who, however, also gives this correct explanation: ὅτι ἐξ ἐπαγγελίας ἐδόθη.—R.] CALVIN, BEZA.)

Ver. 14. Who is the earnest of our inheritance [ὅς ἐστιν ἀρραβὼν τῆς κληρονομίας ἡμῶν].—Ὅς refers logically to τὸ πνεῦμα, marking its personality, which the Apostle has in mind, constructio ad sensum, as Matth. xxviii. 19: τὰ ἔθνη—αὐτοῖς; 2 John 2: τοῖς τέκνοις—οὖς. Comp. WINER, p. 133. [A better explanation of ὅς, than the constructio ad sensum, is that of its agreement in gender with ἀρραβὼν. So MEYER, ALFORD, ELLICOTT. (See WINER, p. 157.) The last named remarks that “τὸ πνεῦμα in its most distinct personal sense is invariably used with the neuter relative.”—R.] It is not to be referred to Christ (POLYCARP); that is too remote (WINER, p. 149) and the sense will not admit of it, since the Spirit is the ἀρραβὼν; 2 Cor. i. 22: “Who hath also sealed us, and given the earnest of the Spirit in our hearts” (v. 5).

From the Hebrew אַרְבָּן (Gen. xxxviii. 3, 17, 18, 20)=pignus,* there probably arose through the agency of Phœnician traders ἀρραβὼν in Greek, arrhabo and arrha in Latin (without the h also), with the sense of “earnest-money,” the beginning of the payment which should take place in full afterwards. Hence HESYCHIUS: =πρόδομα, CHRYSOSTOM: μέρος τῶν πάντων; JEROME: Arrabo future entioni quasi quoddam testimonium et obligamentum datur. It is=ἀπαρχή τοῦ πνεύματος, Rom. viii. 23.

What the Spirit promises to vouchsafe to us in the future, in eternity, is indicated by the genitive τῆς κληρονομίας ἡμῶν, “of our inheritance.” The inheritance which is the necessary consequence of sonship (Rom. viii. 17; Gal. iv. 7) is an eternal one (Gal. iii. 18; Heb. ix. 15; comp. v. 5; Col. iii. 24). Thus then believers obtain the certainty that they are heirs and have an inheritance in eternity, not through an assurance from without, but chiefly through the reality of the possession, not at once in its entire extent, but in an earnest (HARLESS). “Our” includes the Apostle, his readers and all Christendom (1 Cor. ii. 12), because it stands at the end of the paragraph, not Gentile and Jewish Christians (STIER, SCHENKEL and others.)

nating the promise as a characteristic of the Holy Spirit.” ALFORD would retain the article in English: “the Spirit of the promise.”—R.]

Unto the redemption of his purchased possession, unto the praise of his glory, εἰς ἀπολύτρωσιν τῆς περιποιήσεως, εἰς ἑπαινον τῆς δόξης αὐτοῦ.—These two qualifying phrases, introduced by the same preposition, are to be taken as parallel, the first referring to the objective aim of the church of God, the second to the subjective aim of the redeemed member (SCHENKEL). Comp. vers. 6, 12. Hence αὐτοῦ is to be joined to περιποιήσεως as well as to δόξης (MEYER, HOFMANN), who however in Schriftbeweis, II. 2, p. 28, understands it of Christ, when it obviously refers to God the Father, (SCHENKEL). The preposition εἰς marks a goal, which is nearer at hand, more definitely described in the phrase “the earnest of our inheritance,” than in “ye were sealed,” so that the connection with the relative clause is more natural than to pass over it back to the verb of the main clause, ver. 13 (MEYER, [HODGE, ELLICOTT] and others). Thus the explanation of ἀπολύτρωσις as ἡ τίμεια is required. [That is, as in chap. iv. 30; Rom. viii. 23 (comp. my note in loco) the full final redemption, the accomplishment of all that is included in the word (ALFORD).—R.] The context, however, gives a further definition with τῆς περιποιήσεως (αὐτοῦ.)

Περιποιεῖν = to cause something to remain, to let remain, to deliver; περιποιεῖσθαι, to cause to remain for one's self, hence to acquire, to gain. The substantive therefore = acquisition, possession. In 2 Thess. v. 9: εἰς περιποίησιν σωτηρίας; 2 Thess. ii. 14: εἰς περιποίησιν δόξης, it is acquisition as the genitives indicate; 1 Pet. ii. 9: λαὸς εἰς περιποίησιν, it is evidently possession (comp. Matth. iii. 17; Acts xx. 28; Isa. xliii. 21), hence = הֵנִיחַ as the people of Israel were termed, which is elsewhere designated by περιποίησις (Exod. xix. 5; Deut. vii. 6; xiv. 2; xxvi. 18, λαὸς περιποίησις, LXX. and Tit. ii. 14), peculium Dei. Hence the “redemption” applies to God's possession, to the people already acquired by Him, and cannot be the first redeeming act, “the forgiveness of sins” (ver. 7; Col. i. 14; Rom. iii. 24), by which the people are acquired, but must be the completed work, to which the Holy Ghost, as earnest, pledge, points and leads. So most expositors from THEOPHYLACT (οἱ τινὲς ἔσμεν περιποίησις καὶ κτήσις καὶ περιουσία θεοῦ) and EUSEBIUS (διὰ τὸ περιποιήσασθαι ἡμᾶς τὸν θεόν) to ERASMUS and the latest time. Hence εἰς is not = usque, usque ad (MORUS), nor ἀπολύτρωσις = mors, liberatio a malo (MORUS), nor is the genitive τῆς περιποιήσεως a designation of the effect (LUTHER: to our redemption, that we become His possession; STIER: to the redemption, that we become and because we are His possession.)

[It rarely occurs that a passage presenting a number of difficulties is interpreted with so great an approach to unanimity as in this case. Modern English and American commentators, almost without an exception take the same view as BRAUNE. STIER, among the Germans, does not reject it, but puts other meanings upon the passage as usual. EADIE gives his Trinitarian division as follows: “The Father seals believers, and His glory is the last end; in the Son they are sealed, and their redemption is His work; while the Spirit ‘which proceedeth’ from the Father, and is sent by the Son—is the Seal and Earnest.”—For a very full discussion of the word περιποίησις, see HARLESS, whose comments have largely contributed in producing the unanimity respecting this passage among modern interpreters.—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The importance of the doctrine of predestination. The Apostle speaks in great emotion, as is unmistakably shown by the remarkably complicated structure of his sentences, and with special emphasis, as the repetition and strength of his expressions (vers. 4, 5, 9, 11) equally prove. CHEMNITZ says, in a sermon on Matth. xxii. (in FRANK'S Theologie der Form. Concord., iv. 268): “Therefore (on account of the contests arising out of the doctrine of election) it has occurred to some, that we ought not to preach at all to Christians in the church about the foreknowledge and choice of God, because it is dangerous to both sides, as it is said, leading either to security or despair; but because God has revealed this very doctrine to us so often and in so many parts of the Scripture, we must not put it under the table, may not and should not say, that it is unprofitable, obnoxious or injurious, yet we must so look into it, as not to run too far or climb too high, but have and hold in all simplicity the true understanding and proper use thereof.” [It may well be added, that such use is for Christians alone (ver. 5: “us”), and that this use will lead on the one hand to trustful security in view of the fixedness of God's purpose, on the other hand to profound humility in view of the entire freedom of God's choice irrespective of our merit. Others may, nay some must speculate on this subject, but they find no solution of this problem save so far as God's word gives one; and this solution can be fully apprehended only by a believing soul; it is above logic and philosophy, and even technical theology, even as on many subjects, and these the most important, the heart is a better teacher than the head. Still even the most advanced Christian, seeing that God's word alone gives any solution, may well say with the martyr Ridley: “In these matters I am so fearful, that I dare not speak further; yea almost none otherwise than the text does, as it were, lead me by the hand” (from EADIE).—R.]

2. The starting-point. It must be by no means be overlooked, that the Apostle first expresses in praise the consciousness of salvation, though in a summary way, and then passes to predestination. Even the transition (“even as he chose us”) does not place predestination in the first rank; it only marks the actual relation, and that the possession of salvation becomes our portion according to the election and fore-ordination; yet it still remains true, that from the consciousness of salvation we should look into the eternal will of God, and be lifted up to it. This is done in the confession of the Lutheran church, Form. Concord., article xi. In that symbol we begin with sin and the natural powers of man (i. ii.), then follows Justification and its consequences (iii. iv.), next the means of grace in the Word and the Lord's Supper (v. vi. vii.); to these are joined the Christological articles (viii. ix.), and De ceremoniis ecclesiasticis (x.) seems to form the conclusion. But last of all there is added further: De aeterna prædestinatione et electione Dei. See FRANK, Theologie, i. 48; iv. 188. The Reformed in their confessions (Basle, Belgic, Westminster, Helvetic and others) proceed from the speculative idea of God, which is neither Pauline, biblical, nor advisable. [This objection as regards abstractness does not hold against the Heidelberg Catechism. Still the Lutheran symbols go to the opposite extreme. That the order in the Reformed confessions is Pauline, Dr. Braune unconsciously admits in the order he himself adopts in these notes (ver. 4 follows ver. 3 very closely, be it observed). If it be Pauline, it is Scriptural, though this Apostle is not alone in putting God and His will so prominently in advance. As to its advisableness: some minds demand the Reformed order, which is at all events that of logical statement, of systematic theology. Others object to it, but the great difficulty is not met by any change of position. If we claim that believing hearts, "blessed with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ," alone are competent for the discussion, we have claimed all that our section warrants us in doing. Let each systematize as he will; we cannot make God's truth dependent on the order of our symbols. Let us be charitable, since some minds are so constituted as to accept or even demand Calvinism, and others prefer to take the difficulty in another form. Let each hold, indeed, that God's truth is objective truth independent of our subjective statements, and hope for the time when a higher synthesis will reconcile what seems now to be contradictory, all the more because neither Calvinism nor Arminianism has solved the problem presented in this chapter, though one may in its efforts embrace more of the facts of the rule of grace and providence than the other. Comp. the Doctr. Notes on Rom. ix. in the Bible-work—R.]

3. The object of the predestination is set forth in "us" (vers. 4, 5, 6, 8, 9, 12, 14) and "you" (ver. 13), and in such a way that no ground for the predestination is to be found in those predestinated, hence nothing indicates a limitation of it. It is rather to be extended as widely as sin reaches, and the "forgiveness of sins" (ver. 7) is necessary, and the hearing of "the word of truth, the gospel of salvation" (ver. 13) is designed to extend. Hence the whole human race is the object of the predestination, and as the words "we" and "you" require, not in a mass, but down to each individual. This is entirely in accordance with 1 Tim. ii. 4 (πάντας ἀνθρώπους θέλει σωθῆναι), with the Lord's word, John iii. 16 (ἡγάπησεν ὁ θεὸς τὸν κόσμον), and the saying of Peter (2 Pet. iii. 9: μὴ βουλόμενος τινὰ ἀπολέσθαι, ἀλλὰ πάντας εἰς μετάνοιαν χωρῆσαι). It is precisely the section before us which marks the Divine will of mercy as directed towards all. We must maintain the universality of grace, UNIVERSALIS VOLUNTAS DEI, quod non tantum prædictio penitentiae, verum etiam promissio evangelii sit universalis, hoc est, ad omnes homines pertineat (Form. Cono. xi. 23). The word πάντας (1 Tim. ii. 4) cannot be explained by cujusvis status atque conditionis homines, tam illustres ac potentes in mundo, quam obscuros (PISCATOR), neither can we understand under κόσμον (Jno. iii. 16) the elect, on the ground that God never loved the damned (βέζα), nor limit πάντας (2 Pet. iii. 9) by nempe credentes (PISCATOR). Thus the Form. Cono. (xi. 23); et quidem Deus illo suo consilio—non tantum in genere salutem suorum procuravit, verum etiam OMNES ET SINGULAS PERSONAS electorum—præcivit—eligit (comp. ibid. § 54). The Lutheran confession, it is true, besides the universality of the grace of God notes also with a reference to this section a particularity of the election of grace, of which not all, good and bad, are the objects, but only the children of God: ÆTERNA VERO ELECTIO seu PRÆDESTINATIO DEI AD SALUTEM non simul ad bonos et ad malos pertinet, sed tantum ad filios Dei, qui ad æternam vitam consequendam electi et ordinati sunt, priusquam mundi fundamenta jacerentur (xi. 5). Accordingly we should reject here the double predestination to salvation and damnation, which from the first was taught by LUTHER and MELANCHTHON (following AUGUSTINE, who, however, expressed himself very prudently and only in an infra-lapsarian sense, and GOTTSCHALK in the ninth century with his duplex sive gemina prædestinatio), but in an infra-lapsarian sense, maintained however by ZWINGLE (see HAHN, Stud. u. Krit., 1837, pp. 765-805) and CALVIN in a supralapsarian sense, and revived by the Jansenism of the Catholic Church in the 17th century, and by E. W. KRUMMACHER in our day, and also the doctrine of SAMUEL HUBERS, that God has in His Son ordained and elected each and every man to eternal life (see FRANK, iv. pp. 165, 281 ff., HAGENBACH in Herzog's Real-Enc., vi. p. 293 ff.), a doctrine which SCHLEIERMACHER repeats in his discussion of the doctrine of election (Werke Theol. ii. p. 393 f) and in his Glaubenslehre (§ 119, 2), and also the view of HOFMANN (Schriftbeweis, i. p. 257 ff.), followed by LUTHARDT (Compendium der Dogmatik, p. 85), which denies the reference of the decree of grace to a definite number. [Dr. Braune seems to avoid a definite statement. Whatever may be deduced from the other passages referred to, Paul here declares that individual persons are chosen by God, predestinated unto adoption. How many those persons are is a question which when asked of the Son of God led only to personal exhortation. Who they are, manifests itself only in the exercise of faith, though even this is not always manifest to others (nor, as in the case of infants, is this a decisive test). Practically, the question is respecting our personal appropriation of the blessings of redemption, which are according as (καθώς, ver. 4) the election. Logically and theologically, the fact that some are partakers of blessing and others not, when taken in connection with the statement of vers. 4, 5, leads to the conclusion, that of God's free will some have been chosen and others not chosen. The negation is, however, all that any ought to deduce from our passage. The difficulties arising from this conclusion cannot be fully met save by a heart so trustful in its affection to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, as to know it to be right because He has so ordered. The same difficulty meets us in God's providential dealings, aye, in the workings of

His natural laws, for as a brilliant author has well said: "Nature is a terrible Calvinist." Paul concerns himself here only with the positive side, which presents but one difficulty, viz. that of fully responding in love to the gracious fact.—R.]

4. The Subject of the predestination is God, the Father of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ (ver. 3), and that, too, in His "love" (ver. 4) according to "the good pleasure of His will" (vers. 5, 9), or "the purpose of Him who worketh all things after the counsel of His will" (ver. 11); reference being made to His "grace" (ver. 11), and "the mystery of His will" (ver. 9) being recognized as the subject of the revelation. A duplex state in God Himself is by no means indicated, but rather excluded. In Him there are not two wills, one revealed, according to which God wills the salvation of all men, and another secret (occulta illa et metuenda voluntas Dei ordinantis suo consilio, quos et quales prædicat et oblate misericordie capaces et participes esse velit), nor do His mercy and justice exist merely beside each other, the latter respecting the damned and the former the elect. It is not that God is gracious, and at the same time just, or just and yet gracious, but in that He provides a satisfaction for His justice, He is gracious, and because He will satisfy His grace, He appeases His justice, so that justice as satisfied is the ground of grace, and grace as to be satisfied is the ground for the satisfaction of justice (FRANK, iv. 191). The secret will is not here asserted beside the revealed, nor can the secret will detract aught from the revealed; the latter, "as the real, unlimitedly efficient" will, stands "constantly over against the apparently contradicting secret" will and "conditions and controls" "the reality of the secret will." "A secret will in abstracto, not having at the same time in itself as substantial elements the substantial determinations of the revealed will, does not exist" (FRANK, iv. pp. 198-200). "The Scriptures, however, teach, that the Providence of God has not such a manner and meaning as if a master cook determines he will strangle some of the pheasants lying before him and let others fly, a figure Gerson uses, but predestination comprises in itself totum decretum redemptionis, vocationis, justificationis, gubernationis et glorificationis, as Paul throughout the first chapter of the Epistle to the Ephesians thus treats and expounds this doctrine in detail" (CIEMNITZ in FRANK). The omnipotence and executive energy of God is conditioned and bound by His will, by His Nature, as well as by the regulations He has Himself established, which will be spoken of hereafter (notes 6, 7, 8). It is not the Absolute in itself, nor yet the purely Absolute One, but the self-conditioning Unconditioned One. Accordingly the Scriptures and the Lutheran Confession distinguish from the prædestinatio Dei ad salutem, taken as identical with the electio, the præsentia Dei, according to which He prævidet et novit etiam mala, sed non ea ratione, quasi Dei voluntas propitia illa sit, ut fiat (Form. Conc. xi. 6); principium autem et causa mali non sit ipsa Dei præsentia, Deus enim non creat, procurat, efficit aut operatur malum, sed neque illud juvat aut promovet (Ibid 7).

[The theory of the self-conditioning of God is a favorite one with many German theologians. Such self-conditioning may be assumed as the basis of creation, especially the creation of free moral agents, but the mystery yet remains: an Almighty God from whose freedom none of His creatures dare detract aught, and moral, yet sinful, men, from whose freedom of will God will detract nothing. If foreknowledge be assumed as the basis of the predestination, the difficulty is increased: "If God foresaw this faith and holiness, then these qualities were either self-created, or were to be bestowed by Himself; if the former, the grace of God is denied, and if the latter, the question turns upon itself—what prompted God to give them the faith and holiness which He foresaw they should possess" (EADIE). BRAUNE only hints at this explanation, however. Sir WM. HAMILTON's "Philosophy of the Unconditioned" encounters the problem* as directly as Calvinism. Assuming as we must that "God's grace fits men for heaven, but men by unbelief prepare themselves for hell," we still insist: that St. Paul here teaches the entire freedom of choice on the part of God, that choice being in accordance with the nature of the Sovereign Chooser; and at the same time in ver. 13 assumes the free faith on the part of those addressed, while the state of blessing which moves his thanksgiving is expressly said to be in accordance with the choice of God. So much a fair exegesis allows, as Dr. BRAUNE himself admits in his exegetical notes. "Whether this doctrine be identified with Pagan Stoicism or Mohammedan fatalism, and be rudely set aside, and the world placed under the inspection of an inert omniscience; or whether it be modified as to its end, and be declared to be privilege, and not holiness; or as to its foundation, and that be alleged to be not gratuitous and irrespective choice, but foreseen merit and goodness; or as to its subjects, and they be affirmed to be not individuals, but communities; or as to its result, and it be reckoned contingent, and not absolute; or whether the idea of election be diluted into mere preferential choice;"—"such hypotheses leave the central difficulty still unsolved, and throw us back on the unconditioned and undivided sovereignty of Him 'of whom, to whom, and through whom are all things,'—all whose plans and purposes wrought out in the Church, and designed to promote His glory, have been conceived in the vast and incomprehensible solitudes of His own eternity."—EADIE.—R.]

5. The end of the predestination is defined in a threefold way:

a. For the predestinated: "unto adoption" (ver.

* [EADIE, whose notes on this subject are as judicious as they are apt, quotes from Sir Wm. Hamilton (Discussions, etc. p. 698): "It is here shown to be as irrational as irreligious, on the ground of human understanding, to deny, either, on the one hand, the fore-knowledge, predestination, and free grace of God, or, on the other, the free will of man; that we should believe both, and both in unison, though unable to comprehend even either apart. This philosophy proclaims with St. Augustine, and Augustine in his maturest writings:—'If there be not free grace in God, how can He save the world? and if there be not free will in man, how can the world by God be judged?' (Ad Valentinum Epist. 2.4.) Or, as the same doctrine is perhaps expressed even better by St. Bernard: 'Abolish free will and there is nothing to be saved; abolish free grace, and there is nothing wherewithal to save.' (De Gratia et Libero Arbitrio.)" See the list of authors of all opinions given by EADIE, pp. 28, 29.—R.]

5), in which "redemption, the forgiveness of sins" (vers. 7, 14) are given to them in grace ("His grace which He freely bestowed upon us," ver. 6), so that they as the "possession" of God (ver. 14) become partakers of the inheritance (ver. 11), of the salvation which the gospel brings (ver. 13) and "holy and without blame" (ver. 4).

b. For the entire world, in the history of which through various periods of development ("dispensation of the fulness of times," ver. 10), it is accomplished: "to gather up together all things in Christ."

c. For God the Lord: "unto the praise of the glory of His grace" (ver. 6), "unto the praise of His glory" (vers. 12, 14). The aim is accordingly as much moral as religious, and as much individually-personal as world-historical. The synthesis of the moral and religious factors, which is in the main peculiar to the Sacred Scriptures (SCHENKEL), appears all the more prominently here, as the emphatic εἰς ἑαυτὸν is at once both religious and moral. The same is true of the glory of God and the blessedness of man, and so much so that it is not correct to affirm that the glory of God and it alone is "the final and most exalted end of the creation and redemption of the world" (SCHENKEL).

What is world-historical must be combined with what is personal, the individual life with the whole; it is however unmistakable, that the relation of the creature to the Creator is arranged in order to regulate the demeanor of the former, and that the whole is wrought upon by the individual parts becoming the object of activity, as these are wrought upon through the whole, and thus the totality is brought to completion.

6. The Mediator is Christ, "our Lord and Saviour" (ver. 3), "the Beloved" (ver. 6), and it is "through His blood" (ver. 7) thus in conformity to His eternal Person and His relation to God, as well as according to His atoning and redeeming sufferings in time. Æterna igitur prædestinatio in Christo et nequaquam extra mediatorem Christum consideranda est (Form. Conc. xi. 65). Since then God, who is the Father of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, the Beloved, formed the decree of redemption in Christ, He must be conceived of as existing before the purpose, and hence the Person of Christ as that eternal person, in whom the Father chose us, as He created us in Him despite the foreseen fall. Accordingly Christ is the causa meritoria of our election, both of the purpose and its accomplishment, to which latter the suffering of death, mentioned in ver. 7, especially refers. Although the Reformed agree with the Lutherans in formal statement on this point, all their symbols describing the election of grace as taking place in Christo and propter Christum, yet they deviate from scriptural truth, in regarding Him as the object of the predestination: ut ipse quoque ἐκλεκτός (Helvet. Conf. V.), and not as fundamentum ipsam electionem præcedens, not as causa meritoria. So that they not only refer with propter Christum to the idea of satisfaction, which should not be the causa impulsiva, rather merely the condition chosen by God for the actualization of the predestination in eternal blessedness, but also with in Christo wish to designate only the medium of the accomplishment. According to this view only for those elected by God's mercy is there a Christ and an atoning death, and it cannot be perceived whence there should then arise any necessity of the atoning act of redemption for the satisfaction of Divine wrath; for the grace has not to be rendered possible, but the determined gracious purpose has only to be carried out. Comp. SCHNECKENBURGER, Vergleichende Darstellung, I. p. 192 ff.; FRANK, IV. p. 192 ff. [It is scarcely fair to take the strongly partisan work of HEIDEGGER (Formula Consensus Helvetica, 1675, see Biblework, Romans, pp. 191, 192) as a representative of the Reformed Confessions on this point. There has been, since the days of the Reformation, a tendency in the Reformed Church to bald forensic statements on this point, but to-day the full significance of the phrase: "in Christ," is perhaps better understood than ever before.—R.]

7. The means of grace in carrying out the decree of redemption the Apostle indicates with γνώσας, "having made known" (ver. 9), and calls them also: "the word of truth, the Gospel of your salvation" (ver. 13). To neither designation of the Divine word is there attached any limitation as respects the sphere of its effect, while the genitives describe rather, partly ("of truth") an efficient truth, calculated for all, as the purport of this word, partly ("of your salvation") the power and effect, which it bears in itself and exercises. At all events we should maintain, as respects this chapter, what is said in the Form. Conc. xi. 16, 29, 33 (where the German version has "verleiht," the Latin expressing it more weakly: largiri vult, though meaning quite as much): For it should not be thought, that God spoke thus: Externally through the word I call all of you, to whom I give my word, into my kingdom, but in my heart I do not intend it for all, but only for a certain few; for it is my will, that the greater part of those whom I thus call through my word should not be enlightened and converted, but be and remain condemned, although I declare otherwise respecting them in the invitations of my word. "Hoc enim esset Deo contradictorias voluntates fingere" (xi. 24). [This is the old difficulty in another form. It is a difficulty of fact, too. For a large portion of those who have the word of God in their hands and hear it, even while it is the Gospel of salvation to those who sit beside them, are "not enlightened and converted." Why not? The question is not a merely theoretical one, but comes out of agonized hearts often enough. An answer which charges God with folly, or which accepts His purpose as thwarted, will not satisfy the heart, however theologians may philosophize: the resting place in this strait, as in all others, is in God. "He worketh all things after the counsel of His will"—but is "the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ."—R.]

8. The condition of the saving effect of these means the Apostle marks with ἀκούσαντες, to which he adds with emphasis καὶ πιστεύσαντες (ver. 13), and with προηλεκτός ἐν τῷ Χριστῷ. The Formula of Concord aptly states these thoughts (xi. 17): Decrevit etiam se spiritu sancto suo per verbum annuntiatum audiente perceptum et memorie commendatum velle in nobis efficacem esse, et corda ad veram penitentiam agendam inflectere et vera fide conservare. There is at least nothing to be derived from these propositions in favor of the Synergism of Melancthon and his followers. The word of God develops in the hearer that power which he has placed in it, and in this power he apprehends, being himself first apprehended, what is bidden him, and thus gains hope and confidence through the power of the word which has become vital and active in him. But it is indicated definitely enough that man can resist; he is not forced to hear and accept what is proclaimed, nor to believe in it and hope in it. Since God will save only in Christ, and only through the Word will create faith and hope in Him, this does not accord with the statement of the Reformed and the Predestinarians, that God wills nothing which He does not do. If the Nivites could avert His punitive will by repentance, so His gracious will may be thwarted through resistance. This is Scriptural truth, and it is confirmed by Christian experience, which knows of no necessity for obeying the will of God, but too well of a possibility of resisting it (FRANK, IV. p. 205). The gratia irresistibilis of AUGUSTINE is a fiction arising from an abstract conception of the purely Absolute. The unconditioned yet self-conditioning Personality of God does not will, as the predestinarians think that He wills, but with a self-restraining almightiness within the sphere of redemption, so that salvation is not gained without His will, but the proffered salvation is lost through man's own fault against His earnest gracious will, which He offers in His Word. Both must be maintained: God has willingly given men of His will and conditioned Himself, in placing conditions before men in the hearing and believing of His Word, and man has the power of continued resistance, so that an entire apocatastasis of all things, the ultimate salvation of all, although God's revealed will points thereto, is scarcely conceivable, as ORIGEN, SCHELERMACHER and others suppose. A final resistance is to be maintained as possible. NITZSCHE, System, p. 416.

9. Assurance of election is definitely pointed out in vers. 13, 14: "ye were sealed with the Spirit of promise, the Holy One, who is the earnest of our inheritance," and although in consequence of faith (πιστις), still on the ground of the promise of the Holy Ghost and the resulting bestowal of the same—in the means of grace, the word, and baptism (which, though not expressed, is to be understood) and through which Christ's merit, that is and suffices for all, is attributed to us. On the ground of the certainty, that God's word is true, that God has loved the world, that Christ has died for the sins of the whole world, and that God has called you also, must have called you, because He has loved you in Christ, and I have been baptized, accepted as a child, endowed with the Holy Ghost, renewed, regenerated, even though it be but germinally, potentially, I am certain of my election before the foundation of the world, and my inheritance in eternity. [Rightly enough the doctrine of election is for the comfort of believers, but they will derive far more comfort from a more definite conception of the matter. If "baptismal regeneration" is a ground for the assurance of election, then many thus assured are not sanctified in this world, and such an assurance is not likely to further such a result. The Augustinian view is here the practical one.—R.]

10. The possibility of apostasy is indicated by the phrase "unto the redemption of the purchased possession." It marks chiefly the goal to which the Holy Ghost, as "earnest of our inheritance," points. But the Christian has the consciousness, that his life-development is an ethical, not a physical, process, that he can withdraw himself, can resist the Divine will, can fall and fall away too. God will preserve us to the end and complete His work on and in us, si modo non ipsi nos ab eo averlamus (Form. Conc., xi. 32, 75). Hence the warnings in the hortatory part of this Epistle (chap. iv.—vi). Comp. Heb. vi. 4-6, where the fall of the regenerate is assumed, and only the return of such is called impossible. Accordingly there inheres in the reference to election and the possession of salvation a strong means of incitement to sanctification, on the ground and in virtue of the existing ethical matter of fact in faith. [An "earnest" is generally a safeguard against failure to fulfil the agreement, nor does the preposition εἰς (ver. 14), rendered "until" in the E. V., indicate any possibility of failure, but rather with its strong final sense, and that too in parallelism with "unto the praise of his glory," implies the very opposite. The doctrine of the perseverance of the saints stands or falls with that of personal predestination, and both are parts of the theological system, which makes "His glory" the chief end.—R.]

11. Concluding remark. A mystery remains here until eternity. It is analogous to a miracle, which is not such in the sight of God nor of the redeemed any longer, but only for those in lower stages. Thus it is with the mystery of God's will, which is ever dissolving and in the higher degrees of revelation becomes ever more manifest. The completion of revelation like that of the inheritance lies beyond this world. Hence we have no contradictions,* that inhere in the Scripture or the truth, but only those which belong to human statement, and are such to our understanding. Let us then be humble! [This is the best guard against dogmatism. Especially let those who hold those views of Divine Sovereignty which are most humbling learn the lesson!—R.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Begin always with thanksgiving to God, and neither forget nor overlook the benefits He has conferred upon you; but above all consider the spiritual gifts with which He has blessed you and yours.—The beginning, middle, and end of the Christian life, or its ground, path and goal, is the praise and adoration of God. Before God created men, He willed that they should be His children; it is just in being or becoming God's children, that we foster the human in us, and we should be Christians, in order to be really men. He who does not fully become a man, is no proper Christian or child of God. The ultimate end of God is His glory; this is attained, when we become holy and blameless. He wills His glory only in our blessedness; the Father's honor is linked with the children's blessedness.—Everything is to be traced back to the will of God: what is manifest, revealed, experienced is the guide into the secrecy of God and His will; we must let ourselves be led from His revealed will into His secret will.—God accomplishes His will, but only according to the purpose of His will; hence not in a physical, chemical, “natural” process, but in an ethical life-process of men created after His image and for sonship with Him does He effect the desired and determined redemption of the same.—In Christ, the Beloved, is the counsel of salvation formed, in Christ it is to be carried out, and in such a way that Christ dies for the sake of sinners as a sacrifice of reconciliation, as an atoning sacrifice, and with the forgiveness of sins is begun that redemption, which leads to the throne and heart of God, since the Spirit of God works on our spirit, and His work not being in vain, confirms us in sonship, in regeneration and renewal even unto the inheritance. The process is from above to beneath, then from within to without, in order to lead from the depths up on high. The mystery of the Divine will is not in itself an incomprehensible, inconceivable enigma, entirely uncomprehended; it is only a mystery for us, rising so far above us, who cannot fathom its depth nor measure its infinitude, considering the majesty and the kindness of the same. For our reason it is a mystery; not contrary to, but above our reason; the reason of man and of God are two very different things. The mystery of the Divine will is only the manifestation of what is conditioned, limited, finite and imperfect in our knowledge, which bears to what in itself is clearest of all the same relation as the eyes of night birds to bright daylight. It is a proof of a Divine revelation, if we seem, when confronted with His will and truth, to be transferred to a shoreless sea, a fathomless depth. That is at once the mystery and the revelation of God. Without revelation knowest thou nothing of God, canst know nothing of Him; whoever rejects the revelation in Christ, in the sacred Scriptures, rejects also the science of God Himself; to him the mystery of God ever becomes a riddle without solution, while the Christian ever knows and feels it with greater joy. It is not unreasonable to believe on the mystery in God, since this disappears ever more and more; like children, we grow into the truth which was at first so mysterious.—As Christ is the point of beginning for the Father's gracious decree in eternity, so He is the middle-point of its accomplishment in history, and the terminal point in its consummation.—All things, the creation of heaven and earth, the maintenance and administration of the world are subordinate and subservient to the counsel of God's grace respecting our redemption in Christ: the Father is concerned for His children, not for His servants and His possessions; these are employed and rightly placed, when the children are cared for.—The word of revelation must be proclaimed and accepted: this is the chief duty of men ordered by God.—Here believers have no lack of germs, beginnings, earnest; but fruit, completion, full payment come not here, but above.

* [The position to be taken is not that the future will reconcile propositions which are contradictory, but which seem to be contradictory, the whole question transcending the limits of human thought.—R.]

STARKE:—The wealth of the elect is inconceivable, indescribable, incomparable.—See the final point of this election of grace, and its tokens too. Prove yourselves thereby, ye Christians!—Believers have sonship with God through Christ, not from their own worthiness: it brings with it the noblest treasures, yes, the eternal inheritance.—The forgiveness of sins is the most glorious fruit of Christ's redemption; it is the basis of all other benefits: for where it is, there is life and blessedness.—The fountain of grace will never be drained, but is and remains inexhaustible, so that of its fulness we receive grace for grace.—Christ is the true ladder whose top touches heaven and its end the earth, thus linking and binding heaven and earth, God and men. Let him, who will be united to God, hold to Christ.—Angels and men stand again in friendship through Christ. Hence Christ is concerned with the angels, not that He must gain something for them of which they do not stand in need, but that they may have friendship again with men, when these again attain to grace.—The work of our election and salvation is full of wisdom, because it has taken place according to the counsel of Him who is wisdom itself; it is pure grace, because it appertains to an inheritance; infallible, because it is founded on the purpose of the Almighty; full of righteousness, because all comes to us through Christ, the righteous. Excellent tokens of the Divine truth of the Christian religion: it brings that with it, which the whole world cannot give and which makes man blessed, in the germ here in time, in perfection in eternity. This makes believers joyful in all tribulation, even in martyrdom.

RIEGER:—They shall be blessed is the sum of all the promises of the Old Testament; He has blessed us is the Gospel laud for the fulfilment of these promises in the New Testament. With these spiritual blessings in heavenly places the gospel conquers the whole world and the earthly mind, in which Jews and Gentiles lay captive.—In this are the honor of God and our salvation inseparably joined; God seeks His honor or the praise of His glory in us through our pardon.—In the Old Testament, it was often said: the Lord do thee good for Abraham's sake, for His servant David's sake; but now all is in and through the Beloved, who became the propitiation for the sins of the whole world. Once obtain in Him the forgiveness of sins, and then all other spiritual blessings flow without ceasing.—By the frequent phrase: according to His good pleasure, according to the counsel of His will, the Apostle bows down our mistrustful heart, so apt to strive for the mastery with the Holy One of Israel.—In the repeated expressions: through Himself, in whom, in Christ, the Apostle manifests an unusual zeal and care, to bind us ever to Christ, to accustom us to seek and find our glory in this alone, that we belong to Christ and are numbered in His inheritance; we may have reason hereafter to praise more the truth of God, like the Jews, descending from the fathers, whose are the promises; or to magnify rather His mercy, like the Gentiles, who unexpectedly have been favored with the gracious call. It is a word of truth, searched by every one, who is of the truth, concerned about the truth, that thus he may be helped to the truth; it is the Gospel of our salvation, not only bringing us tidings of it, but containing a Divine power for actual blessing, through the faith to which it inclines the heart, giving also the Spirit, which affords what redounds to our own certainty and steadfastness in the truth, serving at the same time as a witness to others, that we have attained a position in true grace, and especially assuring us of our preservation, which we are to enjoy as the redeemed possession of the Lord, but which with the crown thereto appertaining we will lay at the feet of Him, who has accepted us to the praise of His glory.

BENGEL:—Ultra hoc beneplacitum nobis neque in salutis nostræ neque in ullis operum divinorum causis rimandis ire licet. Quid philosopharis de mundo optimo? Cave, ne tute sis malus!

KLEUKER:—The entire Pauline theology rests mainly on what he calls the Divine mystery, terming its execution the economy of God. No Apostle speaks with such a sweep and fulness of spirit, as Paul, whose revelation is in this economy.

GERLACH:—The riches of Divine grace in the forgiveness of sins makes itself known to us chiefly through the illumination, which thus becomes ours, the knowledge of God and our salvation,—this we include under wisdom; under prudence especially the insight into our condition and the life of the world, the practical, Christian wisdom for living. In neither should we think merely of the one-sided intellectual knowledge.

HEUBNER:—Christ, the eternal Son of God, has been the ground, why God created the world, and delivered and blessed the fallen world. Christ is the eternal ground of the Divine complacency toward the world, the ground of our blessedness.—The highest grace is Redemption. God decreed it, Christ accomplished it, earning it. It is of a purely spiritual character, the forgiveness of sins. That is true redemption, which releases us not from earthly need, but from anxiety and disquietude of conscience, from enmity to God, from incapacity for good and fear of hell. It is the fundamental condition of all other possessions, which we have through Christ. The general decree of God is the basis of the calling of individuals; for God overlooks no one. Man can bring either honor or shame to God, as a child to its parents. Christians should bring honor to God, He desires to get honor through us before the world.—The Holy Spirit is the seal of Christians, the stamp which they receive, that they are real children of God, the token by means of which they appear and pass current as Christians before the celestial spirits. Without this character ("express image") faith is vain and all Christianity mere sham. How many sham Christians there are, who have not this seal!—This Spirit is to the Christian the strongest proof also of eternal life, because in itself it is something eternal, imperishable.

PASSAVANT:—The eternal counsel of the Father respecting the election of souls is first carried out and consummated in the Son and through Him in the course of time. It is a work and miracle of love, unsearchable and unfathomable, carried on at once on earth and in heaven, in a human breast, and in a Divine heart. This election does not rest in man or angel, not in the will of man or angel's thought; not in human or angelic holiness or righteousness, purity or greatness or fidelity, not in any virtue, glory or love of the creature.—By nature we are not the children of God; even though so many may, flatly and godlessly enough, think and affirm otherwise, calling God Father and All-father.—But God now makes us His children; He has exalted us to the joys, the blessednesses, the treasures, the eternities, the glories of the heavenly nature; we are children, beloved children, heirs of God, heirs of heaven! This is the doing of the Lord's grace.—Nothing makes so poor in all true good and worth and blessing, as sin and all that belongs to and proceeds from sin.—The gospel traces our thoughts and feelings back to and into ourselves, so that we perceive the cunning of our hearts and the deceit of sin, and come to the footprints of God, to the springs of what is eternally true and good. It reveals to us, what we were, what we are, and what we should become; what are our deepest needs, the eternal ones; what our internal injury the worst of all; what our heaviest sorrows might be, here and hereafter. It reveals to us, where the true, certain aid is, where salvation, light, peace, life are, a Divine salvation, an unerring light, an eternal peace, an everlasting life.—It is out of this light, that its opponents and enemies have borrowed or stolen all the rays of truth and wisdom, which shine here and there in their proud writings and philosophies.—It is the Holy Spirit, who gives man to God in this life, and gives God to man in eternal life; who here sketches the features of the children in likeness to their heavenly Father, and will complete the picture in eternity: who begins their redemption here with their release from the servile yoke of the creature, and will complete it in the unity and love of the Creator.

STIER:—An Apostle prays for his church, teaches and exhorts out of the promise and petition of his apostolic prayer, but does not lord it, does not establish eternal forms, does not urge and carry to excess the external phenomena of the church, which is forming itself deeply and inwardly in view of its goal.—Each after his manner! As Christ is now our Head in another way than that of the holy angels, so is He in another way Lord and King, and Crown, too, of the material world also. The condemned and evil spirits lie at His feet in another manner than the adoring saints and angels—yet still all really, all finally before Him.

BECHER*:—Those who are willing are always the elect, those who will not, are not elected. Many men are wrapped up in the doctrines of election and predestination, but that is the height of impertinence. They are truths belonging to God alone, and if you are perplexed by them, it is only because you trouble yourself about things which do not concern you. You only need to know that God sustains you with all His might in the winning of your salvation, if you will only rightly use His help. Whoever doubts this is like the crew of a boat working with all their might against the tide and yet going back hour after hour; then they notice, that the tide turns, while at the same time the wind springs up and fills their sails. The coxswain cries: pull away boys! wind and tide favor you! But they answer: What can we do with the oars, don't the wind and tide take away our free agency?

* [This is no doubt HENRY WARD BECHER. Dr. Braune gives no further clue to the discovery of the original passage than the single word "Becher," which might apply to any one of a large family. As this is the only American citation in any part of the volume, it is retained, even though at the disadvantage of being a translation of a translation.—R.]

SCHELLING:—It is a vacuity of ideas, that ventures to call itself Rationalism. Not to hate one's enemies, not to persecute them, but to do them good, aye, to love them, is above Reason. The supreme commands of a generous morality, exalting humanity, could not be fulfilled, if man could not act above Reason. Why then should not God act above Reason? In this sense it is by no means irrational to say,—the will of God as respects the human race estranged from Him is above Reason. We can, with J. G. Haman, answer the good-natured people who want to have a rational God after their notions: whether they have never noticed, that God is a genius, who asks very little about what they call rational or irrational.

HOFACKER:—The wide range which Christmas Day opens to our eye of faith: 1) How far back; 2) How high up; 3) How far ahead it teaches us to look.

AHLFELD:—Thank the Lord, who hath blessed thee with all spiritual blessings in heavenly things! 1) For what should I be thankful? 2) How should I thank Him?—(Sermon for Whitsunday): The Holy Ghost, as Steward of the possessions of Christ, pours out His treasures upon us. He (1) proclaims, (2) entails, (3) seals to us salvation in Jesus Christ.

PALMER:—Our election in Christ: 1) It is an eternal one, but linked to the temporal Incarnation of Christ: 2) It is a mysterious act of God, but each may have a clear consciousness respecting it: 3) It has taken place without our help, but does not permit us to be idle.

KAPFF (on St. Thomas' Day):—What a mighty strengthening of our faith lies in the Divine election! 1) in its goal, 2) in its ground, 3) in the mode of its accomplishment.

[SCHENKEL:—The eternal election of the Christian: 1. A work of Divine love; 2. With the effect of presenting him ever more and more pure and holy before God.—Jesus Christ the Saviour of the world: He is (1) the Centre of the world's history, (2) the Key to the understanding of the mystery of God's providential rule.—How in the Person of Jesus Christ, beginning and end, heaven and earth harmoniously unite.—No predestination save unto holiness, no election outside of the Mediator, Jesus Christ.—All events in time depend on the decree of God in eternity.—The Holy Ghost as the earnest of our heavenly inheritance: 1. A balm of consolation for the weak; 2. A weapon of victory for the strong.—R.]

[EADIE:—Ver. 3. We bless Him because He has blessed us.—Christianity is the dispensation of the Spirit, and as its graces are wrought by Him, they are all named "spiritual" after Him.

—Ver. 4. The pulsation of a holy heart leads to a stainless life, and this is the avowed purpose of our election.—Sovereignty is but another name for highest and benignest equity.—Ver. 5. The returning prodigal does not win his way back into the paternal mansion. This purpose to accept us existed ere the fact of our apostacy had manifested itself, and being without epoch of origin, it comes not within the limits of chronology. It pre-existed time.—Adoption has its medium in Christ: but it has its ultimate enjoyment and blessing in God. Himself is our Father.—His household we enter—His welcome we are saluted with—His name and dignity we wear—His image we possess—His discipline we receive—and His home, secured and prepared for us, we hope forever to dwell in. To Himself we are adopted. The origin of this privilege and distinction is the Divine love.—Ver. 8. A mystery is not to be flung abroad without due discrimination. The revealer of it wisely selects his audience, and prudently chooses the proper time, place and method for his disclosure.—Ver. 10. This re-capitulation of all things is declared a second time to be in Christ—a solemn and emphatic re-assertion. His mediative work has secured it, and His mediatorial person is the one centre of the universe. As the stone dropped into the lake creates those widening and concentric circles, which ultimately reach the farthest shore, so the deed done on Calvary has sent its undulations through the distant spheres and realms of God's great empire.—Ver. 11. His desire and His decrees are not at variance, but every resolution embodies His unthwarted pleasure.—Ver. 13. The gospel is wholly truth, and that very truth which is indispensable to a guilty world. And it comes as a word, by special oral revelation, for it is not gleaned and gathered: there is a kind and faithful oracle.—The gospel is good news, and that good news is our salvation.—That seal unbroken remains a token of safety. Whatsoever bears God's image will be safely carried home to His bosom.—Ver. 14. The earnest, though it differ in degree, is the same in kind with the prospective inheritance. The earnest is not withdrawn, nor a totally new circle of possessions substituted. Heaven is but an addition to present enjoyments. The prebialion will be followed by the banquet.—"We have redemption" so soon as we believe; we are ever having it so long as we are on earth; and when Jesus comes again to finish the economy of grace, we shall have it in its full and final completion.—All issues "to the praise of His glory." His grace having now done its work. The church receives its complement in extent at the very same epoch at which it is crowned with fulness of purity and blessedness. "May it please Thee of thy gracious goodness shortly to accomplish the number of Thy elect, and to hasten Thy kingdom," is an appropriate petition on the part of all saints.—R.]

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 15.—N.¹ A. B. and some other authorities omit τὴν ἀγάπην; N.² adds it. The omission is an evident error of the transcriber. [K. L., nearly all versions, most fathers support the longer reading, which is adopted by Tischendorf, Meyer, Elliott and the great majority of editors and commentators. The repetition of τὴν readily accounts for the omission, while there is little reason for accepting an insertion from Col. i. 4.—In the above emendations Elliott has been followed. For this cause is adopted in preference to wherefore (the rendering for διό) and on this account (which is more modern). The more indefinite participial construction, having heard, is necessary here: the faith which is among you is more exact than your faith (see Exeg. Notes), while the love which ye have brings out the force of the second τὴν.—R.]

² Ver. 16.—The Rec. reads: ἀνταὶν ὑμῶν ποιοῦμενος, on the authority of D.³ E. K. L. (F. G. transposing: ποιοῦμενος ὑμῶν), most cursives, Vulgate, Syriac versions, Coptic, most fathers; accepted by Tischendorf (but not in all editions), Griesbach, Elliott, Wordsworth (De Wette and Braune tacitly). In N. A. B. D., and about 10 cursives, ὑμῶν is omitted; accepted by Rückert, Lachmann, Meyer, Alford. The question is a delicate one: Was the word inserted where the meaning is so obvious, or was it omitted because occurring so immediately before? The variation in position favors the former theory, but a similar omission by nearly the same authorities in 1 Thess. i. 2 is almost decisive for the latter. See Exeg. Notes for the interpretation of Meyer and Alford, resulting from the acceptance of the briefer reading.—R.]

⁴ Ver. 18.—καὶ is omitted in N.¹ A. B. [D.¹ F.]; by Lachmann, Rückert, Alford, Braune. It is found in N.³ D.³ E. K. L., nearly all cursives retained by Tischendorf, Meyer, Elliott, Eadie. The probability is against its genuineness, yet it may have been omitted because καὶ follows in ver. 10.—R.]—A very few authorities substitute τι for καὶ.

⁵ Ver. 19.—On this choice of words, see Exeg. Notes.—R.]

⁷ Ver. 20.—N. A. B. and others read: καθίσας [adopted by Rückert, Lachmann, Alford. Tischendorf varies. The Rec. reads καθίσας, with D. F. K. L. and most cursives. So Eadie, Elliott, and Meyer (apparently); but the change to the finite verb looks more like the attempted relief of the construction.—R.]

⁹ Ver. 21.—[For above (E. V.) involves more than is expressed by the Greek word ὑπεράνω, according to the most exact commentators.—R.]

¹⁰ Ver. 23.—[The Rec. omits τά before πάντα, but on altogether insufficient authority. No important alterations have been made in the rendering of this clause, because it is almost impossible to change the literal rendering of the E. V., without substituting an explanation for the translation: Braune's view would require: all things in all (persons), but the difference of gender he accepts cannot be expressed in an English rendering.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Summary.—After the praise of God on account of His grace towards Christendom, to which the readers of this letter belong (ver. 13) has been expressed (vers. 3-14), there follows on account of this very grace the Apostle's thanksgiving for the readers' faith and love in his prayers (vers. 15, 16), out of which he gives prominence to the petition, united with his thanksgiving, that God would make them know the glory of their calling and inheritance as well as of His power (vers. 17-19), which He has shown and will show in the Redemption through Christ, the Head of the church (vers. 20-23).

It is not proper to find here, as OLSHAUSEN does, after an "effusion of love," only a "thanksgiving for the faith of the readers," as far as ii. 10, without perceiving the profound, rich instruction contained in these verses. But it is not precisely a prayer for the readers which follows, as HARLESS says; he only mentions what he does when thinking of the church. This prayer and supplication to God about and for souls is the apostolic ministry in faith, care and joy; and the whole Church should know it and should infer from this petition, how weak and needy she is in and of herself, even though born a heavenly seed for heaven; and how necessary earnest, persevering prayer and supplication on her part always is, for her preservation and prosperity.

[After praise comes prayer (EADIE). ELLICOTT: "I ever give thanks, and pray that you may be enlightened to know the hope of His calling, the riches of His inheritance, and the greatness of His power, which was especially displayed in the Resurrection and supreme exaltation of Christ."—ALFORD, following the Trinitarian division of STIER: "The idea of the Church carried forward, in the form of a prayer for the Ephesians, in which the fulfilment of the Father's counsel through the Son and by the Spirit, in His people, is set forth, as consisting in the knowledge of the hope of His calling, of the riches of His promise, and the power which He exercises on His saints as first wrought by Him in Christ, whom He has made Head over all to the Church."—R.]

The Apostle's Thanksgiving (vers. 15, 16).

Ver. 15. For this cause, διὰ τοῦτο, refers to what precedes, and on account of the close connection of the individual parts with each other, to vers. 3-14. So most ancient and modern commentators (ECUMENIUS: διὰ τὰ ἀποκείμενα ἅγια τοῖς ὁπλοῖς πιστεύοντες καὶ βιοῦντες καὶ διὰ τὸ ἐν τοῖς σωθημένοις τεράχθαι ἡμᾶς): it is not merely an appendage to vers. 13, 14, because the thanksgiving and petition apply to the readers only (MEYER, RUECKERT), nor to the last clause (ver. 14: "to the praise of His glory"), as GROTIUS thinks. But it treats of more than thanksgiving, of petition, supplication, not merely of the readers, but also of all Christendom (εἰς ἡμᾶς, ver. 19; comp. vers. 20-23).

[The reference to the whole preceding paragraph is defended by HARLESS (so CHRYSOSTOM, WINER, SCHENKEL and many others). It accords best with Braune's exegesis of vers. 13, 14, to accept this view, but EADIE, ELLICOTT, HODGE follow THEOPHYLACT, in referring it to vers. 13, 14. ALFORD: "On account of what has gone before, since ver. 3; but especially of what has been said since ver. 13, where καὶ ὑμεῖς first came in." The more restricted view seems preferable, but we must then accept an expanded reference in ver. 19.—R.]

I also, καὶ ἐγώ.—The unexpressed fellowship in which Paul thus marks himself, as ver. 13 (καὶ ὑμεῖς), is to be inferred from the context, from the clause ἀκούσας—οὐ παύομαι εὐχαριστῶν. He thinks of the Christians, who have spoken of the readers' Christian state with joy and thanksgiving, and "expects, that all Christians, especially they themselves to whom he writes, would do the same" (HARLESS). Hence it is not—even I also, a believing Israelite (BAUMGARTEN); such arrogance he would have opposed, not possessed. Nor is it—also I, your Apostle (STIER) [EADIE]; He places himself as a member of the body of Christ, who is the Head, in the Church, not above it. [DE WETTE unwarrantably joins καὶ with the preceding διὰ τοῦτο. ALFORD objects to the view of MEYER ("Paul knows that he co-operates with the readers in his prayerful activity"), preferring to take καὶ as marking the resumption of the first person after the second. ELLICOTT thus expresses Braune's view: "Καὶ ἐγώ is thus faintly correlative with καὶ ὑμεῖς, and hints at the union in prayer and praise which subsisted between the Apostle and his converts."—R.]

Having heard, ἀκούσας.—This marks nothing further than that he had heard, and accordingly indicates only, that what has been heard has been spoken of, hence that the Apostle was not in Ephesus, when he heard. GROTIUS is therefore correct: loquitur apostolus de profectu evangelii apud Ephesios, ex quo ipse ab illis discesserat. So THEODORET, HARLESS, MEYER and others. Nothing is said respecting acquaintance or non-acquaintance (against OLSHAUSEN [who thinks the larger part were probably unknown to him—R.]); it is used in the former case, Phil. 5, in the latter, Col. i. 4; Rom. i. 8. BENGL: Hoc referri potest non solum ad ignotos facie, sed etiam ad familiarissimos, pro statu eorum præsentis. It is therefore not—scire, comperire (HAMMOND), as though it described personal observation, since it is the very opposite; but at the same time nothing can be inferred from this against the composition of this Epistle for the Ephesians, nor that he wrote the letter before his personal acquaintance, nor yet that he had other churches in his mind at the same time (STIER).*

Of the faith which is among you in the Lord Jesus, τὴν καθ' ὑμᾶς πίστιν ἐν τῷ κυρίῳ Ἰησοῦ.—To this Col. i. 4 is parallel: "your faith in Christ Jesus," etc. Accordingly τὴν καθ' ὑμᾶς πίστιν here seems to be equivalent to τὴν πίστιν ὑμῶν there [so E. V.]. But "faith among you" differs somewhat from "your faith;" the relation of the faith to the subjects is different: in the first case, in accordance with the notion of the preposition (κατὰ τὴν πόλιν, Luke viii. 39, κατ' οἶκον not=ἐν οἴκῳ, see WINER, p. 374), which is distributive, the faith is merely to be found there, within the church, even though each one does not have it, and believers and unbelievers dwell side by side, in the other case, however, the faith is the possession of the individuals; WINER, p. 146, fides, quæ ad vos pertinet, apud vos (in vobis?) est.† Such cir-

* [On the other hand, the aorist must not be taken as frequentative, so as to show from such a sense, that he had frequent communication with them as a well-known church. Even EADIE, who at first adopted this view, citing Kühner and Buttmann in support of it, is disposed to defer to the judgment which WINER (p. 290) pronounces against it. HODGE seems to have been led into the same error.—R.]

eumlocutions have their special shadings of thought, as τὴν ἀπὸ σου ἐπαγγελίαν (Acts xxiii. 21), τῇ ἐξ ὑμῶν ἀγάπῃ (1 Cor. viii. 7), promissio a te profecta, amor qui a vobis proficiscitur, are not exactly equivalent to tua promissio, amor noster. Comp. WINER, p. 181. STIER is excellent: A hint that a gracious treasure of faith and love is indeed present within the church, yet not certainly active in every member of it. [So ALFORD.] The notion of the substantive is not, however, thereby modified, as though the objective nature of faith were to be understood here, and the individual quality of faith in the particular persons, in Col. i. 4 (HARLESS) [ELLIOTT]; with the Apostle the faith in Ephesus as among the Colossians remains the subject of thanksgiving; and the genitive indicates nothing about individual quality, only the possession of the individuals, still less any thing about purity or impurity (MATTHIES); nor is any hint given respecting fides qua or fides quæ creditur.

It is indeed here as there more closely defined as the faith "in the Lord Jesus," as Gal. iii. 26. The preposition marks the foundation of the faith: founded in the Lord Jesus, or its life-sphere, without placing any other aim of the faith. There is no reason for understanding here εἰς θεόν from 1 Pet. i. 21: "who by him do believe in God" (BENGE: fidem erga Deum in domino Jesu; GROTIUS: fidem in Deum fundatam in Christo); "in the Lord" is not—"through Him," nor ἐν=εἰς (KOPPE, FLATT). The article τὴν is wanting before ἐν τῷ κυρίῳ, because the qualifying phrase adds an integral element to πίστις, which as anticipated is joined immediately (Rom. iii. 25; 2 Cor. vii. 7). [“Christ-centred faith” (ELLIOTT).—R.] Comp. WINER, p. 128. The position of the words does not permit our connecting ἐν τῷ κυρίῳ with ἡμᾶς (WINER); besides πίστις requires further definition more than ἡμᾶς.

And the love which ye have unto all the saints, καὶ τὴν ἀγάπην πᾶν εἰς πάντας τοὺς ἁγίους.—[See Textual Note 1.—R.] This sets forth the first and immediate manifestation of the faith. CHRYSOSTOM aptly says: πανταχοῦ συνάπτει καὶ συγκολλᾷ τὴν πίστιν καὶ τὴν ἀγάπην, θαυμαστὴν τινα ξυνωρίδα. Quisquis fidem et amorem habet, particeps est totius beneficentis (BENGE). This love is, however, more closely defined as "unto all the saints." On the article [which here specializes love.—R.] see WINER, p. 126. "Paul had here first the idea of love in itself and then added in his thought τὴν εἰς πάντας" (MEYER). Ἅγιοι are Christians. Hence: "all saints" (iii. 8, 18; vi. 18, 24) points to brotherly love as characteristic Christianismi, John xiii. 34 f.; 1 John v. 1. As little as this notion is to be enlarged here into universal philanthropy, as CALVIN would do, and as is the case in 1 Cor. xiii.; Gal. v. 6; 1 Tim. ii. 1; Tit. iii. 2, also in 2 Pet. i. 7 (ἐν τῇ οὐδαμῶς τὴν ἀγάπην), so little and still less is brotherly love to be narrowed down, with THEODORET, to liberality. At the same time we should not overlook the emphasis resting on the word "all," permitting no distinction as respects condition, rank, possessions or internal endowment, either mental or spiritual.

Ver. 16. Cease not to give thanks for you, οὐ παύομαι εὐχαριστῶν ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν.—Thus οὐ εὐχαριστῶ πάντοτε, 1 Cor. i. 4; Phil. i. 3; Col. i. 3; 1 Thess. i. 2; Phil. 4; comp. WINER, p. 323. Paul never ceases to be a giver of thanks. [The participle points to a state supposed to be already in existence. EADIE: "As one giving thanks for you I cease not."] ULPHILUS: non cessans gratias dico.—[R.] The phrase ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν, as in ver. 2: 1 Tim. ii. 1, marks the protection of prayer, like that of a shield over the assailed (WINER, p. 359) while περὶ πάντων ὑμῶν (Rom. i. 8) denotes the position of the protector around the protected.

Making mention of you, μνησθὲν ὑμῶν ποιούμενος, adds a limitation; he thanks constantly whenever he thinks of them; but that happens daily.—In my prayers, ἐπὶ τῶν προσευχῶν μου.—This indicates that Paul has and takes occasion to think of them from his prayers.* Comp. WINER, p. 352; 1 Thess. i. 2; Rom. i. 10. Praying is the Apostle's daily doing, and therewith arises the thought about his church, changing his prayer into intercession. The subject of his thought and petition is not, therefore, precisely the faith and love of the Ephesians (MEYER [ALFORD] who rejects ὑμῶν), but themselves, with their necessities indeed, which determine the purport of the petition.—"No thanksgiving without petition, so long as perfection and completion are not yet there" (STIER).

The Apostle's petition as to its purport. Vers. 17-19.

Ver. 17. That, ἵνα, has its parallel in ὅπως, Phil. vi. and must retain, as in iii. 16, the signification of the purpose, design. Comp. WINER, pp. 418 f., 428 f. The Apostle's will, in the very thought of his prayer, is directed to this, that God should give (MEYER, SCHENKEL). Hence there is no reason for weakening the force of ἵνα here into: that He may give (WINER, p. 273), as if it introduced only the object, the purport of the petition (HARLESS, STIER); for although Paul did not regard his request "as causa of Divine favors," nor purpose "thereby" to bestow upon others the gift of grace, yet still in his petitions offered in the name of Jesus (John xiv. 13; xv. 16; vi. 23) he has the design as well as the hope, that they should take place.† BENGE: Argumentum precum pro veris Christianis.

* ["In ἐνί with a genitive, the apparent temporal reference partakes somewhat of the local reference of juxtaposition," BERNHARDY. So ALFORD, ELLICOTT, and now EADIE who formerly omitted the sub-local reference. The preposition "serves to express the concurrent circumstances and relations, in which and under which an event took place"—R.]

† [On the force of ἵνα comp. TITTMANN, Syn. N. T. II., p. 35, ff., who is perhaps the ablest defender of the frequency of its eletic signification. But many of the instances he cites are very doubtful. The eventual or eletic sense (indicative of result) is not defensible here. The very best explanation of the force of ἵνα after verbs of praying, etc., is given by ALFORD (on 1 Cor. xiv. 3): "The idea of purpose is inseparably bound up in this particle, and can be traced wherever it is used. At the same time, prayer being a direct seeking of the fulfilment of the purpose on account of which we pray—not like many other actions, indirectly connected with it,—the purport and purpose become compounded in the expression." This sub-final force is accepted by ELLICOTT, denied by EADIE and by MEYER, who rejects everything short of the strict final ment (though frequently used for the possessive genitive in later classical Greek), makes it denote more characteristic possession, differing thus from nearly all the commentators.—R.]

The God of our Lord Jesus Christ, ὁ θεὸς τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ. —Here we must hold (see ver. 3 f.), that he is speaking of the Incarnate One, the God-man, to whom God is God, worshipped by Him also (STIER). It does not suffice to say, that the meaning is, God sent Him, He bore witness of God and returned to God (HARLESS) [apparently HODGE also].

The Father of glory, ὁ πατὴρ τῆς δόξης. This parallel clause is far more difficult than the last. First of all, πατὴρ, corresponding to θεός, is to be retained in its established meaning, "Father," hence not to be taken in the sense of causa (GROTIUS), auctor (ὁ μέγας ἡμῶν δεικνύς ἀγαθή, CHRYSTOSTOM and others), source, origin (MATTHIES, SCHENKEL). The genitive, τῆς δόξης, designates the possession, the character of the Father, to whom the glory belongs, which is = כְּבוֹד, the Divine glory and majesty; it is like "the God of glory" (Acts vii. 2; Ps. xxix. 3), "the Lord of glory" (1 Cor. ii. 8), "the King of glory" (Ps. xxiv. 7); comp. also "the Father of mercies" (2 Cor. i. 3). Hence: the Father full of glory. As parallel to the genitive: "of our Lord Jesus Christ," we must also in connection with "glory," think of Him, in whom it was manifested. BENGL: Pater glorie, infinite illius, quæ refulget in facie Christi; imo glorie, quæ est ipse filius Dei, unde etiam nobis hereditas gloriæ obtinget (ver. 18). HARLESS: Father of glory, because the glory presses upon the Apostle, which God has revealed to men in His Son.

Though the Greek Fathers go too far (δοῦσαν γὰρ τὴν θείαν φύσιν ὡνόμασεν), yet "the Father full of glory," following "the God of our Lord Jesus Christ," is evidently not without a reference to Christ and of such a kind, that the Apostle's first phrase conceives rather of the God-man,* the second of the God-man. This explanation accordingly is not a curiosity (RUECKERT), needing no contradiction (OLSHAUSEN), nor is it obscurius et remotius (A-LAPIDE). It is much more of a curiosity, to wish to connect thus: Deus qui est domini nostri Jesu Christi pater, gloriæ; since then ὁ θεὸς and τῆς δόξης must be taken together, while τοῦ κυρίου—ὁ πατὴρ is inserted between them (VATABLE). The conjecture of PISCATOR, that πατὴρ and θεός were first written in interchanged positions, is very bold. Still it cannot be said that our phrase is=pater gloriosus (CALVIN and others), or cui debetur honor, venerandus, or prestantissimus (WAHL and others), or the Almighty Father (KOPPE).—(ECUMENUS aptly remarks: πρὸς τὸ προσκείμενον ὀνομάζει θεόν. The designation of God in this passage corresponds entirely with the fervor and confidence of the Apostle's petition respecting the affairs of the kingdom of Christ.

May give unto you, δώη ὑμῖν.—Δώη the optative; John xv. 16: δῶν the conjunctive; the Ionic conjunctive form is not sufficiently attested in the New Testament, and δῶ is preferred [in that passage, B. giving it here also.—R.] The optative as modus optandi is here, especially in oratio obliqua (MATTHIES), used in the place of the conjunctive (WINER, p. 273). In 2 Tim. i. 16, 18 we find a similar usage. [MEYER and ELLICOTT regard the optative as chosen to follow the present here, because the answer belongs to what is hoped for, etc., the latter finding in its use a support for his view of the sub-final force of iva. But the view of ALFORD (and EADIE) is preferable: The optative "is used when the purpose is not that of the writer as he is writing, but is described as that of himself or some one else at another time," thus falling in effect under the rule of the oratio obliqua.—R.]

The spirit of wisdom and revelation, πνεῦμα σοφίας καὶ ἀποκαλύψεως, is the object of the preceding verb. The omission of the article before the genitives points to the close connection with the governing substantive, to which also the article may be wanting, without its becoming indefinite, as the genitives contain the close definition; Luke xxiii. 46: εἰς χεῖρας σου παραθεῖναι τὸ πνεῦμα μου (WINER, p. 118 f.). God gives as a Father to His children, who have become such through Christ, of His Spirit; hence the reference may well be to the Holy Ghost; but since they have already been sealed with this (ver. 13), this efficient, personal, power recedes rather, and we are to understand the spirit wrought or to be wrought by the same in Christians. So Gal. vi. 1; 2 Tim. i. 7. So OLSHAUSEN, STIER: Something of God, yet manifesting itself as in man. Hence we are not to understand the human spirit of itself, or the human heart (RUECKERT: God give you a wise heart, open to His revelation), nor yet precisely the Person of the Holy Ghost (BENGL: idem Spiritus, qui est promissionis, in progressu fidelium est etiam sapientie et revelationis; sapientia in nobis operatur sapientiam, REVELATIO cognitionem; MATTHIES, MEYER).* Evidently Paul is speaking of a gift for all Christians; hence Charismas are not meant, as 1 Cor. xii. 8; xiv. 12; v. 26 (OLSHAUSEN).

Both "wisdom" and "revelation" point to universal gifts to Christians, and to what is or comes to pass in them, hence to something subjective. By "wisdom" we understand a continued condition, by "revelation" the single glances afforded us, into the truths of Christianity, into the will of God in special circumstances and situations of life, into the human heart, into the course of time, into eternal life. The former includes the φρόνησις, "understanding," joined with it in ver. 8; the latter is "the very necessary private revelation for every Christian" (STIER), as 1 Cor. ii. 10. Paul adds the special to the general in the same way (Rom. i. 5; v. 15; xi. 29). Accordingly we are not to consider the second an objective medium for the first (HARLESS); in that case, the position would be reversed (MEYER).† Comp. Col. i. 9.

sense. The ebatice sense is rare, it must be admitted, and due to a "Hebrew teleology," which reverently accepted a prophecy as fulfilled.—R.]

* [It is perhaps unwise to press any Christological reference upon this phrase upon the ground of its parallelism with the preceding one, though this is preferable to the many distorted views, which have been adopted through fear of an Arian interpretation.—R.]

* [EADIE and HODGE defend the formal reference to the Holy Spirit here, but it seems better with ALFORD and BRAUNE to accept πνεῦμα as "the complex idea, of the spirit of man indwelt by the Spirit of God, so that as such, it is His special gift." This intermediated or complex sense is that suggested in my Excursus, Romans, p. 235, B., but too often overlooked.—R.]

† [These genitives are also characterizing genitives, it would seem. EADIE takes the latter as indicating the mode by which

In the full knowledge of him [ἐν ἐπιγνώσει αὐτοῦ].—First the meaning of the words. In ἐπιγνώσις the preposition, which “renders prominent the intention of the verbal notion to its object” (HARLESS), must not be overlooked, and the distinction from γνώσις must be maintained. It is major exactiorque cognitio (GROTIUS,) plena et accurata cognitio (WAILL). 1 Cor. xiii. 12 is instructive: “Now I know (γινώσκω) in part; but then shall I know (ἐπιγνώσσομαι) even as also I am known” (ἐπεγνώσθην).* Hence it is not = agnitio (CALOVIVS and others), nor can it be of any force here, that γνώσις designates the higher, the charismatic form of knowledge, 1 Cor. xii. 8; xiii. 8 (OLSHAUSEN), since this technical term designates the character, not the degree (MEYER). The context, vers. 18, 19, evidently determines that the knowledge of God is here referred to, and does not permit αὐτοῦ to be referred to Christ (BEZA, ERASMUS, LUTHER and others); nor can it remain undetermined (CALVIN). Finally ἐν, “in,” designates the sphere within which that is accomplished, which has been spoken of: it cannot possibly be taken as eis (Vulgate, LUTHER and others), or = per (ERASMUS and others), or = una cum (FLATT). [HODGE most unwarrantably renders the preposition ἐν, “together with.”—R.]

The connection with the verb “give” is clear then: The knowledge of God is a status or circle of life, wrought already by the Spirit and word of God, in which he should and must be, who will and shall receive the spirit of wisdom and revelation, since this does not take place without means, Col. i. 9, 10. Advance is made from truth to truth, from knowledge to knowledge. The connection with what follows: πεφωτισμένους ὁφθαλμοῖς (CHRYSOSTOM and others), is impossible, both grammatically and logically, on account of the appended εἰς τὸ εἰδέναι ὑμᾶς, which is joined at the close of ver. 18, just as ἐν ἐπιγνώσει αὐτοῦ here in ver. 17; the two phrases correspond to each other. But the connection with viv is quite as impossible, as with ἀποκαλύψας (a suggestion of KOPPE’s); it is contrary to the usus loquendi and introduces erroneous thoughts: for it is not to those, who have known, who are real worshippers, that He gives such a spirit, as He does not give the spirit through knowledge, but rather knowledge through the Spirit, nor does revelation consist only in the knowledge of God, although this is the beginning, centre and main point to which all comes and returns. [EADIE follows KOPPE, the result being a confusion respecting these phrases, which is very uncommon with him.—R.]

Ver. 18. Having the eyes of your heart enlightened [πεφωτισμένους τοὺς ὁφθαλμοὺς τῆς καρδίας ὑμῶν].—This is added without a conjunction, seeming to be in apposition, with the emphasis on the participle;

the wisdom is imparted, which appears illogical. Dr. HODGE does not clearly indicate what view he adopts, but apparently inclines toward that accepted above.—R.]

* (The use of the verb in this passage, applying it in the second instance to God, contradicts the position taken by EADIE, that ἐν has in our word an additive force, referring to the successive increments of knowledge, for in that case it could not be applied to God, as indeed he affirms ἐπεγνώσκει never is.—R.)

the being enlightened is, what God should give. Τοὺς ὁφθαλμοὺς, eyes, He need not first give; BENDEL: articulus præsupponit oculos jam præsentis. But the Apostle wishes that the eyes may be given in a new quality (HARLESS). Accordingly we should not render: enlightened eyes (LUTHER); in that case we should find, τοῖς ὁφθαλμοῖς τοῖς πεφωτισμένοις. It is arbitrary to correct the reading into πεφωτισμένοις (PISCATOR and others), as though it belonged to ἑμῖν. It is untenable to accept an accusative absolute (BEZA, KOPPE, MEYER [E. V., EADIE], and to refer the participle to ἑμῖν, so that the accusative of the noun is made to contain the closer definition; for then the recipients would have been, which is contrary to Scripture and to fact, enlightened before they received the Spirit of wisdom and revelation; the reference to the effect: so that you are illuminated as respects your eyes—is grammatically impossible. Nor should εἶναι be interpolated (FLATT).

[The interpretation: so that you are illuminated as respects your eyes, is that of MEYER, who does not defend the accusative absolute. ELLICOTT and ALFORD, whose rendering is given in the English text, refer the participle to ἑμῖν, as a lax construction, taking the noun as an accusative of limiting reference. Notwithstanding Dr. BRAUNE’s objection, this seems the best solution. The clause “serves to define the result of the gift of the Spirit, and owing to the subsequent infinitive, which expresses the purpose of the illumination, not unnaturally lapses into the accusative” (ELLICOTT). See ALFORD for similar constructions. The accusative absolute which also expresses a result, is a very doubtful construction, see MEYER in loco, and on Rom. viii. 3. The appositional construction, which makes our clause the object of δῶν, is open to fewer grammatical than logical objections. The enlightenment as regards the eyes of the heart ought not to be put as correlative or co-ordinate with the gift of the Spirit of wisdom, etc. This objection holds, however, the meaning of our clause may be enlarged, as is done below, and by HARLESS and others. BRAUNE’s view, it should be added, is supported by RUECKERT, MATTHIES, MEIER, HOLZHAUSEN, HARLESS, OLSHAUSEN, DE WETTE and others; apparently by HODGE, who does not notice the construction preferred in this note.—R.]

The value of the gift is well described by GREGORY NAZIAN.: εἰ γὰρ σκότος ἡ ἀγνοία καὶ ἡ ἀμαρτία, φῶς ἂν εἴη ἡ γνώσις καὶ ὁ βίος ἐνθεός. According to v. 8, compared with iv. 18; 2 Cor. iv. 4; Heb. vi. 4, the light of life is meant, that illumination which is already connected with sanctification and rooted in experience (HARLESS, STIER), so that it cannot be referred to merely intellectual insight (RUECKERT and others). [Yet “the eyes of the heart” are spoken of, giving prominence to the perceptive side.—R.]

The eyes are τῆς καρδίας ὑμῶν, “of your heart,” and this is the centre of life (HARLESS), the core of the personality (OLSHAUSEN), and not merely mind or soul, without disposition. Matth. xxiii. 15: τῇ καρδίᾳ συνώσι. Comp. iv. 22; Rom. i. 21; 2 Cor. iv. 6. Cor est, quo tan- tas res percipimus (BENGEL).^{*} It is thus marked by this qualifying phrase, that we, in spite of our old nature, are renewed and made susceptible of that wisdom and revelation, that is the light for which the eyes of our heart are prepared; our heart should become secure and full of the Spirit. Thus this apposition is defended from MEYER's objections.

That ye may know, εἰς τὸ εἰδέναι ὑμᾶς.—This sets forth the aim of the enlightening, toward which progress is made "in the knowledge of Him;" the latter is to be developed. Thus to the ground and outgoing there corresponds the aim, in which the beginning now appears in its extent; the deeper insight after the hearing of the proclamation, after the first faith and knowledge and understanding, is here treated of.†

What is the hope of his calling, τίς ἐστὶν ἡ ἐλπίς τῆς κλήσεως αὐτοῦ.—The first object of this insight is "the hope of His calling." "His," αὐτοῦ, according to the context, is to be understood of God; Rom. xi. 29: the "calling of God." He calls; this call is not without effect; and this is the hope, the cause of which is the call. The re-echo in us of this call of God on us is hope, hoping; the Christian's hope lies, not in the eternal "election," but in the temporal "calling." So "joy of the Holy Ghost" (1 Thess. i. 6), "trial of affliction" (2 Cor. viii. 2). Hope is the Christian's advantage (ii. 12; 1 Thess. iv. 13; Rom. v. 2), and a hope that "maketh not ashamed" (Rom. v. 5; viii. 24). To know the character of such hope is not a small matter (against STIER). Τίς points then to the character, the quality of this hope. PASSOW sub voce. It is therefore not = ποσῆ, ποσότης, quantitas (STIER, OLSHAUSEN, SCHENKEL), but qualis, cuiusnam nature (HARLESS, MEYER and others). Nor is ἐλπίς = res sperata (OLSHAUSEN, STIER [EADIE] and many others), although it can mean this (Col. i. 5: "laid up;" Heb. vi. 18: "set before us;" Gal. v. 5: "wait for the hope of righteousness"), which MEYER [with ELLICOTT] denies. It is inconceivable that κλήσις should be = those called (SCHUTZKE). LUTHER renders: "your calling," putting the effect for the cause: "his calling." [With ALFORD, EADIE, and ELLICOTT it is better to take τίς in the simple meaning "what," quæ (Vulgate), without referring either to quality or quantity. As regards "hope," the objective sense must be admitted in the N. T., but the bald res sperata does not express the signification here. ALFORD thinks the controversy mere trifling:

^{*} [ELLICOTT says of the phrase, "the eyes of your heart:—"
"A somewhat unusual and figurative expression, denoting the inward intelligence of that portion of our immaterial nature (the ψυχή) of which the καρδιά is the imaginary seat." Comp. MEYER, ALFORD, HARLESS and STIER.—R.]

† [Dr. HODGE divides the prayer of the Apostle into three leading petitions: 1. For adequate knowledge of Divine truth; 2. For due appreciation of the future blessedness of the saints; 3. For a proper understanding of what they themselves had already experienced in their conversion. This is well enough for homiletical purposes, but it is very unsatisfactory as an exegesis of the passage, since it places as co-ordinate three clauses, which hold very different relations to each other, destroying altogether the proper final force of εἰς, besides being open to other objections. ALFORD rightly takes εἰς τὸ εἰδέναι as setting forth the purpose of the ἐκφραστῶν, not of the πνεῦμα σοφίας. What is now described is involved in the latter, not its object, but that of the former.—R.]

"If I know what the hope is, I know both its essence and its accidents." Even ELLICOTT admits an objective aspect: "the grounds, the state of the hope." HODGE supports the subjective sense. On κλήσις, see Romans, pp. 280, 281.—R.]

What the riches of the glory of his inheritance in the saints [τίς ὁ πλοῦτος τῆς δόξης τῆς κληρονομίας αὐτοῦ ἐν τοῖς ἁγίοις].—The second object of the insight is the object of the Christian hope, the inheritance, to which "the calling of God" helps us, hence "His." He gives it, it is from His own. As Divine, eternal life, participation in the kingdom of God, heirship with Christ (God Himself is our portion), it has a "glory" and this glory has "riches," so that it is an important object for our more profound observation. So Col. i. 27: "the riches of the glory of this mystery." It is a weakening of the ideas, to resolve these substantives into objectives: what is the riches of the glorious inheritance (LUTHER), or: what is the glorious riches of His inheritance (STIER). [As MEYER well says: "What a rich, sublime cumulation, setting forth in like terms the weightiness of the matters described;—and not to be diluted by any resolving of the genitives into adjectives."—R.]

"In the saints" is added after "His inheritance," without the article (τῆς ἐν τοῖς ἁγίοις), and hence conceived of as most closely connected with his inheritance, which is to be found in (LUTHER: an) and among the saints, the called Christians not outside of them. So Rom. ix. 3: "my kinsmen according to the flesh;" 2 Cor. vii. 7: τὸν ἑμὸν ζῆλον ὑπὲρ ἐμοῦ. Comp. Col. i. 12 (εἰς τὴν μερίδα τοῦ κλήρου τῶν ἁγίων ἐν φωτί); Acts xx. 32 (δοῦναι τὴν κληρονομίαν ἐν τοῖς ἡγιασμένοις πάντιν); xxvi. 18. The Apostle does not say "in you," "us," but states it altogether objectively in humility and wisdom. He speaks indeed of the inheritance of God in Christians, but not of the glory of the portion, nor its riches in the saints, so that we must understand here chiefly the children of God, who are partakers of the inheritance (vers. 11, 14), even though only in its incipient stages; "the riches of the glory" become indeed perceptible even here, but unfold themselves fully only in eternity, which is the more to be included, since here and hereafter are less divided than light and darkness. Accordingly we are not to consider the object of the inheritance to be principally and solely the present kingdom of God on earth (HARLESS), or on the other hand the future kingdom of God to be established at the second Advent (MEYER); nor is the connection of ἐν τοῖς ἁγίοις with ἀποτίν to be supplied (KOPPE and others) possible, since not ὁ πλοῦτος, but only κληρονομία, is in, on and among the saints.* To join αὐτοῦ with

* [This interpretation should not be lightly passed over, since it is sustained by WINER (in earlier editions, not in 6th and 7th), DE WETTE, MEYER and ELLICOTT. The reason for adopting it is the assumption that the article should precede our phrase, were it joined directly with κληρονομίας αὐτοῦ, since that expression is so complete in use as to admit of no qualification forming one conception with it (which is the condition of the omission of the article). Our phrase would then, according to ELLICOTT, define the sphere in which the riches, etc. are peculiarly found, felt and realized. To this view, however, there are grave objections. It is awkward to begin with; it disturbs the grammatical parallelism of the clauses, and logically it represents Paul as praying that they might know what great things are already among Christians, ἐν τοῖς ἀγίοις (STIER) is inadmissible, because far-fetched. The reference is not to the totality of morally good beings in the other world (RUECKERT), or in the holiest of all (CALOVIUS), as Heb. ix. 12; nor should prominence be given to the thought, as inhering in the text: God inherits the saints (MEYER, ETTINGHOFF, STIER), although they belong to Him, and He to them. This is the carrying out, extension and expansion of the thought, but not an exegesis of the words set before us.

Ver. 19. And what the exceeding greatness of his power to us-ward who believe [καὶ τὶ τὸ ὑπερβάλλον μέγεθος τῆς δυνάμεως αὐτοῦ εἰς ἡμᾶς τοὺς πιστεύοντας].—The third object of the insight is the power of God, which leads from the calling to the inheritance. The “exceeding greatness” of this power is a worthy object of profound insight (2 Cor. iv. 7: ὑπερβολὴ τῆς δυνάμεως); it must and can also be experienced, since it makes itself felt “to us-ward,” to those “who believe” in the present, hence, without limiting the circle of those who believe, or passing beyond it, not to all in general, but only to those who admit and consent to this condition appointed by God. Since the preposition designates the direction towards the believers, and the present participle the present time, and the article before the participle marks that word as the ground, condition of the activity (ver. 13; 1 John iii. 23), and since only experiences of the power of God are spoken of, from which “the exceeding greatness” is to be inferred, we must here hold fast to the proofs in this earthly life (CHRYSOSTOM or to HARLESS, STIER), and not apply it to the future (MEYER, SCHENKEL, who however adds, that the beginning of the consummation manifests itself in this life).*

According to the working of the might of his strength,† κατὰ τὴν ἐνέργειαν τοῦ κράτους τῆς ἰσχύος αὐτοῦ.—In this collo-

This last objection MEYER, who on all possible occasions adopts a reference to the future kingdom of God at the second Advent, avoids by saying that Paul conceives of it as present (vergegenwärtiges). Nor does the absence of the article interfere with the other interpretation. Comp. HARLESS and ALFORD for a clear statement of the case. We give the paraphrase of the latter: “His inheritance in, whose example and fulness, and embodying is in the saints.” EADIE and HODGE apparently restrict “inheritance” to the future blessing, the former expanding this idea with his usual felicity as a practical expositor.—R.

* ELLICOTT agrees with SCHENKEL in taking the primary reference to be to the future, but admits a secondary present reference, which MEYER denies. See the beautiful climax ELLICOTT gives in his note. But the other view is preferable, on the grammatical grounds urged by BRAUNE, and because of the comparison with the resurrection of Christ. See HODGE, who quotes CALVIN’s remarks against the notion that this language would be frigid hyperbole if applied to our experience in this life. Dr. HODGE, however, incorrectly takes our clause as a third petition. ELLICOTT and MEYER again supply est, with which they connect εἰς ἡμᾶς. It is better, with most, to join it with δυνάμεως αὐτοῦ.—ALFORD retains “to us-ward” as better indicating the prominence which belongs to “us” in the fact of its direction. “But it is not the power which works faith in us, except in so far indeed as faith is a portion of its whole work: here the πιστεύοντες are the material on which the power works.”—R.

† ALFORD and ELLICOTT prefer “strength of his might;” the former says: “The latter (ἰσχύς) is the attribute subjectively considered; the former (ἐκότης) the weight of that attribute, objectively esteemed.” Most commentators accept this distinction; the question is only, whether the inherent strength (ἰσχύς) is best expressed in English by the word strength or might. The former seems preferable.—R.]

cation of words the proper subject is ἰσχύς, as δύναιμι just before, giving prominence to a characteristic, the strength (ἰσχύς from ἰς = seat of elasticity, sinew, muscle, nape of the neck, stem of a tree, hence vis); δύναιμι is brachium divinum, ἰσχύς its muscles; κράτος is the power manifesting itself, the ἐξουσία, which rules (κρᾶται); ἐνέργεια (ἐν ἔργῳ), efficacy (ERASMUS), the actual efficiency (HARLESS). So BENIGL, CALVIN: robur est quasi radix, potentia autem arbor, efficacia fructus. There is no chance throwing together of words, but an order corresponding to the thought: regard is to be paid chiefly to the efficacy, the effects, in which the power of God’s strength allows itself to be perceived and felt. [The language is intended to exalt our ideas of God’s power in connection with this “eminent act of His omnipotence.”—R.]

Κατὰ with the accusative is juxta, secundum, according to, thus designating the norm and standard as well as the motive and occasion (WINER, p. 375 f.). Comp. iv. 7; i. 5, and κατὰ νόμον (Luke ii. 22), κατὰ χάριν (Rom. iv. 4). The two notions, “according to” and “by virtue of” are related (1 Cor. xii. 8, 9). The simplest connection and that most readily understood by the hearer, is that with “us who believe.” We believe only by virtue of the efficacy of the power of God in Christ and upon our souls. [The meaning of the preposition is something less than propter and something more than according to. On the connection see below.—R.]

So CHRYSOSTOM, who truly and beautifully says: τὸ ἀναστῆσαι νεκρὸν πολλῷ θαυμασιώτερον τὸ πείσαι ψυχάς. Just on this account, because we believe only by virtue of the efficacy of God’s power, which has enough obstacles to faith to overcome in us, we can understand, how great the power of God is. Since believing is not a momentary affair, but a status, preserved by the same power, which produced it, the aorist participle πιστεύσαντες is not necessary (BLEEK), and no room is given for the monstrous thought, that faith according to the power of God is spoken of. It is inadmissible to connect, either with the verb ἐστι which is understood, or with “the exceeding greatness” (SCHENKEL), or with all the points introduced by “what” (HARLESS), or with “may know” (MEYER). [Dr. HODGE also defends the connection of this clause with πιστεύοντες, but it is doubtful whether this is correct. For though undoubtedly expressing a truth, yet it places the rest of the chapter in grammatical dependence on an incidental idea. It has also a suspicion of polemical purpose (against Pelagianism) attached to it, besides pressing too strongly on κατὰ the sense of “in virtue of.” It is better then with DE WETTE, EADIE, ELLICOTT, ALFORD and others, to accept a reference which BRAUNE does not mention, viz.: to the whole preceding clause: “not however as an explanation (Chrys.) or an amplification (Calv.) of this power, but in accordance with the full ethical force of κατὰ, as a definition of its mode of operation (Eadie), a mighty measure, a stupendous exemplar by which its infinite powers towards the believing, in its future, yea, and its present manifestations, might be felt, acknowledged, estimated and realized” (ELLICOTT).—R.]

The Apostle's petition as to its ground. Vers. 20-23.

Ver. 20. Which he hath wrought in Christ.—Ἦν ἐν ἐργῇ σου,* analogous to ἀγάπην ἀγάπην, ii. 4, is to be referred to ἐνέργειαν. WINEY, p. 210 [The cognate accusative]. Nor is ἐν τῷ Χριστῷ, without a reference to εἰς ἡμᾶς, ver. 19: in Christ is accomplished that efficacy of God, which is powerful toward us. ["In Him" as our spiritual Head (ELLICOTT and others).—R.]

In raising him from the dead, ἐγείρας αὐτὸν ἐκ νεκρῶν, marks a fact of his working. [The aorist indicates that the act is contemporaneous with that of the preceding verb. ALFORD justly warns against the danger of regarding, "with the shallower expositors, Christ's resurrection as merely a pledge of our bodily resurrection, or as a mere figure representing our spiritual resurrection,—not as involving the resurrection of the church in both senses." Both HODGE and EADIE fall somewhat short of the full conception thus expressed.—R.]

And making him sit at his own right hand in the heavenly places [καὶ καθίσας ἐν δεξιᾷ αὐτοῦ ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις].—Thus the exaltation, beginning with the resurrection, was completed (1 Pet. iii. 21 ff.). Instead of the better supported participle, ἐκάθισεν has been generally substituted, because the Greeks disliked the spinning out of long relative and participial sentences, and easily passed over into the finite verb (WINEY, p. 533, b.). Ἐν δεξιᾷ αὐτοῦ denotes the participation in dominion, the συνθρόνος of the Father (Mark xvi. 19; Rom. viii. 34; Acts vii. 55; Phil. iii. 20 f.; Matth. xx. 21; Mark x. 37). Comp. also 1 Sam. x. 25; 1 Kings ii. 19, in the earthly relations, which are transferred to Christ, Ps. cx. 1. The phrase ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις (see on ver. 3), which is the antithesis of ἐκ νεκρῶν, designates space, or as HOFMANN (Schriftbeweis, II. 1, p. 334) intimates, the relation to the world; ἐν δεξιᾷ αὐτοῦ distinguishes Him from spirits, ἐν ἐπουρανίοις locates Him and them alike. We may wish as little right understand here the status celestis (HARLESS and others) as the central place of Divine glory and revelation, the highest, inmost heaven (STIER, SCHENKEL), since the word is used of Satan also (vi. 11, 12).

[The various local expressions used in the context seem decisive as to the meaning of ἐπουρανίους. It refers to heavenly places, is more indefinite than ἐν τοῖς οὐρανοῖς, but was chosen here probably on account of the details in ver. 21 (ELLICOTT).—ALFORD reminds us, that "the fact of the universal idea of God's dwelling being in heaven, being only a symbolism common to all men, must not for a moment induce us to let go the verity of Christ's bodily existence, or to explain away the glories of His resurrection into mere spiritualities. As Stephen saw Him, so He

Ver. 21. Over above all principality, and power, and might, and lordship, and every name that is named [ὑπὲρ πάντων ἀρχῆς καὶ ἐξουσίας καὶ δυνάμεως καὶ κυριότητος καὶ παντὸς ὀνόματος ὀνομαζομένου].—The word ὑπὲρ πάντων (iv. 10: πάντων τῶν οὐρανῶν; Heb. ix. 5), the opposite of ὑποκάτω (κλίνης, Luke viii. 16; τῆς σκῆς, Jno. i. 51; τῶν ποδῶν, Mark vi. 11; Matth. xxii. 44; Rev. xii. 1), can only mean "over, above" [so ELLICOTT, ALFORD] without marking any particular eminence, GREEK FATHERS, BEZA, ESTIUS [EADIE] or dominion (BENGEL), although the latter inheres in the nature of the case (MEYER). It is to be connected with "setting," and with its genitives ("all principality," etc.) forms the detailed description and explanation of the phrase, "at his right hand in the heavenly places;" the two belong together, the first being more closely defined by the second.

Of these four names the first three occur in the same order in 1 Cor. xv. 24, the first two occur in our Epistle, iii. 10, and in Col. i. 16, after εἴτε θρόνοι εἴτε κυριότητες, joined with εἴτε also and in the same order, in 1 Pet. iii. 22: ὑποταγέντων αὐτῷ ἀγγέλων καὶ ἐξουσιῶν καὶ δυνάμεων. On the other hand in Rom. viii. 38: ἀγγέλων καὶ ἀρχαί, like ζωὴ and θάνατος, δύναμις, ἐνφύμα and βάθος, are contrasted with each other by οὔτε; so that we can infer nothing thence respecting our passage.* A certain consistency is noticeable in the use of these words. Besides the reference to angels is quite obvious, being required here by the context, especially ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις, CALVIN. Cur non simpliciter nominavit angelos? Respondeo, amplificandæ Christi gloriæ causa Paulum exaggerasse hos titulos, ac si diceret; nihil est tam sublime aut excelsum, quocunque nomine censeatur, quod non subjectum sit Christi maiestati. According to HOFMANN (Schriftbeweis, I. p. 34)† we cannot understand there a climax descendens (MEYER, STIER). These designations for the world of angels were given through the higher position of the angels as the messengers of God (Ps. ciii. 20 f.; Heb. i. 6 f., 13 f.), as holy (Ps. lxxxix. 5; Dan. viii. 13). Since the context points to the resurrection of Christ, the Crucified, and His exaltation to a participation in the government of the world, as a fact, in which we see the efficiency of God, according to which He works on us also, in order to make us His children and heirs of His glory, we may well apply these terms to good as well as bad angels, aye, we can scarcely limit the reference to the angels, who reach also into this world, the αἰὼν οὗτος, especially as both πάντες and the concluding phrase "every name that is named," which corresponds entirely with "nor any other creature" (Rom. viii. 38), warrant an unbounded

* [See Textual Note 6, where the reading ἐν ἡγήρηκεν is accepted. MEYER notes its distinctive sense here in referring to an act completed, as viewed by the writer.—R.]

† ELLICOTT, adopting the reading ἐκάθισεν, says the change to the finite verb, is especially designed to enhance the importance of the truth conveyed by the participle, referring to the same page in WINEY. The main thought at first is that of the resurrection, but the Apostle is speedily absorbed with the other, which accords so well with the ground-tone of the Epistle.—R.]

* [The variation in the text of Rom. viii. 38 indicates certainly that the early transcribers referred δυνάμεις to angels, since there is no other motive for the change in its position; the correct reading however seems to justify a reference to earthly powers, so that as remarked above we gain nothing decisive from that passage.—R.]

† [HOFMANN denies any reference to gradations in rank, admitting only a designation of various relations to God and the world, but this distinction does not seem to be tenable.—R.]

extension, limited only to power and might. HARLESS only concedes this, preferring however the reference to good angels alone, as does MEYER, who then refers "name" to every thing created. In such universality is the passage understood by ERASMUS, RUECKERT, STIER [ALFORD] and others. With STIER we must understand under the first four designations, personalities, not merely principles, forces, factors, recognizing them in "every name that is named," the transition to the impersonal (τὰ πάντα). Accordingly the following views are to be rejected: the reference to devils alone (SCHOLZ), to Jewish hierarchs (SCHÖTTGEN), to heathen (VAN TILL) human potentates (MORUS); the affirmation of a polemical purpose, not at all indicated, against angel-worship (BUCER, ESTIUS, HUG), or a preservative purpose possibly infected through false gnosis (OLSHAUSEN [HODGE, though not decidedly]); also every attempt to define the different grades of these groups of angels, and the explanation of "name" as a summing up of a nomen dignitatis potentie (ERASMUS and others); it is not even to be limited to names of "such a character" (HARLESS).

[It is on some accounts safest to take the four terms here introduced in the widest, most indefinite sense. Still it would seem best, if any limitation is made to refer the words to good angels alone, including of course under that term all created heavenly intelligences. The prevailing reference in these words is to angelic powers, to good (Eph. iii. 10; Col. i. 16; ii. 10) and bad (vi. 12; Col. ii. 15; 1 Cor. xv. 24; comp. Rom. viii. 38) alike. The preceding local definition would not exclude the latter, as Christ is placed "over above" all these (besides ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις is apparently applicable to bad angels also, vi. 12). But the "verse relates to Christ's exaltation in heaven rather than His victory over the powers of hell." Then without attempting any closer definition of these classes, we may still admit a descensive order throughout: First the Exalted One, then the various gradations of heavenly Intelligence, then "every name that is named," a view which is favored by the apparent regularity in the order (comp. Col. i. 16). "Every name that is named" includes more than persons, in this view, more than titles of honor: Every thing which can bear a name. No less comprehensive sense seems admissible.—ALFORD accepts the most universal reference for the four terms under discussion, but adopts rather too abstract a sense.—ELLIOTT refers to the list of authors in HAGENBACH, History of Doctrine, § 131.—R.]

Not only in this world, but also in that which is to come [οὐ μόνον ἐν τῷ αἰῶνι τούτῳ ἀλλὰ καὶ ἐν τῷ μέλλοντι].—This qualifies "named," establishing the pre-eminence of Christ above all that is ever named in both this world and that to come. BEZA: præstantiam non esse temporariam, sed æternam. We find a parallel in "things present," "things to come" (Rom. viii. 38). Yet the expression here is not purely—now and hereafter [HODGE], but designates the present time as the first age, disappearing in the transition to the future glory, the future as the eternal glory beginning with the return of Christ. Paul takes the reference to time from the system of the world ruling in each period, thinking at once of pre-messianic and post-messianic, terrestrial and celestial worlds. Excellent, but rather abrupt is BENIGEL's remark: αἰὼν denotat hic non tempus, sed systema rerum et operum suo tempore revelatum et permanens. It is then—always (HARLESS) with respect to this institution of the history of salvation (STIER).* Comp. my remarks on αἰὼν οὗτος and μέλλον, Biblework, 1 John ii. 18, p. 73 f. The connection with kathōcas (CALVIN and others) is incorrect and also the remark of BENIGEL, following CHRYSOSTOM: "Imperia, potestas, etc., sunt in futuro, sed tamen NOMINANTUR etiam in seculo hoc; at ea quoque, quæ in præsentī ne nominantur quidem, sed in futuro demum nobis nomine et re patefient, Christo subjecta sunt."

Ver. 22. And subjected all things under his feet [καὶ πάντα ὑπέταξεν ὑπὸ τοὺς ποδας αὐτοῦ].—Even if we retain the participle in ver. 20, we must here accept the transition from the participle to the finite verb. The words themselves are not difficult. Evidently, and in this the advance of thought consists, πάντα, "all things," is to be applied to all that is created, and ὑπέταξεν, "subjected," with its closer definition, refers of itself as well as on account of Ps. viii. 6 (comp. iii. 6) to conflict and opposition, which was suggested already by the passage (Ps. cx. 1) evidently in mind in ver. 20: "set him at his own right hand." The Lord Himself had quoted Ps. viii. 3. The same Psalm (ver. 6) is used with special emphasis in 1 Cor. xv. 27; Heb. ii. 6-8. Should the Psalm refer to the glory of the first Adam (Gen. i. 26-28) and its restoration, as is definitely indicated in the Epistle to the Hebrews (ii. 6-8), then we must suppose here, that Paul is led by such thoughts to the use of this passage, especially as the context requires it, treating as it does of what shall occur to us, in accordance with what has occurred to Christ. Dominum nunc illi uni (Christo) tribui potest, quandoquidem per Adamum primum potestatem dignitatemque a Deo concessam nostrum genus amisit (PETER MARTYR). There is therefore no tautological repetition here, but from above descensively the Apostle marks, after a sketch of the dignity of Christ (SCHENKEL), the sovereignty, which subjects all things, even the unconscious creation (OLSHAUSEN). This representation is not merely emphatic, or only a reminiscence (MEYER), but καὶ τὴν προφητικὴν ἐπιγάγε μαρτυρίαν (THEODORET). So HARLESS and STIER in the main.

[The notion of opposition should not be too strongly pressed, though it is undoubtedly implied. As regards the allusion or citation from Psa. vii. 6, if it be regarded as a mere allusion the difficulty disappears; if it be a veritable citation, then we must adopt one of two conclusions:

* [Alford remarks: "Not only time present and to come, but the present earthly condition of things, and the future heavenly one." ELLICOTT: "With regard to the meaning of αἰὼν it may be observed that in all passages where it occurs, a temporal notion is more or less apparent. To this in the majority, an ethical idea is limited. In a few passages like the present a semi-local meaning seems also superadded, causing αἰὼν to approach in meaning to κόσμος, though it still may be always distinguished from it by the temporal and (commonly) ethical notions which ever form its back ground." Comp. chap. ii. 2; Gal. i. 4.—R.]

either the Psalm is in a certain sense Messianic, or Paul quotes in the accommodating manner which virtually destroys any specific meaning the Scriptures have. I prefer to adopt the former alternative, little fearing that too many Psalms will be accepted as Messianic. Paul's allusion is due "to a direct reference under the guidance of the Spirit to a passage in the O. T. which in its primary application to man involves a secondary and more profound application to Christ. In the grant of terrestrial sovereignty the Psalmist saw and felt the antitypical mystery of man's future exaltation in Christ" (ELLICOTT).—R.]

And gave him to be the head over all things to the church [καὶ αὐτὸν ἔδωκεν κεφαλὴν ὑπὲρ πάντα τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ].—Thus is set forth the office (SCHENKEL) of Christ, and the sphere of His efficiency. Αὐτὸν is in emphatic position, Him. Such an one, thus placed [thus exalted, thus glorified]. We must regard Him too as a gift, a present. Διδόναι is not=τιθέναι, the Apostle might otherwise have said ἐθηκεν or κατέστησεν; it is quite different in 1 Cor. xii. 28: "And God hath set (ἔθετο) some in the church." He gave Him to be "Head over all things to the church." We say with equal exactness: He gave Him to be Head, or as Head for the Church. As Head! not as καρδιά, but as κεφαλή. In the head lies the organizing power. SCHUBERT (Geschichte der Seele, p. 163) describes the relation of head and body "as a figure of a love, descending from above to beneath, grasping and moving the corporeal, and of a longing rising from below to above, the work of which it is, to constantly transform the lower nature of that which longs into the higher nature of that which is longed for." MARTIN BOOS boldly says: "Christ dwelling in our humanity is as active as in that which He assumed from Mary." GERLACH beautifully says: "At once Ruler and Member of His Body." "Head" designates elsewhere superiority also (1 Cor. xi. 3).

The qualifying phrase "over all" is governed by "gave him to be head," and marks the might (ὑπὲρ) of this Head; πάντα is all without limitation, He is Head over all—to the church, to Christendom; "Head" is not to be supplied again (MEYER). The presence of κεφαλὴν ὑπὲρ πάντα between ἔδωκεν and τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ does not at all alter the construction (against HOFMANN, Schriftbeweis, II. 2, p. 117). The sense is precisely this: "Christ is such a Head of the Church, that He is for all that the Lord over all, over devils, world, etc." (LUTHER). The whole economy of Creation stands at His disposal as the basis and sphere of activity for the economy of redemption (BECK). Accordingly ὑπὲρ πάντα is not to be joined per trajectionem to αὐτόν (Syriac, GREEK FATHERS, ERASMUS and others), nor is ὑπὲρ πάντα to be taken as meaning: above all the good which God has given stands this that He gave Christ as Head of the Church (CHRYSOSTOM), nor is it=præcipue, μάλιστα πάντων (BAUMGARTEN), nor=ὑπερέχοντα πάντων, caput summum (BEZA, RUECKERT: Oberhaupt, OLSH.: the prophets also were heads); nor are we to understand it of bona virtutum (ANSELM), or dona gratiæ, nor is "the natural limitation to be found in τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ" and this dative taken as in commodum ecclesiæ, for the Church (HARLESS). It is altogether unwarrantable to take the neuter for the masculine (JEROME, WAHL).

[The view of BRAUNE is in the main that of modern English commentators. We must reject any sense of the verb but the simple one of "give," since the dative follows. Christ is given to the church—and given as Head, for the next clause renders this view imperative. The only trouble then is with "over all things;" what is His relation to them? Evidently that of Head also. No other view is admissible exegetically; the question becoming thus a purely grammatical one: Shall we accept a brachyology and understand a second κεφαλὴν before τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ (MEYER, STIER, HODGE approvingly): "gave Him the Head over all things (to be the Head) to the church," or take κεφαλὴν as a species of tertiary predicate (ALFORD, EADIE, ELLICOTT): "gave Him as Head over all things to the Church." The latter seems to be Braune's view, and is certainly the simpler grammatically. Nor does it throw out of view the grand thought that Christ is Head of the Church. ALFORD: "CHRIST is Head over all things: the Church is the Body of Christ, and as such is the fulness of Him who fills all with all: the Head of such a Body, is Head over all things; therefore when God gives Christ as Head to the Church, He gives Him as Head over all things to the Church, from the necessity of the case."—R.]

The choice of the word ἐκκλησία for the Christian Church (iii. 10, 21; v. 23, 25, 27, 29, 32; Phil. iii. 6; 1 Cor. vi. 4; xii. 28) is very apt. GERHARD (Loc. ed. Colta. X. 3, 20): Chemnitius notat σύγκλητον de primoribus, magnatibus, consilibus et eorum conventu, διάκλητον de coluvie promiscuæ multitudinis quando fit congregatio ab agris, ἐκκλησίαν vero de civibus, quando συνέδος τῶν κατὰ τὴν πόλιν celebratur, eorum scilicet, qui certis legibus sibi devincti unius reipublicæ cives sunt. Appellatio igitur ecclesiæ ad populum Dei translata ostendit, ECCLESIAM DEI NON ESSE COLLUVIEM PROMISCUÆ MULTITUDINIS, sed eorum, qui certis legibus a Deo vocati et sibi invicem sunt obstricti. Athenis erant usitati duplices conventus, ἐκκλησίαι et ἀγοαὶ vel ἀγοραῖαι. Illæ significabant conventus ordinatos, quando universitas civium, eorum scilicet, qui sui civitatis habebant, ordine, iusto, a magistratu convocati congregabantur; hæ vero significabant congregationes promiscuas et inordinatas, quando promiscua multitudo hominum in civitatibus et oppidis sine observatione ordinis in unum coibat.—Appellationi igitur ecclesiæ ad populum Dei translata inest significatio εὐτασίας καὶ εὐνοίας, qualis est in aristocratia civili, cui opponitur δημοκρατία, ἀναστασιας καὶ ἀτασίας plenissima.—Ut civitas non consistit ex medico et medico, aut ex rustico et rustico, sed ex medico et rustico, sicut Aristoteles in ethicis loquitur, ITA QUOQUE ECCLESIA NON CONSTAT EX PASTORE ET PASTORE SEU EX AUDITORE ET AUDITORE, SED EX DOCENTIBUS ET DISCENTIBUS, ATQUE INTER IPSOS AUDITORES SUNT VARIJ VITÆ STATUS ATQUE ORDINES.

Accordingly the ἐκκλησία has two main features in it, one the ordained unity and the other the calling, which includes in itself a separating out (ἐκλέγεσθαι) from the world not yet called or rejecting the call, and which is consummated through intellectual means. See further under Doctr. Note 6.

Ver. 23. Which is his body. ἡ τις ἐστὶν -ὃ σῶμα αὐτοῦ.—The pronoun ὅστις has an “explanatory element,” introducing the statement of a reason, and is—the old German als welcher, “as which.” So Rom. ii. 15: οἵτινες= ut qui (BEZA), qui quidem ostendant (CASTALIO); LUTHER renders it quite well: damit dass sie beweisen, and here: welche da ist. [ALFORD: which same; EADIE, ELLICOTT: which indeed. MEYER: “ut quæ, defining the attribute as belonging to the being of the church”—is perhaps too strong—though true enough.—R.] He is the Head of the church, since it is His Body, τὸ σῶμα αὐτοῦ (il. 16; iv. 4, 12, 16; v. 23, 30; Col. i. 18, 24; ii. 19; iii. 15; Rom. xii. 5; 1 Cor. vi. 15; x. 17; xii. 13, 27). From this citation of passages, in all of which this view of the Apostle is contained, the frequency of the figure, especially in this Epistle, may be seen. The membership making up the whole, the indispensableness of Christ and the vital fellowship with Him are marked. We must also remember, that here, on account of the ἡ τις, only that is treated of, which the church is and has in Christ, and not what He has in it; this is only an inference, though a correct one, and remains in the background, should it enter at all.

[The questions, what constitutes the church? who are true members of the true church? do not enter here; but that Paul here teaches a mystical union, above and beyond any federal or representative union, or ethical union of thought and feeling, seems perfectly clear. We call this a figure, but is it not the reality, and the organic unity of the body the figure? Really and truly the church is the body of Christ, and out of this truth spring many lessons respecting our personal union with Christ. ALFORD: “It is veritably His body: not that which in our glorified humanity He personally bears, but that in which He, as the Christ of God, is manifested and glorified by spiritual organization. He is its Head; from Him comes its life; in Him, it is exalted; in it, He is lived forth and witnessed to; He possesses nothing for Himself,—neither His communion with the Father, nor His fulness of the Spirit, nor His glorified humanity,—but all for His Church, which is in the innermost reality, HIMSELF.” Comp. Col. i. 24, which admits of no satisfactory explanation, unless we accept the fact that the Apostle was conscious of such a union as this.—R.]

The fulness of him who filleth all in all [τὸ πλήρωμα τοῦ τὰ πάντα ἐν πάσιν πληρομένου].—As respects syntax, this is the intrusion of an apposition, forming a parallel clause, in order to express without a figure, what has just been figuratively explained: “fulness” corresponds to “body,” “of Him filling all in all” to “His.”

On πλήρωμα, comp. ver. 10 and Passow sub voce. Words ending in —μός as a rule represent the abstract action of the verb, those in —μα the concrete effect, so “that they are for the most part equivalent to the perfect participle passive” (BUTTMANN), like πράγμα, σπέρμα, κήρυγμα, especially here σῶμα (id quod sēctetur). The word is not=πληρώσις, the act of filling, but is to be taken in the passive sense: all that, or with which any thing is filled, the fulness. So here. [This simple passive sense is adopted by FRITZSCHE, DE WETTE, OLSHAUSEN, STIER, MEYER, and by ALFORD, EADIE, ELLICOTT (“that which is filled, the filled-up receptacle.”) As the word was a favorite among the Gnostics (in after times however), so it has been a favorite plaything with commentators since, who have thrown not a little confusion upon its meaning. The simple passive sense is the most natural one; though perhaps not the most usual one, it is certainly allowable. The active sense, the filling up is adopted by HARLESS, who says there is no other sense used in the New Testament, in which view HODGE seems to acquiesce. But what is meant by the active sense: implendi actionem, or id quod res impletur? ELLICOTT speaks of the latter as passive, while HODGE evidently regards it as active (so BRAUNE apparently under 2 below). ALFORD deems it a transition from the abstract sense, denying any active sense to such nouns, but saying that what is thus termed is “a logical transference from the effect to that which exemplifies the effect.” From this it is evident how impossible it is to speak intelligibly about the word in its active and passive senses, until this meaning: that by which any thing is filled, is properly labelled. That is the work of the grammarian, yet it is evident that it is active or passive, according to the point of view: “whether one thinks first of the container, and then of the contained, or the reverse.” HARLESS and HODGE are not justified in saying that the word is always used actively in the New Testament, though this sense is a common one.* It would give here the meaning complement, or supplement, which seems appropriate in view of the figure of Head and Body. But, on the other hand, this gives a sense which is so remarkable as to raise doubts; for how can Christ be filled by the church? Then again, we are almost forced by this interpretation to take the following participle in a passive sense, which is objectionable grammatically and logically. These reasons are strong enough to lead us to adopt the passive sense, which may be done without any fear of running counter to the usus loquendi of the New Testament.—R.]

Nor does the difficulty lie in the genitive: τοῦ πληρομένου, which refers to Christ. The participle is middle, and, as usage requires in the case of such correlated words, is used in the same sense as the preceding noun: of Him who fills from out Himself, through Himself (WINER, p. 242), or fills for Himself (FRITZSCHE: qui sibi complet). [The latter sense is adopted by MEYER (in 4th edition, BRAUNE quotes him as accepting a deponent sense), ELLICOTT, EADIE. This reciprocal sense seems to have escaped the notice of Dr. HODGE, who agrees with ALFORD in accepting the active sense, though he admits it is favored only by classical usage. Certainly the active meaning of the participle is not so justifi-

* [In many of the instances specified by HODGE, the passive sense is equally allowable. For example, chap. i. 10, “the fulness of the times” may as well be taken as meaning the state of being full on the part of the appointed periods of time, as that which fills up those periods, and so in Gal. iv. 4; Eph. iii. 19: “the fulness of God” affords a much better sense if taken passively (see in loco), while Mark vii. 20: “the fulnesses of how many baskets,” refers not to what fills up the baskets, but “the state of fulness as respects the baskets.”—R.]

fiable as the passive sense of the noun πλήρωμα.—R.] The present tense must also be taken into the account: He is conceived of in the process of filling; whether He succeeds, the result will show; the process is now going on.

The real difficulty lies in τὰ πάντα ἐν πᾶσιν, "all in all." The object τὰ πάντα, is of course, in accordance with what precedes, to be referred to the entire world of creatures, which Christ fills, naturally as a soul the body, the former however working out beyond the latter, not exclusively in and upon it, and not only working, but being actively present, hence not as blood fills the heart, or water a vessel. "All" is filled by Christ, as is the Church, His Body, hence not mechanically, chemically, or the like. The most difficult point still remains: ἐν πᾶσιν, "in all." The preposition ἐν joined with πληροῦσθαι and πλήρωμα must designate that in which He fills; if this is inconceivable, then the Apostle must and would have expressed himself otherwise. Accordingly the neuter cannot be accepted here, since then idem per idem would be asserted, or an exaggeration occur: Alles in Allem [all things in all things, see below under (7).]—R.] Following the rule, that those cases which belong to both genders (πάντων, πᾶσι) are to be taken as masculine, unless the context absolutely requires the neuter, we render: in Allen, "in all persons" (so LUTHER originally, but "in Allem" afterwards crept in); it thus marks His filling efficiency in persons, in heavenly spirits and human souls, of which also His relation as Head of the Church obliges us to think. He is the central Personality, working through all things, working in all. Such a Head has the Church, the central sphere of the world which is to be perfected (STIER).^{*} This explanation is in no particular without supporters, but there is also no incorrect explanation possible which has not been made here.

(1.) The connection is viewed incorrectly, by joining the parallel clause "the fulness," etc., with "him" (ver. 22), and taking "which is his body" as parenthetical (ERASMUS), when it is too important to admit of this. BENGE, too, following SEMLER, is incorrect: "Hoc neque de ecclesia prædicatur, ut plerique censent, neque, ut aliis visum, cum DEBIT construitur, sed absolute ponitur accusativo casu, uti τὸ μαρτύριον, 1 Tim. ii. 6. Est enim epiphonema eorum, quæ a ver. 20 dicuntur, inuitus apostolus, in Christo esse PLENITUDINEM patris omnia impletis in omnibus."

(2.) Η πληρωμα is taken in the active sense as supplementum. So the GREEK FATHERS, ESTIUS,

^{*} [This interpretation is very plausible, and commends itself especially on account of the view it takes of the preposition ἐν. As τὰ πάντα immediately precedes, too much stress should not be laid on the rule mentioned above respecting the choice of the masculine. But I fully share in Dr. Braune's dislike for the instrumental sense of ἐν (taking it as per). One who has been puzzled by the E. V., which accepts this as one of its most usual significations, and seen how often commentators pass over it without notice, must feel that for so small a word, it has suffered more at the hands of its friends than any other in the Greek Testament. It is a good rule: never render ἐν, by if any other possible meaning accords with the context. ALFORD and ELLICOTT refer to chap. v. 18, in support of the instrumental sense, but it is very doubtful even there. If we take ἐν—in here, then the πᾶσιν must be accepted as masculine, for the neuter would not allow of an intelligible meaning, especially in view of the well-known phrase τὰ πάντα, the universe. See under (7) however.—K.]

CALVIN, BEZA ("ut sciamus Christum per se non indigere hoc supplemento, ut qui efficiat omnia in omnibus revera," even HARLESS, who holds with BAEHR as the undoubted result of investigation, that πλήρωμα is used in the New Testament only in its active sense, says: "She is the fulness of Christ, not as though she were the glory which dwells in Him, but because He permits His glory, as in all, so to dwell in her; she is the glory, not of one who would be in want without her, but of Him who fills all in all parts," so HORMANN (Schriftbeweis, II. 2, p. 118-120). Even STIER points to this, bringing it over out of the middle form: yet this is not se implere, se supplere, but sibi. It is quite as incorrect to take it as= πλήθος (HESYCHIUS, WAHL: copia cultorum Dei sive Christi, SCHÜTZGEN: multitudo, cui Christus præest).—RUECKERT, too, who is helpless here, is in error, in taking the Church, πληρωμα, as the means of filling for Christ's executive efficiency, since the Church can do nothing without Him.—The explanation of CAMERON is a curiosity: full bodily mass.*

(3.) The participle τοῦ πληρουμένου is taken as passive (CHRYSTOSTOM, Vulgate); ἀντὶ τοῦ πληροῦντος (THEODORET, EKKUMENIUS, OLSHAUSEN, HARLESS); as deponent (MEYER). BENGE remarks: "i. e., πληροῦντος; sed major vis medie vocis, in denotanda relatione ejus, qui implet et eorum, qui impleuntur"—quite correct!

(4.) The meaning of the verb is certainly not: to make complete (Vulgate, ESTIUS: adimpletur).

(5.) As regards the subject of the verb, HARLESS, referring to THEODORET: τον μὲν Χριστοῦ σῶμα, τὸν δὲ πα πρὸς πλήρωμα—οὐκ ἐν αὐτῇ τῇ (ἐκκλησίᾳ) καὶ ἐμπεριπατεῖ κατὰ τὴν προφητικὴν ὁσάνην says: it must be referred to Christ, while STIER, who founds his proofless on the passage in question than on the organism of the Epistle, says: God must be considered the subject. [So ALFORD, but the great majority of commentators adopt the other reference.—R.]

(6.) Τὰ πάντα has been limited to the members of the Church, to members of the body of Christ (ESTIUS, STIER), to the spiritual results wrought by Christ, or the Christian's faculties of soul (GROTIUS: Christus in omnibus (credentibus) implet omnia, mentem luce, voluntatem piis affectibus, corpus ipsum obsequendi facultate), to different peoples, nations (FLATT, MORUS).

(7.) The preposition ἐν is taken as instrumental (MEYER). [ALFORD: "The thing with, or by, or in which as an element, the filling takes place. So that the expression will mean, with all, not only gifts, not only blessings, but things." So ELLICOTT, who thus explains the whole verse: "The Church is the veritable mystical Body of Christ, yea the recipient of the plenitudes of Him who filleth all things, whether in heaven or in earth, with all the things, elements, and entities, of which they are composed." This view accepts πᾶσιν as neuter, and is on the whole preferable to every other interpretation, unless that of Braune be an exception. See above.—R.]

^{*} [HARLESS takes πλήρωμα as expressing the Divine glory—Shekinah, but that is objectionable for reasons both lexical and logical.—EADIE refers to the view of MICHAELIS and BRETSCHNEIDER—(quasi templum in quo habitat, quod occupat et regit, ut anima corpus), but this and kindred interpretations are all either too limited or too specific. Just here it becomes us to be cautious.—R.]

(8) Πᾶσιν is taken as neuter and rendered: in all parts (HARLESS and others), or in all places, everywhere (FLATT). BENDEL (neutrum, masculini potestatem) does not belong here, nor does he waver; he refers it to μέλει τοῦ σώματος αὐτοῦ, to persons. It is also taken adverbially: ἐν παντί (JEROME: sicut adimpletur imperator, si quoties ejus augeatur exercitus—ita et—Christus—sic tamen, ut omnia adimpleantur in omnibus, i. e., ut qui in eum credunt, cunctis virtutibus pleni sint). Indeed, πάντα ἐν πᾶσιν has been taken adverbially (SCHÖTTGEN: omnia omnino), or referred to the eternal (HOLZHAUSEN).

(9.) It is entirely groundless to find a polemic purpose here, especially an account of the word πλήρωμα used afterwards by the Gnostics also (MEIER, BAEHR).

(10.) Quite as groundless is the assumption that the ubiquity of the glorified Body is taught here (CALOVIVS).

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. God, whose power and glory is so exceeding great (ver. 19), at whose command and disposal are all things, even Christ, whom He raised and exalted above all heavenly and earthly, personal and unpersonal powers (vers. 20-22), works freely, but without arbitrariness, conditioning Himself, upon men—not without faith (ver. 19), not without Christ (vers. 22, 23), so that the prayer also (vers. 16, 17: ἡμεῖς), which is offered believingly in the name of Christ, has a prospect of being granted. Precisely in the work of Redemption is manifested the worshipful glory of God, who in self-conditioning love moderates Himself, lowers and limits Himself, in order to employ and to show His unbounded love, to impart of His nature and to make blessed. His whole power, strength, might and efficacy stand in the service of His love.

2. Christ, who as to His human nature has in His Father His God (ver. 17), is our Lord, the Head of His Church, at the right hand of God in glory, of unlimited power over angels and men, ministering and hostile spirits, as well as over the economy of the creation and of salvation. He cannot be put down to the level of Divine humanity and God likeness. Yet our section says nothing of His state of humiliation, speaks only of His state of exaltation, beginning with the resurrection from the dead, refers to the humanity, which He assumed, appropriated, and did not afterwards relinquish,* only that in what the Father did in Him, we might have a standard for what the Almighty God, who through Him is our Father, will and shall do and work in us (vers. 19, 20: εἰς ἡμᾶς—κατὰ τὴν ἐνέργειαν—ἐν τῷ Χριστῷ). He is the Head, to whom there will not be wanting a body, which He will prepare for Himself; He cannot be a "mere Head." But he has also no vicar, such as the Pope. Sancta enim Christiana sive Catholica ecclesia consistere absque 1870 capite optime potest et constitisset certe rectius, ac melius cum eo ageretur, nisi diabolus illud caput in medium projecisset et exaltasset (Articles of Smalkald).

3. The connection between creation and redemption is presupposed here; the two spheres do not fall asunder; Christ, the acme in both, holds them together; the former must serve the latter (vers. 21-23).

4. Respecting the angels, who are included in ver. 21. "over above all principality, and power, and might, and lordship," it is only indicated that they are personalities, and affirmed that they have power and might. From the series of these designations, which can scarcely be taken as a descending climax [though this is the most plausible hypothesis—R.], nothing can be inferred as to the ranks or groups of angels.* ["On the nature of angels, consult the able treatise by TWESTEN, Dogmatik, Vol. II. especially § 1, 4, the essay by STUART, Bibliotheca Sacra for 1843, p. 88-154, EBRARD, Dogmatik, § 228 sq., Vol. I. p. 276, and the remarks of LANGE, Leben Jesu, Part II. p. 41 f." (ELLICOTT).—All that is expressed is well set forth by WESLEY: "We know that the king is above all, though we cannot name all the officers of his court. So we know that Christ is above all, though we are not able to name all His subjects."—R.]

5. The Church. On this subject our section teaches more. As regards its origin the name ἐκκλησία (ver. 22), "the calling of God" (ver. 18) show what is indicated by "Head" or "gave Him to be Head" (ver. 22) viz.: The Church results not from a physical or purely world-historical process without the creative power and fatherly love of God; it is His work, His gracious gift, and indeed His Word is efficient therein, Christ, also, as the Eternal Word, as the power organizing the whole (τὸ σῶμα), through the word, as the intellectual means of the ingathering. The extent of the Church is also pointed out in two directions:

a) On earth: "the faith which is among you in the Lord Jesus" (ver. 15) and "to us—ward who believe" (ver. 19)—the faith in Jesus, wrought in men through the word, describes the domain of the Church: where (καθ' ἡμᾶς) faith is there is the Church, the congregation, even if it is wanting in particular persons or in many. The extent is not to be limited by Donatist or Anabaptist notions of the Church; she has, according to the purity of the word, the power of the preaching, the vitality of the faith, her degrees, quo purior et sincerior est verbi prædicatio, eo etiam purior est ecclesie status (JOHN GERHARD, Loc. XI. p. 195). But it should not be said, that there is no Church where sinners are and are tolerated (Anabaptists, SCHWENKFELD and others).

b) On earth and in heaven: "the fulness of Him who filleth all in all" (ver. 23); she is not merely a temporal institution, within the visible world, she embraces men after as well as before death. "Of all the names which the Church can and does bear, not one is so immeasurably

* [We must hold fast, especially in view of the local reference in ver. 20 to the truth of Christ's actual bodily presence in heaven, over against the Lutheran doctrine of the ubiquity of His humanity (Form. Conc. II. 8). Comp. the implied opposition to this dogma in the Heidelberg Catechism, Q. 47, 48, 80 (apparently inserted afterwards). The Eucharistic controversies of the 16th century made of this a battle-field.—R.]

* [The so-called revelations of modern "spiritualism" do not seem to have shed much light on the few passages of Scripture which treat of angels. Nor do they attempt to do so. One might infer something from this fact, as to the question whether these revelations, granting them a supernatural origin, have the same origin as the statements of Scripture.—R.]

deep and yet so transparently clear, so sharply defined and yet so inexhaustibly rich, at once so real and spiritual, external and internal, obvious and mysterious as this one: she is the Body of Christ. It is this name and no other, which the New Testament Church has not in common with the Old Testament Church, and in which all her superiority over the latter is included; time and eternity, suffering and glory, blessing and curse, for all over whom the name of Christ is named, lie in its lap, and itself a riddle, to be first solved hereafter, yet all the riddles proposed to us by the present life find in it their solution" (DELITZSCH).

The completion of the Church is an object of the Divine government of the world, and has begun here in Christendom by the path of faith, to which the inheritance in the saints is certain (vers. 18, 19, 23).

6. Faith has its ground "in the Lord Jesus" (ver. 15), its place of manifestation in the Church (καθ' ἑαυτήν, ver. 15), its worth and its position before love (ver. 15), its importance and value for God, who requires it as the condition of salvation (ver. 19: "to us-ward who believe"), from which may be inferred at the same time, that it has different degrees, since the Apostle joins together himself and others, also since the participation is present, that it is not to be conceived of as an act once for all, but as "a continuing life-movement to be constantly renewed."

7. Beside faith stands love, which is germinally included in the former, since this "is an act of self-emptying and surrender to a gracious God," who is Love. But it is not to be regarded as a virtue, by means of which we become well-pleasing to the beloved Love; it comes into existence with faith, which lays hold of the righteousness of Christ, and thus attains to righteousness before God, and is the mother of all virtues.—In the phrase "unto all the saints" no limitation can be perceived, since he who loves all the members of the Church, the orthodox and the erring too, will imitate his Lord Jesus, the Good Samaritan of the world in Samaritan love (Luke, x. 37: "Go thou and do likewise"). The context leads only to this emphasizing of love.

8. The ground of hope is the calling of God and its goal the "inheritance" of God. It comes from above, points and looks upward; it lifts us out of the natural ego and above the visible world about us.*

9. Knowledge is both path (ἐν ἐπιγνώσει, ver. 17) and goal (εἰς τὸ εἶδέναι, ver. 18); it is a matter capable of growth, for it has but to ponder the thoughts of the eternal, creative God. Man's knowledge is not perfect within the domain of creation, still less can he know the things of the invisible world. Only by living in a sphere does he gather knowledge of what is found there; knowledge comes from experience of occurrences. Without a disposition of the heart the sense of the understanding is not enlarged and sharpened. Sensible, mental, spiritual knowledge refers to life-spheres, in which he who knows must move. Only the believing, loving, longing one knows and grows in knowledge unto knowledge.

10. The prayer of the Apostle has its starting-point in what God has given, and its goal in what God should give. From thankful acknowledgment, he proceeds to requests, petitions; with the faith and love of the church before his eyes, he rises to supplication for the spirit of wisdom and revelation, for wider knowledge of what God is, on behalf of their inner life. This occurs daily. Thus have we all, ministers and members of the church, especially the former, to learn, in order to practise it, what furthers the Kingdom of God in general and in particular: such prayer is a means of grace full of blessing for those who offer it, as well as for those for whom it is offered.

11. The consummation in the case of individuals is conditioned by the church and conditions its consummation. Hence "His inheritance in the saints" (ver. 18). Outside the church we do not advance, nor salvation become ours, whatever we may be, or accrue to us, wherever we stand; it is a gift, for which we must be prepared. The fulness of the gift and our perfection finally coincide.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

It is a joy, when in social circles one hears from another, just as of city and state events, so especially of the kingdom of God, the church of Christ, of the faith and love of Christians.—We should not judge the faith of particular persons in a church, but rejoice in the faith within the church, though it be only among the minority; so long as there is believing preaching, supplication for all that concerns the church, order in the administration of the sacraments, grace at table and family worship, use of the best hymns, since we have so many poor ones, and many another sign of faith in the Lord Jesus Christ in the church, a stranger who does not know the individuals at all, may and ought to rejoice therein and speak thereof.—Love to all Christians! As we must pray every Sunday for love toward all men, so love to all Christians is not so easily brought about. The orthodox, pietists, and those who deal earnestly with God's word and the confessions of the church, are least likely to encounter love from those, who regard themselves as precisely the liberal Christians; such fall in much more readily with those who are against the Church of Christ than with these. Always reckon among "all Christians" those first, who are to you the most unpleasant, thus you will best perceive the weight of this injunction and your own weakness.—Who of us always begins his prayers with thanksgiving, as did the Apostle? We rather pray for what we lack, than thank for what we have received. This should not be.

Men rejoice much, if they are thought of at a distance; they part well-nigh always with the request: Remember me! It is something beyond this, when such remembrance rises into intercession, and one remembers the absent, not merely pleasantly or listlessly, in conversation with men, but devoutly in prayer to God.—Without knowledge we do not attain to knowledge; only in the light do we see light. The Apostle does not indeed preach the Word of learning or science, but still it is spoken against ignorance, indiscretion, narrowness. Only that the centre of man, the heart and temper with the will be open to the light, to knowledge!—As the fear of God is the beginning of wisdom (Ps. cxi. 10), so the starting point for this is insight into our misery and poverty: poor human beings generally swell out with their own worth, and just in this way fritter away what they have of God's gifts. We must in the end seek our worth above, if we would find it; else we get into a pitiful satisfaction.

* [MEYER: "Notice here, too, the three fundamental elements of subjective Christianity: Faith and Love and Hope (vers. 15, 18); in faith and love the illumination through the Holy Ghost should ever bring more and more to our knowledge the glory of our hope; for the Christians' σώζοντες is in heaven (Phil. iii. 20), whither their entire "minding" and "seeking" is directed. The centre of Christianity is still faith with its love, in connection with which, however, hope ever, encouragingly and inspiringly, holds up the constant goal." He adduces this against WEISS, who seeks to discover here special prominence given to hope "entirely after the Petrine mode," which as that author thinks makes "hope" the centre.—B.]

The three most important objects of our knowledge: 1. God's call—in our need; 2. God's heritage—in our heart; 3. God's strength—in our longing and striving.—As the world needs revelation beside the wisdom from experience, so a man also needs besides wisdom and prudence the private revelation to teach what and how he should act and suffer and bear.—Our hope rests on Christ in God. What the Father, to whom Christ in His holy humanity prayed, praying as to His God, has done to Him, in and upon Him, when He exalted Him from the dead to His right hand, that shall occur to thee, since He works upon thee, yet only in proportion to thy faith in thy Saviour.—Be, become and remain a member of the Church which is His Body! Those are beheaded rather, who deny the Lord to save their heads, than those who in holy martyrdom lost their heads, to remain with their Head.

STARKE:—Faith has to do with the gospel, love with the law. Faith takes, love gives; the former has the benefits, the latter the duties.—We must not seek the saints only in heaven, for they are certainly already on the earth. The imperfection of sanctification and holiness does not deny the truth of these things.—See here, how a preacher should remember his congregation before God in prayer!—As it is one of the signs and duties of a faithful teacher, now to thank and now to pray to God for his congregation, so it is not less the characteristic of a good hearer, to give the teacher, whose intercession he will confidently expect as a blessing to himself, great cause for thanksgiving.—The possessions of our glorious inheritance are so great and excellent, that no man can understand them without the illumination of the Holy Ghost.—The mere science of the letter in Divine things, obtained by the natural powers of godless people is no real enlightenment nor proper knowledge of Jesus Christ.—The call to the kingdom of God must stand at the basis of every external calling which we have in our sphere of life, that we may master it.—Conversion is a great and almighty work of God, hence not the power of man, nor consisting in a mere thought of the brain, but is a great change of soul, since all its powers are turned away from sin and the world to heaven and God.—Lazarus was awakened by Christ with a word, but how many sermons did He use to awaken the spiritually dead Jews, and yet they would not let themselves be awakened. God's power and grace for the conversion of man is in itself infinite, yet He will force no man, but leaves him the freedom to resist.—The Christian Church is the Body of Christ and hence closely united with Him. She receives all her fulness from Him; from Him, the Head, flows all strength into the members. Although she here finds herself surrounded with much weakness and misery, yet is she still glorious in her Head, who already reigns in glory.

A. H. FRANCKE:—This then is also wisdom, to know that we cannot be wise unless there be a God and we can receive it from Him in answer to prayer. The Apostle does not say, he wishes that a university might be established in the city of Ephesus, in which many professors would take positions, that by this means the people might be made wise,—but: that the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, may give unto you the spirit of wisdom.

RIEGER:—Beside the glances into the distance and the hope of our calling in the invisible and eternal, beside the insight into the economy of God, without us, we must not disregard the insight into the necessary truths learned by experience of God's work of grace within us, that each do their part in making the heart steadfast and full of confidence and love. If a man thinks of the depth of his fall, the throng and deceit of his foes, the powerful hindrances to his salvation, then he may well desire to look into the greatness of the power of God, which is employed in his calling and preservation unto blessedness.—In faith we can most precisely notice, how God applies His transcendent might and yet how man is not overcome by it in a violent manner, but is so disposed, that he can maintain his convictions, his love for light, his obedience under its influence.—Believing is opposed by the love of our own life so deeply inherent in us, by so many offences occurring to us in the world's ways; therefore it requires the working of His mighty strength. This power of God and its effect is indeed still concealed in us, covered up by our weaknesses, and behind the curtain of the flesh not yet fully to be judged; but in Jesus Christ it has already attained to victory.—The Head and the Body together make a whole: in the church is seen the fulness of Him who filleth all in all; Christ applies the fulness of the Godhead dwelling in Him to the completing and perfecting of this His church; He does not leave her until He has also fulfilled all that is well-pleasing to God, and presented her, blameless, filled with all the fruits of righteousness.—He who stands in vital fellowship with Him, has all things.—All that is not yet disclosed to you, remains yours still in this fulness.

PASSAVANT:—Do you detect no result of this Divine power in you, no new life from God, or no hunger and thirst after deliverance out of the old nature into the new nature of the friends of the Lord; oh, do not trust yourself, do not trust thy best thoughts, thy most beautiful feelings, thy noblest strivings, thy best beliefs, for there is also a vain, a false, self-made, fancied faith, a faith leading to God as little as coming from God.—Are they holy and good, those powers, Jesus is still more holy and glorious above them; and have they on God's account, as is the case, as angels of light an influence upon the worlds of God, upon the earth, upon us, they receive from Christ their power and strength, they stand under His supreme influence; He directs them, He equips them. Are they unholy and evil, those powers, even here Jesus will have power and maintain authority; will punish their evil nature, will restrain their corrupting influence and destroy their power, aye, has already, as the Dying and Crucified One, broken and destroyed their power.—All in all: In the angels of His power, in the glorified righteous, in His saints, and all the Blessed, their only clear and heavenly radiance, their Divine joy, their eternal peace, their blessedness, their glory. All in all: Among the angels of disobedience, about the unrighteous, the ungodly and the damned, for all the Light shining with eternal rays of anxiety and terror through their darkness; the eye, that with a flame of fire searches forever through their inmost nature; the power, that always from without and from within tends them with a rod of iron; the word, the eternal word, judging and condemning them in their own hearts, ever anew, ever more penetratingly, more irrevocably, more awfully. All in all: In all His worlds, from the lowest to the highest degrees, in all powers and glories, from the smallest to the most exalted of constellations, of suns, which excel all others in clearness and glory. He is the Divine, infinite fulness of light, of life, from out which they gladly rise in His heavens.

HEUBNER:—Thanksgiving and prayer are the inward emotions of a holy mind, the inward holy choir.—Only what proceeds from God's revelation, which is attested to man by the illumination of the Holy Ghost, is true wisdom. Every one must have his own revelation of Christianity, for he should not believe on the testimony of a stranger.—The Christian knows not only his misery, but also his blessedness, how rich and glorious is the inheritance ordained by God for the saints, and from the greatness of his blessedness he knows the greatness of Divine grace. All this can be known and valued only by an enlightened eye, because it has not the dazzling glitter of earthly things. The evil spirit blinds man, so that he does not perceive how great is the blessedness won by Christ, so that he in his blindness thinks this disturbs his happiness and lays a yoke upon him.—God's mental power shows itself in what He has made out of man, in the transformation of the single sinner as well as of the heathen world. What philosopher could have suspected this? What did Apollonius accomplish? Nothing, save that the next generation held him to be what he was, a charlatan.—The resurrection of Christ is a token of spiritual life, of the regeneration of humanity, to take place through the Risen and Exalted Christ.—Christ is the Lord of the whole world of spirits, visible and invisible; He has authority over all ruling powers in heaven and on earth. Paul's words are an amplification of Matth. xxviii. 18.—This heavenly King is given to the Church as Head; she is committed to Him in specie; over her He has immediate oversight and care; she is to Him the dearest of all, because He has bought her with His own blood.—The Church is the Body of Christ, she is a communion, entirely permeated by His Spirit, the members being animated and controlled by His Spirit; she is the very centre of His efficiency.

STRER:—The most powerful and yet most humble way of exhorting is with this introduction: I pray for thee!—No thanksgiving without petition, so long as perfection and completeness are not yet there.—Our state of grace does not indeed begin with this deeper insight, but only through this does it indeed advance: may all preachers then learn from the Apostles, to work properly in their sermons and in their congregations for this end.—The Spirit of God cannot begin entirely without knowledge, nor work through dim feeling toward new will and life.—Illumination is not itself as yet sanctification, but is the immediately vital transition thereto from faith, which is at first, in and before experience, a matter of knowledge.—To know God—the highest aim of all wisdom of the spirit.—In the heart is all decided, faith, insight, desire, will.—The Apostle unfolds and portrays the supremacy of the Exalted One in the domain of power, especially in the kingdom of grace, of the Spirit, making alive again the dead in sin on the earth, in the church.—In this world there are many names before God and Christ, that we do not know or name, but hereafter we shall learn them.—Church is the assembly or unity of those called to the fellowship of salvation in Christ; it is the growing, developing body of Christ.

LEUPOLD (Sermons for Whitsunday on vers. 15-19): The heavenly gifts, in which the children of God rejoice with praise to-day. 1) The grace of God, enriching us in the knowledge of salvation; 2) The power of God, causing this knowledge to become a might; 3) The faithfulness of God, carrying forward the good work already begun to the blessed goal.—How do we prove ourselves thankful for the outpouring of the Holy Ghost and His gifts? 1) By our knowing His gifts better; 2) ever imploring them more faithfully for ourselves and others; 3) by letting ourselves be filled by them and their power become more perceptible and precious in us.—What are the Christian's festival petitions? 1) That he may grow in the knowledge of salvation; 2) that he may grow in fellowship with the Saviour and all saints; 3) that he may not forget to give thanks for the unmerited favors of God.—The high significance of the Pentecostal gift: 1) It comes from the Lord; prayer is its condition; 2) In it the Lord comes to us; knowledge of God and His plan of salvation, of Christ and His saving work, is its proof; 3) Through it we come to the Lord; living faith, working in love is its crown.—The fellowship of believers, holy and glorious: 1) The spirit of revelation endows it; 2) Faith in the Lord Jesus founds it; 3) Love to all saints strengthens it; 4) Fraternal intercession crowns it.

WINTER (vers. 20-23):—The ascension of Christ His exaltation to the right hand of God in heaven: 1. Let us so consider it. 2. Let us perceive the transcendent consolation therein inherent for us: a) now is He properly attested as our Saviour and Deliverer; b) now we know, not only that He still lives, but has power to defend us and His kingdom; c) now we may cheerfully go there too. 3. The high and holy duties proceeding from this: a) that we obey Him in all things; b) commit to Him ourselves and our whole life; c) seek not what is below, but what is above, and have our conversation in heaven.—Christ all in all! 1) The Lord of all in heaven; 2) the Almighty Head of His Church on earth.

[HODGE:—In praying that the Ephesians might be enlightened with spiritual apprehensions of the truth, the Apostle prays for their sanctification. In praying that they might have just conceptions of the inheritance to which they were called, he prayed that they might be elevated above the world. And in praying that they might know the exceeding greatness of the power exercised in their conversion, he prayed that they might be at once humble and confident,—humble, in view of the death of sin from which they had been raised; and confident, in view of the omnipotence of that God who had begun their salvation.

[EADIE:—Ver. 15. Community of faith begets community of feeling, and this brother-love is an instinctive emotion, as well as an earnest obligation. In that spiritual temple which the Spirit is rearing in the sanctified bosom, faith and love are the Jachin and Boaz, the twin pillars that grace and support the structure.—Ver. 16. The Apostle, though he had visited them, does not felicitate himself on his pastoral success among them, but gives thanks on this account to God.—The Apostle gave thanks, and his thanks ended in prayer.—Ver. 17. It is only when the prayerful study of the Bible is blessed by spiritual influence that wisdom is acquired.—This knowledge of God concerns not the works of His creation, which is but the “time-vesture” of the Eternal, but the grace and the purposes of His heart, His possession and exhibition of love and power.—Ver. 18. If the spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of God be conferred, then the scales fall from the moral vision, and the cloudy haze that hovers round it melts away.—Not only had they been the objects of God’s affection—but also, and especially, of God’s power. Infinite love prompted into operation omnipotent strength.—Ver. 19. If the resurrection of Jesus be the normal exhibition of Divine power, other similar exhibitions are pledged to Christ’s people.—Ver. 20. The specimen and pledge of that power displayed in quickening us, is Christ’s resurrection. 1. It is transcendent power. 2. It is power already experienced by believers. 3. It is resurrectionary power, displayed in restoring life. 4. The resurrection of Jesus is in this respect not merely a specimen or illustration—it is also a pledge. Present spiritual life and future resurrection are both involved.—Jesus was placed at the Father’s “right hand.” 1. It is the place of honor. 2. It is the place of power. 3. It is the place of happiness—happiness possessed, and happiness communicated.—Ver. 22. The brow once crowned with thorns now wears the diadem of universal sovereignty; and that hand, once nailed to the cross, now holds in it the sceptre of unlimited dominion. He who lay in the tomb has ascended the throne of unbounded empire. Jesus, the brother-man, is Lord of all: He has had all things put under His feet—the true apotheosis of humanity.—The history of the church is a proof extending through eighteen centuries; a proof so often tested, and by such opposite processes, as to gather irresistible strength with its age; a proof varied, ramified, prolonged, and unique, that the exalted Jesus is Head over all things to the church.—Ver. 23. Head and body are correlative, and are organically connected. There is first a connection of life—at the same time a connection of power,—and, in fine, a connection of sympathy.—The Head of the Church is at the same time Lord of the Universe. While He fills the Church fully with those blessings which have been won for it and are adapted to it, He also fills the universe with all such gifts as are appropriate to its welfare—gifts which it is now His exalted prerogative to bestow.—R.]

B. The extent and mission of the church.

CHAPTER II. 1-22.

1. Reminder of the previous condition of death and the glorious new creation.

(CHAP. II. 1-10.)

- 1 And you hath he quickened, who were dead in trespasses and sins [You also who
- 2 were dead in your¹ trespasses and your sins]; Wherein in time past ye [Wherein ye once] walked according to the course of this world, according to the prince of the power [or powers]² of the air, [of] the spirit that [which] now worketh in the
- 3 children [sons] of disobedience: Among whom also [even] we all had our conversation [way of life] in times past in the lusts of our flesh, fulfilling the desires [doing the wishes] of the flesh and of the mind [thoughts]; and [we] were by nature³
- 4 the children of wrath, even as others [the rest:—]. But God, who is [being] rich

5 in mercy, for [because of] his great love wherewith he loved us, Even when we were dead in sins [our trespasses], hath [omit hath]⁴ quickened us together with Christ, 6 [by grace ye are [have been] saved;] And hath [omit hath] raised us up together [with Him],⁵ and made us sit together [with Him] in [the] heavenly places in 7 Christ Jesus: That in the ages to come he might shew [That he might shew forth in the ages which are to come]⁶ the exceeding riches⁷ of his grace, in his [omit his] 8 kindness toward us, through [toward us in]⁸ Christ Jesus. For by grace are ye 9 [have ye been] saved through faith;⁹ it is the gift of God [the gift is God's]. Not 10 of works, lest any [that no] man should boast. For we are his workmanship [his handiwork are we]¹⁰, created in Christ Jesus unto [for] good works, which God hath before ordained [God before prepared] we should walk in them.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 1.—[The pronoun ὑμῶν is found in N, B, D, F; accepted by Lachmann, Tischendorf, Meyer, Ellicott. It is omitted in Rec., K, L; bracketted by Alford, rejected by Braune, but it seems unlikely to have been inserted, since the articles are sufficiently explicit. They justify at all events the above rendering.—On also instead of and, the meaning of in, and the anacoluthon, see Ereg. Notes.—R.—B. reads ἐνδουίαις instead of ἀμαρτίαις.

⁵ Ver. 6.—[In Him is preferable to together, bringing out more exactly the force of σὺν in the compound verbs.—R.]

⁷ Ver. 7.—[The Rec. (with D³ K, L.) gives the masculine form. The neuter is found in A, B, D, F, added in N., accepted by nearly all modern editors.—R.]

¹⁰ Ver. 10.—[This transposition brings out the emphasis resting on His, required by the Greek order, and has the additional advantage of showing that the participle created agrees with we.—The changes in the latter part of the verse are demanded by the generally admitted interpretation of the passage.—See Ereg. Notes.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Connection and Summary.—After the Apostle has been led, by his petition for enlightenment respecting the glory purposed from eternity and already begun, to the carrying out of this purpose in the Church of Christ, the Body of which He is the Head, and in such a manner too, that i. 23, "so grand and solemn in matter and in manner," is adapted to form "a full-toned conclusion" (MEYER), his look is again turned to his readers to notice the "mighty working of the Father, through the resurrection and ascension of the Son, done once for all, and yet taking place in every one called into the Church" (STIER). First of all he is moved by "a glance at the similar condition of death in the case of the Gentiles (vers. 1, 2) and of the Jews (ver. 3)" (STIER) and then by the thought of God, who out of mercy has quickened and blessed the wretched in, with and through Christ (vers. 4-7): of grace through faith (vers. 8, 9), new-creating in Christ (ver. 10)!

[Braune, as will be seen below, arranges this section into paragraphs: Vers. 1-3, the condition of death out of Christ; ver. 4, the Deliverer; vers. 5, 6, the deliverance; ver. 7, the purpose; vers. 8-10, the means of bringing about the deliverance.—HODGE, who is always clear in his analysis, finds three principal topics treated of in this section:—(1) The spiritual state of the Ephesians before their conversion, vers. 1-3. (2) The change which God had wrought in them, vers. 4-6. (3) The design for which that change had been effected, vers. 7-10. He then enters into details.—ALFORD: "The power of the Father in quickening us, both Gentiles and Jews, in and with Christ (1-6); His purpose in manifesting this power (7); inference respecting the method of our salvation." This follows STIER's view, who refers the preceding clause to God.—R.]

Hence the connection of the beginning of this chapter (καὶ ὑμᾶς συνεζωοποίησε, ver. 5) with "wrought" (i. 20, BENGE) or "gave" (i. 22, HARLESS) is inadmissible. Nor is καὶ ὅντας ὑμᾶς to be joined with εἰς ὑμᾶς τοὺς παρεόντας (i. 19, KNATCHBULL and others) or with πληροποιεῖτον (i. 23, CALOVIVS, KOPPE and others); nor is it necessary to complain here again, that a well-continued thread of discourse can scarcely be found in this Epistle (RUECKERT). Although these grammatical connections are to be rejected, there is still an internal relation: as the petition (i. 15-19) passed over into the typical and consolatory view of the exaltation of Christ, this section by applying this to the readers in effect continues the subject.

The condition of death out of Christ (vers. 1-3). The construction is not easy at first sight, but otherwise regular: καὶ ὑμᾶς ὄντας (ver. 1)—ὁ θεὸς (ver. 4)—συνεζωποίησεν (ver. 5). The expansion of the object (vers. 1-3) alone occasions the beginning of a new sentence (ver. 4), as ὁ δὲ θεὸς shows, indicating as do autem, inquam the epanalepsis (WINER, p. 412); in consequence the object already described (vers. 1-3) is again repeated in briefer statement (ver. 5). So THEOPHYLACT and most ancient and modern expositors. [ELLICOTT thus states the same view: "Ver. 1, after having its structure interrupted by the two relational sentences, vers. 2, 3, is renewed in ver. 4 (not ver. 5, SCHOTT) by means of δέ resumptive (Herm. Viger, No. 544), and there further elucidated by the interpolated nominative Θεός, expanded in application by the more comprehensive ὑμᾶς, and concluded in ver. 5."—HODGE (more popularly, but less exactly): "He dwells so long, in vers. 2-4, on the natural state of the Ephesians, that he is obliged, in ver. 5, to repeat substantially the beginning of ver. 1, in order to complete the sentence there commenced." The objection to the E. V.: hath he quickened, aside from the wrong tense, is that "he" has no antecedent, if ii. 23 refers to Christ, within reasonable distance.—R.]

Ver. 1. You also, καὶ ὑμᾶς, applies the discourse to the readers, without opposing ὑμᾶς to any others, than the genus, the whole church, as members of which they here come into special consideration, since they also have experienced, what has been experienced by the whole, and are a proof of the truth before uttered. [In rendering καὶ ὑμᾶς, "you also," it is not implied that they are contrasted with other Christians; it is chosen rather to avoid the simple connection with what precedes which is expressed by "and you," and to give prominence to the word "you;" not thus introducing "a special exemplification of the general act of grace in ver. 23," but implying a parallelism between the physical death in the case of Christ and the spiritual death in their case, as indeed the governing verb συνεζωποίησεν (ver. 5) suggests.—R.]

Who were dead in your trespasses and your sins, [ὄντας νεκροὺς τοῖς παραπτώμασι καὶ ταῖς ἁμαρτίαις ὑμῶν. See Textual Note 1].—ὄντας, depending on συνεζωποίησεν, in view of the πότε occurring in the subsequent relative clause, is evidently=cum eratis (BENGEL), the condition in which God found them, when He quickened them (MEYER). They were dead through sins; the dative is ablatival, marking the causa efficiens (GROTIUS, MEYER). Hence it is not equivalent to νεκροὶ τῇ ἁμαρτίᾳ (Rom. vi. 11), ye are dead for sin (CAJETAN), nor with GROTIUS—ἐν τοῖς παραπτώμασι (Col. ii. 13, the parallel passage, in which the state, the element is emphasized).*

* [EADIE infers from ver. 2, "in which," that these datives represent not simply the instrument, but at the same time

That Paul makes a distinction between πάρπτωμα and ἁμαρτία, and what it is, is shown in Rom. v. 12-19. There the sin of Adam is termed τὸ τοῦ ἔνδου παράπτωμα (vers. 15, 17, 18) or παρακοή (ver. 19), and through one man ἡ ἁμαρτία has come into the world (ver. 12). Comp. Rom. v. 20 with vii. 10-13. Παράπτωμα is applicable to the first sin of the seduced first man; the idea of misdeed is contained in it, of a deed not considered, temere commisum, i. e., a volente facere injuriam, while ἁμαρτία, with its manifestations αἱ ἁμαρτίαι reaches further and deeper (TITTMANN, Syn. l. p. 45 ff.).* There is here an ascent from desertio boni to perpetratio mali (AUGUSTINE). To this view approximate HARLESS [HODGE] (actual sins and manifestations of sin in word, deed or otherwise), OLSHAUSEN (actions of sin and the more internal sinful motions of the soul in desires and words), JEROME (delicta cogitatione inchoata and actual sins).† The distinction: the mental errors and obscurations, the moral sins and vices (MATTHIES), is unfounded; neither should we apply the former to the Jews and the latter to the Gentiles (BENGEL), nor with STRIER first think of the law of the State, of the conscience, well-known to the heathen also, and then of the outbreaks of corruption itself. We may not, however, take the two as purely synonymous (KOPPE), or deny a real distinction by affirming merely a two-fold representation, fall and transgression (MEYER).—The article points to the sins committed by the readers, Rom. v. 12: ἐφ' ᾧ πάντες ἥμαρτον. Hence ὑμῶν is an unnecessary explanatory gloss. [It is to be retained on diplomatic and critical grounds, but does not affect the sense.—R.]

Under νεκροὶ we should understand the dead, made dead; it recalls ἐκ νεκρῶν (i. 20): Christians are no longer dead. But the natural sinful condition, according to the Scripture from Gen. ii. 17 on, is really a death, because it is without life from and in God (iv. 18). It is therefore not=miserable (KOPPE and others), nor does it refer to physical death, as though it were equivalent to certo morituri (MEYER), which does not spare them now. Spiritual death alone is spoken of, since God is the source of life (Ps. xxxvi. 10) and without Him men are in the shadow of death (Matt. iv. 16; Luke i. 79; Matth. viii. 22; Luke xv. 24, 32; Rom. vii. 9, 10). So nearly all expositors. [No weakening of the sense is admissible; comp. Doctr. Note 3, d.—R.]

Ver. 2. Wherein ye once walked [ἐν αἷς ποτὲ περιπατήσατε].—Ἐν αἷς, which the condition of death. The general notion of the dative, the where-case, is not opposed to this. HODGE ELLICOTT and ALFORD accept the causa sense, the latter justifying the use of in, to express this ("sick in a fever"). There seems to be doubt enough as to the exact force to warrant us in retaining the preposition supplied in our version.—R.]

* [ALFORD doubts the universal applicability of TITTMANN'S distinction, but accepts it as correct here, where both words are used. In Rom. v. 12-19 (see pp. 176, 182, Romans) there is a very marked distinction between the words, but here it is less observable. We must however attribute to ἁμαρτία a more generic sense than is found in the concrete πάρπτωμα.—R.]

† [ELLICOTT: The former, the more limited term, viz.: particular and special acts of sin; the latter, the more inclusive and abstract, embracing all forms, phases and movements of sin, whether entertained in thought or consummated in act." So EADIE, though not very decided in his preference.—R.]

connects with *διapαρία*s, the word just preceding and forming a climax, denotes the causa of the condition of death as a developed condition, as a desired element. Ποτὲ περιπατήσατε joined with *κεκρίβη*s is an oxymoron, like 1 Tim. v. 6: ζῶσα τέθηκεν. Περιπατεῖν ἐν τῇ (iv. 17; v. 2; Rom. vi. 4; 2 Cor. iv. 2; Col. iii. 7) has been transferred from the Hebrew (לָּחַק) and designates walking as to the mode of life (WINER, p. 32); in English it designates the being at home, having entrance and exit, having one's doings and movements, having one's residence (Matth. xvii. 22: they abode in Galilee"). [EADIE: "The ἐν marks out the sphere or walk which they usually and continually trod, for in this sleep of death there is a strange somnambulism. Col. iii. 7."—R.]

According to the course of this world [κατὰ τὸν αἰῶνα τοῦ κόσμου τούτου].—Κατὰ now defines a relation of those walking to a power. This relation qualifies the walk more closely as one directed thereby, dependent thereon, determined thereby; "according to," "by virtue of" are the two significations required here (STIER), which are combined in: corresponding to. This power is designated by τὸν αἰῶνα τοῦ κόσμου τούτου, "the course of this world." This combination is peculiar, the words themselves are frequent, seeming to be used indiscriminately: 1 Cor. ii. 6 (σοφία τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου); iii. 18 (σῶφρος ἐν τῷ αἰῶνι τούτῳ); ver. 19 (σοφία τοῦ κόσμου τούτου); i. 20 (σοφία τοῦ κόσμου); John xii. 31 (ὁ ἄρχων τοῦ κόσμου τούτου); 1 Cor. ii. 6 (τὸν ἄρχοντα τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου); 2 Cor. iv. 4 (ὁ θεὸς τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου). But the distinction is clearly obvious. Αἰὼν (PASSOW sub voce, HARLESS in loco), from αἰω=ἄημι, ἄω, to breathe, is related to ψυχή, with which Homer joins it, referring to life and time (ævum); hence also ἄπ' αἰῶνος, ἄπ' αἰῶνων. In the New Testament the notion of time predominates, of periods of time, and the tendencies controlling them, their character, view and mode of life, their spirit. Κόσμος is the created, but fallen, apostate world, more definitely: humanity. The former may occur in the plural, the latter not. Hence BENCKE is very correct: Ille hunc regit, et quasi informal; κόσμος est quiddam exterius: αἰὼν subtilius. "TEMPUS dicitur non solum physice, sed etiam moraliter, connotata qualitate hominum in eo viventium; et sic αἰὼν dicit longam temporum seriem, ubi ætas mala malam ætatem excipit." Acts xiv. 16; 1 Pet. i. 18. In αἰὼν here the notion of the tendency of time predominates, and means more what we call the course of the world than lapse (Verlauf); the course includes both the time and its character, as does αἰὼν also. Hence: according to, corresponding to the course of this world. The αἰὼν is in itself ethically indefinite, hence αἰὼν παντός (Gal. i. 4) and the demonstrative οὗτος or a genitive as here τοῦ κόσμου τούτου. Κόσμος is the external appearance, the external continuance of the world of men, αἰὼν its course, current, impulse (STIER); the latter may change, vary, in different periods, the former remains, and as the latter is estranged from God, so is this.*

* [ELICOTT finds an ethical meaning predominant here in αἰὼν. "In such cases as the present the meaning seems to approach that of 'tendency, spirit, of the age' (Olsk.), yet

It is incorrect to take the two words as purely synonymous, as though it were τὸν κόσμον τούτον (KOPPE). We regard as arbitrary the view that they are=τὸν αἰῶνα τούτου τοῦ κόσμου (RUECKERT), or: τὸν κόσμον τοῦ αἰῶνος τούτου (BRETSCHNEIDER). It is impossible to explain this designation from the gnostic doctrine of Æons, and to understand the devil thereby (SEMLER). LUTHER's rendering: Lauf [so E. V.: "course"] is more apt than: spirit of the age (MATTHIES), tendency of the age (OLSHAUSEN), life (HARLESS), duration of time (MEYER), course of time (SCHENCKEL).

According to the prince of the powers of the air [κατὰ τὸν ἄρχοντα τῆς ἐξουσίας τοῦ ἀέρος].—Here Paul evidently passes to what stands behind the course of this world, influencing it, working through it. Κατὰ places this clause as parallel to the preceding, and τὸν ἄρχοντα refers to the master, the prince.* The genitive τῆς ἐξουσίας denotes the power belonging to and at the command of this prince (Matth. ix. 34; xii. 24; Mark iii. 22; Luke xi. 15). This power, which is to be considered as collective, is further defined by the genitive τοῦ ἀέρος, "of the air," most closely connected with it. Ἄηρ, which in its etymology reminds us of αἰὼν and in its nature of πνεῦμα, is the air, the atmosphere, surrounding the earth, breathed by all, acting upon the κόσμος, the world of men, standing in many relations to and exerting great power and influence upon their life; hence the power which the prince controls, is brought into connection with "the air," is described by "of the air," because in this are found the place and character of the power, its medium, element, region and domain, its means and mode; the figurative and literal meanings coalesce, the air as a cosmical and pneumatic reality (STIER); we too say: it lies in the air, in the time, thus denoting a quiet, profound and powerful operation. Thus Satan with his kingdom is sharply characterized, his nature spreading widely miasmata of corrupting power, from which even those truly living can scarcely withdraw or defend themselves, miasmata from diabolical choke-damp (as in the French Revolution) even to the most refined ethereal poisons of classical, æsthetic literature (vi. 11, 12; Col. i. 13). So ECUMENIUS has described the devil's power as ὑπὸ τὸν οὐρανόν, οὐχ ὑπὲρ τὸν οὐρανόν, concluding thus: ὅσις γὰρ τοῖς πνεύμασιν ἡ ἐνέκρος διατρέφῃ.

We reject therefore those explanations, which take ὁ ἄρχων τῆς ἐξουσίας as principes potentissimus (CLARIUS), or the genitive as appositional=ὃς ἐστὶν ἐξουσία (FLATT), or cui est potestas (ERASMUS and others), or as the object=imperium (GREEK and LATIN FATHERS and others); those taking τῆς ἐξουσίας τοῦ ἀέρος as potestatis still not without distinct trace of the regular temporal notion, which, even in those passages where αἰὼν seems to imply little more than our 'world' (comp. 2 Tim. iv. 10), may still be felt in the idea of the (evil) course, development, and progress ("ubi ætas mala malam ætatem excipit"), that is tacitly associated with the term.—R.]

airē (Syriac, BUCER and others); or those taking τοῦ ἀέρος only figuratively (CALVIN, BEZA), or τοῦ σκότους (although we find: ἐκκοιτῆθι ὁ ἀήρ, Rev. ix. 2), either tropically pro obnubilatione mentis (COCCELIUS, STORR and others), or pro concreto as darkened spirits, men and bad angels (FLATT), or by metonymy, continens pro contento, the earth surrounded by the atmosphere (HILARY, BULLINGER and others), or merely as the region—ἐν τῷ ἀέρι (BAUMGARTEN, not -CRUSIUS), or only as a designation of quality—ἀέριος (ALAPIDE, CALIXTUS and others), or referring it to the "prison," 2 Pet. ii. 4 (AUGUSTINUS); nor can we suppose here a remnant of rabbinical tradition (MEYER), or echoes of a Pythagorean view of the world (MEYER, SCIENKEL), or the influence of Alexandrian gnosis (ELSNER and others). Out of such "muddy pools" or untenable speculations Paul would not have drawn his doctrine. Comp. Doctr. Note 3.

[HARLESS and STIER are very full on this clause. The most extended comments easily accessible to the English reader will be found in EADIE, whose opinion approaches very nearly to that of BRAUNE. The simplest explanation is that of ALFORD, who thinks the phrase "of the air" is drawn from "the persuasion and common parlance of mankind," without conveying any teaching respecting demonology. In any case the genitive ἀέρος is to be regarded as a genitive, not of quality, but of place, either literal or figurative, or both, as BRAUNE holds. HODGE, while not definitely deciding, seems to favor the untenable view, that "of the air" is—"of darkness." EADIE: "The κόσμος of the New Testament is opposed to God, for it hates Christianity: the believer does not belong to it, for it is crucified to him and he to it. That same world may be an ideal sphere, comprehending all that is sinful in thought and pursuit—a region on the actual physical globe, but without geographical boundary—all that out-field which lies beyond the living church of Christ. And, like the material globe, this world of death-walkers has its own atmosphere, corresponding to it in character—an atmosphere in which it breathes and moves. All that animates it, gives it community of sentiment, contributes to sustain its life in death, and enables it to breathe and be, may be termed its atmosphere. Such an atmosphere belting a death-world, whose inhabitants are νεκροὶ τοῖς παραπτώμασι καὶ ταῖς ἀμαρτίαις, is really Satan's seat. His chosen abode is the dark nebulous zone which canopies such a region of spiritual mortality, close upon its inhabitants, ever near and ever active, unseen and yet real, unfelt and yet mighty, giving to the κόσμος that 'form and pressure'—that αἰὼν—which the Apostle here describes as its characteristic element."—Comp. STUART, Biblioth. Sacra, 1843, p. 140; HAGENBACH, Stud. u. Krit. I. p. 479; CUDWORTH, Intel. System, II. p. 664.—R.]

Of the spirit, τοῦ πνεύματος, is in apposition to τῆς ἐξουσίας τοῦ ἀέρος, "of the power of the air." While the last phrase sets forth his external dominion, the parallel phrase denotes his internal efficiency. BENIGL is excellent: principium illud internum, ex quo fluunt actiones infidelium, oppositum spiritui fidelium filiorum Dei. It is therefore not a personality, but an influence which has become a ruling mode of thought, disposition, a πνεῦμα ἐνεργούν (RUECKERT, STIER). Comp. Winer, p. 689. Hence it is not to be joined in apposition to τὸν ἀρχοντα and a hyppallage accepted as in iii. 2; 2 Cor. iii. 7; Luke viii. 32; xxii. 20. So CALOVIUS, KOPPE, RUECKERT; similarly FLATT. But τοῦ πνεύματος is also not dependent on τοῦ ἀέρος, as HOFMANN (Schriftbeweis I. p. 455) thinks, taking ἐξουσία in accordance with Luke xxiii. 7 as the region of dominion, so that the air of the spirit working in the disobedient is the atmosphere formed by his nature. Nor is it to be taken collectively, just as ἐξουσία τοῦ ἀέρος is the complex of demons (GROTIUS and others). It is the spirit, which through its ruler, the devil, exists outside of individuals, defines them, works in them, the spirit of the age [Zeitgeist].

[The apposition with ἐξουσίας is at all events to be accepted, with the majority of modern commentators. But here the two views present themselves: (1) the reference to the evil principle, which must be taken objectively as the article requires (MEYER, ELLICOTT), as BRAUNE holds, or (2) to the aggregate character of the individual πνεύματα (EADIE, ALFORD). The former is open to the objection, that it represents Satan as the prince of a principle, and the latter assumes a collective sense which is quite unusual. If we accept a tacit antithesis to the Spirit of God, and remember that this spirit is here conceived of as distinct from its influence on men, (1) will be the safer view—R.]

Which now worketh, τοῦ νῦν ἐνεργούντος.—This spirit is to be regarded as efficient, not as effected, affectus mundanus (SCHMIDT); νῦν being put in advance and "in the children of disobedience" appended for emphasis. "Now" expresses the fact that it has not ceased to work, after no longer working in them, the readers (νοτέ); it now works in the children of disobedience, subjects of its activity are not wanting; it might be explained with OLSHAUSEN by ἐν τῷ αἰὼνι τοῦτω. From this danger always springs for the believers. Hence it is not: now still, ad huc (MEYER and others), nor: nunc maxime (BENIGL: qui evangelium per incredulitatem spernunt, manent mancipia spiritus illius et amplius capiuntur; STIER: "more now, since accomplished redemption proffers itself"). RUECKERT also, with FLATT, refers to the extraordinary, specially dangerous power of the Satanic kingdom in the age of Redemption (2 Thess. ii. 2 ff.; 2 Cor. iv. 4). [So DE WETTE].

In the sons of disobedience, ἐν τοῖς υἱοῖς τῆς ἀπειθείας.—Thus are those designated who are οἱ ἐξ ἀπειθείας (comp. Rom. ii. 8: οἱ ἐξ ἁπείλειας), who are dependent on, springing from, nourished by disobedience, as v. 6; Col. iii. 6. It is a Hebraistic expression. [It marks "the essential and innate disobedience of the subjects, a disobedience to which they belong as children to a parent" (ELLICOTT).—R.] "Disobedience" emphasizes the immoral nature of unbelief, which is precisely disobedience, contumacy, among the heathen also, who resist the secret voice of God in their conscience (Rom. ii. 14, 15) as well as among the Jews who resist the revealed will of God in the word of the prophets, and among both, in resisting the apostolic announcement. MEYER should not be willing to refute the explanation: unbelief (LUTHER, BEN- GEL, HARLESS, STIER).^{*}—The preposition ἐν, "in," marks the internality of this Satanic working: in their souls (MEYER). They are the "fulness" of the devil, on whose part there is a "spirit," efficient unto destruction, which the disobedient and unbelieving mood already pre- sent in man comes to meet.

Ver. 3. Among whom even we all had our way of life in times past [ἐν οἷς καὶ ἡμεῖς πάντες ἀνεστρέφμεν ποτέ].—The emphasis rests on καὶ ἡμεῖς "even we;" in antithesis to "you" (ver. 1), the readers, whom he describes as previously heathen, he places himself and the Jewish Christians,† and that too without exception ("all"). Ἐν οἷς, according to grammatical rules, refers to "the children of disobedience" (ver. 2); thus declaring that those who were formerly Jews be- longed also to the children of disobedience; ἐν οἷς is—ὡν καὶ ἡμεῖς ὄντες, in order to lay down the ethical category for the Jews (MEYER). So the same corruption and its universality are pre- dicated of the Jews, over against the Gentiles. Comp. Doctr. Note 3. We should not then render it inter quos, or explain that although the Jews were actually locally among the Gentiles, they did not live there as children of disobedience. The reference to παρὰ τῶν, "trespasses," ver. 1 (Syriac, JEROME, BEN- GEL, STIER and others), is at once impossible, if ἡμῶν be retained there, and in any case inadmissible on account of "in the lusts of our flesh," which denotes the element or sphere of the verb, so that this cannot be found in ἐν οἷς. The grammatical con- nection cannot be decided by the parallel passage, Col. iii. 7: ἐν οἷς—περιπατήσατε, since parallel- ism will not contravene the requirements of grammar.

In the lusts of our flesh [ἐν ταῖς ἐπι- θυμίαις τῆς σαρκὸς ἡμῶν].—The repeti- tion of ἐν in the same clause occurs also in 2 Cor. i. 12: ἐν ἀγότητι καὶ εὐκρινείᾳ—ἐν σοφίᾳ—ἐν χά- ριτι ἀνεστρέφμεν ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ, where the first phrase answers to the last in our verse, and the last to our first. BEN- GEL remarks on the verb: hoc quiddam speciosius quam ambulare. STIER finds it sharper and stronger than περιπα- τήσατε, used of the Gentiles. LUTHER: "ye have walked"—"we have had our walk." [So sub- stantially the E. V.] This ἀνεστρέφσθαι refers more to an unquiet, refractory, quarrelsome course of conduct, περιπατεῖν is rather an indo- lent letting one's self go according to habit. The qualifying phrase; "in the lusts of our flesh," also sharpens the affirmative here, in comparison with that respecting the Gentiles. Among the latter the power of the evil spirit works, as re- spects the Jews prominence is given to their own disposition and will. Israel had already the proper ἀρχὴν in the theocracy, in its discipline another ἐξουσία, the moderating and helping air of a better spirit, being by no means given over in the same degree to the course of this world (STIER).—HARLESS sets forth very well the order of the significations of σάρξ; 1) what is material, 2) external, not mental, 3) what is ruled by matter, and in so far sinful, 4) what is sinful, opposed di- rectly to the Spirit of God, 5) Humanity in all these aspects. [Comp. the Excursus in Romans, pp. 235 ff. The word is here used in its ethical sense: the whole human nature turned away from God, in the supreme interest of self, devoted to the creature.—R.]

Doing the wishes of the flesh and of the thoughts [ποιοῦντες τὰ θελήματα τῆς σαρ- κὸς καὶ τῶν διανοιῶν].—Ποιοῦντες, placed first for emphasis, defines more closely the preceding verb. [A participle of manner.—R.] The children of disobedience to whom they belonged, do the wills, τὰ θελήματα,* not merely single ones, which the flesh has, and those τῶν διανοιῶν, as real servants, slaves in fact. The plural denotes the confused, op- posing multiplicity; a united, self-contained will is not spoken of. But these are not mere bulli- tions of the flesh. "The διανοεῖσθαι is the in- ternal self-activity of man, conscious of his na- ture as self-determinable, and the διάνοια are the manifold productions of this" (HOFFMANN, Schriftbeweis, I. p. 563). He appears as the slave of his inborn nature and of his selfish thought; the two are turned to various objects, and in his desires create a diversity. The un- derstanding or the reason stands in the service of the flesh, falls into subtleties, seeking reasons, excuses, ways and means for the "lusts of the flesh," helping the desire to strengthen into deter- minations and activities of the will. Διάνο- ιαι are "opinions of the will representing them- selves as prudent, deceitful grounds of volition." COGITATIONES callidius peccandi studium inferunt, caro ceco ruit impetu (BEN- GEL). The plural marks the sundering, the confusion of the διάνοια into the unhappy and treacherous diversity (HARLESS, STIER); the flesh makes a heap of reasonings (Berlenburger Bible). The context determines this view, as MEYER correctly re- marks, but the form chosen subverts the con- text, corresponding well to its purpose; but it should be noted, that διάνοια is used by Paul only here, and θελήματα only in his speech, Acts xiii. 22, there too of God's will. It is incorrect to regard διάνοια as loose fancies (MATTHIES),

* [The connection between "unbelief" and "disobe- dience" is undoubted, but the former does not come into any special prominence here. The word here "characterizes the world not as in direct antagonism to the gospel, but as it is by nature—hostile to the will and government of God, and daringly and wantonly violating that law which is written in their hearts" (EADIE).—R.]

† [The reference to Jewish Christians has been accepted by the vast majority of commentators, both on account of the particular antithesis (ὑμᾶς, ver. 1) and the general distinction which seems to attach to these pronouns in this Epistle. But DE WETTE, EADIE, ELLICOTT, ALFORD oppose this reference here, on the ground that πάντες will not admit of this limitation. In every case Paul refers to both, when he uses ἡμεῖς πάντες.—Perhaps it is safest to follow this usage here, for the doctrinal teaching remains the same, whether we suppose the Apostle is emphasizing the fact that all Christians are children of wrath by nature, or even the Jews who thought themselves children of promise by nature.—The meaning of οἱ ἄσσω at the close of the verse will of course be modified by the view taken of ἡμεῖς.—R.]

* [ELLICOTT says of this word: "It here probably denotes the various exhibitions and manifestations of the will, and is thus symmetrical with, but a fuller expansion of ἐπιθυμίας." So MEYER. EADIE similarly; the latter inclinations, the former the resolves into which they ripen, and which are further divided.—The use of the word seemed to justify our finding in it an element of desire, though the E. V. is too decided in its rendering.—R.]

sensuous thoughts without the basis of sensuous desire (OLSHAUSEN), or corrupt imaginations (HASE).

[The distinction between the two classes of θελήματα is thus expressed by EADIE: "The 'desires of the flesh' are those grosser gratifications of appetite which are palpable and easily recognized; and the 'desires of the thoughts,' those mental trespasses which may or may not be connected with sensuous indulgences." ELLICOTT: "The worldly sensual tendency of our life on the one hand, and the spiritual sins of our thoughts and intentions on the other." Both EADIE and HODGE restrict σάρξ (in the second clause, not in the first) to the animal part of our nature, but this scarcely seems justifiable, especially as the wider meaning gives so good a sense. Nor is the latter exact in taking διανοία as including "the whole thinking and sentient principle, so far as distinguished from the animal principle," still less in referring it here "more to the affections." MEYER says διάνοιαι bears to σάρξ in this case the relation of the special to the general.—The article before σαρκός and before διανοίων would justify the rendering "our flesh," "our thoughts," but the literal translation is sufficiently explicit, "thoughts" being the nearest equivalent to διάνοια.—R.]

And we were by nature the children of wrath [καὶ ἡμεν τέκνα φύσει ὀργῆς].—Καὶ ἡμεν is most naturally taken as i. 19-22: ἐγείρας—καὶ καθίσας—καὶ ὑπέταξεν, or ἐγείρας—καὶ ἐκάθισεν—and joined with ποιούντες, as a participle resolved into the finite verb. Since ἡμεν comes first, it is emphatic. [The change of construction gives emphasis to this verb also, marking that they "were," not that they "are," and further, as EADIE suggests, indicating unmistakably, that what they "were by nature" was not the result of what they had been doing.—The insertion of "we" in the English text will serve to indicate this emphasis.—R.] The Apostle has noted the action in the preceding clause, he now notices the state of the Jews, which is perceptible and perceived from the action, and hence put in the second place, this like the other being more sharply expressed than in the case of the heathen. This is parallel to "the children of disobedience," among whom he has already reckoned them (ἐν οἷς) but among whom they are now characterized as "by nature children of wrath." The phrases: "son of perdition" (2 Thess. ii. 3), "child of hell" (Matth. xxiii. 15), "Son of peace" (Luke x. 6) are similar. Paul says τέκνα, not υἱοί, not to weaken it into "little children," but to indicate the relation to birth.

The genitive ὀργῆς without the article must be connected as closely as possible with τέκνα, "children of wrath." [Not mere liable to wrath, but under it, as the figure implies.—R.]

The Hebrew phrase כְּנִים-לַיהוָה (2 Sam. xii. 5: υἱὸς θανάτου in the LXX., comp. Ps. lxxix. 11; cii. 21) may have occasioned the expression, but does not modify the explanation in the N. Testament, nor justify a weakening of the meaning, only marking the dependence of ὀργῆς, which the context (ver. 4) defines as that of God. So v. 6; Col. iii. 6; Rom. i. 18; comp. Doctr. Note 1

Φύσει is not so emphatic as ἡμεν, nor even as τέκνα, denoting only a closer qualification of the latter, as regards origin, by nature. Φύσις (from φύω, to become, to arise, as natura from nasci, ingenium from geno, gigno) refers to birth, origin, and is that which has grown as distinguished from what has been effected, has the ground of its being, as it is in its own development, not in the accessory influence of others (HARLESS, STIER). [So EADIE, ALFORD, HODGE, ELLICOTT and the vast body of commentators. The last named finds the exact meaning in Gal. ii. 25; Rom. ii. 14; Gal. iv. 8, to be respectively (a) transmitted inborn nature; (b) inherent nature; (c) essential nature. The first is the meaning here, see below.—R.] So in Gal. iv. 8; Rom. ii. 24 (comp. Acts xvii. 28) φύσει points to the ground and origin of the present status. The meaning of these words necessarily is: we were from birth those who were forfeited to the Divine wrath, iræ Dei devoti atque obnoxii, quasi ad eam rem ab ipsa natura effecti (BEZA). Indeed ἡ φύσις is something living, developing itself, but from its beginning, in accordance with the principle inherent in it, so that there is included here also the natural development, further determined by man in his unregenerate state.

Standing in contrast to this φύσει is the Divine θέσις of God's work of revelation and of His covenant with the people of Israel, according to which they should not be "children of wrath," and also might not have been. "As belonging to the people of God, the Jews were כְּנִים-לַיהוָה but aside from this, consequently as belonging to the Adamite humanity, they were τέκνα ὀργῆς" (HOFMANN, Schriftbeweis, I. p. 565), hence φύσει. It is aptly mentioned that CHEMNITZ remarks: Dicit, eramus et nos, Judæi scilicet. Dixerat enim Rom. xi. 16: si radix sancti, ergo rami. Ne ergo intelligatur, Judæos natura esse sanctos, dicit; eramus et nos Judæi filii iræ, sicut cæteri (HARLESS). The position of φύσει between τέκνα and ὀργῆς suggests too: we were children—that is, φύσει, not θέσει, ὀργῆς, and yet might and should have been διαθίκης (cum putaremus nos esse liberos liberos Dei. BENDEL)! [The doctrine of original sin is here plainly implied (EADIE, HODGE, ALFORD, ELLICOTT, and others), the implication being an "even more convincing assertion of that profound truth." The opposition of BARNES and STUART, so far as it has an exegetical basis, finds some justification in the forcing of a direct theological statement on our passage. But the attitude here taken as respects this fearful fact of a universal natural state of condemnation, is precisely that which the Scriptures hold toward the question of the existence of God: it is not proved, but assumed. Comp. Doctr. Notes 1, 3, 4; EADIE in loco; ROMANS, Dr. SCHAFF's exhaustive notes on v. 12-21, especially pp. 178-180, 191-195; the last reference is to a resumé of the theories of original sin.—R.]

Accordingly "children of wrath" is not to be taken as merely a Hebraizing phrase for "worthy of wrath," ira rei, digni (THEODORET, RUECKERT and others), nor proprii iræ (STRIEGLER), objects of wrath (FLACIUS). Nor is ὀργῆς=pæna (GREEK FATHERS). Quite as little is φύσει=ἀληθῶς, γνησίως (ECUMENIUS), or: natura, indole gentis (CLEB-icus), still less: paternæ traditionis consuetudine (PELAGIUS), since it is the very opposite of συνήθεια. Moreover we should not think of a relation produced by the development of a natiua indoles (MEYER), or of the customary actual life of sin, "a doing of the wills of the flesh and of the thoughts," which had become habitual, making them "the children of wrath" (SCHENKEL). BLEEK says more circumspectly: the reference here is not merely to the inborn character, but also to the natural development springing from the man himself. To explain it of the natural condition of man in ante-christian life (ERASMUS and others) leaves undecided the main question, whether or not the φύσει designates an inborn relation. HOLZHAUSEN'S connection of οὐσίσει with ὀργῆς (wrath springing from the ungody natural life) is entirely too inverted.

Even as others. ὥς καὶ οἱ λοιποί.—In 1 Thess. iv. 13, this designates the Gentiles, who have not become Christians. Λοιποί are passed over, without any further characteristics; according to the context the word classes together here men with and men without Christ, who have not submitted themselves to the working of Christ, resist it; such can be among Christians even. We may easily suppose, however, that Paul means the yet unbelieving Jews, over against the "we all," who have become believers in Christ; this would render prominent that while the Jewish Christians who have been rescued from the condition of death are no longer "children of wrath," these are and remain so, like the heathen, the "children of disobedience." So STIER, while nearly all expositors refer it either to the Gentiles (MEYER and others) or to all except those mentioned before (HARLESS and others); the latter is unquestionably more correct than the former, since just here the Gentiles are not in question, and to refer it to these alone, would be as if ver. 3 had been appended. The extension to other nations is, however, unnecessary, since all men are either Jews or Gentiles, and what has been said of the previous life of Christians from among the Gentiles or Jews, applies to the whole of the human race. It marks in a tender, sparing manner those Jews unconverted to Christ as "children of wrath," as the Gentiles not converted to Christ are "children of disobedience," in whom Satan works. [Those who refer ἡμεῖς πάντες to all Christians, of course take οἱ λοιποί as including all the rest of mankind, not Christians; but the universality of sin and guilt remains the indirect (and more convincing) assertion of the passage, whatever reference be adopted.—R.]

Ver. 4. The Deliverer. But God, ὁ δὲ θεός.—This is not antithetical, but resumes the discourse, begun with the object and then lengthened out, in order to permit the subject to follow, as we would say in German: hat also Gott. [We have no word so strictly resumptive as the German also, or the Greek δέ, as used here, hence the E. V. supplies both subject and verb in ver. 1, and resumes here with "but," which may bear a resumptive meaning.—R.] See on ver. 1. The δέ is required here by the antithesis in which the subject stands to the object; otherwise we have found ἐν here (MEYER and others). [HODGE makes the antithesis too strong: "notwithstanding our guilt and misery."—R.]

Being rich in mercy [πλούσιος ὢν ἐν ἐλέει].—Πλούσιος stands first for emphasis; our Epistle frequently mentions the riches in God (i. 7; Rom. x. 12: πλουτῶν). [ὢν does not seem to be causal here (HODGE: "because He is rich in mercy"), but rather to state (in the form of a secondary predicate of time) the general principle under which the Divine compassion was exhibited (ELLICOTT, ALFORD); "being rich in mercy." The special ground follows.—R.] The connection "rich in mercy" is like Jas. ii. 5 ("rich in faith"); 1 Cor. i. 5; 2 Cor. ix. 11. So πληθὺς τῶν οἰκτιρῶν σου, Ps. li. 1; lxix. 16. But ἐλεος is somewhat more than οἰκτιρμός (ὁ ἐλεῶν subvenire studeat misero et si potest, vere subvenit, sed qui intra fines doloris se tenet, is tantum oiktrei; TITTMANN, Syn. I. p. 70).

Because of his great love wherewith he loved us [διὰ τὴν πολλὴν ἀγάπην αὐτοῦ ἣν ἡγάπησεν ἡμᾶς].—The preposition (διὰ) marks the ground of His doings (vers. 5, 6), on account of this, propter multum suum amorem. LUTHER is therefore incorrect: through His great love. Prominence is given, not so much to the greatness, as to the riches, the manifold character of the love of God. The construction, ἣν ἡγάπησεν ἡμᾶς, is like John xvii. 26; Mark x. 38. WINER, p. 210.—The great love of God (αὐτοῦ) is added by Paul, after the expression respecting the riches of His mercy, which he had placed first on account of the context over against the condition of death in the case of Gentiles and Jews alike, because there was to be found in men themselves no ground at all for their salvation. Mercy was in God the movement of His love, which belongs to His Being; that men should be helped, required the entire fullness of the love of God. MISERICORDIA removet miseriam, AMOR confert salutem (BENGEL). CALVIN incorrectly joins διὰ τὴν πολλὴν ἀγάπην with πλούσιος ὢν [HODGE apparently]; the latter is an attribute of God, the former is an adverbial qualification of συνεξωποιοῦσεν. "Us" must be applied here to entire Christendom, after the necessary statements about "you" (vers. 1, 2) and "us" (ver. 3). Aperta satis hæc verba sunt et cognitum facillima, si tantum et creditu facilia ea plerisque dominus redderet (BUCKER)! STIER refers it to the Jews, on which view see next verse. [It is—ἡμεῖς πάντες, if that phrase be accepted in its wider reference.—R.]

The Deliverance; vers. 5, 6.

Ver. 5. Even when we were dead in our trespasses [καὶ ὄντας ἡμᾶς νεκροὺς τοῖς παραπτώμασιν].—After ἡμᾶς (ver. 4) the object is again repeated, with a reference to what has been said in vers. 1-3, in admiration and wonder at the Divine grace, mercy and love. Now however we read καὶ ὄντας ἡμᾶς, while before we had καὶ ἡμᾶς ὄντας (ver. 1), καὶ ἡμεῖς (ver. 3): the emphasis therefore rests on ὄντας, and καὶ puts this state of death with another ὢν in a certain relation to πλούσιος ὢν ἐν ἐλέει. Accordingly the distinction between those dead, between "you" and "us" falls into the background behind the existence, the reality of this condition.

[Against MEYER, who takes καί as the simple copula, and RUECKERT, who deems it resumptive, we are fully justified in taking it as intensive, retaining even (E. V.) therefore; so ALFORD, ELLICOTT and most.—The dative is precisely as in ver. 1.—R.] What he has said in ver. 1 of the heathen: “dead in trespasses,” is true of both therefore: it is the briefest expression, and quite sufficient after the previous explication of the object, especially as he mentions παραπτώματα, in which the reality of the condition of death is perceptible. The article denotes that the sins are the sins of the “dead” themselves (MEYER). [Hence our trespasses.]

This statement cannot indeed be referred to entire humanity; though it be done for all men, yet it is only done in Christians; and that is what is spoken of here. But it is just as little to be limited to Jewish Christians (STIER); the interchange of ἡμεῖς and υμεῖς (vers. 5, 7, 8) springs from the liveliness of the discourse, the interest in the readers and the purpose of the Apostle. Καί is of course not—καίτεπ, quamvis (CALVIN, SCHENKEL). [For a making alive could only be from a state of death, not in spite of it.—R.]

Quickened us together with Christ, συνεζωοποίησεν τῷ Χριστῷ.—The construction is clear; the dative is governed by the σύν in composition. A fact in the past is clearly denoted as having taken place upon Christ and upon us. The meaning is also indicated by the antithesis or object: the dead He has made alive; were these not physically, but spiritually dead, then a spiritual life is meant. The preposition σύν does not denote contemporaneity, but only fellowship: in the fellowship with the Risen One God quickened us also: Him hath He raised from the dead, us from our death, but not without Him, the Risen One. The verb itself does not determine any thing more definite regarding the life; the tense marks only the act of God as having taken place. Nothing further is added. Accordingly this fact is to be taken altogether objectively, without a subjective reference, altogether generally, without further qualification, as Col. ii. 12, 13, 20; iii. 1, 3; Rom. vi. 4-6; it is simply: He quickened us together with Christ. THEODORET: κεφαλὴ ἡμῶν ὁ συνεδρεῖων, ἀπαρχὴ ἡμῶν ὁ συμβασιλεύων τὴν γὰρ ἡμετέραν ἐνδέδωκε φίσιν. Comp. i. 7, 22, 23. Though the life of Christ the Risen One is completed, and ours just begun, beginning in the Spirit, yet the two stand in an internal connection (2 Cor. v. 15), the latter, like the former, is the Father's act, in which the whole, the full life is implied and granted.

Accordingly it is first of all incorrect to apply σύν to the re-animation of the Jews and Gentiles together (BEZA), or: sicut ad exemplum (ANSELM, GROTIUS). Then the reference is not to physical death and the actual resurrection life (MEYER), or to the forgiveness of sins (RUECKERT), or only to the first degree of life, from which the subsequent ones advance (OLSHAUSEN), or to justification and regeneration (BOEDUS); nor are the aorists to be justified by recalling God's prescience (JEROME), or by introduced hope (AUGUSTINE, ERASMUS), or by a prophetic view, as if it had already taken place, were as good as certain (MEYER), nor is the fact of the actual accomplishment of this act of love in the readers, the Christians to be set aside by an emphasizing of the objective act in Christ (HARLESS).*

By grace ye have been saved [χάριτι ἐστε σωσμένοι].—In lively discourse, with a direct application to the readers, this is joined parenthetically to the general, objective fact of new life in Christ. The emphasis rests on χάριτι, which comes first; it refers to “His great love,” is God's grace, thus dismissing all thought of claim and merit on the part of man. The clause emphasizes the fact of the deliverance from death into life, from wrath into love. Ye are (ἐστε)! This means more than the simple ἴδωθετε. [“Ye have been and are saved,” the perfect of permanent state, implying that God's grace abides.—R.] Videmus, ut nunquam sibi in predicanda gratiae amplitudine rite expendat, non fastidit hanc parenthesin quasi supervacaneam (CALVIN).† It is not interpolated from what follows (GROTIUS), nor is the grace of Christ (BEZA) referred to.

Ver. 6. And raised us up with him and made us sit with him in the heavenly places in Christ Jesus [καὶ συνήγειρεν καὶ συνεκάθισεν ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ].—After thus specializing, Paul expands what was expressed in συνεζωοποίησεν. Here the first verb gives prominence to the negative side, and the second, with “in heavenly places,” to the positive side of the quickening; the former marks the disappearance of the condition of death, the latter the permanent participation in what is heavenly. The liveliness of the discourse causes the introduction and repetition of καί, καί; they are not to be rendered: both—and. “In heavenly places” (comp. on i. 3) sets forth the antithesis to “the power of the air”; “at His right hand” (i. 20) could be predicated only of Christ (BENGEL:

* [EADIE emphasizes the subjective side: “The object of the Apostle, however, is not merely to affirm that spiritual life and resurrection have been secured by such a connection with Jesus, but that having been so provided, they are really possessed.” This makes the “life” here referred to strictly spiritual. But a reference to physical resurrection seems to be involved (ALFORD, ELLICOTT). The aorist, retaining its proper force, has occasioned some difficulty. While the reading ἐν (B.) is to be rejected, and “in Christ” is not the exact sense, we must still hold that this thought underlies our verse. “What God wrought in Christ He wrought ipso facto in all who are united with Him” (ELLICOTT); not to the exclusion of a reference to the actual quickening in the case of believers. “When He was raised physically, all His people were ideally raised in Him; and in consequence of this connection with Him, they are, through faith, actually quickened and raised” (EADIE).—Dr. HOBBS finds in the last fact that two other aorists follow a reason for limiting this verb to the beginning of the work of restoration, and yet says, ver. 6: “In its widest sense the life, which in ver. 5 is said to be given to us, includes the exaltation expressed in this verse. It is, therefore, only by way of amplification that the Apostle, after saying we are made partakers of the life of Christ, adds that we are raised up and enthroned with Him in heaven.” If the latter position be correct, the verb is not to be limited here.—R.]

† [ELLICOTT: “This emphatic mention of grace (grace, not works) is to make the readers feel what their own hearts might otherwise have caused them to doubt,—the real and vital truth, that they have present, and actual fellowship with Christ in the quickening, yea, and even in the resurrection and glorifying power of God.”—R.]

Christo sua manet excellentia), but "in heavenly places" of Christians also. "In Christ Jesus," following "with Christ" (ver. 5), introduces the mediation in the fellowship with Him; with this Col. ii. 12, 13 should be compared. [EADIE takes "in Christ Jesus" as qualifying "in the heavenly places," but this is scarcely allowable.—R.]

Accordingly, "raised with him," is not an advance from "quickened" toward "made us sit" (OLSHAUSEN) [EADIE], the first two expressions occur Col. ii. 12, 13 in inverted order. We should not interpolate spe (GROTIUS) or jure et virtute spirituali (BENGEL), nor are the aorists to be taken as futures from a prophetic view (A-LA-PIDE), nor should we refer them to summa et universa felicitas (KOPPE), or to something spiritual, which is not yet objectively and really given. Comp. Col. iii. 1-3; Phil. iii. 20; Rom. vi. 6-10. Though ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ is not=per et propter Christum, yet it cannot be denied that fellowship with Him is indicated (HARLESS), in accordance with the συν in the verbs.* But it may not be affirmed that on account of this "wonderful union" of the redeemed with the Redeemer, all the occurrences, through which the Redeemer passed after His death until His glorification, are spiritually and morally, hence in this life, consummated in the converted (SCIENKEL). Comp. Doctr. Note 2.

[EADIE also takes the three aorists as referring to what takes place in this life, and as marking successive steps: "The dead, on being quickened, do not lie in their graves." ELLICOTT is very cautious here: "As συνεζωοποιήσεν, though primarily spiritual and present, may have a physical and future reference,—so here conversely, a present spiritual resurrection and enthronement may also be attended to," the primary reference being, as he thinks, to what is future and objective. ALFORD seems most correct: "God vivified us together with Christ: in the one act and fact of His resurrection He raised all His people—to spiritual life, and in that to victory over death, both spiritual and therefore necessarily physical also. To dispute therefore whether such an expression as this is past (spiritual), or future (physical), is to forget that the whole includes its parts.—The three aorists are proleptical as regards the actualization in each man, but equally describe a past and accomplished act on God's part.—The disputes as to whether these are to be taken as present or future, actual or potential, literal or spiritual, will be easily disposed of by those who have apprehended the truth of the believer's union in and with Christ." This last statement finds a striking confirmation in the fact, that many a commentator begins by limiting the sense, and ends by including the entire meaning.—R.]

Ver. 7. The purpose.—That he might show forth, ἵνα ἐνδείξῃται.—The verb stands emphatically first. Ἐνδείκνυσθαι (Rom. ii. 15; ix. 17, 22; 1 Tim. i. 16; 2 Tim. iv. 14; Tit. ii. 10; iii. 2) has, like ἐνδείξας (2 Cor. viii. 24) the signification of an efficient, active showing, a making known through communicating, giving, causing to experience. It is not a mere φανεροῦν, γνωρίζειν, declarare (OLSHAUSEN, MEYER and others. [EADIE inclines to the singular meaning: give a specimen of, which is not in accordance with the emphasis resting on the word.—R.]

In the ages which are to come, ἐν τοῖς αἰῶσι τοῖς ἐπερχομένοις.—The plural marks a series, the word αἰῶνες, periods of time, stretching over "generations" (iii. 21), standing over against "the course (αἰὼν) of this world (ver. 2), not mere καιροί, occasions, moments of time (i. 10); ἐπερχόμενοι points to coming periods, i. e., according to the context, those periods (temporibus instantibus) following each other with the fact of Redemption in the resurrection of Christ as the starting-point; lastly the preposition ἐν marks these as the spaces of time in which the showing takes place, in which there is really an advance. BENGEL: Plurale, contra unum seculum malum, cui secula beata superveniunt potenter. Congruit hæc locutio menti Pauli de die novissimo non prozime instante. Even in the earliest Epistles there is not wanting the thought of the long development of Christianity, whose blossoming in the Apostolic Church and in the first Christians as first fruits and representatives, lets us perceive the fulness of their Lord (1 Thess. iv. 15-17; comp. v. 1; 2 Thess. i. 7; comp. ii. 3 ff.). It is neither the age succeeding the resurrection, the age of the parousia (GROTIUS, MEYER), nor αἰὼν μέλλων (HARLESS). [These limitations are rejected by EADIE, ALFORD and ELLICOTT, HODGE who agree with BRAINE in referring the phrase to the successive periods of time between the resurrection and the Second Advent of Christ. The plural forbids the limitation to any one age, the present participle renders any remote future reference improbable. The Second Advent is rarely alluded to in this Epistle (ALFORD), though as usual MEYER finds it here also.—R.]

The exceeding riches of his grace, τὸ ὑπερβάλλον πλοῦτος τῆς χάριτος αὐτοῦ.—The neuter form τὸ πλοῦτος is well established here, as in iii. 16, and occurs several times (iii. 8; Phil. iv. 19; Col. ii. 2). On ὑπερβάλλον, see notes on i. 19. It denotes, over against the wrath of God (ver. 3) and the power of Satan (ver. 2) the triumphant superior power, hence it is not=περισσεύειν (i. 8). Comp. Rom. v. 20. Evidently as in the case of those realities, so is the power of this grace efficient, already imparted. Rom. ix. 23.

In kindness toward us in Christ Jesus [ἐν χρηστότητι ἐφ' ἡμᾶς ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ].—"In kindness" designates the mode of showing the grace, "the friendly, condescending kindness" (HEUBNER), which expressed itself in Christ's Incarnation and in Himself. TITTMANN (Syn. I. p. 195): Est benignitas Dei ad benefaciendum hominibus potius parata, quam ad puniendum; differt a voce χάρις; in hac enim certe in N. T. imperat notio benevolentie et gratiæ, quæ nihil merentibus bene facit. It is therefore not here (as TITTMANN thinks, p. 142): ipsum beneficium in nos Dei benignitate per Jesum Christum; it is not χάρισμα, but χάρις is active "in kindness," the condescending love scatters out of the fulness of its possessions; that is, its "kindness." [EADIE says of the four terms here used respecting the source of salvation: ἔλεος, ἀγάπη, χάρις, χρηστότης, "the first respects our misery; the second defines the co-essential form of this—ἔλεος; the third characterizes its free outgoing, and the last points to its palpable and experienced embodiment." He finds an evident alteration in χάρις, χρηστότης, Χριστός.—R.]

* The force of συν in the two verbs is brought out in our rendering of this verse. A neuter version would probably be: "And with Him raised us up, and made us sit in the heavenly places in Christ Jesus."—R.]

'Εφ' ἡμῶς is connected with "in kindness," as χαρὰ ἐν πνεύματι ἀγίῳ (Rom. xiv. 17) and similar cases. See WINER, p. 126. This occurs with anarthrous substantives, which receive further definition; ἐπὶ denotes the object of the kindness, as Luke vi. 35. The phrase: ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ without τοῖς or οὖτως is therefore not to be referred to ἡμᾶς. Were it grammatically admissible, the thought would not be against it, since it corresponds with "to us-ward who believe" (i. 19). As, however, it stands here without any word to connect it with ἡμῶς, it must be taken as qualifying the verb ἐνδείκνυται.^{*} Notanda repetitio nominis Christi, quia nihil gratie neque amoris a Deo sperari vult, nisi ipso intercedente (CALVIN). Comp. Doctr. Note 2.

The means of the deliverance. Vers. 8-10.

Ver. 8. For by grace have ye been saved through faith, τῇ γὰρ χάριτι ἔστε σεσωσμένοι διὰ πίστεως.—This is a completed, more closely defined, repetition of the parenthetical clause (ver. 5). Γὰρ is connective. Non igitur ait, sed enim, quia ab effectu ad causam concludit (BENGEL); because He in the course of time brings into manifestation nothing else than the exceeding riches of His grace. Ye are saved by grace. τῇ χάριτι, not merely χάριτι (ver. 5), to denote the category; the article referring to the grace mentioned in ver. 7, the wealth of which is so exceeding, marking thus the grace in question (MEYER). The dative expresses, as Rom. iii. 24 (αὐτοῦ χάριτι διὰ τῆς ἀπολυτρώσεως), the motive, διὰ with the genitive here states the subjective means,† in the passage just referred to, the objective. Comp. WINER, p. 204 f. The emphasis rests on "by grace," which is placed first, being the causa efficiens; the causa apprehendens follows, as a modal qualification. On the nature of "faith," see Doctr. Note 5.

And that not of yourselves: The gift is God's [καὶ τοῦτο οὐκ ἐξ ὑμῶν, θεοῦ τὸ

^{*} [It is joined by some to χορηστῶντι, but this seems a strange collocation. ELLICOTT takes the whole expression as "a single compound modal clause," "in kindness toward us" defining accurately the manner in which God displays "the riches of His grace," while "in Christ Jesus" specifies as it were, the ever-blessed sphere to which its manifestations are confined, and in which alone its operations are felt. The same author very properly remarks on DE WETTE's "melancholy want of appreciation" of the repeated mention of the name of Christ.—R.]

† [The variation in the reading does not affect this statement, since διὰ πίστεως would mean, through faith, taken abstractly, while τῆς πίστεως would mean your faith. As regards the meaning of "grace," it preserves the same wide sense as in ver. 5 and is "not to be regarded specially and technically as in the scholastic theology, and divided into gratia præveniens, operans, co-operans, the first having for its object homo convertendus; the second, homo qui convertitur; and the third, homo conversus sed sanctificandus" (EADIE). The force of the perfect as expressing both a terminated action and a present state should not be overlooked: Ye have been saved, and ye are actually now in a state of salvation.—R.]

δῶρον].—"And that" refers back to the idea of the preceding verb: "ye are saved," in the sense of et quidem (PASSOW, sub οὗτος, 12); and this in addition I say, or and this, being saved through faith, comes not out of yourselves. Thus the value of διὰ πίστεως is put below that of τῇ χάριτι; salvation has not its origin in faith or the believing one (οὐκ ἐξ ὑμῶν); he has indeed only to accept it. Hence there is at once added to the negative the positive (not parenthetical, HARLESS) expression: θεοῦ τὸ δῶρον, God's is the gift, i. e., the salvation; the genitive being—ἐκ θεοῦ (Phil. iii. 9) or ἀπὸ θεοῦ (Phil. i. 29), and τὸ δῶρον=δωρεάν (Rom. iii. 24; v. 15, 17), gratis, as a present of grace.

[The reference to salvation is adopted by CALVIN, RUECKERT, HARLESS, OLSHAUSEN, MEYER, DE WETTE, STIER, EADIE, ALFORD, ELLICOTT, and every commentator of note since the days of BENGEL, except HODGE.* Of course on doctrinal grounds there is no objection to the reference to faith, for, as ELLICOTT remarks, "it may be said that the clause καὶ τοῦτο κ. τ. λ. was suggested by the mention of the subjective medium πίστις, which might be thought to imply some independent action on the part of the subject." But since the next verse: "not of works," cannot be referred to faith, and an unnecessary parenthesis, creating some confusion and destroying the obvious parallelism between ἐξ ὑμῶν and ἐξ ἔργων, is the result of this view, it seems far better to accept the other reference. The gender of τοῦτο is not decisive in favor of this; but when it stands so near to πίστεως, it does seem strange that it should not be feminine, were the latter its antecedent.—R.]

Ver. 9 takes up the negative side again: not of works, οὐκ ἐξ ἔργων, used by Paul repeatedly (Rom. iii. 20; iv. 2; xi. 6; Gal. ii. 16; iii. 2; v. 4; Tit. iii. 5). Without the article, because in this respect there are no saving, meritorious works; it is God who rescues, and He is determined thereto by no works or virtues of men. There is not here, nor should there be, any thought of the works of the Mosaic law (BLEEK). Thus the phrase "not of yourselves" is more closely and sharply defined. Accordingly we should not accept a parenthesis from καὶ τοῦτο ἐξ ἔργων (GRIESBACH) or καὶ τοῦτο—τὸ δῶρον (BEZA), or θεοῦ τὸ δῶρον (LACHMANN, HARLESS), nor refer καὶ τοῦτο to διὰ τῆς πίστεως and then to infer τὸ πιστεῖν on this account (FATHERS, ERASMUS and others).

That no man should boast, ἵνα μὴ τις καυχῆσθαι.—This is the manifest end (ἵνα) of this ordering of grace, established and desired by God Himself. Comp. 1 Cor. i. 29 ff.; iv. 7;

^{*} [Dr. HODGE presents four reasons for preferring the reference to faith. 1. "It best suits the design of the passage." Grant it, but that is of little weight when the other reference accords better with grammar and syntax. 2. "The other interpretation makes the passage tautological." Paul uses a great deal of such tautology. 3. "The antithesis between faith and works is preserved." But regard for an antithesis found in the Epistles to the Galatians and Romans does not outweigh regard for the parallelism of our own passage. 4. "The analogy of Scripture is in favor of this view." Very true, but as it represents elsewhere faith as the gift of God, so it represents everywhere that salvation is the gift of God.—It is to be regretted that so judicious an author had not stated the difficulties attending his view as well as these arguments in its favor.—R.]

2 Cor. x. 17 f.; Rom. iii. 27; iv. 2. ἵνα is not to be taken as ὥστε or as imperative (KOPPE). [MACKNIGHT objects that this is not a worthy end, therefore ἵνα is not telic. But it is only one enj., and then it implies a great deal more than the mere stopping of man's boasts. The implied antithesis is: that God should have the glory, as ver. 10 indicates.—R.]

Ver. 10. For his handiwork are we, αὐτοῦ γὰρ ἔσμεν ποίημα.—The genitive stands first with special emphasis; if there should be any boasting, He should be boasted of by us, His work.* Hence the connection by means of γὰρ, for the reason is given why no one should boast. Gratia tollit naturam. What we are to understand by ποίημα, the Apostle sets forth in the following participial clause belonging to ἐσμέν:

Created in Christ Jesus for good works.—Κτισθέντες ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ, "created in Christ Jesus," is like 2 Cor. v. 17: εἰ τις ἐν Χριστῷ, καινὴ κτίσις. Comp. Gal. vi. 15. The fellowship with Christ is the mediation conditioning the creative efficiency of God. "God's work" is a creation in Christ, by means of which there becomes a "new man" (ver. 15). A double creation is therefore not spoken of, the physical, that of the protoplast, in "His handiwork" (TERTULLIAN, GREGORY NAZ. and others), and the spiritual, that of the new birth in "created," nor are both creations to be regarded as united here (PELAGIUS, ERASMUS, MATTHIES, RUECKERT), so that we both as Christians and as men are God's work. Salvation alone is in question. Thus much only is true, that the expressions respecting the physical first creation are transferred to this ethical one, which is a new birth (Tit. iii. 5), a real creation (ver. 15; iv. 21, 22).

The preposition ἐν with the dative marks both the end and the result; Gal. v. 13: ἐπ' ἡλευθερίᾳ ἐκλήθητε; 1 Thess. iv. 7; 2 Tim. ii. 14; WINER, p. 368. It is not ἐν ἔργα ἀγαθὰ, hence not merely the end and aim of salvation [HODGE], (SCHENKEL). [ALFORD: "Just as a tree may be said to be created for its fruit."—R.] Ἐπὶ ἐργοῖς ἀγαθοῖς is in antithesis to ἐξ ἔργων, denoting that those created in Christ Jesus do perform good works, as "a peculiar people, zealous of good works" (Tit. ii. 14); such works are therefore not the cause but the consequence of being delivered.† Hence we read here not ἐργοῖς or ἐργοῖς νόμων, but, what is much more significant, ἐργοῖς ἀγαθοῖς: good works are performed only by the regenerate.

Which God before prepared that we should walk in them, οἷς προητοιμάσεν ὁ θεός, ἵνα ἐν αὐτοῖς περιπατήσωμεν.—As regards the construction it should first be remarked that the difficulty lies in οἷς and in the meaning of the verb προητοίμασεν, which requires an object in the accusative, as well as in the reference of the preposition προ. The relative οἷς can belong only to ἐργοῖς ἀγαθοῖς, and since προητοιμάζειν cannot be taken as neuter (BENGEL) and there is no ἡμῖς added, it must be explained by attraction (Vulgate, Syriac, down to BLEEK); ἐν αὐτοῖς follows, as in John v. 36. [That is, the relative is the object of the verb, which would be in the accusative (ᾧ) were it not attracted into the case of its antecedent ἐργοῖς ἀγαθοῖς; so E. V. and the vast majority of commentators.—R.] Προητοιμάζειν (Rom. ix. 23) is to prepare beforehand, here of things, as προορίζειν of persons (i. 11). [See below however.] The προ totam rem Deo tribuit (BENGEL), implying that they should be performed. It should be borne in mind that we do not find: ἐπὶ τοῖς ἐργοῖς ἀγαθοῖς, οἷς —; the individual good works are not regarded as prepared before, but only ἔργα ἀγαθὰ in general. Christians are new-created for these; they are performed by the Christians not according to arbitrary choice; they are determined, as by the law, so by the Holy Ghost (GROTIUS: quasi in mari aliquis et viam præsignaret et simul ventos daret ferentes); they are given, to them is the Christian directed, equipped therefor with strength and desire.

God Himself has thus prepared before "good works," and that too with the design, to the end: "that we should walk in them," as prepared beforehand by God, as in the element in which the Christians' walk moves, in which the regenerate should prove themselves alive. This final clause is in antithesis to: "lest any man should boast" (ver. 9). HOFMANN, who (Schriftbeweis, II. 1, p. 365) rejects rightly the explanations, ordained before, predisposed in God's counsel, and accepts the proper conduct of humanity to God as once for all present in Christ, says excellently in further exposition (ibid. II. 2, p. 294): Our walk in Him is a walk in them (good works), so that ἐν αὐτοῖς has the emphasis, and ἡμῖς is not missed in the first clause.

Accordingly, οἷς cannot be referred to κτισθέντες and explained as masculine: for whom, to whom He has before ordained (ERASMUS, and necessarily RUECKERT also). It is altogether impossible to accept a Hebraism and construct thus: ἐν οἷς ἵνα περιπατήσωμεν προητοιμάσεν ὁ θεός (BENGEL, KOPPE); but προητοιμάζειν is not velle, jubere. Nor should ἡμῖς be supplied from the context and the clause rendered: to which, or: for which He has prepared us before (LUTHER, RUECKERT but doubtfully, SCHENKEL). Nor should the verb be taken as neuter (BENGEL): for which He has already prepared, so that nothing is wanting (STIER). Nor should we say that God has prepared the circumstances for them (bonos socios, præceptores, confessionarios, concionatores, sancta exempla aliisque incitamenta et occasiones), as do MICHAELIS and OLSHAUSEN, following Catholic expositors. Nor does προ stand related to "created unto good works," as though the preparation of the works preceded the new creation of the man, and the men were redeemed for the works and for their sake, and the walk in good works were the final and supreme aim of the Divine revelation of grace and saving dealings with man (MEYER, SCHENKEL)

* [ALFORD: "The English reader is likely to imagine a contrast between 'not of works' and 'for we are His workmanship,' which can hardly have been in the mind of the Apostle." The word ποίημα becomes in Latin and English poema, poem; the same notion of poetry being the truest, highest work or creation, is found in other languages.—R.]

† [EADIE well sums up the argument of the Apostle, that salvation is not of works: 1. The statement that salvation is of works involves an anachronism; 2. Involves the fallacy of mistaking the effect for the cause. 3. Even such good works can have in them no saving merit, for we are His workmanship.—R.]

[The view of Braune is open to serious doubt in one point alone. The attraction from the accusative is by far the best solution of the grammatical question. The verb, which is not neuter, does not mean "predestinated," but "prepared before." Comp. Romans, p. 321. That notion is a fair inference, but does not necessarily belong to the word, as even HODGE admits. It may be allowed too that "good works" without the article does not of necessity refer to definite, particular actions, which God has appointed for the several believers. But the force of προ is not sufficiently taken into the account in the view advocated above, while HOFMANN's explanation seems to be an attempt to avoid a theological difficulty rather than a fair exegesis. Προρρίξεν is distinguished from προετοιμάζειν, not by a difference of objects (as Braune holds, following HARLESS), but as follows: The end comes more into view in the former, the means more in the latter (so FRITZSCHE, LANGE, Romans, p. 320, EADIE, ELLICOTT). As the temporal relation to "created" seems to be the only proper reference in the preposition προ, we should accept this explanation: God, before we were created in Christ, made ready for us a sphere of moral action, a road, with the intent that we should walk in it, and not leave it: this sphere, this road, was "good works" (ELLICOTT).—Or yet more definitely, with ALFORD: As trees are created for fruits which God before prepared that they should bear them: i. e., defined and assigned to each tree its own, in form, and flavor, and time of bearing. So in the course of God's providence, our good works are marked out for and assigned to each one of us. This does not seem to be open to the objection that it makes the works the supreme end of God's saving dealings.—EADIE: "These good works, though they do not secure salvation, are by God's eternal purpose essentially connected with it, and are not a mere offshoot accidentally united to it."—R.] BENGEI says aptly: Ambularemus, non salvaremur aut viveremus.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. THEOLOGICALLY: God's nature is designated by: "who is rich in mercy, for His great love" (ver. 4). Precisely as in 1 John iv. 16: "God is love" (comp. my notes, Biblework in loco, p. 146 f.). What He will ever more and more manifest and prove, is "the exceeding riches of His grace in kindness" (ver. 7). All salvation is traced back to "grace" (vers. 5-8), to "love" (ἀγάπη) now condescending in its entire fullness to the deepest misery, the lost condition of sinners (ἁμαρτία), in order to help (ἐλεος) as a master and to minister (χρηστότης) as a servant. How then can there be room for "wrath?" Ὁργή (from ὀργίζω, allied with reach, rack, stretch, and ὀργάνω, to swell, to be full) designates first of all, appetite, emotion, then passion, anger. God is indeed holy love, hence precisely not an apathetic personality, not an epicurean natura divom semota ab rebus nostris sejunctaque longa, not a pagan or Turkish eliuarmehi, nor a modern moral order of the world, or mere "Providence," "Heaven," or the philosophical Absolute, or the common numb Deity. He loves, He must also be angry with what is unholy, evil; He has wrath, not as a man, active et initiative, but passive et consecutive. His wrath is the zeal of love against corrupting evil, the energy in the conduct of God against that relation to Him, established with the fall of the creature from Him; in the creature's sin God's wrath brings forth itself (STIER).—One thing besides should be especially considered. By "we," described in ver. 3, the Israelites are meant: precisely these, though chosen, are called on account of the apostasy of the human race, "children of wrath." Accordingly all, the entire fallen race, are the object of the wrath of God, even the elect, just as all are the object of His grace, as even these have been, who, because they will not let themselves be saved, are cast away. In mercy and anger is He the same God, and has before Him the human race in like manner undivided, in order to save it as the object of His love. Comp. FRANK, Theologie der Form. Conc., IV. p. 194 ff.

2. CHRISTOLOGICALLY: The Mediator, in whom alone the fallen race, now a prey to the corruption of sin, is and can be an object of love to God, and through whom alone, yet certainly, the purpose of salvation conceived in Him, is consummated, is Jesus Christ, the Risen One, who, as the Sinless One, was not forfeit to death, but overcame it. The text only indicates this latter thought; but it distinctly asserts: only in Him is life, renewal, power, blessedness, without Him there is none of this (vers. 10, 5-7). In this entirely unique Person, including in Himself all that man needs for a renewal well-pleasing to God, presenting in His resurrection and exaltation, not merely a type, but the dynamic principle for the elevation of humanity to sonship with God—in this Person is set forth all that is specifically Christian in Christianity.

3. HAMARTOLOGICALLY: a) The essence of sin is disobedience ("sons of disobedience") to the will of God, and obedience to the flesh ("doing the wishes of the flesh and of the thoughts").

b) The universality of sin. It extends itself over the whole human race without exception. Gentiles (vers. 1, 2) and Jews (ver. 3), and among these (ἡμῖς πάντες) to those also who like the Apostle were "taught according to the perfect manner of the law of the fathers, and zealous toward God" (Acts xxii. 3); for fleshly self-will and obstinacy mingles itself as a ruling power, even in the most refined forms, with human virtue and honorableness.

c) The variety of sin does not condition a variety in the extent of guilt. To the Apostle the heathen world was a wrestling place of demons: Satan ruled it; there all goes according to his will; and the Apostle calls the Gentiles "sons of disobedience." The people of Israel, notwithstanding its theocracy, consists in his esteem of "children of wrath," as he designates them much more sharply. The guilt increases with the less considerable sins, if the favors received, which have been despised or neglected, are greater: so there may be less guilt with greater sins, and a far greater guilt with sins less great externally, because there is a greater sinful corruption.

d) The corruption of sin. Although some may hold for truth in Eph. v. 14 ("Awake thou that sleepest and arise from the dead"), only "thou that sleepest," together with Rom. v. 6: "when we were yet without strength," the phrase "were dead" (vers. 1, 5) here may not be overlooked. The Romanists indeed say (Cone. Trid. Sess. VI. cap. 1): liberum arbitrium minime extinctum esse, viribus licet attenuatum et inclinatum, and MÖHLER speaks only of the sleep of sin (Symbolik, p. 100), but Paul says, in accordance with his Lord in the parable of him left "half-dead" (ἡμιθνήψ, Luke x. 30), that we are dead to what is good, robbed of the "life," which includes strength and activity in connection with entire satisfaction, i. e. happiness, and hence are powerless, inactive, cramped in our life-movement, troubled, dissatisfied and unhappy; it is therefore not merely a feeling of unhappiness, not merely the corruption of the intellectual, but also of the moral, in fact of all the powers of life, so that physical death cannot fail, nor yet the ἀπώλεια, eternal destruction. Indeed the physical life is so affected, that sin is the heritage of every child of man from birth, it is forfeit to death as well as to sin.

[EADIE: "While admitting the scriptural account of the introduction of sin, many have shaped their views of it from the connection in which they place it in reference to Divine foreknowledge, and so have sprung up the Supralapsarian and Sub-lapsarian hypotheses. Attempts to form a perfect scheme of Theodicy, or a full vindication of the Divinity, have occupied many other minds than that of Leibnitz. The relation of the race to its Progenitor has been viewed in various lights, and analogies physical, political and metaphysical, with theories of Creationism and Traducianism, have been employed in illustration, from the days of Augustine and Pelagius to those of Erasmus and Luther, Calvin and Arminius, Taylor and President Edwards. Questions about the origin of evil, transmission of depravity, imputation of guilt, federal or representative position on the part of Adam, and physical and spiritual death as elements of the curse, have given rise to long and labored argumentation, because men have looked at them from very different stand-points, and have been influenced in their treatment of the problem by their philosophical conceptions of the Divine character, the nature of sin, and that moral freedom and power which belong to responsible humanity. The modus may be and is among the deep things of God; but the res is palpable: for experience confirms the Divine testimony that we are by nature 'children of wrath,' per generationem, not per imitationem." Comp. the history of the Doctrine, Romans, pp. 191 ff.—R.]

These walking dead ones (vers. 2, 3) stand in the relation of slaves in Satan's kingdom, and so long as they are without help from above, they wallow ever deeper and deeper into misery and death. They have in Satan an ἀρχοντα, "prince," who works and rules in opposition to Christ, the Head of the Church. He has his personal, wicked will as ruler, according to which (κατά) unconverted sinners walk; he has in the existing tendencies of the age in the world, urging themselves as a norm, an assistant of his power, which surrounds all men, penetrates all, unper-ceived and unregarded (ἐξουσία τοῦ ἀέρος), which works as a spirit in the sons of disobedience (ver. 2). The lusts of the flesh also and its glory, of the "thoughts," the selfish thought, are channels of his influence, of the flow of his spirit into the children of wrath, to which he is himself forfeit and to which all are exposed, who do not permit themselves to be converted and redeemed. This truth is as startling as it is humbling. In and with the world-historical progress under God's gracious guidance Satan as the prince of darkness carries on his activity to the destruction of men.*

4. ANTHROPOLOGICALLY: Man appears here:

a. As the creature of God (αὐτοῦ ποίημα), in which however there is but a side reference to the fact of man's creation. Paul uses this (ver. 10) only as a substratum for his remarks respecting man's renewal and regeneration in Christ, holding this truth firmly however, just here, where man's ruin in sin is spoken of. This must never be forgotten: Every man, not merely Adam and Eve, those too who are born, are God's creatures. Even though the substance is given, out of which man is begotten and born, it exists only as the creative inworking of God. And although man is to be regarded continually as the creature of God, this does not exclude the second causes by means of which God since the close of the Hexaëmeron continues the work of creation (see FRANK, Theol., F. c., I. p. 52), so that the Apostle can say: "by nature children of wrath." There is a two-fold nature, the original, created by God, the degenerated, corrupted by sin. So far as we are God's work and creation, is the nature of the body and the soul in organism and powers, good; but intruded sin has corrupted their nature which was in itself good. This leads to the second point.

b. As a member of his race (φύσει) and that from the point of time when his "nature," a production within humanity, begins, hence from his birth. As respects this he is "flesh," doing the wishes of the flesh and of the thoughts, is "dead in trespasses and sins." For humanity is a living whole and in it every individual partakes of the character of the whole. This permits no one to be a non-participant in the consequences of the first sin, and each individual has his natural share in the corruption thereof. There is however, notwithstanding, in him a capacity for being converted, redeemed, saved, which distinguishes him from the fallen angels, who do not possess this, and also from lapis or truncus, negatively, in that he holds himself not passively, but aggressively against God, and positively, in that he has been created by God for renewal in Christ, and has from the creation on such an aptitudo (see FRANK, p. 140 ff.). To his doings

* [In our section, immediately following I. 22, 23, the world is marked in distinct and telling contrast to the Church. "The Church has its head—κεφαλή; the world has its—ἀρχων. That Head is a man, allied by blood to the community over which He presides; that other prince is an unembodied spirit—an alien as well as a usurper. The one so blesses the church, that it becomes His 'fulness,' the other sheds darkness and distress all around him. The one has His Spirit dwelling in the church, leading it to holiness; the other, himself the darkest, most malignant, and unlovely being in the universe, exercises a subtle and debasing influence over the minds of his vassals, who are 'children of disobedience,' Matt. xiii. 38; John viii. 44; Acts xxvi. 18; 2 Cor. iv. 4." EADIE.—R.] and his character there belongs however no activity or relation to the salvation given in Christ, although he can and will have a consciousness of his unhappiness as a "child of wrath," and has accordingly a certain knowledge (obscura scintillula ejus notitia quid sit Deus), or a memoriter knowledge of God and a longing for the removal of his need, and hence too will try in his conduct and plans many a way to help himself, without ever finding the right way and the effective means. He will rather be deceived by the lusts and be oftener and more powerfully moved by the wills of his flesh and of his selfish thought under the evil influences of his surroundings.

c. As a child of his age ("according to the course of this world") and his nation, breathing in the atmosphere of his time and his tribe, determined and swept on by the stream of the present, to which he belongs.

d. As member of a world, in which outside the Divine power the power of the kingdom of darkness secretly, noiselessly exercises its force all about and in the individual men, who are unbelieving and unconverted. Man has an individual, moral, national position, but stands related also to the cosmical power of the evil one as well as to the eternal power of God working above and within the world.

5. SOTERIOLOGICALLY: a) The essence of salvation ("ye have been and are saved") out of the condition of death, wrought and strengthened by sin, is "life:" hence "quickened together" (ver. 5). Life is a gift, a gratuity of grace (δωρον, ver. 8), but not so complete at once, that it only needs to be offered and taken into possession; it is a new creation (ver. 10), a creative renewal. Salvation is also conceived of as deliverance from the power and dominion of this world and its prince, as exaltation and redemption into the kingdom of God; hence "raised us up with Him, and made us sit with Him in heavenly places."

b) The cause of salvation is God, who quickens, raises and exalts, and especially His grace (vers. 5, 8). Comp. 1. This salvation is so little a life developing itself out of the natural character, that it is called a "gift of God," which is only to be received.

c) The Mediator is Christ. See 2.

d) The condition is faith: "through faith." The context shows that the object of faith is the Person of Christ (vers. 5, 6, 7, 10), in whom God and God's grace are known and grasped, grasped and known. The nature of faith is evidently thus defined, that it is no work, since in this salvation works are denied as antecedent ("not of works," ver. 9), and good works are designated only as subsequent thereto (ver. 10), but also, that it does not spring of itself on the soil of our heart or spirit, since salvation comes "not of yourselves:" faith is not from the natural man. But since salvation is the impartation of life, and that too in creative manner, faith itself must be conceived of as an accepting activity, an ethical act, or an ethical course of action, having its corresponding development. Still nothing further is predicated on this point.

[It is the uniform doctrine of the New Testament, that no man is saved against his will; and his desire to be saved is proved by his belief of the Divine testimony. Salvation by grace is not arbitrarily attached to faith by the mere sovereign dictate of the Most High, for man's willing acceptance of salvation is essential to his possession of it, and the operation of faith is just the sinner's appreciation of the Divine mercy, and his acquiescence in the goodness and wisdom of the plan of recovery, followed by a cordial appropriation of its needed and adapted blessings, or, as Augustine tersely and quaintly phrases it—Qui creavit te sine te, non salvabit te sine te. Justification by faith alone is simply pardon enjoyed on the condition of taking it." EADIE.—R.]

e) The course of salvation, according to vers. 5, 6: "quickened us together with Christ," "and raised us up with Him and made us sit with Him" "in Christ," as well as ver. 10: "created in Christ Jesus," is to be thus understood: that the salvation, given personally and actually in Christ, begins in man with a reviving, which is a "dying to sin" (Rom. vi. 1 f.), beginning first of all in the individual and having in him first its growth and development, but then extending itself over whole races and unfolding itself ever more gloriously in them, not indeed as a natural life left to itself, but as continually evoked and furthered by the supernatural grace in its riches (ver. 7), always in Christ, out from Christ, never away from Christ, beyond Christ, but on toward and up to Him.

6. ETHICALLY: a. The worth of morality transcends all intellectual power. If ever a people was great in the latter respect, it was the Greeks, and yet to them applies what is said in vers. 1, 2: despite all science and art, despite all progress in the department of human mental culture and the earthly life, so that they have been for centuries the masters of the leading civilized nations, they have fallen and persisted in moral corruption.

b. The nature of morality is "good works," which God prepared before; they have been given since the beginning of the creation: in the written law the unwritten laws have been rendered, fixed and secured against alteration. The new creation in Christ has resumed and continued the first, not obsolete creation, not however as supplementing a defective one, but as renewing one disfigured and destroyed in man. God's dealings ordered from the beginning by Him are alone spoken of.

c. The basis of morality, which is the proper bearing of man towards the will of God, rests in the proper relation of man to God, into which he is transferred as a new creature in Christ. Since this is brought to pass through faith, faith itself is the basis of true Christian morality. From what is said respecting the people of Israel, it is manifest that even the law of God and many other salutary institutions can be in force, without helping or furthering this, if faith be lacking. But works cannot and may not be lacking to faith, if it is genuine: they are essential in the life of faith; even though not necessary for the sake of justification and to the attainment of eternal life, they are still necessary proofs of faith, and necessary on account of the mandatum, ordinatio et voluntas Dei. Since good works are not created by God, but Christians created for them, and since Christians should perform them of their own free will under the impulse of the Spirit, faith must be the basis for these, the same faith by means of which the man becomes a new man. [The Gospel says "Live and do this," not "Do this and live," and the old maxim: bona opera non præcedunt justificandum, sed sequuntur justificatum, is here again proven Scriptural, as experience proves it the only possible order. The many battles on this point, the ever-recurring tendency in theology and in the heart of the Christian, to mix, confuse, contrast and oppose faith and works, find in the plain, pellucid statement of the Apostle their proper rebuke. Alas, such simple words have too often been tortured by expositors to support their theories.*—R.]

Despite the amiable qualities and social virtues in the character, lovely mental gifts in the life of those who are not born of God, not born of His Spirit; they are still walking dead men, dead in the living body, in which the outer man is nobly upheld while the inward man perishes day by day.—Through trespasses and sins, through many, but little sins, little meannesses, trifling impurities, petty jealousies, which creep in secretly, lightly, unnoticed, and work so successfully for the death of man's soul,—it occurs that one otherwise honorable can be inwardly more corrupt, more thoroughly ruined, than one who has committed some great crime. Among the twelve disciples of Jesus, one was Judas the traitor!—Consider the experience of all Christians: only after conversion do they perceive the abomination of sin, its origin and its end, destruction. Here can man only reflect.—Most men appear well, but if they had at one time the thoughts and feelings which so often steal in upon them, in externally manifest and accomplished deeds before their eyes, their body would seem to them like a shroud, and their heart like a corpse, of a beloved one indeed, yet full of stench.—The spirit of the age of this world is never a good spirit. It does indeed occasionally appear to be so here and there, as in the time of the Reformation. This was born of God's Spirit and Word, and yet it was furthered by carnal hostility to the Pope, evil desires after the ecclesiastical possessions, after the treasures of the monasteries; godless movements against godless oppression; if God the Lord had not helped it by special events and circumstances, it would have been repressed or polluted—by the spirit of the age!—In evil there is system, progress, growth, development; a prince too and rulers, spirit and law; evil, darkness is a kingdom also, and at its head is a prince, the chief of the devils; from frivolous, temperate sinners to premeditated villains, and from sinful men to fallen angels, and among these there is gradation and connection, a kingdom, without peace and happiness, it is true.

* [As a specimen of the mode by which human inferences and hypotheses can be added to Scripture to pervert it, take the declaration of the Council of Trent. Sess. VI. cap. 16: "The Lord's goodness to all men is so great that He will have the things which are His own gifts to be their merits"—ut eorum vellet esse merita quæ sunt ipsius donæ (from EADIE).—R.]

Selfishness is a destructive pervading disease of one's own Ego, which dies of it. To live for self and only for self is a poor, pitiable life. What kind of a wife is that who will not live for her husband? what kind of a man is he who will not live for his calling? what kind of a human being is that who will not live for his God, but only for his lusts, capable of no sacrifice, except petty alms if he is rich; noble before men, before God a tatter, honored before men and yet the object of Divine wrath and of His sentence to perdition?—It is a sad contradiction among men, that they speak of the "dear God" [the common German phrase: der liebe Gott] and say, He is love, while no one is to them more uncomfortable and obnoxious than the Church, which makes this a matter of earnest, preaching of the love of the Father in Christ the Crucified and Risen One; they are tolerant toward sins in themselves and others, aye, toward vile sins, fornication, suicide, if there is any respectability about it, but tolerant toward the living and active members of the church they are certainly not, that is impossible for them. What then do they think of the love of God?—You may as little undervalue faith as the rudder, however small it is in a large ship. All labor in the rigging, in the masts and sails, at stem or stern, helps nothing even in the best of weather, much less in swell and storm, if the rudder is not in order and rightly used; so without faith you toss about in life, aimless, helpless, hopeless.—God did not first make the members and then out of them the body; man was at once entire. So too man is not born piecemeal, though small and weak, he is yet an entire human being. It is so with the new birth also. Conversion affects the whole man, is however only the first step, not perfection, is a beginning pointing and impelling toward advance and completion.

LUTHER:—That for which each thing is created, it does without law and compulsion. The sun shines by nature, unbidden; the pear-tree bears of itself, voluntarily; three and seven ought not to be ten, they are ten already. There is no need that one should say to God, He should do good, for He does all the time willingly and gladly of Himself. So too one should not command the righteous man, that he should do good works, for he does it without this, without command and compulsion, because he is a new creature and a good tree.—He should not be driven thereto, if his faith be not fancied and feigned.

STARKE:—He who does not walk in God's way, following the guiding star of God's will, gets other blind guides, and is induced to cut such capers, that he is plunged into extreme corruption.—The saints are free confessors of their sins, having no desire for hypocrisy to justify themselves.—All men are equally corrupted by original sin, although the corruption breaks out in various ways.—Evil lust is the root of all sins, even of sin itself.—Reason is a glorious gift of God, as the deprival of the same, madness, is a great misery and judgment. But it is much weakened and darkened through the fall, and hence inclined to many errors and prejudices, permitting itself to be abused.—Art thou poor in soul, here thou mayest find an inexhaustible treasure of God's mercy, making us rich in Him.—Our salvation comes from God's compassionate love alone.—We are really quickened in Christ, by Christ and with Christ. Therefore we have a real not a fancied life, and there is as great a difference between a natural and a regenerated man as between those physically dead and alive.—Believers not only become blessed in the future, but they are really blessed, although their blessedness is still imperfect.—Without grace no one can believe, and without believing no one can partake of grace.—We are God's work as regards creation; but if we do not become so as regards sanctification and the application of redemption, we remain outside the fellowship with God.—Regeneration is a real creation and the source of all spiritual life.

RIEGER:—Living men cannot exactly understand that they are to regard themselves as dead through trespasses and sins. Weak they prefer admitting as applicable to them; and indeed the word of God does occasionally describe us as weak, as sick. But the Spirit of God does not mean this, as men gladly explain it. They confess themselves weak with the persuasion that they can make themselves better and become strong by self-improvement. The word of God, however, means a weakness, in which self-help is no longer possible, where the hope of recovery rests solely on the presence and power of the physician. As certainly as the body without the soul is dead, so certainly is the soul without the Spirit dead.—The walk and the occupation with which man commonly conceals this death, do not make the harm less, but rather the more dangerous.—That the time, the existing course of the world, the principles, opinions and habits arising therein, can operate largely in man, bearing him into much which he would not reach by himself, making his exit and freedom very difficult, should a longing for something better actually arise within him; this is quite readily perceived. But that a prince, a ruler of darkness, an expert power, extending as far as the air and clouds, lurks therein, that we do not know of ourselves, nor do we want to believe it, though it is proven by the word of God. The devil himself has the best interest in the fact that so little of his business is suspected among the dealings of men.—At first flesh and Reason can be for a while in conflict. Reason accuses the lusts of the flesh of being vile and unbecoming to man; but there is no power to free itself from them; and the flesh reproaches the reason with this inability and the consequent falsity of its assumed virtues, and so the two prefer to make peace with each other. The reason is reconciled with the flesh, helps to justify and excuse its lusts, paints a better external appearance for them, while the flesh for the sake of the praise occasionally crawls into a form not too coarse.—What will God yet do in future ages, that the riches of the grace of Christ may be yet more confidently proven, more gladly believed, and more uninterruptedly enjoyed!

PASSAVANT:—Our whole nature desires life, life is our thirst, we hate death! So often and so long as we trespass against the law of our conscience or God's law, is all holiness and righteousness dead within us; there lives then no love of God, no Spirit of the Lord, no joy in Him, no heavenly peace, no Divine life in us, that is, no real life.—If God's breath does not breathe afresh upon us with the power of the Divine nature, then education however careful, culture however refined, is mere patchwork and tinsel, no pure truth, no pure power from God, no new birth, no heavenly life.—We can learn from the reports of the gospel messengers, in what forms, in what follies and enormities the kingdom of superstition and unbelief has down to our days, multiplied and established itself. Every recollection of the holy and eternal, every trace, every presage of the unknown God in the human soul, has been degraded and distorted into the silliest and most infamous fictions and lies, into the most miserable and sinful abortions of idolatrous forms and worship.—Notice the language of Scripture. One and the same word in the text signifies unbelief and disobedience, for both these poisonous plants proceed from one and the same bitter root of the heart. You do not look with pleasure on Him, whom you will not obey; you do not keep Him in mind, nor inquire after Him.—Is thy obedience poor, then thy faith is not earnest; is thy faith not vital and genuine, then there is no child-like, earnest obedience.

HEUBNER:—Those are dead, who have died to all that is good and godly, in whom the spirit is benumbed and the flesh alone is active. There are grades of death as well as of life. Spiritual death manifests itself in the entire lack of knowledge respecting spiritual things, of desire, love, power for good; all taste for the Divine, all longing for God is wanting. This death is the result of sin. Christianity found the world dead and reanimated it. To be without God, without Christ, is death. The first stirring of life is anxiety about ourselves, the consciousness of misery and sin.—Fearful is the power, which the course, the spirit of the world, maintains over man. It distorts all his ideas. We must agree with it, if we would have peace, honor, respect and power; those who oppose it, are regarded with wrath. The origin of this spirit is in the prince of darkness. He who stands outside of Christ, stands in fellowship with Satan; for he thinks and lives in accordance with the maxims of the evil spirit.—“Prince of the power of the air!” This description is apt, because the evil spirit is not a visible member of human society, and yet is about us, in our circle, in the sublunary world.—Satan was therefore the ruling power in heathenism, and accordingly this cannot be regarded as a healthful and normal development of religion. His influence still continues.—To deny this activity of Satan is to bring water to his mill.—The bodily resurrection of Christ has as a consequence a spiritual resurrection of men.—It is contrary to the proud consciousness of man, to live by the grace of God, and yet he cannot live by any thing else than grace. All is of grace: that we may hear the gospel, God opens our understanding, and makes our hearts willing to believe.—What would have occurred had Christ not come? Socrates, Plato, Pythagoras appeared 4-500 years before Him—what had they helped the world? He who thinks that others would have come after them, who would have helped, will wait in vain for—ever.—On the one side Paul excludes works, on the other he requires them.

STIER:—God not only raised Him from the dead, but the dead in Him.—The air which exhales from earth the old villain who hides therein and uses it, thoroughly knows how to turn and pour in opposition to the gales from heaven.—Mercy removes misery and death, Love appears instead of wrath, blessing, delivering, saving.—First life, the new creature, then we may speak of walk and good works.—Life, as just begun, is not complete, does not stand still, but grows, develops, forms and employs itself. It proceeds from the Risen One continually as the Spirit of sanctification.

SPURGEON:—Spiritual quickening: Jairus's daughter, the young man at Nain, Lazarus, 1) Illustrations of the different circumstances in which those who are really dead are to be found; 2) Illustrations of the various means of grace through which they are quickened by the power of the same Spirit; 3) Illustrations of experiences through which those who have been made alive pass after their quickening.

LANGBEIN:—The glorification of Christ, the glorification of Redeemed ones: 1) God has quickened us together with Him, 2) raised us together with Him, 3) transferred us into heavenly places in Him.—Gesetz und Zeugnis: Bow thy knees and rejoice over the great gracious plan of God: 1) that we fully survey it in Christ, 2) that each of us has his place in it, 3) that it has become actual in many respects through the word and faith and in the Holy Ghost.

[SCHENKEL:—Sin a fountain of death in apparent life.—The kingdom of Satan in its dreadfulness and nothingness.—The blessedness of the Christian: 1) It has a firm basis, that of grace; 2) It leads them to a certain way, that of faith.—Our hope that in the course of ages God will manifest Himself yet more gloriously by means of the grace and truth made known in Christ. "Faith opens our eyes, ears, mind and heart; giving us (1) the heavenly desire, (2) the Divine knowledge, (3) the Divine taste, (4) the truth of life" (from PASSAVANT).—R.]

[EADIE:—Ver. 1. The epithet "dead" here

implies: 1. Previous life; 2. Insensibility; 3. Inability. He cannot because he will not, and therefore he is justly responsible.—Ver. 2. They did not pursue indulgences fashionable at a former epoch, but now obsolete and forgotten. Theirs were not the idolatries and impurities of other centuries. No; they lived as the age on all sides of them lived—in its popular and universal errors and delusions; they walked in entire conformity to the reigning sins of the times.—Ver. 3. Si Deus non irascitur impiis et injustis, nec piis justosque diligit (LACTANTIUS).—Ver. 4. Though mercy has been expended by God for six milleniums, and myriads of myriads have been partakers of it, it is still an unexhausted mine of wealth.—The love is great—a great God is its possessor and great sinners are its objects.—Ver. 5. Life may be feeble at first, but the sincere milk of the word is imbibed and the expected maturity is at length reached. Its first moment may not indeed be registered in the consciousness, as it may be awakened within us by a varying process.—Ver. 6. The quickened soul is not merely made aware that in Christ, as containing it and all similar souls, it is enlivened, and raised, and elevated, but along with this it enjoys individually a conscious life, resurrection and session with Jesus.—Ver. 7. All the grace in this kindness shown in the first century is a lesson even to the nineteenth century. What God did then, He can do now and will do now; and one reason why He did it then was, to teach the men of the present age His ability and desire to repeat in them the same blessed process of salvation and life.—Ver. 8. Look at salvation in its origin—it is "by grace;" in its reception—it is "through faith;" in its manner of conferment—it is a "gift."—Ver. 9. If man be guilty, and being unable to win a pardon, simply receives it; if, being dead, he gets life only as a Divine endowment; if favor, and nothing but favor, has originated his safety, and the only possible act on his part be that of reception; if what he has be but a gift to him in his weak and meritless state—then surely nothing can be further from him than boasting, for he will glorify God for all.—R.]

22 Lord: In whom ye also are [being] builded together for a habitation of God through [in] the Spirit.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

² Ver. 12.—[The Rec. inserts ἐν before τῷ καὶ τῷ, with D.³ K. L, and some versions, but it is omitted in N. A. B. D.¹ F, by most fathers; rejected by nearly all modern editors (Hodge retains it without remark) as an explanatory gloss, the preposition being more usual and perhaps more correct in such cases.—The same gloss occurs in the Rec. again (iii. 5).—R.]

⁶ Ver. 16.—[We may render here: both of us with equal correctness.—Reconcile again may be the true meaning, but I hesitate in adopting it.—In one body is to be closely connected with both. To instead of unto (E. V.) for the simple dative.—Through best expresses the sense of διὰ.—On it is more exact than thereby, the reference being to the cross.—We might put a period at the close of this verse, but the insertion of the subject in verse 17, indicates the want of close connection.—R.]

⁸ Ver. 18.—[The article here is almost equivalent to the possessive.—The E. V. again renders ἐν, by.—R.]

⁹ Ver. 19.—[The Rec. omits ἐαυτοῖς, with D.³ K. L, versions and fathers; but it was probably deemed superfluous, instead of emphatic; it is found in N. B, (both ἀλλὰ ἐαυτοῖς), A. C. D.¹ F, accepted by modern editors.—R.]

¹⁰ Ver. 20.—[The Rec. reads Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ on the authority of C. D. E. F. G. K. L, several versions and a number of fathers; accepted by Scholz, De Wette, Meyer, Ellicott. N.² A. B, the Vulgate and other versions, some fathers, support the order: Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ; adopted by Tischendorf, Lachmann, Alford and others. N.¹ has only τοῦ Χριστοῦ, which Braune seems to favor. On the whole the order of the Rec. should be given up.—R.]

¹¹ Ver. 21.—[The Rec. inserts ἡ between πᾶσα and οἰκοδομή (N.² A. C, some cursives), but it is omitted in N.¹ B. D. E. F. G. K. L, most cursives, and is rejected by nearly all modern editors. The briefer reading is difficult, and the change was an easy way of avoiding it, just as following the Rec. now-a-days saves a little trouble to the commentator.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Detailed description of their previous condition.

Vers. 11, 12.*

*[Dr. Hodge gives the following analysis of this paragraph: I. Their former relation.—1. To the Church as foreigners and aliens. 2. To God as those who were far off, without any saving knowledge of Him, or interest in His promise—vers. 11, 12.—II. The means by which this alienation from God and the Church has been removed, viz., by the blood of Christ. 1. Satisfying the demands of justice it secured reconciliation with God. 2. Abolishing the law in the form of Mosaic institutions, it removed the wall of partition between the Jews and Gentiles—both are united in one body and reconciled to God—vers. 13-18.—III. The Ephesians are therefore united with God and His people. 1. They are represented as fellow-citizens of the saints. 2. They are members of the family of God. 3. They are constituent portions of that temple in which God dwells by His Spirit—vers. 19-22.—R.]

Ver. 11. Wherefore remember.—Διὰ τοῦτο, "wherefore," refers, like i. 15: διὰ τοῦτο, to the preceding section (STIER, BLEEK), since the object of "remember" is their previous quite as well as their present condition, or the "creating" of those who were "dead." Talis recordatio gratum animum acuit et fidem roborat (BENGEL), taking into view not merely the obtained riches, but also the poverty and misery from which they were released. The reference to vers. 5-10 (MEYER) is not correct, since ver. 5 resumes the object of vers. 1-3, and ver. 4 contains the subject, nor that to the last thought only (CHRYSOSTOM), since this sums up the whole. [ELICOTT suggests the reference "to the declaratory portion of the foregoing paragraph, vers. 1-7; vers. 8-10 being an argumentative and explanatory addition.—R.]

That once ye, Gentiles in the flesh, ὅτι ὑμεῖς ποτὲ [ποτὲ ὑμεῖς] τὰ ἔθνη ἐν σαρκί.—(See Textual Note 1.) The ἦτε (ver. 12), introduced by the resumptive ὅτε after the apposition, belongs here, so that it need not be supplied. "Ye" means those who are now Christians (σῳσμένοι), and that they have been "Gentiles in the flesh" is marked by ποτὲ. Accordingly τὰ ἔθνη ἐν σαρκί is a predication appositional phrase. The article marks the designation as one well-known, the substantive, which in itself has no dishonorable meaning, being used with a reference to ὁ 11, and thus with the additional notion of a fault. Accordingly, Paul adds, "in the flesh." This is not κατὰ σάρκα (vi. 5; Rom. ix. 3, 5; 1 Cor. x. 18), which denotes a relation, while here a status is spoken of, one which has been, but is no longer existing (ποτὲ). Joined without the article it forms with "Gentiles" one conception: Gōim in the flesh, denoting what is external: Ye former heathen in the flesh, in the natural condition, uncircumcised, without a sign of the covenant, not even externally, in the flesh, endowed with the known sign of the people of God. [Σάρξ is taken in this its simple meaning by nearly all later commentators (MEYER, ELLICOTT, ALFORD, HODGE, EADIE, for the very good reason that the context plainly points to it, especially ἐν σαρκί just below. Braune's view of the construction is also the usual one.—R.) Otherwise we must take τὰ ἔθνη without any reference to heathenism and the therewith connected deficiencies, as the nations excepting Israel, and find its quality denoted in the added phrase, as designating what was defective in them. BENGE: hoc considerate Paulus conjungit cum GENTIBUS; nam Judæi gentes simpliciter dicebunt præputium, non præputium in carne—Gentiles, not Gentiles in the flesh. Hence it is incorrect to take ἐν σαρκί = natalibus, origine carnati (GROTIUS); for this they would continue to be. Nor does it designate the carnal mind, the unholy life (AMBROSE, ANSELM, CALOVIVS), nor has it a typical reference (STIER) for which Heb. vii. 16; ix. 10, give no occasion.

Who are called the Uncircumcision by that which is called [the so-called] Circumcision in the flesh wrought by hands [οἱ λεγόμενοι ἀκροβυστία ὑπὸ τῆς λεγομένης περιτομῆς ἐν σαρκί χειροποίητοι.].—Ἀκροβυστία, "uncircumcision," is evidently in apposition to "Gentiles in the flesh," and οἱ λεγόμενοι, already prepared for by τὰ before ἔθνη, is placed first for emphasis. The nations are called "Uncircumcision" on account of heathenism, the absence of the sign of the covenant in the flesh. The abstract noun, denoting here the essential point, is here a name also; hence it stands for the concrete = the uncircumcised. Col. iii. 11; Gal. ii. 7; 1 Cor. vii. 19, and περιτομή = the circumcised. In the phrase "who are called the Uncircumcision," the fact that they were (LUTHER) and are so termed, is stated here objectively, while in ὁ πὸ τῆς λεγομένης περιτομῆς, instead of τῶν λεγόμενων, which is called, instead of are called, it is indicated that the thing and the name do not coincide in the same way, i. e., by the so-called circumcision, the so called 'circumcised.* Accordingly the added phrase "in the flesh," corresponding precisely with "in the flesh" in the last clause, marks the externalness, in the flesh where it takes place.

Χειροποίητοι, "wrought by hands," is added with special emphasis, forming the antithesis to ἀχειροποίητοι, Col. ii. 11, and to what is perfect, wrought by God (Heb. ix. 11, 24; Acts vii. 48; xvii. 24). It has a typical reference, as the passages in Hebrews plainly affirm, so that this reference is not contained in ἐν σαρκί, which is not opposed to ἐν πνεύματι, either here or in the previous clause (STIER). Hence we should connect closely "circumcision in the flesh," and explain: which is made by hands in the flesh (MEYER, BLEEK). There is indeed a special significance in circumcision, which is mentioned by Moses (Deut. x. 16; xxx. 6), and the prophets (Jer. iv. 4; ix. 24, 25; Ezek. xlv. 7, 9). This the Apostle does not wish to undervalue; he only does not permit it to pass for something merely external, over against that of the heart, wrought by God (Phil. iii. 3; Rom. ii. 29; Col. ii. 11), to which that wrought in the flesh points.† He marks here the Jew in the people of Israel; the Jew, who remains satisfied with this external mark of the covenant with Israel, is a so-called circumcised one, and exalts himself without reason arrogantly above the uncircumcised and unclean nations. How miserable must be the condition of the heathen, who are despised by the Jew! So much the more glorious is it that they as Christians are now exalted above the latter. Hence we should not accept here a repugnance toward the Jews (RUECKERT), or an advantage of the Gentiles (CHRYSOSTOM), or the opinion, that uncircumcision was no detriment to the Gentiles, and circumcision no advantage to the Jews (CLARIUS). In ea æqualitate, quam antea commemorat apostolus, nunc latente inæqualitate profert, ut Gentes, quo longius a Deo abstant, eo plura se gratiæ Dei debere fateantur (BEZA).

Ver. 12. That ye were at that time [ὅτε ἦτε τῷ καιρῷ ἐκείνῳ].—ὅτε, "that," is a resumption of the first ὅτι (ver. 11), and connects with "remember," adding to the status miserabilior of the heathen, already defined, the inner side. The verb placed first for emphasis marks the past, and τῷ καιρῷ ἐκείνῳ, the dative of time (Luke xii. 20: ταύτη τῇ νυκτί; WINER, p. 205) renders it even more prominent than ποτὲ (ver. 11).

Without Christ, χωρὶς Χριστοῦ.—Χωρὶς ad subjectum, quod ab objecto sejunctum est, refertur, aveu, ad objectum, quod a subjecto abesse cogitandum est (TITTMANN, Syn., I. 93 ff.). Thus χωρὶς Χριστοῦ affirms: the heathen are in a condition, where they are deprived of Him: vos eratis

* [The Gentiles were called and really were the ἀκροβυστία; the Jews were called the περιτομή, but were not truly so" (ELLICOTT).—R.]

† [Here again ELLICOTT is excellent. He renders: performed by hand in the flesh, to bring out the connection more accurately, and calls the phrase "a tertiary predication added by the Apostle reflectively rather than descriptively; 'the circumcision,—yes, hand-wrought in the flesh; only a visible manual operation on the flesh, when it ought to be a secret spiritual process in the heart; only κατατομή, not περιτομή.'"—R.]

*procul a Christo; ἀνευ Χριστοῦ esset; Christus non aderat vobis. "Christ" refers to the promised One, the eternal Son of God; since a time is spoken of when He had not appeared in the form of a servant. Hence the name "Jesus" is not inserted. Christ, by means of ἐπιδήμια νοστή (OLSHAUSEN), as the Angel of the Covenant (RUECKERT), dwelt already in the people of Israel (see 1 Cor. x. 4), and the people of God stood in an attitude of longing, hope, trust and faith, towards the coming One. The antithesis is in ver. 13: "in Christ Jesus." Hence we have here the summary which is expanded in the succeeding clause; this is not then a first point followed by a second and third (SCHENKEL), but a κεφάλαιον. [HODGE takes the following clause as a confirmation of this phrase, but ELLICOTT, more correctly, as an elucidation of its significance.—R.] It is incorrect also to explain it as = sine Christi fide vel notitia (ANSELM, CALOVIUS).

Being alienated from the commonwealth of Israel, ἀπηλλοτριωμένοι τῆς πολιτείας τοῦ Ἰσραήλ.—This is the first of two co-ordinate members of one thought; it describes the external relation, the other the internal. We have marked here, a separation from the πολιτεία of the people of Israel, which has become and will become ever greater, and at the same time an internal estrangement (comp. iv. 18; Col. i. 21). The word indicates, if not an original fellowship, still an earlier nearness and equality. BENGE: Abalienati, non: alieni; participia præsupponunt, gentes ante defectionem suam a fide patrum, imo potius ante lapsum Adami, fuisse participes lucis et vite. So RUECKERT, OLSHAUSEN, STIER. [MEYER does not think this notion of a previous fellowship is here implied. ALFORD: "Gentiles and Jews were once united in the hope of redemption—this was constituted, on the apostasy of the nations, into a definite πολιτεία for the Jews, from which and its blessings the Gentiles were alienated." To which ELLICOTT adds: "The Gentile lapsed from it, the Jew made it invalid (Matt. xv. 6, comp. Chrysostom); and they parted, only to unite again (ἔθνη καὶ λαοὶ Ἰσραήλ, Acts iv. 27) in one act of uttermost rebellion, and yet, through the mystery of redeeming love, to remain thereby (vers. 15, 16) united in Christ forever."—R.]

By πολιτεία (ARISTOTLE: τῶν τῆν πόλιν οἰκοῦντων τὰς τις) we necessarily understand here according to the context the constitution of the State, the external polity, from which the Gentiles were ever further removed; a reference to the theocracy also is of course included. Hence too the theocratic name of honor, of "Israel" (Gen. xxxii. 28), not "of the Jews." Tota respublica Israelis spectabat Christum (BENGE). Comp. John i. 48; Rom. ix. 4, 6; 2 Cor. xi. 22; Gal. vi. 16. The genitive τοῦ Ἰσραήλ denotes the possessor, the usufructuary, of the πολιτεία. [So ELLICOTT, who rightly insists that the word marks their religious and spiritual, rather than their national or political distinctions. HODGE and ALFORD accept as more simple the view of HARLESS, that the genitive is that of the identical nation: "the commonwealth which is Israel." ALFORD notices that the word "alienated" requires an objective reality as its reference, hence the meaning mentioned next is to be rejected.—R.] Certainly we should not refer this to the civil constitution (ANSELM, GROTIUS), for which a Roman or Greek could have no desire; what the Gentiles, who became Christians, lacked previously and now possessed, was certainly not "places of honor" or "citizenship in the Jewish State" (HARLESS). We should not then think of citizenship (BULLINGER, CALVIN).

And strangers from the covenants of the promise, καὶ ξένοι τῶν διαθηκῶν τῆς ἐπαγγελίας.—This clause is closely connected with the preceding (καὶ), as a formula. So too the words correspond: "strangers" to "alienated," "covenants" to "polity," "promise" to "Israel." "Strangers" respects what has come to pass in the course of development or the internal position, which that development furthers (BULLINGER: eandem rem significat utraque, nisi quod posterius prius); "covenants" designates the repeated renewal of the covenant from Abraham to Moses (Gen. xii. 2 f.; xiii. 15; xv. 18; xvii. 20; xxii. 16 ff.; xxvi. 2 ff.; xxviii. 13 ff.), to the prophets; the context speaks merely of the time before Christ. All these repeated agreements, however, serve the one promise given to Abraham referring to all nations as well as characterizing the covenants, and echoing again and again. So in Rom. ix. 4: "the covenants" and "the giving of the law" are placed side by side. Hence this is not to be referred to the two covenants, the old and the new (CALOVIUS and others), or to the two tables of the law (BEZA and others).

Having no hope, etc.—Here again we have two clauses connected and belonging together. Ἐλπίδα μὴ ἔχοντες, "having no hope," owing to the absence of the article, denotes that they have no hope of any kind; not merely a definite hope, but all hope is denied in their case. Hence we should not understand it of the resurrection and eternal life (BULLINGER, GROTIUS), or of the promised possessions (ESTIUS, BENGE), as the object of the hope, nor indefinitely of deliverance (HARLESS). At most we might join to it from the following ἀθεοί, in accordance with Acts xxiv. 15: "toward God." πρὸς (εἰς) τὸν θεόν. In 1 Thess. iv. 13 we find the expression used as absolutely as here. The negative μὴ is used with the participle in this

* [On this distinction EADIE remarks: "Not to contradict this refinement, we might add, that ἀνευ, allied to in, un, ohne, might, in a general sense, signify privation; but χωρίς marks that privation as caused by separation. The Gentiles are viewed as being not merely without Him, but far away from Him. Their relation to Him is marked by a great interval—χωρίς. But, as ELLICOTT says, 'this distinction must be applied with caution, when it is remembered that χωρίς is used forty times in the New Testament, and ἀνευ only three times.'"—The connection of this phrase with ἀπηλλοτριωμένοι: "that at that time, being without Christ, ye were excluded from theocratic privileges" (DE WETTE, following the punctuation of LACHMANY, EADIE, though not decidedly in his second edition), is properly deemed harsh by ELLICOTT and ALFORD, though it ought not to be termed "clumsy beyond precedent" by the latter, since there are no clumsy tricks possible in interpretation that have not found a field for their exhibition in Biblical Exegesis (!)—R.]

clause, which is dependent on μνημονεύετε, "remember," as a subjective negative. WINER, p. 444. Accordingly this clause is not to be put in dependence upon the preceding "strangers," etc. (BENGEL: si promissionem habuissent, spem habuissent illi respondentem; HARLESS); the clause would thus also be loosened from its close connection with the following one: καὶ ἄθεοι ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ.

Without God.—ἄθεος is stronger than χωρὶς θεοῦ, corresponding to θεὸν οὐκ ἔχει (2 John 9; 1 John ii. 23), = "not having God." The essence of heathenism is Atheism (Rom. i. 21 ff.); the worship of devils and εἰδωλά (1 Cor. x. 20; xii. 2) does not take the place of God; "for polytheism is atheistic," and that philosophy is first correct, which throws this off in its thoughts respecting God. BENGEL: non statuerant, nullos esse deos (Acts xix. 35): sed verum Deum ignorabant; tantum aberat, ut haberent (1 Thess. iv. 5). He who is ἄθεος is, not merely as respects religion, but also as respects morality, God-less, and heathen immorality is different from Jewish immorality. Hence HARLESS should not wish to exclude this as if it were true enough but not pertinent here, where the distinction from the people of Israel is set forth, they being however included also under sin. MEYER, against the context, weakens the idea, by taking it as passive: God-forsaken. [Of the three senses of ἄθεος: active opposed to God), neuter (ignorant of God, without the subordinate notion of impiety, which BRAUNE prefers), and passive (forsaken of God, without God's help), the latter seems most prominent here, and is accepted by HODGE, EDIE, ELLICOTT, ALFORD, mainly on the ground that the whole passage is passive in its character. This is the gloomiest view, and hence the most probable one, though the others stand so close; related to it, that it is hardly correct to term this a weakening of the idea.—R.] The connection with the preceding clause is evident, God is the God of hope (Rom. xv. 13; 2 Thess. ii. 16). Comp. Doctr. Note, 2.

In the world ἐν τῷ κόσμῳ, sets forth the antithesis to "th commonwealth of Israel," denoting the "unodly where" (MEYER), and marking in any case the fearful element of ἄθεος, the place, where "sure hope, a firm hold" is so urgently needed (OLSHAUSEN), the place without the Creator n the service of nature and the creature, without a Redeemer in need and sin, without constation and salvation in vanity and nothingness. Hence it is not=inter ceteros homines, in his terri (KOPPE), in profane humanity, the heathen world (MEYER), or in the world created and ruled y God (GROTIUS, RUECKERT).

Finally it must e remarked in regard to the structure of this sentence, that the two pair of clauses which unfold the meaning of "without Christ," each contain two related connected thoughts, and the two in the first pair stand in such a relation to the two in the second pair, that the first corresponds to the fourth and the second to the third. [The various correspondences as well as the relation to the leading clause of the verse are aptly expressed by EDIE: "Being Christless, they are described in regular gradation as being churchless, hopeless, godless and homeless."—R.]

Ver. 13. Fundamental trait of their present condition.—But now, in Christ Jesus [νυνὶ δὲ ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ].—The thought of this verse is still in dependence on "remember" (ver. 11); the Apostle however breaks off into the independent, antithetical form. "But now" is in contrast with "once" (ver. 11), "at that time" (ver. 12), and as there the past was described by "without Christ," so here the present by "in Christ Jesus;" the latter form being fuller than the former, because the Promised One has come, the eternal Son of God has become man.* The Apostle does not refer to "the 'now' of the present 'simply,' but to the present in their fellowship with Christ" (HARLESS). Still we need not supply either ἐστε (BAUMGARTEN-CRUSIUS) or ὄντες (CALVIN), nor connect the phrase exclusively with "now" (HARLESS); both belong to ἐγενήθητε below, in fact to the whole sentence.

Ye who once were far off were brought nigh in the blood of Christ, ὅτι οἱ ποτὲ ὄντες μακρὰν ἐγενήθητε ἕγγυς ἐν τῷ αἵματι τοῦ Χριστοῦ.—The position of the words obliges us to regard ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ as rendered specially prominent, as a general definition of modality, and ἐν τῷ αἵματι τοῦ Χριστοῦ, "in the blood of Christ," as a special one, so that the latter is to be taken as a more precise explanation of the former; it is not then in apposition with it; both belong to the verbal notion "were brought nigh." Then again "ye" has now another qualification than before: "who were once far off," as corresponding to ver. 12 ("alienated"—"strangers"). Comp. i. 17; Acts iii. 39; xvii. 27 ("though He be not far from every one of us"); Mark xii. 34 ("Thou art not far from the kingdom of heaven"). These words have a reference figuratively to our relation to God; the heathen are thus spoken of in prophecy (Isa. xlix. 1; lx. 3, 4; lxvi. 19; lv. 5; lvii. 19) in their relation to both God Himself and His people. BUCER: qui hactenus non fuisti populus domini, jam esis populus domini. The distance and nearness include both the relation to God and that to His people; hence should not be referred either to the former alone (MATTHIES), or to the latter alone (RUECKERT, OLSHAUSEN, BLEEK). BENGEL: procul a populo Dei et a Deo. It is not sufficient to say: longe erat a cognitione Dei veri et a spe vite celestis (GROTIUS), still less: μακρὰν homines miserimi, ἕγγυς, felicissimi (KOPPE). The approach is something which develops (ἐγενήθητε), has a history; † the means rest in and proceed from what is expressed by: "in the blood of Christ." This is almost—"through his blood," διὰ τοῦ αἵματος αὐτοῦ (i. 7); the prepositions ἐν and διὰ are, however, both used in Col. i. 16: ἐν αὐτῷ—δι' αὐτοῦ. The latter denotes the cause, through which any thing takes place, comes into position or existence, the former the permanent ground,

* [The reference to the personal Messiah, to Jesus of Nazareth, who is the Christ, seems to be quite certain (comp. ELLICOTT and EDIE).—R.]

† [The verb is the aorist passive, expressing the effect of a definite event in the past, though the idea of becoming or being gradually brought is not to be forgotten. They were brought nigh, they became nigh through the instrumentality of another.—R.]

on which it has its continuance.* (WINER, p. 362. The word "Christ" here has special significance: it marks the Son of God beside the word "blood," which marks "the form of a servant.")

Closer explanation respecting the nature and genesis of their present condition. Vers. 14-18.

Ver. 14. For he is our peace [αὐτὸς γὰρ ἡ εἰρήνη ἡμῶν].—The position is emphatic, "He," not the unemphatic subject, but He Himself (WINER, p. 142). [He and none other; so most commentators.—R.] His Person is "our peace." The article marks the peace as well-known, more closely defined. BENDEL aptly says: pax, non modo PACIFICATOR; nam sui impensa pacem peperit et ipsi vinculum est UTROMQUE. The allusion to passages in prophecy (Mic. v. 4; Isa. ix. 5, 6; lili. 7; lili. 5; Zech. ix. 10, etc.; also Ps. lxxii.) is unmistakable. This is denied by BAUMGARTEN-CRUSIUS. The Messiah is indeed called ΠΡ, not merely Prince of Peace, εἰρηνοποιός. The genitive ἡμῶν, "our," merely denotes that the peace belongs to them, does not say whether the peace is among themselves or between them and God. This is determined by the context. On the nature of this peace, see Doctr. Note 3b.

Who made both one, ὁ ποιήσας τὰ ἀμφοτέρα ἓν.—He is therefore "the peace" through an act (ὁ ποιήσας with αὐτός, quippe qui fecit), which is set forth here only generally: made one, ἐν ποιεῖν. Here we find a closer definition of the idea "peace," not of "our," as the neuter requires. Τὰ ἀμφοτέρα, like τὰ μόρφα, ἀσθενή, κ. τ. λ., 1 Cor. i. 27 f., designates the general: what is of two kinds, "what opposes because sundered" (MATTHIES). The annulling of an existent variance is thereby noted as the nature of the peace. Hence we may not say that the neuter is=τοῦ ἀμφοτέρου (vers. 16, 18), τοῖς δύο (ver. 15), as KOPPE, MEYER and others think, nor does the neuter ἐν define the neuter τὰ ἀμφοτέρα (BENDEL). ["Both" is usually referred to "Jews and Gentiles." This is a legitimate inference, but BRAUNE holds that the statement here does not require any specific reference.—R.]

And broke down the middle wall of the partition [καὶ τὸ μεσότοιχον τοῦ φραγμοῦ λύσας].—The indefinite notion of "making one" is now more closely defined; καὶ adds in a figure the main point; hence it is not expegetical (MEYER). [The explanatory or expegetical force of καὶ is accepted by EADIE, ALFORD, ELLICOTT. It is correct, if the previous clause has a distinct reference to the Jews and Gentiles: who made both Jews and Gentiles one, viz., in that He broke down, etc. There seems to be nothing gained by adopting BRAUNE's view, while the other most obviously suggests itself.—R.]

* [The strictly instrumental sense does not belong to ἐν, even here, where it seems so natural. At all events the idea of immanent instrumentality is as much as can be conceded in that direction. ALFORD rightly prefers "in" as more comprehensive: "The symbol of a fact in which—the seal of a covenant in which—your nearness to God consists." HODGE accepts "by" as the proper rendering without question.—R.]

† [This particle introduces a confirmatory explanation of the preceding verse (so most commentators).—R.]

Τὸ μεσότοιχον τοῦ φραγμοῦ (like ἔρκος ὁδόντων)=the partition wall of the fence, that is, the partition wall which is in the fence, denoting in the figure of an independent object a quality and effect of the hedge. [So HARLESS]. The leading idea is found in the first noun, the wall set up between the two, the Gentiles without the promise and covenant of God, and the Jews, the people of promise, which contains in itself the notion of separation; the participle applies to it. Therefore τοῦ φραγμοῦ is not the genitive of apposition (MEYER) or to be resolved into τὸν φραγμὸν τὸ μεσότοιχον ὄντα (GUMM, Clavis, sub voce); in that case we would have found here τὸν φραγμὸν τοῦ μεσοταίχου. LUTHER too is incorrect: and has broken down the hedge, which was between. Nor is it=μεσότοιχον διαφράσσον (GROTIUS and others). Unserviceable here also is the distinction of BENDEL: paries disjungit domos, sepes regiones. From Matth. xxi. 33; Isa. v. 2, we are shown that φραγμός (in agreement with ver. 15) refers to the law, that is, to its quality or effect in separating the people of God, which permits it to be regarded as a partition wall. We may also refer it to the temple in which a type of the spiritual is presented, and to which the expressions here selected point; there was there a court of the Gentiles (Acts xxi. 28), though only in latter times, in the last temple; a veil, which separated like a wall, rent first at the death of the Redeemer. Hence the word λύσας is aptly chosen (John ii. 19; Matth. v. 17; Gal. ii. 18; 1 John iii. 8; 2 Pet. iii. 10).*—All reference to be separated residence of Jews in cities, as in Frankfurt, Rome and elsewhere (GRONOW and others) and the like is to be rejected.

Ver. 15. Having abolished (done away) in his flesh the enmity, even the law of the commandments expressed in ordinances [τὴν ἐχθραν, ἐν τῇ σαρκὶ αὐτοῦ, τὸν νόμον τῶν ἐντολῶν ἐν δόγματι καταργήσας. See Textual Note 4]. The Apostle now adds, without a connecting particle, the meaning of the figure: he construes it thus: τὴν ἐχθραν ἐν τῇ σαρκὶ αὐτοῦ καταργήσας, but during the dictation inserts after αὐτοῦ the phrase τὸν νόμον τῶν ἐντολῶν ἐν δόγματι, the banner of this unity; these two objects in the accusative representing two sides of one object, hence very well allowing the dependence on καταργήσας. Τοῦ μεσότοιχου corresponds τὴν ἐχθραν, denoting simply the literal reality, the division the hostile separation and antagonism of Jews and Gentiles, and, since there is nothing to indicate any limitation, but as the context rather points to enmity of man towards God which is active behind this hostility of the Jews and Gentiles, including this latter at the same time (ver. 16). [SALFORD and ELLI-

* [EADIE, ALFORD, ELLICOTT follow DE WETTE in taking τοῦ φραγμοῦ as the genitive of possession: the wall which pertained to, or belonged to, the fence. This view has the advantage of giving a wide reference to φραγμός. ALFORD finds a primary allusion to the ending of the wall of the temple, a view which is supported by the complex idea of peace running through our passage. He takes φραγμός of which μεσότοιχος is the instrument—the whole legal system, ceremonial and moral, which made the whole separation—of Jew from Gentile,—and the background of both from God. (So ELLICOTT).—R.]

COTT: "The enmity due not only to Judaical limitations and antagonisms, but also and, as the widening context shows, more especially to the alienation of both Jew and Gentile from God."—R.] BUCKER: Vera tamen inter Judæos et ethnicoſ inimicitia, i. e., diversitas erat, quod illi verum Deum colerent, hi minime. It is incorrect to refer it exclusively to the enmity against God (GREEK FATHERS, HARLESS and others) or to the enmity between the Jews and the Gentiles (AMBROSIAS-TER, ERASMUS, BLEEK [EADIE, HODGE] and others), or to understand only the cause of division that is the law (LUTHER, CALVIN and others). It is correct however to understand that the Apostle places by the side of the existing fact, τὴν ἐχθράν, the cause of the same, τὸν νόμον τῶν ἐντολῶν ἐν δόγμασι.

The law has its contents in "commandments." ἐντολαί, the injunctions to be regarded and executed, are both the purely moral and the ceremonial commandments of God (Matth. xv. 3; xxii. 36, 38; Rom. vii. 8-13), called also "of men" (Tit. i. 14); the plural marks plurality, and points also to divisions. This is rendered prominent by the phrase ἐν δόγμασιν, joined closely without the article to ἐντολῶν, and defining its quality. Similarly: πιστις ἐν τῷ κυρίῳ (i. 13), ἀγάπην ἐν πνεύματι (Col. i. 8), σοφία ἐν μυστηρίῳ (1 Cor. ii. 7). Comp. WINER, pp. 129, 206. Δόγμα, used of regal orders (Luke ii. 1; Acts xvii. 7), of apostolic determinations (Acts xvi. 4), means here as in Col. ii. 14 the statutes of the law; δογματίζεισθαι, in Col. ii. 20, is to be ordered or to order one's self. The idea of a mandate is always contained in it. ERASMUS: Ostendens legem imperiosam appellat illam τῶν ἐντολῶν (ἐντέλλουσαν)—quomodo? non persuasione et lenitate aut promissis, sed preceptis que vocat dogmata. Every ἐντολή appears then in a special, mandatory precept. [This view of the phrase is now the common one. ALFORD: "The law of decretory commandments." For the other interpretations, see HARLESS and EADIE in loco.—R.]

Of this there is predicated καταργήσας (ἀργόν=ἄργον ποιεῖν, Rom. iii. 31; 1 Cor. xiii. 11): to make unavailing, to do away, to deprive of power. The ideal worth remains intact, so also the theocratic obligation; but in so far as the law imperiously binds the heart and will with casuistic ordinances for all cases, it is done away. In this too lies the cause of the enmity against God and men. [EADIE takes "law," etc. to mean the ceremonial law. HODGE more correctly: "The idea probably is that the law in all its compass, and in all its forms, so far as it was a covenant prescribing the conditions of salvation, is abolished." He extends it to all the law of God, written in the heart as well, while admitting a special reference to the Mosaic law.—R.]

This doing away took place "in his flesh." As the decisive, main qualification it stands in an emphatic position. It means more than "in Himself," denoting the real "likeness" to our "flesh," in which He began His sanctifying, expiating sorrows, which slew what was opposed, which helped the right to full right, in active obedience to the law even to the acme, of the death on the cross, the passive obedience, thus, though without sin, bearing, feeling, overcoming the "enmity" with the "law," thus "by virtue of His fleshly life under the law, which He gave to death, in order to receive it back from death living, glorious, free in spirit for us all" (DE-LITZSCH), putting the law with its ordinances into inactivity, at the same time in His bodily life burying it. BENDEL construes incorrectly: Est quasi stilo lapidari scriptum: Christus carne sua inimicitiam, dogmatibus evangelicis in totum orbem deditis legem preceptorum sustulit; this is simply untrue historically, impossible logically, unnecessary grammatically, and too artificial. [It seems scarcely correct to render "by His flesh" (HODGE: "i. e., by His death"), since this leaves out of view the life of Christ as a satisfaction of the law. Besides ἐν rarely means simply by. ALFORD and ELLICOTT however thus limit it: "in His crucified flesh."—The question of connection is more disputed. The article would precede, if it should be joined to ἐχθράν. HARLESS, DE WETTE, MEYER, EADIE, HODGE agree with BRAUNE in joining it with καταργήσας, in emphatic position. To this ALFORD, who, with ELLICOTT and many of the earlier commentators, joins it with λείας, objects, because it makes the instrumental predication precede the verb. If ἐχθράν is governed by καταργήσας, the question is decided at once, while in any case this view seems preferable; the general sense remaining the same, although the allusion to the veil of the temple becomes more prominent, if ALFORD's view be accepted.—R.]

MEYER and others take τὴν ἐχθράν by itself as in apposition to μεσότητον, detaching it from what follows; in that case τὸν νόμον τῶν ἐντολῶν ἐν δόγμασιν would stand before ἐν τῇ σαρκὶ αὐτοῦ. [This is also the view of EADIE, HODGE, ALFORD, ELLICOTT. While it does not introduce any material difference into the interpretation of the passage, it modifies its form very considerably. And it seems the preferable view. The objection BRAUNE raises is met at once by saying that his own interpretation assumes an afterthought influencing the order (see beginning of this verse). The emphatic phrase: "in His flesh" thus takes an emphatic position, whatever be its connection. The emphasis is altogether lost in the E. V., as any reader may perceive. This view allows of a nicer discrimination between the accusatives, introduces a needed explanation of the figurative expression: "middle wall," while ἐχθράν is more usual after the verb λείν than after καταργεῖν. HODGE thus paraphrases: "He is our peace, because He has made the two one, by removing the enmity or middle wall which divided the Jews and Gentiles, and this was done by abolishing the law." This is correct, but omits the important description of the law and the emphatic: in His flesh." Comp. Textual Note 4.—R.]

STIER incorrectly joins ἐν δόγμασιν to νόμον; but then the article τὸν would necessarily have been prefixed (1 Thess. i. 8) or ἐντολῶν have preceded νόμον (Col. i. 8). Nor is "in his flesh" to be joined with "enmity" (CHRYSOSTOM), as though only a natural hatred among his people, among his kindred, were referred to. It is incorrect to understand νόμος τῶν ἐντολῶν as referring only to adiaphora (GRIOTIUS), to the ceremonial law (BENDEL) [EADIE], or to the moral law alone (CALOVIUS), or dóγματα as referring to philosophorum doctrinas (GROTIUS), since the readers are not homines triti in philosophorum Scriptis; quite as little can the doctrine of Christ be denoted thereby (BENGEL and others), or nova præcepta (FRITZSCHE). Finally καταργήσας does not point to the removal of the theocratic obligation (SCHENKEL).

That he might create the two in himself into one new man [ἵνα τοὺς δύο κτίσῃ ἐν ἑαυτῷ εἰς ἓνα καινὸν ἄνθρωπον].—Ἰνα introduces a final clause, giving here the purpose of καταργήσας, which defines ἕως more closely, and with this explains ποιήσας. He has done away the law in its commandments; destroyed the separating elements clinging to it, that He might κτίσῃ. Thus the ποιήσας is further defined as creating. The objects of this creation, τοὺς δύο, are the two great masses of people regarded as two individualities, as two, not a greater number of separate individuals beside each other, each of whom stands or falls for himself (OLSHAUSEN); still less is there involved a series of various specimens of the different races. The masculine denotes the persons, in distinction from the more general idea of the neuter (τὰ ἀμφοτέρα, ver. 14); the choice of words corresponds. That ἀνθρώπους is not inserted, is not to be explained by the wider scope, as BENGEL thinks: elegantior omittit homines, antea enim vix humanum nomen tuiti erant. Ἐν ἑαυτῷ places the Person of Christ again in the foreground: Ne alibi quam in Christo unitatem querant (CALVIN). [HODGE: "In virtue of union with Him,—union with Christ being the condition at once of their unity and of their holiness." In His Person, at all events.—R.] The ground of the existence and permanence is in Him; He is the Author (κτίσῃ) and foundation, and at the same time the life-sphere, Creator and Second Adam, Progenitor of the new race, which stands in original peace with God. It is therefore not =δι' ἑαυτοῦ (GREEK FATHERS), in order to exclude angels or other powers, as those through whom what is asserted was effected. But still less is it =per suam doctrinam (GROTIUS).

In this creation (κτίσῃ, vers. 1, 10) there is a purpose εἰς ἓνα καινὸν ἄνθρωπον. Ἐν ἑαυτῷ conditions ἄνθρωπος in the singular. Comp. Gal. iii. 28: πάντες γὰρ ὑμεῖς εἰς ἓσδ' ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ; John x. 16. By εἰς καινὸς ἄνθρωπος is indicated: ὁράς οὐχὶ τὸν Ἑλλήνα γινόμενον Ἰουδαίου, ἀλλὰ καὶ τοῦτον κακέϊνον εἰς ἐτέραν κατάστασιν ἥκοντα, οὐχ ἵνα τοῦτον ἑτερον ἐργάσθαι, τὸν νόμον κατήργησεν, ἀλλ' ἵνα τοὺς δύο κτίσῃ. It is very superficial and perverted to take "one new man" as a third, which is neither heathenism nor Judaism, without thinking of the moral renewal of persons (BAUMGARTEN-CRUSIUS). The preposition marks the purpose or tendency, and thus the creation as one not yet concluded; humanity, consisting of personally free individuals, is potentially renewed in Christ, but not yet actually.

[ALFORD: "Observe, not that He might reconcile the two to each other only, nor is the Apostle speaking merely of any such reconciliation: but that He might incorporate the two, reconciled in Him to God, into one new man,—the old man to which both belonged, the enemy of God, having been slain in His flesh on the cross. Observe, too, one new man: we are all in God's sight, but one in Christ, as we are but one in Adam."—R.]

Hence: So making peace, ποιῶν εἰρήνην.—The present participle stands first for emphasis, marking a continued activity of Christ. The act of union does not therefore coincide with the act of creation. Hence BUCER is incorrect: pace facta. Since εἰρήνη has no limitation joined with it, that peace (between Jews and Gentiles) which the context indicates as the most immediate reference, is to be meant, but that which is implied also in "new man" (toward God) is not to be excluded (SCHENKEL [EADIE, HODGE], and others). HARLESS should not term the note of CHRYSTOSTOM (πρὸς τὸν θεὸν καὶ πρὸς ἀλλήλους) correct only in the first half.

Ver. 16. And might reconcile them both [Καὶ ἀποκαταλλάξῃ τοὺς ἀμφοτέρους].—Καὶ connects this clause with ἵνα, on which the verb depends; so that this too belongs to the purpose of καταργήσας. The emphasis is on the verb which comes first. This compound occurs only here and in Col. i. 20, 21, and is a strengthened καταλλάσσειν, as ἀπεκδέχεσθαι and ἀποκαρδοκεῖν, not merely to expect, but to await, to expect with perseverance. The preposition ἀπό has the meaning "again" in composition (see Passow sub voce), but only when the notion of the verb itself includes this in some measure, as ἀποκαθίστημι of what is healed, restored (Matth. xii. 13; Mark iii. 5; viii. 25; Luke vi. 10; Acts i. 6); certainly the notion "again" is near at hand in that of reconciliation, because separation and enmity are not original, and the reconciliation leads away from the present status back to the original one. Hence the strengthened notion is "reconcile again." [So CALVIN, ALFORD, ELLICOTT; but EADIE and MEYER object.—R.] Qui ita deposuerunt inimicitiam, ut amicitia successerit, neque quidquam reliquum sit, quin concordēs vivant ἐν ἐνὶ σώματι, cuius est unum caput Christus (TITTMANN, Syn. I. p. 105).—The object of the reconciliation: τοῖς ἀμφοτέροις. [The article renders the object definite: them both or both of us.—R.] Since Paul does not say δύο, which is a mere numeral, but ἀμφοτέροις, which denotes diversity, he renders prominent the difficulty and importance of the reconciliation.

In one body to God through the cross [ἐν ἐνὶ σώματι τῷ θεῷ διὰ τοῦ σταυροῦ].—"In one body" denotes the sphere in which the reconciliation is consummated: over against "both" there is now only "one body," in which they are; each does not need a separate one. To supply "being," ὄντας, in thought is the simplest interpretation. The phrase refers, like ἐν αὐτῷ, ἐν τῇ σαρκὶ αὐτοῦ, αὐτὸς γάρ (ver. 14), to His Person, as the only one in which both are redeemed, to an organism (σῶμα, not σάρξ) in its outward appearance, thus to the body of Christ, the Church. [So HODGE, ALFORD, ELLICOTT.] It is not, sicut Latinis collegia vocantur corpora, corporation=Society (GROTIUS).

The end of the reconciliation is τῷ θεῷ. It is not God that is reconciled with men,* but men with God. What has all along been implied, conceived of in general, left indefinite in the words "peace" (vers. 14, 15), "the enmity" (ver. 15), "new man" (ver. 15), is now definitely expressed as the other side. The added qualification of the reconciliation: "through the [or His] cross" refers to the death on the cross, in which the ἱλασμός, the atonement, is marked as the act, which is the condition of the at-onement. Comp. Doctr. Note 3.

Hence it is not justifiable to take ἐν ἐνὶ σώματι as=εἰς ἐν σῶμα (DELITZSCH), or to refer it to the body of Christ on the cross (CHRYSTOSTOM, BENIGL: cruci affixo, HARLESS, HOFMANN and others), since then διὰ τοῦ σταυροῦ would be altogether unnecessary or should be joined with the following ἀποκτείνας (HOFMANN, Schriftbeweis, II. 1, p. 381): nor is the thought to be completed thus: Christ has reconciled in one single body, or made one single body (His own) to a unity, including them in the same fellowship with God; there is no reference to the antithesis of many sacrifices before and outside of Christ. GROTIUS interprets διὰ τοῦ σταυροῦ incorrectly: Simul intelligit doctrinam cruce sanctam; sed crucem dicere maluit, ut intelligamus, quanto res ista Christo steterit; STIER too misinterprets: the power and fear of the cross which is to be preached. Nor can we accept a reconciliation of "both" with each other, taking "to God" as dative commodi: ut Deo serviant (GROTIUS).

Having slain the enmity on it (ἀποκτείνας τὴν ἐχθρὰν ἐν αὐτῷ).—The aorist participle defines the mode of consummating the reconciliation, explaining τοῦ σταυροῦ, on which account ἐν αὐτῷ can refer only to this: the Crucified One, who was slain, the Dying One, slays and has slain "the enmity," which includes here as in ver. 15 both the enmity between "both" and against God, the latter being more prominent here, the former in ver. 15. On the cross the chief matter was, that He who had been rejected by both Jews and Gentiles should through a propitiation in Himself reconcile both to God. It is incorrect to exclude from τὴν ἐχθρὰν enmity toward God (SCHENKEL, MEYER) or of the Jews and Gentiles against each other (RUECKERT, HARLESS, HOFMANN), for the peace of these with each other does not condition their peace with God, indeed enmity against God participates in the hate these have toward each other, which the law occasions and furthers. [ALFORD and EL-

LICOTT adopt this wide or complex reference. HODGE however says: "The enmity is that which subsisted between God and man." Many doubt the propriety of predicating ἐχθρὰν of God, who certainly has ὀργήν. Comp. Romans, p. 165. In the passage there commented on, the active sense of the adjective must be accepted, I think, but that does not seem so bold and harsh as to say that ἐχθρὰν is "God's enmity." The wider reference is better sustained by the context, and of itself tones down the objectionable form without at all interfering with the implied truth respecting God's anger against sin and the satisfaction rendered on the cross.—The view of MEYER is accepted by EADIE, though there seems to be a confusion in his language. But this limited meaning does not "at all satisfy the solemnity of the sentence, or of the next two verses." Enmity here is "that between man and God, which Christ did slay on the cross, and which being brought to an end, the separation between Jew and Gentile, which was the result of it, was done away" (ALFORD). The fact that our participle is aorist, and in all probability denotes an antecedent act, is no objection to this view, as EADIE seems to think, since what Christ did on the cross (here spoken of) necessarily precedes what He designs doing through His cross ("reconcile them both in one body to God"), and the enmity of man against God was as fully and effectually destroyed in that act as that between Jew and Gentile. MEYER'S position takes this distinction of enmity as the basis of the "one body," in which both are reconciled to God, but this seems to condition the latter on the former.—R.] It is a perversion to understand τὴν ἐχθρὰν as the law (KOPPE and others). Comp. on ver. 14. 'Εν αὐτῷ cannot be referred to ἐν ἐνὶ σώματι (BENIGL, HOFMANN).

Ver. 17. And he came and preached peace (καὶ ἐλθὼν εὐηγγελίσατο εἰρήνην).—Since the verb is not dependent upon ἡ, but independent, it cannot be joined with ver. 16. Καὶ connects rather with ver. 14: He Himself is our Peace and announces that Himself (HARLESS). What intervenes explains the former statement, by showing its meaning and truth in His doings even unto death: He has established peace, therefore He is our Peace. This is to be regarded as pre-supposed in ἐλθὼν. Accordingly His coming is after His resurrection. BENIGL is excellent: Veniens a morte, profectione ad inferos, resurrectione, victor lætus ipse ultro nuntiavit. To this the verb εὐηγγελίσατο, "preached," refers, which is not a predicting of the future, but a message from one who is present, who has come. 'Ελθὼν is added descriptively, and is in accordance with the promise (John xiv. 18): "I come to you," denoting there His continued presence, insigne verbum (BENIGL). CHRYSTOSTOM well says: οὐ δὲ ἕτερον ἐπεμψεν, οὐδὲ δὲ ἄλλου τι νῦν ταῦτα ἐμήνησεν, ἀλλ' αὐτὸς δὲ ἑαυτοῦ. The Risen One is Himself an actual announcement of the attained victory and peace; He is present in the coming of the Holy Ghost, and also with His messengers and their gospel. So in 2 Tim. i. 10, where the ἐπιφάνεια of the Risen One and His gospel are spoken of.

Thus the proffering and appropriating of the

* [Inasmuch as "the cross" is here spoken of, we must admit a secondary reference to the propitiatory sacrifice of Christ as the condition or ground of the reconciliation. If then we ask respecting the nexus between this ground and the result, there must enter a thought of God's wrath (ver. 3) against sin. One thing remains clear—whatever was objectively necessary that men might be at peace with God and with each other was effected by the death of Christ, and what is necessary in the subject is, to take hold of Christ by faith, as to be "in Him" (ver. 15) a member of the "one body" (ver. 16).—R.]

established peace is emphasized, and "preaching peace" is distinguished from "being peace." Evidently we should understand both peace with one another and with God. Accordingly it is incorrect to regard ἐλθών as redundant (GROTIUS and others), or to refer it to the Incarnation (CHRYSOSTOM, ANSELM, HARLESS); the expression can by no means be referred merely to the resurrection and the salutation of peace (BENGEL), or to the coming in the Holy Spirit (OLSHAUSEN, SCHENKEL), or in the Apostles (AMBROSE, CALVIN and others); nor can it be caused to be proclaimed (GROTIUS), since ἐλθών is found here and is not redundant. "Peace" should not be limited to the relation to God (CHRYSOSTOM, HARLESS [HODGE]) or of the Jews and Gentiles toward each other (BLEEK, MEYER). [The repetition and emphasis are against this.] As regards the matters here treated of, we should not compare here John x. 16; xii. 20-23; Matth. 11; xxiv. 14, as though this were that which He "came and preached." We should rather be reminded of the renewal of the Apostles, the conversion of Paul, and of Rom. viii. 9, 10; 14-17; xv. 18; 2 Cor. xiii. 3, 5; Gal. ii. 20; Eph. i. 13. [So EADIE, ALFORD, ELLICOTT and HODGE, except as regards the comprehensive sense of "peace".]—R.] The tense of the verb ἐψηγγέλισατο defines the point of time of the conversion of individuals; then Christ brought it to them.

To you who were afar off and peace to those who were nigh, ἐμὴν τοῖς μακρὰν καὶ εἰρήνην τοῖς ἐγγύς.—This is to be taken in accordance with ver. 13. The readers as originally Gentiles are those "afar off," and on this account they come first, as indeed historically were converted to the Church, the Jews, "those nigh," falling into the background. The repetition of εἰρήνην before this last term marks their need of this, notwithstanding their nearness; ἐμὴν however comprises both, since both (Jews and Gentiles) were in the Church, though the latter constituted the main element.* Comp. Acts xvi. 23. The double εἰρήνην is derived from Isa. lvii. 19. There שָׁלוֹם שָׁלוֹם refers not inaptly but emphatically, like the double vai vai, οὐδὲν (Matth. v. 37; Jas. v. 12), to Gentiles and Jews, and hence the repetition. The dative depends on the verb, not on εἰρήνην as dative commodi; the interpretation of HARLESS compelling him to accept this view of it: the purport of His message was a peace which respected all, Jews as well as Gentiles. [So HODGE, but the other is far simpler, and accepted by MEYER, EADIE, ALFORD, and most.—R.]

Ver. 18. For through him [ὅτι δι' αὐτοῦ].—"Οτι is here evidently—quia; it is pro-

* [This seems doubtful in view of the repeated εἰρήνην, which interposes between ἐμὴν and τοῖς ἐγγύς. ALFORD is better: "Not 'to us' (i. e., in the second category), for fear of still upholding the distinction where he wishes to merge it altogether."—"Though those 'who were nigh' were the first who heard the proclamation based on the commission—"beginning at Jerusalem," yet those 'who were afar off' are mentioned first, as they had so deep an interest in the tidings, and as the invitation of Gentiles into the Church—a theme the Apostle delighted in, proving, as it did, the abolition of class privileges, and the commencement of an unrestricted economy—was the result and proof of the truths illustrated in this paragraph."—R.]

batio ab effectu (CALVIN).* The purport of the ἐψηγγέλισατο cannot be thus introduced (KOPPE); this is set forth in "peace," and it cannot be preached, that (ὅτι) we have, but only: because we have, or: that we may have. The nature of the "peace" is not to be explained by this clause (RUECKERT); this has been already defined. The truth of the assertion: "came and preached" is shown in a reality (ἐχομεν), the reality of the result of this preaching (τὴν προσαγωγήν); because the preaching of Christ is spoken of, δι' αὐτοῦ stands first. Were the proclamation the main matter, then ἐχομεν would have taken the first place. "Through Him" denotes the mediation by means of the entire Divine-human Person; it is not—"through his blood" (OLSHAUSEN). [HODGE suggests this, but not to the exclusion of other thoughts.—R.]

We both have our access in one Spirit unto the Father [ἐχομεν τὴν προσαγωγήν οἱ ἀμφοτέροι ἐν ἐνὶ πνεύματι πρὸς τὸν πτέρα].—Προσαγωγή here, iii. 12 and Rom. v. 2 (εἰς χάριν) is the presupposition to the entrance into the holiest (Heb. x. 19) and "into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord" (2 Pet. i. 11) and the occasion of the drawing near (Heb. x. 22); it is not merely the right and permission to do so, but a fact in which we rejoice as a reality (1 Pet. iii. 18) that has become ours (ἐχομεν); the drawing near should not be wanting; ἐσχήκαμεν (Rom. v. 2) gives prominence to the appropriation as a continuing fact, ἐχομεν denotes only the present possession, the acceptance which has taken place. The underlying figure is according to Heb. x. 19-22 the entrance into the most holy place. In προσαγωγή STIER finds indicated a free approach and an ever closer approach. [The active, transitive sense: admission, introduction, is preferred by ELLICOTT, EADIE, and HODGE apparently, following THOLUCK (Romans v. 2), while ALFORD prefers the intransitive sense, access, which does not differ greatly from the other, certainly does mean merely liberty of approach, and leave the actual enjoyment of the privilege out of view. "Introduction" certainly does not bring out the idea of "repetition, present liberty of approach," as "access" does.—MEYER and EADIE remark that it means more than "door." John x. 9. Comp. Romans, pp. 160, 161.—R.] We need not with CHRYSOSTOM (οὐκ εἶπεν πρόσθεν οὐ γὰρ ἀφ' ἑαυτοῦ προσήλθμεν, ἀλλ' ὑπ' αὐτοῦ προσήλθμεν) and MEYER think of a προσαγωγήν to the king. [This thought need not be peremptorily rejected, however, though the other is on the whole preferable (ELLICOTT, EADIE, ALFORD).—R.] The notion of "leading into" [MEYER] does not suit the other passages, iii. 12; Rom. v. 2.

The words: οἱ ἀμφοτέροι ἐν ἐνὶ πνεύματι placed in juxtaposition, mark strongly the removed division, the unity, that too in the follow-

* [ELLICOTT says correctly that the particle is not merely explanatory, nor yet strongly causal, "because we have," but with more of a demonstrative or confirmatory force, "as it is a fact that we have."—ALFORD finds in this verse a proof of the wide reference of the words "peace" and "reconcile" in the previous verses. "Here clearly the union (or reconciliation, nor is enmity predicted of them) of Jew and Gentile is subordinated to the blessed fact of an access to God having been provided for both through Christ by the Spirit."—R.]

ship of the Holy Spirit. They are not merely within the body of Christ, members of the Church, but are animated and impelled by the Spirit ruling there, which He has sent. "In one Spirit" refers to "in one body;" the two expressions being parallel. It is certainly not = unanimis voluntate, ὁμοθυμαδόν (ANSELM). [The reference to the Holy Spirit scarcely admits of a reasonable doubt. But the preposition is not instrumental. To take as such destroys the parallelism with "in one body," and confuses the relations of this clause. It is greatly to be regretted that this verse, so explicit and discriminating in its designations of the work of the Trinity in our salvation, should be thus confused. Dr. HODGE, whose notes on this verse are otherwise so excellent, does not bring out fully the correct interpretation of this preposition. "The Holy Spirit is, as it were, the vital sphere or element in which both parties have their common πρωταγωγὴ to the Father" (ELLCOTT).—R.] "Unto the Father," ad Patrem ut ad Patrem. Hoc versu fit mentio Christi, Spiritus, Patris, eodem ordine, quo ver. 12, 1 Cor. i. 3, 5; aliter Acts i. 4, 5 (BENGEL). The choice of prepositions is remarkably apt: πρὸς τὸν πατέρα διὰ Χριστοῦ ἐν πνεύματι, Unto the Father through Christ in the Spirit.

Sketch of their present condition. Vers. 19-22.

Ver. 19. So then ye are no longer (ἄρα οὖν οὐκέτι ἐστέ).—Ἄρα οὖν is very often used by Paul (Rom. v. 18; vii. 3; viii. 12, etc. WINER, pp. 414, 519); it is = hinc ergo [accordingly then, comp. on Gal. vi. 10.—R.]; ἄρα draws a conclusion from vers. 14-18; οὖν continues the discourse. Οὐκέτι, "no longer," is placed immediately after ἄρα οὖν, for the sake of emphasis.

Strangers and sojourners, ξένοι καὶ πάροικοι.—LUTHER's rendering: Gäste und Freuudlinge, unnecessarily transposes the words. The expression proceeds from the more remote, ξένοι, to the less remote, πάροικοι. The former is the antithesis of ἐπιχώριος, and thus of the following συνπολιταί. So "brethren" are termed (3 John 5*) "strangers;" it is = רֵעִים. The latter word, πάροικοι = פָּרוֹכִים, which is often joined with the former (Lev. xxv. 35, 40). Lev. xxii. 10, 11, where the LXX oppose πάροικος ἱερέως and οἰκονομείας αὐτοῦ, forbidding the former and permitting the latter to eat of the holy things, seems to have been in the Apostle's mind. Πάροικοι is then here the opposite of οἰκεῖοι, and means inquilini (from incolo, incolinus), qui domicilium in aliquo loco habent sine iure civitatis, hospites in urbe aliqua (GROTIUS). The frequent figurative descriptions of the kingdom of God as the city or house of God (1 Tim. iii. 15: Gal. iv. 26 and Heb. iii. 6; xii. 22) here evidently pass over into each other (συνπολιταί—οἰκεῖοι); there is not however a union or a mixing of these figures, but the πολιτεία is regarded as a more extended household. It inheres in the matter itself, that the citizens of the kingdom of God, have now filial and household privileges with Him, His whole people become themselves the holy house, the temple in which His Spirit dwells (HARLESS, STIER). The figure of the house and building predominates (vers. 20-22). We should not think of proselytes (STIER), nor take ξένοι καὶ πάροικοι as the antithesis to συνπολιταί τῶν ἁγίων, which is enhanced in meaning by οἰκεῖοι τοῦ θεοῦ (MEYER). [The plausible parallelism of HARLESS and BENGEL, adopted by Braune, is doubted by ALFORD and ELLICOTT, but accepted by EADIE.—R.]

But ye are.—The repetition of ἐστέ, in accordance with the best authorities (see Textual Note 9), is emphatic, like Rom. viii. 15; 1 Cor. ii. 6, 7; Heb. xii. 18, 22.

Fellow-citizens with the saints [συνπολιταὶ τῶν ἁγίων*].—Among "the saints" we can include only those who have been thus termed from the beginning of the Epistle, Christians. BENGEL (Israelis cfr. iii. 18), STIER, BLEEK, and others, have taken occasion from ver. 12 to refer it to the spiritual Israel; but this word being without closer qualification scarcely admits of this. RUECKERT understands the Jewish Christians alone under the term. Still less are we to think of the patriarchs (CHRYSOSTOM), or the angels (CALVIN, and others), or to include them here. Still the notion should be extended as it has been by ZANCHIUS: omnium vere sanctorum, qui unquam fuerunt future sunt. [So EADIE. ALFORD: "Not angels, nor Jews, nor Christians then alive merely, but the saints of God in the widest sense, all the members of the mystical body of Christ, the commonwealth of the spiritual Israel." ELLICOTT: "The members of that spiritual community in which Jew and Gentile Christians were now united and incorporated, and to which the external theocracy formed a typical and preparatory institution." This view, which is that of MEYER, HODGE and many others, is preferable, notwithstanding the objection of Braune, since ver. 13 could not fail to remain in the Apostle's mind.—R.]

And of the household of God, οἰκεῖοι τοῦ θεοῦ.—This means those who belong to the house, to the family, whose Head and Father is God. To the right of citizen is added that of the house, of the child, of the heir, ye are not merely menials, servants, but members of the family, children. They have a relation of fellowship not merely to "the saints," but to "God" also. Οἰκεῖος by itself would mean only domesticus, one who dwelt in the same house, as 1 Tim. v. 8, and as οἰκαλός, Matt. x. 36, so that it would remain undecided in what precise relation he stood. The genitive τοῦ θεοῦ, "of God," in accordance with συνπολιταί τῶν ἁγίων, obliges us to apply it to the most intimate relation, that of a child. It is incorrect to understand, according to Gal. vi. 10: οἰκεῖος τῆς πίστεως, religionis socii (WINER, who compares οἰκεῖοι φιλοσοφίας, philosophiæ addicti), here familiares, intimate friends (THEODORET: προσοικειωθέντες, relatives); quite as little should we take the family here as the stones of the house in which God dwells (HARLESS), even though the next verse passes to that figure.

Ver. 20. Built up upon the foundation, ἐποικοδομηθέντες ἐπὶ τῷ θεμελίῳ.—The participle characterizes the οἰκεῖοι as members, who are themselves first wrought, and inserted in the whole as “living stones” (1 Pet. ii. 5), and that too upon the foundation which is laid. Vulgate and BENGL: superedificate. [We have the noun super-structure, but not a corresponding verb. The phrase “built up” is the nearest equivalent. “Having been built up” has perhaps too strict a reference to the past act.—R.] The aorist denotes the act of being built upon, and the context refers only to what has already been attained, not to the further building, which is emphasized in 1 Cor. iii. 10, but first mentioned here in ver. 22. Hence we have here ἐπὶ τῷ θεμελίῳ, not: ἐπὶ τὸν θεμελίον (Rom. xv. 20), nor yet: ἐπὶ τοῦ θεμελίου (= from the foundation, over the foundation; see WINE, p. 350), which would point to the further building. The dative here is not then “accidental” (MEYER). [ELLICOTT remarks on the assertion of Meyer, that the dative of rest, instead of the genitive of rest, is accidental: “the former denotes absolute and less separable, the latter partial and more separable superposition.” The apparent exception (i. 10: ἐπὶ τοῖς οὐρανοῖς) is a reading of doubtful authority.—R.]

There is here no leap from one figure (that of the family) to another (that of a building); it is only on the other side of the same figure, which has in the temple its deeper or higher unity. Comp. Numb. xii. 7; Heb. iii. 2-6; 1 Tim. iii. 15; 2 Tim. ii. 19-21; 1 Cor. iii. 9, 10; Col. ii. 7; Jude 20; Acts xx. 32. [If there be a transition it is quite easy and natural, “the employment of a term in a double meaning. ‘House’ has a similar twofold signification with us, as the ‘house of Bourbon,’ or ‘house of Stuart,’—phrases in which the word is employed in a secondary and emphatic signification. We speak too of such houses being ‘built up’ by the wisdom or valor of their founders. In such cases, as Alford says, there is a transition from a political and social to a material image” (EADIE).—R.] Whether θεμελίος is masculine, as in 1 Cor. iii. 10, 11, 12; 2 Tim. ii. 19; Heb. xi. 10; Acts xxi. 14, 19, or neuter, as in Acts xvi. 26, can be determined as little from the text as Rom. xv. 20; 1 Tim. vi. 19; nor can it be decided on the ground that the neuter is used only metaphorically, which would be inadmissible here (HARLESS), but rather from the fact that the masculine seems to be the prevalent usage with Paul.

Of the apostles and prophets, τῶν ἀποστόλων καὶ προφητῶν.—These genitives set forth who has laid the foundation; 1 Cor. iii. 10: θεμελίον ἐθηκα; Rom. xv. 20: ἐπ’ ἀλλότριον θεμελίον οἰκοδομῶ. For: testimonium apostolorum et prophetarum substructum est fidei credentium omnium; per illos jactum est fundamentum (BENGL). Comp. iii. 5, 6, 7. It is not then a genitive of apposition, which would designate the Apostles and Prophets as the foundation (CHRYSTOSTOM, A-LAPIDE, ESTIUS, [BAUMGARTEN-CRUSIUS, OLSHAUSEN, DE WETTE, HODGE], and others), for Christ is not primus inter pares (1 Cor. i. 12, 13; iii. 11) and Rev. xxi. 14 is a vision, in which the name of Christ is not mentioned, and the names of the Apostles are only inscribed on the foundations. Nor is it a possessive genitive (ANSELM, BEZA, [BUCER, COCCIEIUS, ALFORD], and others), for Christ can at least not be the foundation, where He is represented as the corner-stone.

[This view may be now considered the usual one. It is adopted by BULLINGER, CALVIN, CALIXTUS, GROTIUS, BENGE, KOPPE, FLATT, RUECKERT, HARLESS, HOLZHAUSEN, BLEEK, MEYER, EADIE, ELLICOTT, SCHENKEL. This takes the genitive as that of “originating cause.” The only possible objection to it is that urged by ALFORD against the introduction of those who form parts of the building as agents; but on this very foundation they rested even if they laid it. To take the genitive as appositional is grammatical enough, and does not necessarily involve doctrinal difficulties, while it avoids confusing the foundation and the corner-stone, as the possessive sense does; but the whole analogy of Scripture figures seems to be against it. The simplest, least embarrassed view is then: “The doctrine of the Apostles, i. e. Christ preached, is the θεμελίος; Christ personal the ἀκρογωνιαίος; Christ mystical the πλῆρωμα” (ELLICOTT). This view elevates evangelical preaching, while it sends us back of councils and creeds to Christ for our doctrine.—R.]

The context, which admits only of the preaching of the Christ already come, the order of the words and the omission of the article before προφητῶν, thus denoting a single category, compel us to think chiefly of the Apostles alone (HARLESS, STIER, HOFMANN, II. 2, p. 103),—who are prophets also (iii. 11): the first term referring more to their personal testimony respecting what they have seen and heard, the latter more to the testimony communicated through the Spirit,—and not to the Old Testament prophets (GREEK FATHERS, JEROME, ERASMUS, CALVIN, CALOVIUS, RUECKERT, [BARNES], and others), or to the New Testament prophets, subordinate to the Apostles (PELAGIUS, BENGE: qui apostolis sunt proximi, KOPPE, MEYER, SCHENKEL, BLEEK). [The reasons for a reference to New Testament prophets seem far more decisive than those which support the identity of Apostles and prophets in this passage. The absence of the article is not conclusive. So EADIE, HODGE, ALFORD, ELLICOTT. The reference to the Old Testament prophets is untenable; comp. EADIE and ALFORD in loco.—R.] Of Montanism with its continuation of the Apostolate by means of prophets, ZELLER and his teacher BAUR alone can think. On the significance of the view here set forth, see Doctr. Note 6.

Christ Jesus himself being the chief corner-stone [ὁντος ἀκρογωνιαίου αὐτοῦ Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ. See Textual Note 10].—Participium ὄντος initio commatis hujus, valde demonstrat in presenti tempore (BENGE), and marks the being so. Ἀκρογωνιαίου, to which some codices add λίθον, occurs only here and 1 Pet.

ii. 6: λίθον ἀκρογωνιαίον, from Isa. xxviii. 16; comp. Matt. xxi. 42: λίθος—ἐγενήθη εἰς κεφαλὴν γωνίας. Lapis angularis, ut duos parietes ipse medius contineret (JEROME) καὶ τοὺς τοίχους συνέχει καὶ τοὺς θεμελίους (CHRYSTOSTOM), is the stone, which upholds the connection of the single ones with the whole, gives support to the whole edifice, is the most important stone, designating here the importance and indispensableness of Christ above the Apostles, just as in 1 Cor. iii. 11 Christ is termed the foundation, and the Apostles those who have in preaching laid this foundation and built others upon it. The foundation on which the Ephesians have been built is the preaching of the Apostles, but Christ is the corner-stone, who gives support to the whole and to the parts, Christ Himself, the living historical Christ. It must not be supposed that the Apostles personally are a foundation; they themselves need the corner-stone and are also built upon it. The various readings (see Textual Note ¹⁰) do not alter the sense, only αὐτοῦ marks somewhat more strongly the Person of Christ, and τοῦ in N., or Ἰησοῦ in the others the historical Christ. Αὐτοῦ is not to be referred to θεμελίω (BENGEL and others). The article is naturally wanting after αὐτοῦ, since no reference to what precedes is intended; the “corner-stone” is not for the “foundation;” that would be the support of the foundation; the support of the edifice is spoken of. A reference to the union of Jewish and Gentile Christians (THEOPHORET, ESTIUS and others) is too remote according to the context, ver. 19: “ye no longer are.”

Ver. 21. In whom, ἐν ᾧ.—This is to be referred then to the Person of Christ, not to “corner-stone” (ESTIUS, KOPPE and others), or “foundation” (HOLZHAUSEN), ἐφ’ ᾧ or ἐφ’ οὗ the building might be raised. It is not then: above which (BEZA: Super), nor: on which (LUTHER), nor yet: through whom (FLATT: per), but like i. 10: ἐν τῷ Χριστῷ, who is the point of union and support of the framing together and growing, without which the building falls, dissolves, and does not grow (RUECKERT, HARLESS, STIER), [ALFORD, HODGE, EADIE and most.—R.]

All the building, πᾶσα οἰκοδομή.—Although πᾶσα ἡ οἰκοδομή is the least sustained reading, and the article should be rejected, and the use of πᾶς with and without the article according to Rom. iii. 9 (πᾶν σῶμα—πᾶς ὁ κόσμος) is such that the former would mean; the whole building and the latter: every building, yet here we must in accordance with the context interpret: the whole building, as πᾶς οἶκος Ἰσραὴλ (Acts ii. 36), which however can be regarded as a proper name not requiring the article see WINER, p. 106. (EKUMENIUS reads πᾶσα οἰκοδομή and explains: ἡ καθόλου ἐκκλησία. IGNAZIUS uses πᾶσα ἐπιστολή, πᾶσα ἐκκλησία in the sense of the whole letter, the whole church. The later Greek usage justifies this explanation and the omission of the article.

[Those commentators who are unwilling to accept the poorly supported reading of the Rec., as a rule take refuge from the incongruous interpretation; every building, which usage favors, in some such explanation as BRAUNE gives. MEYER, whose grammatical accuracy rarely leads him astray, in this case insists on a strict interpretation. ALFORD: “Are we then to render ungrammatically, and force words to that which they cannot mean? Certainly not.”—“the account to be given of such later usages is, that gradually other words besides proper names became regarded as able to dispense with the article after πᾶς, so that as they said first πᾶσα Ἱεροσόλυμα (Matth. ii. 23), and then πᾶς οἶκος Ἰσραὴλ (Acts ii. 36), so they came at length to say πᾶσα κτίσις (as we ourselves, ‘all creation’ for ‘all the creation’) and πᾶσα οἰκοδομή, when speaking of one universal and notorious building.” ELLICOTT accepts this view, but doubts the existence of another distinct instance in the New Testament. EADIE thinks the passages cited above and Luke iv. 13; Acts vii. 22; Col. i. 15, at least show a transition to a larger usage. MEYER’s grammatical haste leads him into an unwarranted exegesis, for what warrant is there for calling separate congregations οἰκοδομή.—R.]

Οἰκοδομή is like 1 Cor. iii. 9, building, the edifice in the process of erection, which grows into a temple, especially as ver. 22: συνοικοδομήσατε εἰς κατοικητήριον, marks decidedly the process, requiring the substantive idea of this verse to be that of a building going up. [Hence our word is chosen, not οἶκος.—R.] Our verse then contains an entirely general thought, which ver. 22 applies to the Ephesian church, in the figure of a temple, of the Church as one whole on one foundation; the view that every Christian is a temple of the Holy Ghost (2 Cor. vi. 16), and every congregation also such an one, being quite remote. Hence it does not mean: every building (MEYER), nor “every part of the building,” walls, roof, etc. (CHRYSTOSTOM), since it is not these parts, but the building as a whole that grows into a temple. [Comp. however EADIE in loco.—R.]

Fitly framed together is growing [συναρμολογουμένην αὐξεῖ].—The present αὐξεῖ, instead of αἰζάνεται, like αἰξή (Col. ii. 19), is rare but classical, denoting together with the present participle the process, which the Apostle considers merely as a spectator; the participle sets forth the form of the growth. Συναρμολογεῖν from ἄρμος, groove, joint, member (armus, artus), as Heb. iv. 12, occurs only here and in iv. 16, and according to this and the parallel passage Col. ii. 19 is = framed together, incorporated together. The figure is derived from the organism of the body.—Αἰζάνειν (sometimes transitive = augere, as in 1 Cor. iii. 6, 7; 2 Cor. ix. 10, but usually intransitive) is used most exactly of plants (Matth. vi. 28; xiii. 32), but of men also (Luke i. 80; ii. 40; 1 Pet. ii. 2), of a nation (Acts vii. 17), of the word of God (Acts vi. 7; xix. 20), of faith (2 Cor. x. 15), of growth in grace (2 Pet. iii. 18; comp. Col. i. 10); John the Baptist uses it in a purely external sense of Christ (Jno. iii. 30: δεῖ αἰζάνειν). The growth is not then merely an outward extension, but respects the number of the called and their progress toward perfection (NITZSCH). Hence GROTIUS is incorrect: quorum jam mania surgunt; the citizens themselves are largely involved. BENGEL: crescit coagmentata, Vulgate: constructa, but these renderings are insufficient.

[ALFORD: “Both participle and verb imply that the fitting together and the growing are still going on: and the only way which we in English have to mark this so as to avoid the chance of mistake, is by the auxiliary verb substantive, and the participle. The bare present, 'growth,' is in danger of being mistaken for the abstract quality, and the temporal development is thus lost sight of: whereas the other, in giving prominence to that temporal development, also necessarily implies the 'normal, perpetual unconditioned nature of the organic increase' (ELLCOTT).—R.]

Unto a holy temple, εἰς ναὸν ἁγίον.—The goal of the growth is set forth in the figure of the temple in Zion. It is mere playing with the text to refer it to the temple of Diana, which cedere debet (BENGEL) to this. [MEYER remarks: "This is not to be translated: unto a holy temple; for the notion of several temples was foreign to the Apostle in consequence of the Jewish national peculiarity, but: unto the holy temple, which does not require the article." This accords with the extensive reference advocated above.—R.]

In the Lord, ἐν κυρίῳ.—This phrase is to be joined with "holy," characterizing the sacredness of their temple as inward, vital, proceeding from, effected and nourished by Him.—[So HARLESS, USTERI, DE WETTE, HOFMANN, BLEEK.—R.] Unquestionably Christ is meant, as the Apostolic usus loquendi (WINER, p. 118) and the context which refers back to ἐν ᾧ, demand; He is the Mediator, in whom the members become οἰκτιροί τοῦ Θεοῦ. Hence ἐν κυρίῳ is not to be taken as the simple dative (BEZA, KOPPE [MACKNIGHT] and others), or joined with ναὸν = κυρίον, i. e., Dei (BENGEL). Others rightly refer it to Christ, but incorrectly join it with ναὸν ἁγίον as one notion (STIER), or with αἰζει (MEYER), in spite of ἐν ᾧ. [The construction last named is rendered still more objectionable by taking ἐν = "through" (GROTIUS, WOLF, and SCHENKEL, who has a fondness for this instrumental sense of the preposition). HODGE suggests the same view, but prefers that of MEYER, which is tautological. ELLICOTT objects to the connection with ἁγίον, that it "gives perhaps a greater prominence to the special nature of the holiness than the context requires." He therefore prefers the view of STIER, taking the phrase as a kind of tertiary predicate, almost = "and it is a holy temple in the Lord, and in Him alone." ALFORD thinks this more in accordance with the Apostle's style, and it is favored by ἐν πνεύματι, ver. 22. So EADIE.—R.]

Ver. 22. In whom ye also [ἐν ᾧ καὶ ὑμεῖς].—Per anaphoram iteratur ἐν ᾧ (BENGEL), which is to be joined to "Christ Jesus Himself," as i. 13. It is not to be connected with κυρίῳ (HARLESS, MEYER, SCHENKEL) because the whole clause is parallel to the preceding one; still less however to "holy temple" (CALIXTUS, MATTHIES [EADIE] and others), since they are not built in a temple for a habitation. "Ye also" places the readers as being Christians, without any reference to their coming out of heathenism, as BAUMGARTEN CRUSIUS and BLEEK suppose, in connection with the whole ("the whole building"). This is in accordance with the parallel-

ism of the application in ver. 22, which is not tautological, but marks a dialectic advance. [Most commentators take "in the Lord" as the antecedent of the relative. "You also," not "even you," "καὶ with its ascensive and slightly contrasting force marking the exalted nature of the association in which the Ephesians shared" (ELLCOTT).—R.]

Are being built together, συννοικοδομεῖσθε.—This is indicative, not imperative (CALVIN and others), according to the context, which says what the readers, and the church in general, are, not what they ought to be. The preposition συν, as in συναρμολογούμενη, makes the connection with each other and with the whole; hence not merely with each other (MEYER), nor only with "the whole building" (HARLESS). The verb points to internal edification more strongly than αἰζει, denotes the process of becoming built, magis magisque coaptari (BUCER); hence with LUTHER we should retain: miterbaut WERDET, not seid (PASSAVANT). ["Are being built together" is the nearest English equivalent. The preposition refers to the close and compact union of the component parts of the building (ELLCOTT).—R.]

For an habitation of God, εἰς κατοικητήριον τοῦ Θεοῦ.—This sets forth the goal, as in ver. 21. The word here chosen in the stead of ναὸν occurs only here and in Rev. xviii. 2, marking the place of dwelling (LUTHER: Behausung), while ναὸν marks the place of worship. In this there is implied a significant advance, which explains the idea of the church. Comp. Doct. Note 5. The genitive τοῦ Θεοῦ designates the Master of the house, who goes in and out, doing, regulating, taking care of everything, even to the smallest and most external matters. Hence this is not the same idea as in the previous verse with only a change of expression (MEYER, SCHENKEL), though it is not to be referred to individual Christians (HARLESS) and quite as little to be taken as dependent on αἰζει, ἐν ᾧ καὶ ὑμεῖς συννοικοδομεῖσθε being regarded as a parenthesis (GRIESBACH, KNAPP), so that the sense would be: that a dwelling of God might arise (KOPPE, RUECKERT).

In the Spirit, ἐν πνεύματι.—This, being parallel to "in the Lord," which qualifies "holy," defines more closely the phrase, "of God," His relation to the "habitation": It is God, who dwells in you, in His church, in the Spirit as the element of His presence, hence in the Holy Spirit. The comparison with χαρὰ ἐν πνεύματι ἁγίῳ (Rom. xiv. 17), ἀγάπη ἐν πνεύματι (Col. i. 8) should not be so decidedly rejected as inappropriate by MEYER, as though this were possible only by abstract terms. Eph. iv. 1: δέσμιος ἐν Χριστῷ or κυρίῳ, 1 Thess. iv. 16: νεκροὶ ἐν Χριστῷ are by no means abstract. Comp. on the idea of this verse, 1 Cor. iii. 16: ναὸς Θεοῦ ἐστὶ καὶ τὸ πνεῦμα Θεοῦ οἰκεῖ ἐν ὑμῖν; 2 Cor. vi. 16; Rom. viii. 11. As the Church is a temple, which is holy not merely outwardly, but "in the Lord," so it is also a dwelling of God, where He does not dwell as the Shekinah in the temple, but in the Spirit, in His, the Holy Spirit, who is the Regent in this edifice, as He is efficient in its growth and occupation. So RIEGER, HARLESS, STIER. It is not then = πνευματικόν (Greek Fathers, RUECKERT and others), in accordance with 1 Pet. ii. 5: οἱ κὸς πνευματικός; nor is ἐν = διὰ (THEOPHYLACT [E. V.] and others), nor is the connection with the verb admissible: by virtue of, by means of the Holy Ghost ye are built together (MEYER, SCHENKEL, BLEEK). [HODGE also prefers this view, which disturbs the parallelism, giving the phrase an unwarranted emphasis. The view of RUECKERT is against the whole sense of the passage (ALFORD). Against MEYER's objection to the interpretation of Braune, see ELLICOTT in loco. Comp. EADIE, and Galatians, v. 5, against the distinction of HARLESS respecting the use of the article with πνεῦμα. The reference to the Holy Spirit is undoubtedly the correct one and thus the verse brings the Trinity into view.—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The Trinity. Ver. 18 points to the Trinity: To the Father through Christ in the Spirit. But the allusion in ver. 22 is more obscure. [Yet ALFORD correctly says of the latter part of this section: "Thus we have the true temple of the Father, built in the Son, inhabited in the Spirit; the offices of the three blessed Persons being distinctly pointed out; God THE FATHER, in all His fulness, dwells in, fills the church: that church is constituted an holy temple to Him in THE SON, —is inhabited by Him in the ever-present indwelling of the HOLY SPIRIT."—R.]

2. THE ANTHROPOLOGY of this section.

a. Heathenism in distinction from Judaism. The heathen are termed those "afar off," the Jews those "nigh." The latter had the theocracy and a covenant of God with them, repeated in many ways, and containing a glorious promise; the former were without hope and without God. For neither in the idol deities of the people, nor in the fancied deities of the philosophers and the educated, did they have the living God; neither nature (Rom. i. 19, 20; Acts xiv. 17; xvii. 27), nor conscience could reveal to them the mercy, and the holy and sanctifying love of God, as this had become evident to the Jews in theocratic training and guidance. The heathen with their natural gifts wallowed ever more deeply in the creature, the Jews with their gracious gifts relied more and more on God's election, proudly exalting themselves, as did the former. Such distinctions, defining the relation of God to the nations and of the nations to God, define at the same time differences in the moral conduct of the Gentiles and the Jews. The former, left to themselves, did not see the arm of God shown to be so strong in nature, or the finger of God warning in the conscience, but fell into the mire, into the starless night of vile immorality; heathenism becomes ever worse and worse (Rom. i. 18-32); modern heathenism, which not only struggles to be free from the arm of God's power, but tears itself away from the heart of God with its thoughts of peace, is even more loathsome. Judaism falls away into externality ("the so-called circumcision in the flesh," ver. 11; Rom. ii. 14-29) throwing the theocratic feature into the background and out of practice, but giving prominence and power to the national element; modern Judaism has lapsed into the most frivolous emptiness.

b. Heathenism and Judaism are alike in this, that external position, neither in natural endowments nor in the gifts of revelation, decides as to the personal state of salvation. Whether one is a "stranger," as a heathen, or a "sojourner" as a Jew, amounts to nothing; he ought and must still be and become "of the household of God." Let him who enjoys the gifts of grace, think rather how to use them, to make them efficient in himself, than in false delight to despise others who lack them. In natural endowments there are indeed ways and means to the knowledge of God, which He can carry further unto eternal salvation, through Christ in the Holy Ghost however. We may not with philosophers, such as Hegel, place upon an equal footing the Jews with their theocracy, or the mission of preserving salvation, and the heathen, with their cosmocracy, or anthropocracy, the mission of moulding in its naturalness the subject attaining salvation, and regard both as united in the Theanthropos Christ, thinking then that they shall all become Christ's, God-men, instead of new men, God's men. Still less should we with Abelard, Zwingli and others, make exceptions arbitrarily, placing Socrates, Plato, Cicero and others, among the patriarchs and prophets, Apostles and believers, in heaven, as though we could act as judges in such a matter. Here it is best to keep within bounds, as did Paul, who sticks to what is evident, making no final judgment respecting individuals and their personal state of safety, nor overlooking the distinctions in what is similar.

c. The continued validity of these two forms. This antithesis is perceptible, not merely before Christ, but also in the Church which He established. They are not forms historically concluded, but active categories of human error, showing themselves constantly anew. Man suffers from a defect, though in the rich possession and masterly use of the most important natural endowments, if he is estranged from his Creator, and even in the possession, use and enjoyment of noble gifts of grace, if he has not attained to personal fellowship of life and heart with the Giver. Such a defect does not remain quiescent, but impels to restless opposition and enmity towards God and Man. The oneness urges ever deeper into discord, as the abuse of the gifts of nature or of grace is changed into the destruction of the same, coming home upon him who has enjoyed them.

d. Natural and gracious endowments do not exclude each other. The latter direct, purify, elevate the former, making them more productive. Human nature loses nothing, but gains much by means of the latter, if they are but rightly used: the Divine in the human, the Divinity in humanity is thus nurtured. It is thus that the state of things will be brought about when neither the individual, nor nations as a whole, will stand in hostile antagonism to one another, but will complement each other in peaceful contact, furthering each other's interests through the fulfilment of their calling in life or history, of their ministry with the gifts entrusted to them.

a. Without Christ the distance from God in the case of the Gentiles is not overcome, nor does the nearness to God in the case of the Jews become fellowship with God. Without Him a man or a people is either "stranger" or "sojourner," and the advance from "stranger" to "of the household of God" is not through the "sojourner." As little as sonship of itself develops itself from slavery, so little avail circumcision, Mosaic law, theocracy, promise; only creative renewal (ver. 15) is of avail among Jews as well as Gentiles, and this is accomplished only through Him and in Him.

b. He is our Peace, He, in His Person; and this peace is here defined by its antithesis, "enmity" (ver. 15), by the hostility of Gentiles and Jews (ver. 11), by the estrangement of the Gentiles from God and His law, as well as the distance and separation from God the Father (vers. 12, 18) and the externality of the Jews (ver. 11)—as concord, as unity concluded and secured in agreement, in friendly intercourse. This peace is not a sensation, but a possession. HOFMANN (Schriftbeweis, II. 1, pp. 374) refers to the etymology, deriving the word from εἰρη and ἰσος, the circle, the place of assembly, or it may be traced to εἰπω, to speak, quiet, friendly, independent intercourse in speech. STRIER (Reden Jesu, V., p. 224 on Jno. xiv. 27) compares it with שלום, and reaches thus the notion of prosperity, welfare. In this concord with its intercourse is found welfare, complete and symmetrical development. Hence the possession of this peace is at the same time a status. The first and main thing is peace with God; on this is based and depends necessarily the peace with our neighbor. Where the latter appears, the former is certainly efficient; hence Paul can here give special prominence to it in accordance with the context. He who has Christ, can speak of His peace (Jno. xiv. 27), has peace.*

c. The work of Christ culminates in the death of the cross (ver. 13: "made nigh in the blood of Christ"; ver. 16: "might reconcile them both to God through the cross"), having for its end the reconciliation with God and among each other (ver. 14: "who made both one"; ver. 16: "having slain the enmity"; ver. 17: "came and preached peace"; ver. 18: "we both have our access in one Spirit unto the Father"), comp. Col. i. 20-22; Rom. v. 10; 2 Cor. v. 18-20. Enmity is to be overcome only on the side of man, on the part of God "wrath" (ii. 3). We have only the popular expression: ἰλάσθητι μοι (Luke xviii. 13) and 2 Macc. i. 5; vii. 33; viii. 29: καταλάσσεσθαι ἑαυτοὺς.—Non Deus inimicus erat hominibus, sed homines inimici erant Deo. Non cepit homines amare, qui cum eo reconciliati essent, sed quia ab æterno homines amavit, idcirco decrevit homines sibi inimicos per Christiani secum reconciliare. Reconciliatio, morte Christi effecta, non est duplex seu mutua, sed simplex, h. e., Christus morte sua non Deum, hominum amantissimum, cum hominibus, sed homines, Deo inimicos, cum Deo reconciliavit (WEBER). The enmity against God was extirpated by, through and in Christ; the attracting power of His Person, especially of His cross is so great, that man is won by Him for God. Thus the Father of Christ becomes the Father of men and the contending nations and creatures become peaceful children in one church and one Spirit. This is the reconciliation. It rests upon the propitiation, removing the wrath of God, which is however only the energy of His holy love for sinners against sin. But this is not treated of in this section. By this reconciliation of men resting on the atonement their relation not merely to God but also to the law is changed. In that He fulfilled the law in deed and in truth, performed God's will and suffered in obedience, He rendered it powerless in its single ordinances, dissolving its separative features; it thus gained through Him internal validity and importance, so that it no longer burdens men, but they stand and walk in and on the same as a common soil within salutary bounds. Here too all depends on His Person and our relation to Him (ver. 15: "in His flesh"; ver. 16: "in Him"; ver. 18: "through Him"; ver. 21: "in whom"—"in the Lord"); in Him and through Him that takes place which ought to take place both for us and in us. Ipsa natura suscipienda erat, quæ liberanda (AUGUSTINE). Neque Christo imputari potuissent peccata nostra, nisi tum naturæ ejusdem vinculo tum voluntaria sponione nobiscum unitus esset, neque justitia Christi nobis imputaretur; nisi in unum cum Ipso corpus coaluissimus (TURRETINE).—He guards against that humanitarianism, which is only the glory of the flesh, as well as against a godless cosmopolitanism ["without God, in the world"]; He creates new, real men, who as the children become the possessors and rulers of the world.

4. The law here is the Mosaic law. This follows from the description: τῶν ἐντολῶν ἐν δόγμασιν (ver. 15), from the figure: τὸ μεσότοιχον τοῦ ὄραγµοῦ (ver. 14), and also from the statement that Christ has abolished this "in His flesh"; for it was precisely to this law that He was subject in the flesh; this was the "hedge" of the vineyard of God, the people of Israel; it was this which split the will of God into ordinances difficult to be grasped, and multiplied by casuistry most enormously. But here where the subject is not merely the enmity of the Jews against the Gentiles and against God, an enmity denoted by and connected with the law, but quite as much the enmity of the Gentiles against the Jews and against God, this too being joined with the law, we must admit a secondary reference to the law in the conscience. Rom. ii. 14, 15 permits such a reference, the connection requires it and the nature of the case explains it: the bad conscience is the still active conscience, so far as it is still good. The bad conscience is the justly judging conscience, is enmity, not as it should be with sin and the sinful subject, but with God, before whom it puts to shame, with our neighbor, from whom it divides us; the sinner against the law excuses himself and accuses God and men, by always finding the circumstances, relations, surroundings more to blame than himself. The voices of a bad conscience became for the heathen Furies, but not so easily Eumenides.

Nititur in vetitum. He too, who holds to the law and to conscience, is an object of enmity for the frivolous world; where the law appears powerful, there is in the world discord, opposition—within the heart, in individuals and in the whole, and externally also. Thus enmity toward God and men clings to the law. We do not wish to have the will of God about us, above us, before us, and to know and feel ourselves under the law with its single decrees; it is impossible for us to have the law in us and peace at the same time, unless we have God Himself. Only fellowship of life with God in Christ removes the enmity which attaches to the law, as it appears in its commandments and ordinances over against the natural man.

5. The church is essentially a fellowship, closely united and organic. Her support is in Christ, her beginning in the pure and powerful Word of God, in His Apostles and prophets, her design respects every man and every nation, her task is not merely the worship of God, but abiding fellowship with God, and accordingly each individual must be prepared in the work of the Holy Ghost, freed from his singularity and framed into the whole (vers. 19-22). She is "the assured residence and abiding working-place" of God, from which He will and does work further into His world. In the world He indeed already has His real, immanent, continued presence, but in the church He is present in an extraordinary manner; she is His palace, His immediate surroundings, His family, while the world is His broad kingdom on which He operates from this, and which is subservient to it. Certain as the permanence of the church is, she is still in process of growth, not yet complete. But she is real, not merely ideal.

6. The Holy Scriptures are referred to in the expression: "the foundation of the Apostles and prophets" (ver. 20). There is here evidently a reminiscence of the words of Christ (Matt. xvi. 18: "Thou art Peter," etc.), in which He promises to build His church, not upon the person of Peter, but upon Peter's confession of the Person of Christ. The foundation of the church, the beginning of this building is not the persons of the Apostles, but their witness of Him, the preaching of the Apostles. Scripture is not the producer, but the product, not before the church, but within and for her. The word of God springing up in the Apostles, as prophets of God, as men to whom revelation was imparted by the Holy Ghost, and preached by them, is the foundation, but what is given in fixed form in the Scriptures is the norm for the church. She has her support and deepest ground in Christ, her beginning in the preaching of the Apostles, but her rule in the standard of truth contained in the Apostolic and prophetic Scriptures, the sufficiency of which is such, that no tradition is needed in addition. ["And no other foundation can suffice. When philosophical speculation or critical erudition, political affinity or human enactment supplants it, the structure topples and is about to fall. The opinions of Luther, Calvin, Cranmer, Wesley, Knox, or Erskine (and these were all "pillars"), are not the foundation; nor are the edicts and creeds of Trent, Augsburg, Dort, or Westminster. Such writings may originate sectional distinctions, and give peculiar shape to column or portico, shaft or capital, on the great edifice, but they can never be substituted for the one foundation" (EADIE).—R.]

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ponder this: What thou wast and wouldst have been without Him? what thou wast and hast become through Him? what thou wast and shouldst and shalt become, if thou abide with Him?—God is near thee, nearest of all, yet hast thou at first not noticed or known this at all, and still dost thou forget it and fail to feel it; many a one does not learn it and perishes, but he who learns it gains what is most glorious, the everlasting salvation of the soul, God's gifts, God Himself, as joint-heir with Christ. The moon is by no means so valuable to thee as the sun; it is nearer to the earth with its powerful influence notwithstanding its distance, than the near moon with its borrowed light. So is Christ nearer than Luther; He makes for thee spring with fruit abiding eternally.—See now, what it has cost Him, to bring thee near to God, who is so nigh, to win thee for Him! He must die, that thou mightest live in God and God in thee.—Do not deny it, underneath all hast thou enmity to God; in order not to be obliged to acknowledge His wrath, thou feignest friendship and love to Him, and still wilt not allow Him to rule in thee.—The foundation of religion is not a doctrine but a life, not the Apostles' life, but Christ and He alone, in His Person and in His life and death, His work and suffering. He disturbs the peace, the false one, in order to establish one which is real and eternal.

The Church of Christ is God's house and our own home, in which we should be children and become heirs. Here we are not only instructed, as in a school, but educated, in order to go out into the world and do what is good and useful; here not only is religion protected from the world, but we ourselves from irreligion.—In the church each one should feel, that the might of the whole is at his command, to be used for himself, to be efficient in him, quite as much as that he must serve with assiduity the whole; thus he himself will grow and thrive. The temple becomes a home: First worship Him, then live with Him. Is the home but a hovel at first, a hovel is still home. Do not take offence at the outward appearance of the church, but look at the internal loveliness!—Builded together on the one cornerstone, Christ, so that we are changed from servants or slaves into children and heirs. We are to become free! God hates the slavery of the world, or hireling service no less than we do tyranny. See to it that with thy hatred of tyrants and raving about freedom thou dost not still remain a slave.—In the Church of Christ we first really become men, the grace of God in Christ leads us directly to nature and to true humanity.

STARKE:—Where a soul will have hope toward God, it must have a testament or promise of God as its foundation.—Our life must properly be nothing else than a continued going out of ourselves and going to God. The great glory of Christians as citizens of the city of God and members of His household. What was Roman citizenship in comparison? Acts xxii. 28. Thus we are assured of all possessions, liberties, privileges and protection. Ps. lxxiv. 5.—What glorious and wonderful thing does not attach to the Church of God? Nothing is more majestic, because it is His temple; nothing more worthy of veneration, for He dwells therein; nothing more ancient, for the patriarchs and prophets labored thereon, nothing more solid, for Jesus Christ is its foundation, nothing firmer and stronger, for He is its corner-stone, nothing more exalted, for it reaches into eternity and the bosom of God, nothing more well-ordered and arranged, for the Holy Ghost is the architect; nothing more beautiful and agreeable in its variety, for stones come from all quarters, Jews and Gentiles, from every age, land, race and condition, nothing more roomy, for all the elect and righteous of all generations have a place therein, nothing more sacred, for it is consecrated to the Lord, nothing more divine, for it is a living edifice animated by the Holy Spirit.

PASSAVANT:—God was not far off, but they were far from Him,—with heart and life far from Him in their darkness. How often are we— notwithstanding revelation and the knowledge of the Lord—far from God in our hearts and lives, while we are “in the world!” And that is the beginning and end of all heathenism. We are of a heathen race and always bring again into all our worldly—yes, Christian concerns, undertakings, plans and labors—something, much, that is Pagan.—Instead of making the holy law of their God serve as a sacred and salutary safeguard from the Gentiles, their customs, sins and enormities, the Israelites turned their hearts toward hate and bitter enmity against all the nations about them.—Though both Greek and Roman occupied the most beautiful isles, the loveliest home; yet were they still on an earth foreign to them and not yet confirmed as their property; above them was a heaven, though so glad and beautiful—still—unknown and strange; under them unknown depths and abysses full of night and horror. As really homeless they walked the earth, not knowing whence they were or whither their living and dying would lead them! The holiest and sweetest of the Here and the Hereafter remained closed and strange to them. With all their advantages of form, of culture and customs,—with all the beauty and brilliancy, in which many of them are to-day still patterns for us in earthly things,—they were, over against the Israelites, at most like guests, suffered to remain or kindly received beside the children and members of the household.—Ask thy heart, thou who art called, and mayhap art, a Christian; hast thou really given thyself to thy God? Hast thou transferred every hall, chamber, nook and corner, all the heights and depths of thine inner man to Him for a living, pure, spiritual indwelling? Art thou His temple?—[Christ our peace; 1) In time and in eternity; 2) Before God, in His Judgment; 3) In all sufferings, in all anxieties of life; 4) In need, in death; 5) In God’s rest, in His love.—Jesus Christ: 1) The cause, 2) Ground, 3) Strength of all peace.—It is Christ’s Cross, that atones for Christians; His blood sanctifies them; His Spirit impels them; His love permeates them; His name unites them in one and the same grace.—R.]—

RIEGER:—The wretchedness of Paganism is not represented now-a-days in its full extent.—The matter is now inverted; first the heathen are granted a fortunate fate in eternity, that thus afterwards the difference between nature and grace, faith in the gospel and walking by the feeble light of conscience may be altogether ignored.—The distinction between Jews and Gentiles was brought about by man, but fixed by God Himself, and guarded by the entire ecclesiastical polity of the Jews as by a hedge. Then indeed the human heart took occasion from this for much pride and mutual enmity. This too must then be interrupted and removed by another Divine interposition, which took place in the sending of His Son.—He who thoroughly believes the word of the Apostle, accepting Christ as the Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, in the matter of our salvation, is not only in connection with the foundation, but is in love built in with all the living stones beside Him; abides too for the further work of the good Spirit, who is the master-builder of this edifice, but also the future Possessor and Ruler of every well-erected habitation.

HEUBNER:—Quesnel distinguishes three kinds of looking back at former sins: a longing, faithless one, destructive of grace, a distrustful, disquieting one, hindering the course of grace, a penitent, thankful one, increasing grace.—Without Christ we can be alive in no church; without Him there is no holy kingdom of God on earth. Christ transfers us into the state of the pious, into the congregation of the saints; with Him we are in a state, embracing all true Israelites, in the kingdom of the just and blessed. Heavenly citizenship is a favor from Christ. Without Him man has no part in the covenant of promise, in the covenant with God, which gives salvation. Christianity is the eternal covenant with God. Without Christ we are without hope.—Without Christ we are without God, because the true God has not yet become ours. First with Christ is God rightly known and revealed; we know that He is our God, who cares for us sinners and desires our salvation. Outside of Christianity God remains as it were only a general idea.—The Personality of God is illustrated by nothing so well as by the Personality of His Son. Losing Christ is losing God, denying Him leads to Atheism. Who can read this description of the heathen condition without horror? Yet that is the picture of many baptized people; they live without Christ, they have fallen away from Christ and that leads to apostasy from God. An unhappy withdrawing of the heart from God continues, unless we are brought nigh through Christ.

Christ’s death is the nations’ peace! Who can quarrel and fight with others under the cross of Christ?—The whole of mankind should be one man, one holy body whose Head is Christ. Humanity must be held together by one Head, else unity is impossible. Who is available for this, if God had not given such an one? The highest union of men is that of becoming one in Christ; then they make one family, one household.—Since the establishment of Christianity, God no longer knows any distinction of nations; all have the same access to the Father, because Christianity gives one Spirit to all. That is the business of Christ, the Only-Begotten, to bring the wandering children to the Father, and to reconcile those divided. He is the only and the indispensable Guide. He, who imagines that he will go alone to the Father, will be rejected, because he comes as a self-righteous one. But he, who clings to Christ, will not be rejected.—Men lost through sin the heavenly family-right or the fellowship with angels, through Christ they obtain it again. Without Him eternal banishment were our fate. Now we belong again to the house and family of God.—The Christian Church is the only edifice, that will last. What others, the free-masons for example, boast of as their building amounts to nothing; it will perish.

STIER:—There was a little light even in the midst of heathenish darkness, just as on the other hand Israel with all the light of the law and the promise sat for the most part in the shadow of death.—The enmity between Israel and the Gentiles was at bottom only the prominent manifestation of the enmity of the flesh against God's truth and love, against the Spirit already in the law itself. The same hate and antagonism to the Living One manifested itself in the scorn and hatred of Israel on the part of the Gentiles, led to false glorying in their pre-eminence on the part of the Jews. Something analogous continues to exist everywhere, where Christ has not made all new and free.—Christ is humanity, on that account He can represent it.—Let us hold fast to the words of the Apostles and prophets as the foundation of the Church, but recognize the words respecting Christ as the pith and marrow of the teaching.

[EADIE:—Ver. 11. The exercise of memory would deepen their humility, elevate their ideas of Divine grace, and incite them to ardent and continued thankfulness.—Ver. 12. The Jewish nation—had the Messiah—not Jesus indeed—but the Christ in promise. He was the great subject—the one, glowing, pervading promise of their inspired oracles. But the Gentiles were “without Christ.”—“The commonwealth of Israel” is that government framed by God, in which religion and polity were so conjoined, that piety and loyalty were synonymous, to fear God and honor the king were the same obligation.—They had hope of nothing a sinner should hope for; their future was a night without a star. They were godless, having no one to cry to, to trust in, to love, praise, and serve. “In the world,” dark, hostile and under Satan's dominion.—Ver. 15. Deep hostility lay in their bosoms; the Jew looked down with supercilious contempt upon the Gentile, and the Gentile reciprocated and scowled upon the Jew as a haughty and heathenish bigot.—One new man—the Gentile is not elevated to the position of the Jew; but Jew and Gentile together are both raised to a higher platform than the circumcision ever enjoyed. Spiritual blessing in itself, and not merely pictured in type, is possessed by the Jew as well as the Gentile.—Ver. 16. Jesus reconciles us to God by turning away the Divine anger from us. God has shown infinite love to the sinner, and infinite hatred to his sin, in the sufferings of the cross, so that we tremble at His severity, while we are in the arms of His mercy.—Ver. 18. Christians do not approach some dark and spectral phantom, nor a grim and terrible avenger. It is not Jehovah in the awful attitude of Judge and governor, but Jehovah as a Father.—Ver. 20. That man, “Jesus,” who was the “Christ,” the Divinely appointed, qualified, and accepted Saviour, unites and sustains the Church. Is He not in His truth, His blood, His power, His legislation, and His presence to His Church, Himself “the chief corner-stone?”—Ver. 21. Every stone is in its place, and fits its place. One's ingenuity devises what another's activity works out. As Fergusson says—“By taking bond with Christ the foundation, they are fastened one to another.”—Jehovah dwelt in His temple: 1. To instruct His people; 2. To accept the services of His people. God inhabits this spiritual fane for spiritual ends—spiritual sacrifices are still laid on the altar to God.—The Church is one, holy and Divine; it rests on Christ—is possessed by God—filled with the Spirit—and is ever increasing.—R.]

[The so-called Circumcision occasionally finds a parallel in the externalness of a so-called church.—Hand-wrought ordinances are a fruitful source of pride.—In discovering the condition of men out of Christ we must reverse the order of the Apostle: we see that they are “in the world,” learn that they are “without God,” and despite their stout denials conclude with certainty that they have “no hope.”—Near the cross, near each other.—Christ came to destroy the works of the devil; He destroys partition-walls, which we are slow to class with these works. Christ came to abolish Jewish casuistry and hair-splitting distinctions and ordinances, but how much of this remains in His church. Such things have not tended to make peace.—The peace Christ preaches is no armed neutrality. As disbanded armies give laborers for a country's prosperity, so the activities once employed in hostility against God and man, are turned to edification.—We have our access, do we really enjoy it?—Let men sneer at the “saints”—it is a term of privilege, not of presumption, implying here the highest citizenship, the most exalted adoption, while in itself it means that God is making us sinful ones holy like Himself, that we may the more enjoy the blessings of His household.—Let us hold to that church, whose foundation and corner-stone are here set forth, and then despite all the mistakes of the past and imperfection of the present, we shall see in her the reality described in the figures of verse 21, and find in our own experience that we, together with this corner-stone, “are being builded together for a habitation in the Spirit.”—R.]

² Ver. 3.— \aleph^1 A. B. C. D. and others [many cursives, most versions, including the Syriac and Vulgate] read ἐννομισθη; the internal grounds (Stier notices the agreement with i. 9, the distinct reference to the Trinity, the great probability of an alteration from ver. 5) are not stronger than the external. [The reading of the Rec. (ἐννομισσε) supported by D³ K. L., and some minor authorities, is considered an explanatory gloss by most modern editors.—R.]

⁴ Ver. 5.—[The preposition ἐν is an explanatory interpolation, having no uncial support, rejected by all modern editors.—R.]

⁷ Ver. 6.—[Modern editors generally accept Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ (\aleph^1 A. B. C., cursives and versions) instead of τοῦ Χριστοῦ (Rec., D. E. F. G. K. L.; most cursives)—R.]

is more literal, conforms better with the sense of the aorist: was given, as well as with the infinitive construction retained in ver. 9.—R.]

¹² Ver. 9.—[The longer reading of the Rec. is supported by D. K. L., a number of cursives, and a few fathers; ἐκ τῆς ἰσχύος Χριστοῦ is omitted in N. A. B. C. D. F. G., a few cursives, the best versions and many fathers. It is therefore rightly rejected by critical editors.—R.]

¹⁴ Ver. 12.—[This emendation gives the correct sense better than the literal but harsh and equivocal rendering of the E. V.—R.]

¹⁵ Ver. 13.—[Dr. Braune's exegesis requires the following rendering: Wherefore I pray (God) that (I) faint not." etc. See Exeg. Notes.—The Rec. has ἐκκακεῖν, with C. D. F. K. L. Ellicott (with A. B.) D. E. ἐκκακεῖν, while most editors accept the form ἐγκακεῖν (N. B.²). Comp. my Textual Notes on Gal. vi. 9. Meyer does not accept the view that the first named is a doubtful word, but thinks it was in oral use and first introduced into writing by Paul; the other reading being an attempt at improvement. He is almost alone in this opinion.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Connection and Summary. With τούτου χάριν the Apostle refers to what precedes (ii. 19-22), not exclusively to ver. 22 (BLEEK, also MEYER), which is only a conclusion, although a comprehensive one. The reference to vers. 11-22 (STIER) is preferable to that of BLEEK, yet the first part of that section contains merely an antithesis which has been overcome and is past. Without any fear of a relapse he now looks forward and points to the end and aim.—From the fact that the church, "of the family of God," is built together in Christ "unto an habitation of God in the Spirit," there proceeds as a result: the Apostle's intercession and exhortation (vers. 14-19)* the weight and indispensable consideration of which rest upon the office, not the person, although person and office do and must include each other; if the former rightly regards and administers the latter, the latter makes its importance felt chiefly in its bearer. Hence vers. 1-12 treat of the apostolic office as the appointed subject of the intercession and exhortation. Ver. 1 describes the present efficient bearer of this office in general; ver. 2 defines the office as a gift of God's grace, which according to vers. 3, 4 has been imparted in a special manner and according to ver. 5 now for the first time, having as its task the reception of all nations through the proclamation of the gospel (ver. 6). Vers. 7, 8 a mark the service and the unworthiness of its recipient, ver. 8 b, 9, the extent of the task allotted to this gift; ver. 10 points to the aim; ver. 11, back to the beginning and foundation; ver. 12, to the carrying out of the task already begun. So STIER in the main.

Ver. 1. The person holding the office. For this cause. Τούτου χάριν is an emphatic expression, occurring elsewhere only in iii. 14; Tit. i. 5. It is stronger than ὁ, διὰ τοῦτο, introducing something special. [It means for this reason and is aptly rendered in the E. V.]—To this strong expression corresponds: I Paul, ἐγὼ Παῦλος.—The phrase is found also in 2 Cor. x. 1; Gal. v. 2; Col. i. 23; 1 Thess. ii. 18; Philemon 19 (and ver. 9). Similarly ἐγὼ Ἰωάννης, Rev. i. 9; xxii. 8; xxi. 2 (Rec.). He mentions his name, not on account of his person (ver. 8), but because of his office and the importance of what he is doing.

The prisoner of Christ Jesus (ὁ δέσμιος Χριστοῦ Ἰησοῦ).—In iv. 1 alone do we find ἐν κυρίῳ, elsewhere always (2 Tim. i. 8; Philemon i. 9) as here, with the genitive. It is undoubtedly the genitive auctoris, causae.* WINKER, p. 178. So δεσμοὶ τοῦ εὐαγγελίου, "bonds of the gospel" (Philemon 13) are bonds which belong to the service of the gospel, ὀνειδισμὸν Χριστοῦ (Heb. xiii. 13) is reproach which Christ bore, παθήματα τοῦ Χριστοῦ (2 Cor. i. 3). Our phrase is not= for Christ's sake, propter Christum. A special emphasis rests on the expression. In the Epistle to Philemon written at the same time (ver. 1), it even stands in the place where "Apostle" is usually found, and in ver. 9 ("as Paul the aged, and now also a prisoner of Christ Jesus") it is similarly used. Here it is not a predicate, but in apposition to the subject already so emphatically named, not an adjective, but a substantive added for the sake of description. BENGL aptly remarks: legatus, isque vinculus. As if he would say: I Paul, the prisoner, not of the emperor, nor of the soldier, but of Christ Jesus, whose Apostle I am. So, following RIEGER, PASSAVANT and STIER, MEYER approaches this view (= δούλος Χριστοῦ).

[The phrase is taken as a predicate (εἰμί being supplied) by very many from CHRYSOSTOM to BEZA, KOPPE, MEYER. The Syriac version sustains this view, which simplifies the construction very greatly, but is open to great objection: (1) It makes "for this cause" and "on behalf of you" tautological; (2) disconnects vers. 2 ff. from ver. 1, since they then do not explain it; (3) the article could only occur in the predicate with special emphasis; this emphasis is unaplanine and inconsistent with "if indeed ye have heard" (ALFORD).—Other verbs are supplied in some codices. MEYER formerly accepted a brachyology: I Paul, the prisoner of Christ Jesus. (am a prisoner) for you Gentiles, but gave it up as untenable in his 2d ed. See further below.—R.]

In behalf of you Gentiles, ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν τῶν ἐθνῶν.—This added phrase justifies the above interpretation. Paul is imprisoned for the Gentiles, suffers to their benefit, as is said also in Phil. i. 7, 12 ff.; Col. iv. 3. Although Paul had to suffer on account of his proclamation

* [According to the usual view, ver. 14 is a resumption of ver. 1, all that intervenes being a digression. Dr. Braune takes another view of the construction (see his note at the close of ver. 1), but is forced to accept a connection of thought which amounts to the same thing.—R.]

of the gospel among the Gentiles (Acts xxi. 21, 28 f.; xxii. 21 ff.), yet ὅτι is not propter (GROTIUS).^{*} It refers to ἐν (ver. 2) and is rather ad evangelium gentibus annuntiandum than annuntiatum (FLATT). BENDEL: "Pauli studio erga gentes incensi sunt persecutores, ut vincerent illum; et vincula ipsa profuere gentibus, ver. 13; 2 Tim. ii. 10." Here then everything "odious" is to be rejected from the term, differing thus from the expression: "once Gentiles in the flesh" (ii. 10). OLSHAUSEN is excellent: "He here makes mention of his bonds, in order to bring into stronger prominence the glory just described in contrast with the present condition of the church." HARLESS also remarks: "Paul would have the Gentiles led to none other than Him, whose chains he wore, and would thus give a proof of the glory of such fellowship, exalted above suffering and shame." STRIER: "The bonds should especially show that proof of the office which proceeds from internal efficacy; the bonds themselves also preach to the Gentiles, and themselves reveal to the Apostle something new."

At this point the sentence breaks off, and is resumed again in ver. 8, since it is peculiar to the naïve style of the Greeks, to place the name in the nominative in a sentence, the end of which is not immediately contemplated, and since ἐμοί (ver. 8) is in a strikingly emphatic position, so that it refers back to ἐγώ (ver. 1) and thus indicates the resumption of the interrupted construction. So ECUMENIUS, GROTIUS.

[Notwithstanding Dr. Braune's preference for this view of the construction, it seems to be untenable. (1) Though examples of such a change of case may be found, Origen affirms that it is a solecism. (2) There is no natural connection of thought afforded by this view, while "for this cause" loses its meaning; the grace was not given for this cause, i. e., because they were built in. (3) Ver. 8 has another obvious connection, viz., with vers. 6, 7, so that according to this view "the leading thought of the antapodosis in ver. 8 is clumsily forestalled in vers. 6, 7" (ALFORD).—R.]

Most however (from LUTHER to WINER, p. 526 f., BLEEK) find in ver. 13 a return to the thought of our verse, and in ver. 14 a resumption and continuation. [This view is supported, among others by THEODORET, BENDEL, FLATT, LACHMANN, RUECKERT, HARLESS, DE WETTE (who however regards the construction as "scarcely Pauline"), OLSHAUSEN, EADIE, HODGE, ALFORD, ELLICOTT. It is the simplest view, except that of MEYER, and not open to any grave objection. (1.) It makes the τοῦτον χάρις of ver. 14 take up the same emphatic phrase from ver. 1. (2.) It gives to that phrase as well as to the whole chapter an appropriate meaning, while a long digression or parenthetical statement is not unapostolic. In view of the truth he has just uttered (ii. 19-22), he is about to pray for them, but other thoughts come in. He is a prisoner (ver. 1), that too in behalf of the Gentiles; the thought of his office leads him away (vers. 2-12), when at length he comes back to the thought of imprisonment (ver. 13) with a request that they would not despond on account of his sufferings—then he resumes (ver. 14). The whole seems Pauline, and need occasion no difficulty.—R.]

BAUMGARTEN-CRUSIUS accepts an anacolouthon without any subsequent continuation. CALVIN [legatione fungor] and others supply πρεσβέω (from vi. 20); others κεκαυχῆται (from Phil. ii. 16); while such supplements as postulo, hoc scribo [CAMERARIUS], cognovi mysterium [JEROME], sum captivus adhuc, etc., are quite ancient, and occur in some copies. A prevalent view (from the Syriac to MEYER and SCHENKEL) accepts ἐμὶ as the proper supplement; but it can scarcely be asserted, that Paul, τοῦτον χάρις, just on this account, is the Apostle to the Gentiles, the prisoner of the Lord, and that too κατ' ἐξοχήν. [See above.]

[Among other untenable views there should be mentioned that of ZANCHIUS, CRAMER and HOLZHAUSEN, who suppose the resumption to take place in ver. 13. Against this may be urged the simple διό, the want of connection thus given to ver. 14 with its strong τοῦτον χάρις, and "the insufficiency of such a secondary sentiment as that in ver. 13 to justify the long parenthesis full of such solemn matter, as that of vers. 2-12" (ALFORD).—To take the whole chapter as parenthetical is still more objectionable. In that case the digression were too long, and the parts of the chapter would not find their proper connection; besides chap. iv. does not resume the thought begun in our verse.—R.]

Ver. 2. The apostolic office is a gift of grace.

If indeed ye have^{*} heard, εἰ γὰρ ἠκούσατε.—It is evident, first of all, that εἰ cannot be regarded as purely hypothetical, since it is written by the prisoner "in behalf of you," and also since the object they have learned: "the dispensation of the grace of God," will not admit of such a view. It is not necessary, however, to take it as ἐπεὶ, since, Acts iv. 9; Rom. xi. 21; 1 John iv. 11; see WINER, p. 417. The same is true of εἰ γὰρ in iv. 21; for there, immediately after ver. 20 ("but ye did not so learn Christ"), expressing accurate knowledge of the church, we find: εἰ γὰρ αὐτὸν ἠκούσατε, "if indeed ye have heard him." The particle occurs elsewhere only in Col. i. 23; Gal. iii. 4 (2 Cor. v. 3, we have in various readings both εἰ γὰρ and ἐπεὶ). It does not necessarily indicate a doubt, as does εἴπερ (HERMANN, ad Viger., p. 833), and hence is more like ἐπεὶ, though it must not be regarded as precisely equivalent. In the form there is expressed an uncertainty, an assumption, which challenges a self-scrutiny in the case of every reader or hearer. ["Assuming that;" ALFORD, ELLICOTT, not in itself implying the rectitude of the assumption made, which depends on the context.—R.] The context, however, confirms the truth of the assumption, that they have heard. This turn of expression is therefore a rhetorical,

^{*} [It was indeed the fact that he was a prisoner on account of the Gentiles, but this is not the prominent thought here. Hence EADIE may or may not be correct in saying: "In writing to the Ephesians he could not forget that the suspicion of his having taken an Ephesian named Trophimus into the temple with him, created the popular disturbance that led to his capture and his final appeal to Cæsar, his journey to Rome, and his imprisonment in the imperial city."—R.]

^{*} [This seems to be one of those cases where the Greek aorist is properly rendered by the English perfect.—R.]

"a more elegant and suggestive reminder" (MEYER) of the preaching of Paul, as if he had written: "for ye have heard," or "since ye have heard." ESTIUS: "εἶπε non est dubitantis, sed potius affirmantis." Or we may say with STIER, that it is pre-supposition, not without a slight touch of irony, in case it were otherwise; or still more correctly: in case they would not consider the Apostle as the Apostle of the Lord for them; not to have recognized Paul, not to have received his teaching would be equivalent to not having heard. Hence it is not correct to conclude from these words, that the Epistle was not written to Ephesus (see Introd. § 5, 2). Nor does this phraseology render it necessary to accept a wider, presently unknown, circle of readers (HARLESS, STIER, BLEEK and others). The assumption of CALVIN is inadmissible: "It is credible, that when he labored in Ephesus, he was silent on these topics." Nor is it at all necessary to do violence to the verb, and render it: firmiter retinetis (PELAGIUS), intellexistis (ANSELM, GROTIUS and others). The reference is simply to preaching, especially that of Paul; hence this is termed ἀκοή (Rom. x. 16 f.). [See Romans, in loco, p. 349.—R.]

Of the dispensation of the grace of God [τὴν οἰκονομίαν τῆς χάριτος τοῦ θεοῦ].—Οἰκονομία here follows the close of chap. ii. with its οἰκοδομή. There the building of "an habitation" is treated of, here the establishment of a household, a νῦμεν (STIER). See on i. 10. This is a matter belonging to God, or still more closely to "the grace of God." Hence it is to be regarded not as an apostolic function (PELAGIUS, ANSELM, LUTHER: office. [HODGE] and others), but as a Divine arrangement. It must also be remembered that we find here, not χάρισμα, but χάρις. This χάρις is then more closely defined:

Which is given me to you-ward.—Τῇ δόθεισιν μοι, as in Rom. xii. 3; xv. 15; 1 Cor. iii. 10; Gal. ii. 9, with ὑμῖν 1 Cor. i. 4. Hence it is not to be understood of the Apostolic office exclusively; although the context here points to that (εἰς ὑμᾶς, as in Gal. ii. 8, εἰς τὰ ἔθνη). Εἰς ὑμᾶς marks the readers as the object about which the Apostle's position and activity was concerned, and is neither=ἐπὶ ὑμῶν, vestra causa (MORUS), nor=ἐν ὑμῖν, in vobis (Vulgate) or inter vos, but upon, towards you: as εἰς ὑμᾶς, i. 19: hence it is not merely: with respect to you (RUECKERT). ["To you-ward," though now unusual, expresses very well the precise shade of meaning.—R.]

Thus the apostolic office is described as a gift of God's grace, yet not so imparted and conferred that a "dispensation" is not necessary in addition, but so that the person himself (αὐτός) is especially prepared for it. Here we must include all that God had done for and in Paul, from childhood on (Gal. i. 15), near and in Damascus (Acts ix. 1 ff.; xxii. 3 ff.; xxvi. 12 ff.); in Jerusalem (Acts xxii. 21) and elsewhere (Gal. ii. 8; 1 Cor. xv. 8-10; 2 Cor. xii. 1-10). So RUECKERT especially. To regard this as merely munus apostolicum gratiose, imerito beneficio Divino creditum is too superficial. Nor can we in accordance with Col. i. 25: "the dispensation of God which was given to me for you," explain it thus, that the administrative office of the Divine grace was committed to him (ANSELM, GROTIUS and others); here τῇ δόθεισιν belongs to χάριτος, here the matter is regarded under a different aspect, and the context is different, since "heard" is the governing verb, and the office is not heard.

[This view of οἰκονομία is defended by EADIE, ALFORD, ELLICOTT (HODGE mentions it, though he thinks it differs from his own merely in form). The only remaining question is respecting the genitive. It is obviously not that of the subject, but either that of the object, "the material with respect to which the dispensation was to be exercised" (ALFORD) or that of "the point of view" (ELLICOTT). These scarcely differ here, but some such sense is favored by the passive verb ἐγνώρισθη (ver. 3 where the Rec. has ἐγγνώρισε).—R.]

The method of communication. Vers. 3, 4.

Ver. 3. That, ὅτι, gives prominence to a particular part of what they have heard, the essential part of the dispensation of the grace of God. [ALFORD: "Exegesis of the fact implied in ἠκούσατε τὴν οἰκ., viz., of the fact that: as we say 'how that.' That is the literal rendering, 'how that' is a rather inelegant exegesis.—R.]

By revelation was made known to me [κατὰ ἀποκάλυψιν ἐγνώρισθη μοι].—The emphasis here rests on "by revelation," since it comes first. As neither τινα nor τὴν is added, the reference is not to some particular event, definite in itself, but not more closely indicated (Acts ix. 1 ff., as OLSHAUSEN thinks, or Acts xxii. 21), nor to some occurrence definitely designated, but rather to the mode of making known. It is an adverbial qualification of ἐγνώρισθη=ἀπεκαλύφθη (ver. 5), or like Gal. i. 15, 16. Κατὰ denotes, as in κατ' ἄνθρωπον (Rom. iii. 5 and frequently), κατὰ χάριν (Rom. iv. 4), a mode which obtains or prevails (WINER, p. 375). [So MEYER, ALFORD, ELLICOTT, HODGE apparently.—R.] Even ὅτι ἀποκαλύψης (Gal. i. 12) does not point to a single revelation (STIER). [Comp. in loco. ELLICOTT says the allusion in the phrase as it occurs Gal. ii. 2 "is rather to the norma or rule, here to the manner."—R.] It might be interpreted (according to Passow, sub voce, II. 3, p. 1598 b) like ἐρχεσθαι κατὰ θήραν, to go hunting, or 2 Tim. i. 1: ἀπόστολος κατ' ἐπαγγελίαν, apostle for the proclamation; indeed G. HERMANN explains Gal. ii. 2: for the explanation, proclamation, presentation. But ἀποκάλυψις is only what occurs to man from God, not what men have to impart to one another. The word μοι, placed last, indicates that he treats of something which does not distinguish him personally, but which belongs to his office: "Revelation" and "apostles and prophets" are correlatives; γνωρίζειν is the general making known, but ἀποκάλυψις denotes that by means of which the official personages thus endowed are immediately distinguished, by means of which the Apostles become prophets. See ver. 5 and Doctr. Notes on ii. 20.

The mystery, τὸ μυστήριον, altogether indefinite, is, like i. 9, the decree of salvation and grace in Christ (STIER), the renewing of humanity through Christ, especially moreover the calling of the Gentiles (ALLIOLI). To refer it to the latter exclusively (most commentators from CHRYSOSTOM to HARLESS, MEYER, SCHENKEL, BLEEK) is not admissible, even though ver. 6 follows.

[On the precise reference of the word "mystery" in this chapter. The great majority of commentators, including HODGE, EADIE, ALFORD, ELLICOTT, accept the more restricted view just mentioned, but admit the wider reference in ver. 4 (and many in ver. 9). The reasons for so doing are quite strong: the purport of the mystery is set forth in ver. 6, the dispensation of grace spoken of is "to you-ward," a leading thought of the Epistle has been this calling of the Gentiles to fellowship with the Jews. Nor can it be urged against this, that it presents a matter unworthy of this designation and not at all mysterious. THOLUCK (Rom. xi. 25) thus classifies the meanings of our term: (1) "Such matters of fact, as are inaccessible to reason, and can only be known through revelation: (2) such matters as are patent facts, but the process of which cannot be entirely taken in by the reason." In the latter sense, the calling of the Gentiles was a "mystery," is so still in view of the separatism, which to the Gentile mind is in some aspects yet stronger. Evidently the indefinite reference, which leaves this special fact out of view, is inadmissible, while ver. 4 seems to require the wider meaning. Accordingly the alternating reference has been accepted to meet these requirements. To my mind it is unsatisfactory: (1.) It seems unlikely that a word should thus vary so speedily, when there is so little to mark a difference. (2.) The difficulty in construction is thus increased: the E. V. accepts a parenthesis so as to connect vers. 5, 6 with "mystery" in our verse, and thus leave the wider reference of ver. 4, undisturbed; but this is altogether arbitrary, since the relative clause (ver. 5) is to be joined directly with "mystery" (ver. 4) in accordance with the common structural usages of the Apostle. (3.) Since then the grammatical connection is such, the purport of "the mystery of Christ" is set forth in ver. 6, and the alternating reference has lost its one great object, viz., the extension of the meaning in ver. 4.

It seems best then to accept BRAUNE's view, but with somewhat more definiteness in statement. "The mystery" throughout is one mystery, but in view of the universalism of the Epistle and the current of thought in this section, it here appears as complex, precisely as the notions of "enmity" and "peace" in the preceding section: the mystery of redemption, whose centre is the Person of Christ, whose object and purport is Christ, taking that term as including the Body of which He is the Head, which He has redeemed, and in which the Gentiles are "fellow-members" (σώσωμα, ver. 6); the latter thought being the special reference throughout, though never to the exclusion of the wider thought, since ver. 6 itself with its compounds of συν compels us to think of the one inheritance, body and promise which the gospel presents. VAN OESTERZEE well remarks (LANGE'S Comm. 1 Tim. iii. 16, p. 47): "Paul knows one only great mystery," the chief truth of which as revealed to us is the Person of Christ in its connection with the Body of Christ, as the passage in the Epistle to Timothy itself teaches, and as is not obscurely hinted in v. 32 of our Epistle. With this thought of union as the ruling one, no wonder the special reference to the union of Jews and Gentiles comes in without in the least disturbing or excluding the more general one.—R.]

As I have written afore in few words [καθὼς προέγραψα ἐν ὀλίγῳ.—The English perfect brings out the force of the verb best, though it is not a literal rendering. The parenthesis of the E. V. is altogether unnecessary, the linking of clauses by relatives being common in this Epistle.—R.] Καθὼς indicates that Paul has written only as "it has been made known to him by revelation," of course, from God. This the context demands (vers. 2, 4). This writing has therefore great importance. The verb refers to what is written already. The phrase ἐν ὀλίγῳ, in brief=διὰ βραχείων (CHRYSOSTOM, Heb. xiii. 22); in Plato: δι' ὀλίγων, as in 1 Pet. v. 12. The preposition is, at all events, local: in little space=συντόμῳ, Acts xxiv. 4; xxvi. 28 (ἐν ὀλίγῳ sc. χρόνῳ). Pauca tantum attingi, cum multa dici possent (WETSTEIN). Accordingly we must apply it to the whole Epistle up to this point; in comparison with the wealth of the truth revealed, its fulness, its wide-reaching, deep-moving efficiency, what he writes is to him always little and brief. He thus speaks in modesty respecting his writings, not as though the time for a more thorough treatise failed him (SCHENKEL). The reference is to such passages as i. 9 ff.; 17 ff.; ii. 4 ff.; 11 ff., not to one passage especially,* as those expositors must hold, who limit "mystery." Since he is speaking of local precedence alone, not of temporal, "written before" cannot be referred to a previous Epistle (CHRYSOSTOM, CALVIN: ferre omnium consensum as προετίκμεν (Gal. i. 9), προέλεγῳ, προείπον (Gal. v. 21), point to something spoken at a previous time; so 2 Cor. xiii. 2; 1 Thess. iii. 4; προεγράψῃ Rom. xv. 4 must be understood of a prophetic writing with respect to the future. But Rom. iii. 9: προηγουμένα, as in the present instance, relates to what precedes, in the same Epistle. The explanation: paulo ante (THEODORET, CALVIN, ESTIUS and others) is incorrect.

Ver. 4. In accordance with which, while reading, ye can perceive.—ἵπρος ὃ δύνασθε —ν ᾧ ἂν must at all events be joined together. Προς with the accusative denotes the measure (Rom. viii. 18) as well as the norm (2 Cor. v. 10; Gal. ii. 14). Comp. WIKER, p. 378. The relative ὃ refers to what was written briefly before, as the measure by which to reckon, on which to measure; hoc non refertur præcise ad PAUCIS, sed ad totum νοῦμα et πρὸς notat analogiam ex ungue leonem (BENGL). Accordingly it is not to be applied merely to what was written before (MEYER: προέγραψα), or to ἐν ὀλίγῳ (STIER): nor is it = prout (JEROME), nor = ἐν ᾧ (KOPPE), nor = ἐξ οὗ (FLATT), since what precedes is neither the source or ground, but can only be

* [ALFORD refers it to i. 9 ff., EADIE to ii. 13-22; HODGE and ELLICOTT accept the wider reference. The last author refers καθὼς to the fact that the mystery was made known to the Apostle, not to the manner in which it was made known, but BRAUNE's view seems preferable.—R.]

the measure. [EADIE prefers the sense "in reference to which," but "in accordance with" is adopted by ALFORD, ELLICOTT (whose note in loco on this preposition is a marvel of neatness and exactness) and others, favored by HODGE, who adds: "what he had written might be taken as the standard or evidence of his knowledge."—R.]

With δύνασθε (BENGEL: moderate et liberaliter positum verbum) Paul refers cautiously to the ability which can be affirmed of every one; of the willingness he says nothing, that must come in afterwards. Modestly he points to what they can do, leaving to them the doing, neither commanding nor demanding it. The subject is each and all in the Church. Δύνασθε stands first very properly, since it is the emphatic word. The conditio sine qua non is indeed ἀναγινώσκοντες, reading, while ye read; not attendentes (CALVIN). Nor does he say: ἀκούοντες, hearing; he conceives of each one reading for himself. The present tense suggests repeated reading (GROTIUS). To the Greek reading [as the word indicates] was a second perception following the first perception of the author; to the Roman and German the immediate thought is of connecting the letters and joining the words (legere, lesen). [The present participle here indicates an act contemporary with that of the perception: while reading.—R.] Νοῦσαι is not exactly equivalent to συνιέναι; they differ as do our "perceive" and "understand." Comp. Mark viii. 17; TITTMANN, Syn., I. p. 191. The readers perceive that which Paul understands. It is not a knowledge possible through reflection (RUECKERT), but a kind of immediate perception (iii. 20; Rom. i. 20; Heb. xi. 3; Matt. xv. 17)*

My understanding in the mystery of Christ.—Τὴν συνέσιν μου ἐν τῷ μυστηρίῳ τοῦ Χριστοῦ.—These words are to be taken together as the object of νοῦσαι (MEYER). Συνέσις used with σοφία (Col. i. 9), has a πληροφορία (Col. ii. 2; 2 Tim. ii. 7), is vox media (1 Cor. i. 19), and marks an especial knowing, that penetrates and commands its subject, as in the case of a master of the science (Jno. iii. 11). "The mystery of Christ" (Col. iv. 3) is the mystery, which has Christ for its object and purport; Christ Himself is the concrete Divine mystery. Col. i. 27 (MEYER, STIER).† It is evident that μυστήριον is not an absolute secret, since there is an "understanding" with respect to it. See i. 9. BEZA: "Optimo vero jure de se ista predicare apostolum, re ipsa cognoscat, quisquis perspexerit, quam sublimiter et prorsus divine totum illud argumentum ab initio epistolæ pertractavit." In the connection in which Paul writes, in virtue of his office and by writing labors in and for the Church two things are evident and properly placed together; that he urgently directs the Church to what is written as a standard for their judgment respecting him, as the Apostle, by whom it is said to them, and ascribes to them unconstrained ability and freedom for examination.

Hence the inferences drawn from this passage against the genuineness of the Epistle are inadmissible. It is not necessary that he should refer to his labors among them, since his συνέσις is under discussion, and both the subject-matter itself and his mode of treating it in this Epistle are well adapted to make them aware of this. 1 Cor. xiv. 37; 1 Jno. iv. 6. Comp. Introd. § 5, 2. [See EADIE on the reasons for professing such a knowledge of the mystery. MEYER properly intimates that this verse is worthy of the Apostle (against DE WETTE, SCHWEGLER), and that an imitator would never have written it. In fact an imitator would have probably thought of it as DE WETTE does!—R.]

Ver. 5. The period and persons concerned in the communication.—Which, δ, refers to "the mystery of Christ" (ver. 4), not to "the mystery" (ver. 3); in which case we should have to regard what follows καθώς as a parenthesis (WETSTEIN, [E. V.], and others). [Dr. HODGE seems disposed to regard ver. 4 as a parenthesis, but the relative forms a direct connection. The other construction is an attempt to avoid the difficulty which arises in taking ver. 6 as the purport of the "mystery of Christ."—R.]

In other generations.—The dative ἐτέραις γενεαῖς, is a temporal qualification, which is of very common occurrence; see WINER, p. 205. So ii. 12; Matt. xii. 1: τοῖς σαββάτοις; Luke xiii. 14: τῷ σαββάτῳ. The word γενεά designates the lineage, the family, Matt. i. 1, 17; also in a spiritual sense, Matt. xvii. 17; Mark ix. 19. Then a generation, Matt. xxiv. 34; Luke i. 48; xxi. 32; Phil. ii. 15; and also an age, Acts xiv. 16; xv. 21; Luke i. 50; Col. i. 26 (ἀπὸ τῶν αἰώνων καὶ τῶν γενεῶν); here the temporal idea is the prominent one, only a shorter period of about 33 years is meant. There is no ground for taking it as = time, era (SCHENKEL); and still greater objection to retaining the meaning: lineage, and taking it as an ordinary dative, so that "the sons of men" is an exegesis, which sets forth in concreto what is meant by the "generations" (MEYER). The antithesis "now" demands a temporal definition here. Yet it must be noticed, that the word "generations" is chosen on account of the various stages of revelation to the patriarchs, Moses, David and the prophets.

[MEYER, in his 4th edition, gives up his former opinion, adopting the usual view of our word, mainly on the ground that νῦν requires an antithetical temporal qualification here. Still he correctly insists on the meaning "generations," over against "times" or "periods." HODGE apparently inclines to the earlier view of MEYER.—The word is used in the LXX. to translate the Hebrew word דור, which admits of the temporal signification, now generally attached to γενεαῖς in this passage. ELLICOTT remarks

* [The aorist infinitive, according to DONALDSON (Grammar, § 427, 8) "describes a single act either as the completion or as the commencement of a continuity." Hence ALFORD says that here "the act is regarded as one of a series, each of which, when it occurs, is sudden and transitory." Comp. ELLICOTT in loco, who does not press the aorist here; and WINER, p. 313, where the idiomatic use of the aorist infinitive after δύναμαι is mentioned. The view of Braune is in any case allowable.—R.]

† [So ALFORD, ELLICOTT and others. EADIE prefers to take the genitive as one of the object, but Braune does so, and yet reaches MEYER's explanation. In any case "the mystery" here refers to the whole wonderful scheme or purpose of Redemption in Christ, of which He is Himself the centre. See note on ver. 3.—R.]

that in one case (Isa. xxiv. 22) even ד'ב' is thus rendered.—R.]

Was not made known. οὐκ ἐγνωρίσθη .—This in distinction from ἀποκαλύβηθαι is something more general and indefinite. BENGE: Notificatio per REVELATIONEM (ver. 3) est fons notificationis per praeconium. REVELATIO est quiddam specialius; NOTIFICATIO fit ad reliquos etiam auditores, REVELATIO tantum ad prophetas.

To the sons of men, $\text{τοῖς υἱοῖς τῶν ἀνθρώπων}$.—Only here and in Mark iii. 28, Latissimu appellatio, causam exprimens ignorantiae, ortum naturarum (BENGEL, who adds with overnicely: de statu vetere loquitur idiotismo linguae hebraicae). The antithesis is found in "His holy apostles and prophets," which moreover compels us to give prominence to the "need of men born of men" (HABLESS), while ἐν πνεύματι suggests the lack of the regeneration, correlated to revelation (STIER); so that under the term ד'ב' we must include also the Old Testament men of God, such as Abraham (Gal. iii. 8), and even the prophets (Rom. ix. 24-29; xv. 9-12), whom JEROME would exclude. BENGE, however, is incorrect, when he says: denotari praecipue PROPHETAS antiquos, v. g. Ezechielem, qui saepe dicitur ד'ב' ; thus he is described not as a prophet, but as a man born of men. [EADIE thinks the phrase was suggested by the word γενεά. "Sons succeeded fathers, and their sons succeeded them; so that by 'sons of men' is signified the successive band of contemporaries whose lives measured these fleeting γενεαί."—R.]

As it has been now revealed.— Ὡς contrasts now (νῦν) and formerly. On account of this ὥς , we must take οὐκ ἐγνωρίσθη as $\text{οὐχ οὕτως ἐγνωρίσθη}$, "not thus made known," and supply here in thought: "through their words and works" (CHRYSOSTOM). Comp. Doctr. Notes. It is only asserted that the knowledge of the mystery in former times is not to be regarded as at all equal to the knowledge which now exists; the latter is immeasurably deeper, richer, clearer than the former. It is incorrect to interpret ὥς as=while, and to infer that the mystery was not all known before (BLEEK); that cannot be asserted.

His holy apostles and prophets.—The Apostles are ἅγιοι , because they are Christians; Paul can have no hesitation in affirming of the Apostles, what he had already said of the whole Church (i. 1); of course a higher degree is involved here, especially since they, as well as the Old Testament prophets, who are called "holy," Luke i. 70; Acts iii. 21; 2 Pet. i. 21 (various reading), are termed "prophets." The Apostles also were of themselves naturally only "the sons of men," but like the Christians a holy ἐκλογή . "His," according to the context (ver. 2), must be understood of God, and "apostles and prophets," especially on account of the word "now," must be interpreted as in ii. 20. It is incorrect to regard τοῖς ἁγίοις as qualified by what follows as an appositional phrase. [So LACHMANN, BISPING].

In the Spirit, ἐν πνεύματι , is to be joined with the verb, and defines the modality of the revelation and its communication. It cannot be joined either with "prophets" (CHRYSOSTOM)* or with "holy" (MEIER), still less with what follows (ERASMUS). It is not however = διὰ τοῦ πνεύματος , 1 Cor. ii. 10 (LUTHER: durch den Geist), [E. V., HODGE, ELLICOTT, MEYER], but denotes the life-sphere, within which the revelation is accomplished: one must live in the Spirit to be a partaker in the revelation. BENGE: cujus donum Novo Testamento reservatum ad Christum glorificandum. The glory of the revelation and the importance of the Apostolic office so overpower Paul here, that he forgets himself altogether.

[OLSHAUSEN: "It is certainly peculiar, that Paul here calls the Apostles, and consequently himself among them, 'holy Apostles.' It is going too far when De Wette finds in this a sign of an unapostolic origin of the Epistle; but still the expression remains an unusual one. I account for it to myself thus—that Paul here conceives of the Apostles and Prophets, as a corporation (comp. iv. 11), and as such, in their official character, he gives them the predicate ἅγιοι , as he names believers, conceived as a whole, $\text{ἅγιοι ἢ ἡγιασμένοι}$, but never an individual."—R.]

Ver. 6. The purport of the mystery. That the Gentiles are (εἶναι τὰ ἔθνη).—The infinitive, standing here in emphatic position, is exegetical of μυστήριον , "mystery," hence not to be joined with "revealed" (FLATT), or with "made known," nor is εἰς τοῦ to be supplied; and it should not be taken as γίνεσθαι . ["A mystery is not a secret design, but a secret fact" (ALFORD); hence "are," not "should be." So most commentators.—R.]

Fellow-heirs.— Συγκληρονόμα , not as in Rom. viii. 17 (Χριστοῦ), but "of the saints" (ii. 19), the believing Israel. Comp. i. 14, 18; Gal. iii. 29. With the saints they are heirs of God (Rom. viii. 17), as His children. That is the highest privilege.—Fellow-members [of the same body].— καὶ σύσσωμα denotes, by means of a peculiarly formed word, the membership in that body, the Head of which is Christ (i. 23; ii. 12, 16).—Fellow-partakers of the promise, $\text{καὶ συμμετοχα τῆς ἐπαγγελίας}$. [See Textual Note 6.] This denotes participation in the promise (i. 13; ii. 12; Gal. iii. 14), the fulfilment of which is already begun, but by no means completed as yet; $\text{βασιλεία γὰρ ἐπιγγέλλται παρὰ τοῦ πατρὸς}$ (EUCUMEN.). It refers neither in general to res or bona promissa, nor in particular to the Holy Ghost alone, as BENGE, [EADIE] and STIER think, who find a reference to the Head, Christ, in "fellow-members," and to the Father in "fellow-heirs," and thus to the Trinity as in iv. 4-6, 18, 21, 30; v. 1, 2, 18; 2 Cor. xiii. 13. There is as little ground for this as there is indication of a climax (JEROME, PELAGIUS, SCHENKEL: heir, possessor, partaker). For "fellow-heir" comprises the whole, on the ground of the relation to God as a Father, who has prepared an inheritance for His children; the two added terms respect their relation among each other: the first arising from the relation of the community to which dependence attaches, the other springing directly from the personality regarded as self-inclusive; the first marks the membership in the Church, the relation to it, the second the independence of the individuals, their relation in and of itself. Hence it cannot be said, that what is already sufficiently expressed by the term "fellow-heir," is repeated twice afterwards, once figuratively and the second time literally (MEYER), or that Paul creatively rummaged in the language (KAHNIS), or that the first term contains a personal and substantive reference (HARLESS), which is further indicated by the other two. [ELLICOTT's view resembles that of Braune, but is more clearly expressed: "The general fact of the συνκληρονουσία is re-asserted, both in its outward and inward relations. The Gentiles were fellow-heirs with the believing Jews in the most unrestricted sense: they belonged to the same corporate body, the faithful; they shared to the full in the same spiritual blessings: the ἐπαγγελία."—R.]

In Christ Jesus through the Gospel.—"In Christ Jesus," defines "are" more closely and, like this, relates to all three of the preceding words. It cannot be joined with "promise" (KOPPE, BAUMGARTEN-CRUSIUS). Thus Paul indicates that all is communicated only in Him, the God-man. Hence "through the Gospel" is added, in order to point to the means by which that objectively given in Christ, already proffered and prepared, is brought to the individual, is presented for his subjective appropriation. Because Paul is speaking of his office and calling, he must add this also.

The ministry and unworthiness of the recipient; vers. 7, 8 a.

Ver. 7. Whereof I became a minister [οὗ ἐγενήθην διάκονος].—"Whereof" refers to "Gospel" (Col. i. 23, 25).—Διάκονος (Col. i. 7) is a synonym of ὑπηρετής (1 Cor. iv. 1; Matt. xxvi. 58; Mark xiv. 54, 65; Jno. vii. 32, 45 f., etc.); and according to its etymology (διὰ—κόνις, *dust), like the latter (ὑπὸ—ἐρέτης, rower), designates a servant of a lower order, while οἰκόννομος (1 Cor. iv. 1; Tit. i. 7; 1 Pet. iv. 16) denotes one as related to the property, συνεργός (1 Cor. iii. 9; 1 Thess. iii. 2), as related to the works of his Master, δούλος (vi. 6; Col. iv. 12; Rom. i. 1; vi. 16; 1 Cor. vii. 21; Gal. i. 10; Phil. i. 1), in his dependence on his Master, λατουνργός (Rom. xiii. 6; xv. 16) in his devotion. It is incorrect to assert that διάκονος describes the servant in his activity for the service, ὑπηρετής in that for his Master (HARLESS). [See MEYER and ELLICOTT against HARLESS].—"Εγενήθην" marks more strongly than ἐγενόμην [Rec.] his becoming a servant, refers to a development, even if not as ECUMENIUS (οὐδὲν γὰρ ἐγὼ ἔργον ἐμὸν συνεισένεγκα τῇ χάριτι ταύτῃ), RUCKERT and others think; that thought is found in the context, not in the word.

* [According to BUTTMANN (Lexic. under the word διάκονος) this word is derived from διάκω, or διῶκα, to hasten. The Ionic form is διῶκωνος, and the a is long, hence it is not a compound with διὰ. ELLICOTT refers to Benfey, Wurzelsyntax for remoter difficulties.—R.]

According to the gift of the grace of God [κατὰ τὴν δωρεάν τῆς χάριτος τοῦ Θεοῦ].—KARÄ marks the fact that Paul's becoming a minister of the Gospel had for its norm the grace of God. Δωρεά (iv. 7; Rom. v. 17), the single gift, like δῶρον (ii. 8), marks the free present. "The grace of God" sets forth the nature, purport of the gift. [The genitive is one of apposition or identity; the grace was the gift.—R.] LUTHER accordingly is incorrect: according to the gift out of grace, as if this were the source, the dispenser, while the gift itself was something else, such as the gift of tongues (GROTIUS), the Holy Ghost (A-LAPIDE, FLATT). It is in accordance with the context to think of the Apostolic office [HODGE, EADIE]; but the grace of God, which Paul had received, prepared him for this; He cannot use for His service persons as they are. He must convert and transform them for this end (ii. 10).

Which was given to me.—TISCHENDORF retains τὴν δοθεῖσαν in spite of the Cod. Sin. [See Textual Note 9. The received reading makes "given" agree with "gift;" the other with "grace," the sense being the same in either case.—R.]

According to the working of his power [κατὰ τὴν ἐνέργειαν τῆς δυνάμεως αὐτοῦ].—"According to the working" (i. 19) marks that the gift has been bestowed, not according to the receptivity of the recipient, but according to the efficiency of the Giver. [This prepositional clause depends on τῆς δοθείσας μοι, defining the mode of giving. This justifies the seeming tautology: "the gift given to me." MEYER, whom ELLICOTT cites in favor of connecting the phrase with the leading verb, now adopts this simpler view. Dr. HODGE accepts without remark the incorrect rendering of the E. V., which, not content with the instrumental sense it imposes so frequently on ἐν, here gives κατὰ the same sense: by.—R.] "Of His power" gives prominence to God's power, and throws Paul's person into the back-ground; yet recalls the fact, as he himself does in ver. 8, that it is precisely the persecutor who has become an Apostle, the narrow-minded, proud Pharisee who has been transformed into the most large-hearted and humble servant of the Gospel to the Gentiles (STIER). CALVIN: In hoc dono prædicat Dei potentiam, ac si diceret: nolite respicere, quid sim meritis, quia dominus ultro mihi sua liberalitate hoc contulit, ut sim apostolus gentium, non mea dignitate, sed ejus gratia. Nolite etiam respicere qualis fuerim; nam domini est, homines nihili extollere. Hæc est potentie ejus efficacia, ex nihilo grande aliquid efficere

Ver. 8. To me, who am less than the least, ἐμοὶ τῷ ἐλαχιστοτέρῳ.—The pronoun in the dative stands first, somewhat remarkably; we might rather expect: αὐτῇ ἡ χάρις ἐδόθη τῷ ἐλαχιστοτέρῳ πάντων, this very grace is grace to less than the least of all. But the pronoun refers to ver. 1, and must be joined with it. It is scarcely possible that after the grammatical and logical conclusion of the sentence begun in ver. 1 (ver. 7: τῆς δυνάμεως αὐτοῦ) another entirely new sentence should begin in ver. 8, only to introduce a parenthetical thought, especially as the sentence closes with ver. 12, beyond which the supposed parenthesis must be continued. [The objections to this view of the connection will be found in my note at the close of ver. 1. Dr. Braune's difficulty suggested above is not so singular in a writer like Paul as the resumption by means of a dative. As regards the logical connection, ELLICOTT remarks: "No addition was required to the former period; the great Apostle however so truly, so earnestly felt his own weakness and nothingness (2 Cor. xii. 11), that the mention of God's grace towards him awakens within, by the forcible contrast it suggests, not only the remembrance of his former persecutions of the Church (1 Cor. xv. 9, 10), but of his own sinful nature (1 Tim. i. 15) and unworthiness for so high an office." The transition always seems natural to one who is familiar with Paul's modes of thought.—R.]

STIER attempts to transfer the double comparative into the German: dem Gerinsteren. BEN-GEL: Notio nominis PAULUS cumulat per comparativum superlativo superiorem; quo se sanctis vix accenset; elegantissima modestia. A similar double comparative is found in 3 Jno. 4: μειζότερον. Comp WINTER, p. 67, where he compares the Latin minimissimus, pessimissimus. [To this we may add excelsior, now almost naturalized in English; a word constructed precisely like Paul's double comparative. The rendering of the E. V. cannot be improved.—R.] Comp. 1 Cor. xv. 9: ἐλάχιστος τῶν ἀποστόλων. Here he cannot sufficiently express himself; here he speaks of the service of the Gospel in general. Accordingly he adds:

Of all saints, πάντων ἁγίων, i. e. Christians; he does not say of "Apostles," nor yet "of men," two interpretations, the latter of which is designed to exclude angels, without any ground. According to Phil. iii. 6; 1 Tim. i. 13, Paul's persecution of the Church of Christ is the strongest expression of sin in him, so that, according to the context, compared with all Christians, he regards himself as the most unworthy, because he is conscious of his sin and guilt, feeling that since God's grace has helped him, there is no one whom it cannot and may not help.

Was this grace given, ἐδόθη ἡ χάρις αὐτῇ.—This is the grace which lies at the foundation of his vocation as Apostle (STIER), not the Apostolic office itself (RUECKERT).—Αὐτῇ, "this," points forward to what follows, which sets forth wherein this grace consists. What he has set forth in ver. 6 as the purport of the mystery, as the mission of the Apostles in general, he now represents as that which is committed to him. There is not therefore here a parenthesis and exclamation of joy: "to me less than the least, is this grace given!" so that what follows is to be joined with "gift," ver. 7 (HARLESS); for vers. 2-12 do not form an interpolation, but the sentence begun in ver. 1 is entirely broken off, and αὐτῇ does not refer to what precedes, nor is ii. 6 to be compared with this construction.

The magnitude of the mission; vers. 8 b, 9.

Ver. 8 b. To preach to the Gentiles [τοῖς ἔθνεσιν ἐναγγελίσασθαι.—"An explanatory and partly appositional clause," ELLICOTT.—R.] The infinitive here sets forth the mission of the gift of grace, as in ver. 6 it indicated the purport of the mystery. See WINTER, p. 298. The dative, which in accordance with the context stands first for emphasis, is a more difficult reading than if ἐν were inserted, as in Gal. i. 16. [See Textual Note ¹⁰.] Yet to Paul was committed the task of preaching to the Gentiles (Gal. i. 16; ii. 8; 1 Tim. ii. 7; Acts ix. 15; xxii. 21; xxvi. 17), not merely among the Gentiles; he should do what he could, the completed solution of the problem belongs to God.

The unsearchable riches of Christ, τὸ ἀνεξίχνιαστον πλοῦτος τοῦ Χριστοῦ.—THEODORET is excellent: καὶ πῶς κηρύττει, εἴπερ ὁ πλοῦτος ἀνεξίχνιαστος; Τοῦτο γὰρ αὐτοῖ, φησί, κηρύττω, ὅτι ἀνεξίχνιαστος. Rom. xi. 32. "Of Christ" is not an abbreviated form for the grace, the goodness of Christ, but refers rather to the fulness of the glory (HARLESS). [ALFORD: "The fulness of wisdom, righteousness, sanctification and redemption—all centred and summed up in Him."—R.] BUCER: Jam evangelium exponit investigabiles divitias Christi, non illas quidem, quas nemo nostrum percipere potest, sic enim frustra prædicaretur nobis evangelium; sed quod quisque pro modulo dono suo tantum percipiat opum celestium, quantum ad salutem, consequendam satis est. There is ever indeed an immeasurable remainder, and poor needy souls seek in vain to exhaust it (Berlenburger Bible). Comp. ver. 19; 1 Cor. xiii. 9-12. [Exhaustless "both in its nature, extent and application" (ELLICOTT).—R.]

Ver. 9. And to make all see, καὶ φωτίσαι πάντας.—This adds to "preach," a further task of the Apostle, which is accomplished by means of the preaching of the gospel; what the gospel can do (2 Cor. iv. 4: τὸν φωτισμὸν τοῦ εὐαγγελίου) this the evangelizing Apostle effects, whose word enlightens as a "word of prophecy," which is a "light shining in a dark place" (2 Pet. i. 19). He is bidden "to open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light" (Acts xxvi. 18). See i. 18; Heb. vi. 4; x. 32; Ps. cxix. 130. The object is "all," which according to the context, means the Gentiles hearing him; there is no reference to the Jews (PRELAGIUS, HARLESS, STIER), since πάντας, "all," following the emphatic τοῖς ἔθνεσιν (ver. 8) cannot receive any emphasis. Since, however, no such accusative as "eyes" is added, the verb "enlighten" refers to the whole man, spirit, heart, conscience, not merely to the perceptive faculty (SCHENKEL), nor is it = docere (BENGEL). It is more than "make known," almost equivalent to ἀποκάλυψις, revelation (STIER).* As to what he enlightens the Gentiles then follows:

What is the dispensation of the mystery, τίς ἡ οἰκονομία τοῦ μυστηρίου.—See on i. 9, 10. The "mystery" here is not merely the calling of the Gentiles (ver. 6), but as in ii. 8; here "the actual accomplishment of the plan hitherto formed in secret" (STIER) is treated of. [HODGE favors the same view. ELLICOTT:

* [ALFORD: "Not merely externally to teach, referred to his work—but internally to enlighten the hearers, referred to their apprehension." HODGE takes the verb as equivalent to "teach;" EADIE is much better.—R.]

"The dispensation (arrangement, regulation) of the mystery (the union of Jews and Gentiles in Christ, ver. 6), which was to be humbly traced and acknowledged in the fact of its having secretly existed in the primal counsels of God, and now having been revealed to the heavenly powers by means of the Church." So MEYER, ALFORD and most. See on ver. 3, however.—R.]

Which from the beginning of the world hath been hid in God who created all things [τοῦ ἀποκεκρυμένου ἀπὸ τῶν αἰώνων ἐν τῷ θεῷ τῷ πάντα κτίσαντι].—Τοῦ ἀποκεκρυμένου is like σσιγημένου, Rom. xvi. 25; comp. 1 Cor. ii. 7; Col. i. 26. It has been hid ἀπὸ τῶν αἰώνων (Col. i. 26; = ἀπ' αἰῶνος, Luke i. 70; Acts iii. 21; ἐκ τοῦ αἰῶνος, Jno. ix. 32), since the ages, from the beginning of the same; since there were men and angels, it has been revealed to none of them; before that there was no one, from whom it could be hid (MEYER). It was concealed "in God who created all things." Thus God is marked as the Creator of the universe with all that therein is, of heaven and earth. BENDEL: Antitheton ad creaturas, etiam excellentissimas, ver. 10. There is no ground for limiting "all things," and referring it either to the moral creation* (CALVIN, GROTIUS, MORUS, and others), which is forbidden both by the meaning of the word and by the aorist (κτίσας), or to the moral world (HOLSHAUSEN). Evidently, however, Redemption and creation are thus placed in relation and connection with each other; BENDEL takes the latter as fundamentum omnis reliquæ æconomix, pro protestate Dei universali liberrimæ dispensatæ; STIER regards the former as fundamentum creationis rerum omnium, even of angels. We can and must join together Creation and Redemption, as decrees, dare not separate them, even though the act of creation self-evidently precedes the act of Redemption and the acts of revelation, and is ordered with a view to these.

[The only question that arises in regard to this passage is this, Why is the creation introduced in this connection? HODGE deems it a mere expression of reverence, but this is unsatisfactory. ALFORD thinks the fact here expressed "involves His perfect right to adjust all things as He will," thus the concealment is justified (so RUECKERT). To this MEYER properly objects, that there is no logical connection of this kind, and ELLICOTT says: "A reference to God's omniscience would more suitably have justified the concealment." OLSHAUSEN's view, that Redemption is itself a creative act seems equally irrelevant. It is either added to enhance the idea of God's omnipotence (ELLICOTT), or better with MEYER, EADIE, and others, to indicate that God in creating the world included in His purpose and arrangement that development which forms the purport of the mystery.—R.]

The end with a glance at the final cause and also at the present; vers. 10-12.

Ver. 10. To the intent that now, etc.—Upon what ἵνα depends will be best determined after the whole verse has been explained. Γνω-

* [The correct reading takes away the only support which this view could have from text or context.—R.]

πισθῇ νῦν is the order in the Greek, hence the former word is emphatic and corresponds with "hath been hid," just as "now" does with "from the beginning." Comp. WINER, p. 269. [We might render: "In order that there might be made known now," (the last word having a secondary emphasis).—R.]

Unto the principalities and powers, ταῖς ἀρχαῖς καὶ ταῖς ἐξουσίαις.—Thus the objects, to which it is made known, are marked as of importance. See i. 21. [The repetition of the article adds solemnity without distinguishing two classes.—R.]

In the heavenly places, ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις, describes them more closely as to locality (comp. i. 3); hence they are not earthly and human, either heathen priests, Jewish rulers or Christian church authorities, but angels, and good angels, who desire to look into these things (1 Pet. i. 12). CALVIN: Quid enim egregium de evangelio prædicaret apostolus aut de gentium vocatione, si nunc primum diabolus innotuisse diceret? The context does not permit us to apply the terms to bad angels (AMBROSIASTER), nor even to consider them as included (BENDEL, OLSHAUSEN, HOFMANN, Schriftbeweis, I. p. 361 f., BLEEK), since it treats of a designed making known of the wisdom of God to His praise.* That Paul did not concisely say "angels," arises from the fact that here, as in i. 21, he wishes to give prominence to their power and elevation, here to glorify the Church, as there to glorify Christ, hence the agency of angels in the world of nations is not indicated (HOFMANN). In order to mark that a cosmical relation is under discussion here as in i. 10, the "powers" are termed ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις. This added phrase is so joined with "principalities and powers" as to form a single conception; hence does not indicate the modality of the verb "made known" (MATTHIES). This is done by the next phrase.

Through the church, διὰ τῆς ἐκκλησίας.—This is the theatre of the glory of God, of the Divine works (BENDEL), see 1 Cor. iv. 9. It is a communion in heaven and on earth, the militant and triumphant church, and as such an object of interest to the good angels (Matth. xviii. 10; Luke xv. 7, 10; 1 Cor. xi. 10; Heb. i. 14). LUTHER renders: an die Gemeinde, on the church, which does not accurately present the means employed, as it makes of the church only an object of observation or a place of instruction, while the preposition διὰ presents it as an instructress, who makes known, not in words indeed, but by acts, conduct and character.

The manifold wisdom of God, ἡ πολυποικίλος σοφία τοῦ θεοῦ.—Ποικίλος occurs with νόσος, Matth. iv. 24; Mark i. 34; Luke iv. 40, with ἐπιθυμίας 2 Tim. iii. 6, with ῥόναϊς Tit. iii. 3, with δυνάμει Heb. ii. 4, with διδάχαῖς Heb. xiii. 9, with περὶ αἰσῶν Jas. i. 2; 1 Pet. i. 6, with χάριτος 1 Pet. iv. 10; iii. 7 (various reading) and means "various;" so that the special word πολυποικίλος, occurring only here means multifarious, strengthening the idea of "manifold." Accordingly it cannot be = very wise (KOPPE), nor mean merely the wisdom which adjusts the antagonism between law and grace (HARLESS), but it refers "to those wondrous ways operating on the Church" of that God "who imparts reconciliation and actually edifies the church" (SO STIER, who incorrectly limits it to the Holy Ghost), to the different treatment of different men, the various means He employs, so that He is "to each eternally another and yet to each eternally the same" (LAVATER). Rom. xi. 33, 34. The "wisdom" is indeed one, it is only its manifestation that is so manifold (ANSELM); certainly it is not that of Gnosticism (BAUR). What is said of the Old Testament in Heb. i. 1 ("sundry times and divers manners") is true in the highest degree of the New Testament economy.

[ALFORD: "It is all one in sublime unity of truth and purpose: but cannot be apprehended by finite minds in this its unity, and therefore is by Him variously portioned out to each finite race and finite capacity of individuals—so that the Church is a mirror of God's wisdom—chromatic, so to speak, with the rainbow colors of that light which in itself is one and undivided." ELLICOTT: "The variety of the Divine counsels, which nevertheless all mysteriously co-operated toward a single end—the call of the Gentiles, and salvation of mankind by faith in Jesus Christ." "That the holy angels are capable of a specific increase of knowledge, and of a deepening insight into God's wisdom, seems from this passage clear and incontrovertible."—R.]

It is evident then that this clause of design depends with its iva on the clause: "What is the dispensation of the mystery." The arrangement, management and guidance of this edifice (oikon oikoumen) is of precisely that kind (τῆς), so planned, that (iva) through the church as a collection of believing saints out of every land and condition the wisdom of God should in continued acts become perceptible and manifest to the participant and active angelic world in the most multifarious manner; that is the purpose of the "dispensation of the mystery, which from the beginning hath been hid in God who created all things." The mystery has not been hid from the ages, in order that God's wisdom might be revealed later (MEYER, SCHENKEL, [EADIE] BLEEK), nor has God created all things, that this might be made known through the Church (HARLESS); this purpose and design does not form a closer definition of "mystery" nor of "God," but of His "economy." Nor is the ground of this purpose found in the task set before the Apostle Paul (STIER), his preaching and enlightening, but in that which he has to preach and about which he has to enlighten, which remains after him and his labor, upon which he entered as fellow-laborer; hence in the economy of God itself.

[This view of Braune is certainly plausible, but it is not preferable to that which he mentions last, viz., that this verse is joined with the "preaching" and "enlightening" of vers. 8, 9 (so OLSHAUSEN, DE WETTE, HOFMANN, HODGE, ELLICOTT, ALFORD, who however thinks the reference is to ἐδόθη, if one word must be singled out). The objection that this ascribes too much to Paul's own preaching (MEYER) is scarcely valid in view of the current of thought and the fact that the "manifold wisdom" did manifest itself through the preaching of the Apostle to the Gentiles. OLSHAUSEN: "Paul contrasts the greatness of his vocation with his personal nothingness, and he therefore traces the design of his mission through different steps. First, he says, he had to preach to the heathen; then to enlighten all concerning the mystery; and both, in order to manifest even to angels the infinite wisdom of God."—To take iva as ecbatic is altogether inadmissible. The connection with "created" is accepted by some who adopt the longer reading and refer this then to the moral creation. HARLESS however adopts the same connection in a supralapsarian sense. As this is the only passage in the New Testament which can be made to assert this view, it may be here remarked: (1.) This is singular and involves a theory of creation which, however logical, becomes too terrific to be admitted on the strength of a doubtful exegesis. (2.) It joins a marked final clause to a participle which depends on another participle which depends on an infinitive which depends on a leading verb. (3.) The present manifestation is the end of a present operation, viz., the preaching and making known. (4.) The end of creation is distinctly stated in Col. i. 16 to be the personal Christ: εἰς αὐτόν, "unto Him," as causa finalis, "all things were created."—R.]

Ver. 11. According to the eternal purpose, κατὰ πρόθεσιν τῶν αἰώνων, evidently defines "might be made known," not "manifold" (ANSELM), nor "wisdom" (KOPPE), certainly not vers. 3 and 5 (FLATT). The making known takes place according to the purpose "before the foundation of the world" (i. 3). The genitive marks the relation to the ages, that this purpose will be retained during these, will remain in force and regulate them. Col. i. 20: αἶμα τοῦ σταυροῦ, 2 Cor. xi. 26: κίνδυνοι ποταμῶν are similar; see WINER, p. 176. [ALFORD: "The genitive is apparently one of time, as when we say it has been an opinion of years": "The duration all that time giving the αἰῶνες a kind of possession. If so, the sense is best given in English by 'eternal,' as in E. V." ELLICOTT: "The purpose which pertained to, existed in, was determined on in the ages." Two things we may hold fast to: (1.) The general correctness of the rendering "eternal." (2.) The utter groundlessness of any Gnostic reference.—R.]

Which he wrought in Christ Jesus.—

Ἦν ἐποίησεν refers of course to πρόθεσιν, not to σοφία (LUTHER: which He has shown), nor to ἐκκλησία (ERASMUS): Πρόθεσιν ποιεῖν means either to form a purpose (Rev. xvii. 17; γνώμην ποιεῖν, Mark xv. 1: συμβούλιον ποιεῖν), or to execute one. The context points to the carrying out, which is however just begun: the mystery has already become clear in the gospel, it is no longer as before, and ver. 12, with its emphatic "we have," gives prominence to the present time. Hence it is incorrect to render: "which He purposed" (CALVIN, RUECKERT, HARLESS, HOFMANN, Schriftbeweis, 1, p. 230); in that case we would find the verb in the middle voice (ἐποίησατο), which is used in a periphrasis like this (WINER, p. 240).^{*} To combine the two (STIER) is altogether improper; we must choose one or the other.—“In” denotes, that outside of Him who existed before all (Χριστῶ) and has now become incarnate (Ἰησοῦ) and without Him God’s purpose is not accomplished.

The added: Our Lord, τῷ κυρίῳ ἡμῶν, pointing to the time of His appearing, is added on account of the ἐκκλησία, the ἡμῶν, whose Head and Lord is Jesus the Christ. [ALFORD is forced by his view of the verb to apply the whole to Christ in His pre-existence, which is very unusual.—R.] It is now explicable why the angels through such a church obtain wider knowledge of God’s wisdom. At the same time the phrase introduces what follows.

Ver. 12. In whom we have, ἐν ᾧ ἔχομεν.—[The relative has here a slightly demonstrative and explanatory force (MEYER, ELLICOTT).—R.] Here “we” evidently means those who are really in Him; our fellowship with Him is the fundamental thought. For the gifts which are afterwards mentioned, do not inhere in Him, as do Truth, Love, Life, but are states of mind resulting from fellowship with Him or ripened relations.

Our boldness and our access in confidence [τὴν παρρησίαν καὶ τὴν προσαγωγὴν ἐν πεποιθήσει. See Textual Note¹³.]—On the first term see my remarks on Jno. ii. 28, LANGE’S Comm., p. 82.† It is used by Paul besides in vi. 19; Col. ii. 15; Phil. i. 20; 2 Cor. iii. 12; vii. 4; 1 Tim. iii. 13; Philem. 8; and is found in Heb. iii. 6; iv. 16; x. 19, 35. Here it means the free, joyous spirit of the redeemed, and must not be limited either to libertas dicendi (VATABLE), or to prayer (BENGEL). Καὶ τὴν προσαγωγὴν ἐν πεποιθήσει, “our access in confidence,” forms a single conception; the last term is not to be joined with “boldness;” for that does not require as a closer definition what it has essentially in itself. “Access” (ii. 18) however requires it, since this may be feeble, timid, anxious, uncertain of acceptance.‡

^{*}[ALFORD supports the sense: “constituted,” urging that Paul would have used a more definite verb to express the idea of executing the purpose, and further that the aorist seems to point back to a definite act of origination, while the perfect would better express the continued execution. The latter remark has some force, but does not outweigh the arguments supporting the other sense: (1) That the name of “Jesus,” the historical Saviour, follows immediately; (2) that the next verse is an explanatory confirmation of the accomplished, not the purposed design (MEYER). It may be added that this meaning is more common in the New Testament (ii. 3; Matth. xxi. 31; John vi. 35; 1 Thess. v. 24 and elsewhere) than the other, which occurs only in Mark xv. 1; Rev. xvii. 17 (not Acts xvii. 37, as Braune has it in the German, repeating a typographical error, which has been allowed to remain in several editions of MEYER). Notwithstanding WINER’S distinction, in neither case do we find the middle. ELLICOTT properly renders the verb: wrought, instead of using the too definite “fulfilled.” In support of Braune’s view, the following names may be mentioned: THEOPHRET, GROTIUS, OLSHAUSEN, DE WETTE, MEYER, CONYBEARE, ELLICOTT, HODGE, EADIE.—R.]

† [Dr. Braune there refers to the mistaken conception of the term arising from one of those etymological jumbles so common in all languages. The sense is Freimüthigkeit; Luther however rendered it Freydigkeit, Freudigkeit (derived from frei, free). This was soon confounded with Freudigkeit, Freudig, joyful; a sense which has influenced English commentators as well. The joyous element is present indeed, but not so prominent as this mistake has made it.—R.]

‡ [ELLICOTT clings to the transitive meaning here also,

The “confidence” (πεποιθῆαι, only in Phil. iii. 4; 2 Cor. i. 15; iii. 4; viii. 22; x. 2), which expresses itself after the boldness (comp. Rom. viii. 38, 39 with 31-37), is the childlike confidence in which the subject of grace approaches God. The phrase, therefore, is not to be joined with “we have” (MEYER, SCHENKEL). [The latter view of the connection is adopted by ELLICOTT and ALFORD. While the other is admissible, there seems to be a gain in thought from joining it with the verb; see below.—R.]

Through our faith in Him [διὰ τῆς πίστεως αὐτοῦ].—The preposition marks that by means of which the fellowship we have with Him is brought about, and is a closer definition of ἐχομεν, “we have.” Τῆς πίστεως αὐτοῦ (only in iv. 13) like Rom. iii. 22, Gal. iii. 22, means faith on Him, viz., on Him, in whom “we have,” etc., on “Christ Jesus our Lord” (ver. 11). This faith is the subjective means of the union and the continued fellowship (Rom. v. 1, 2). [ELLICOTT taking “in confidence” as a predication of manner defining the tone and frame of mind in which the “access” is enjoyed and realized, makes the following distinctions between the three qualifying phrases: “in whom” makes the objective ground of the possession, “through our faith in Him” the subjective medium by which, and “in confidence” the subjective state in which it is apprehended. EADIE: “That faith whose object is Jesus is the means to all who are Christ’s, first, of ‘boldness,’ for their belief in the Divine Mediator gives them courage; secondly of ‘access,’ for their realization of His glorified humanity warrants and enables them to approach the throne of grace; and thirdly these blessings are possessed ‘in confidence,’ for they feel that for Christ’s sake their persons and services will be accepted by the Father.”—R.]

Ver. 13. Conclusion. Wherefore I beseech διὸ αἰτούμαι.—This refers to ver. 12 (“we have our boldness and our access”); he prays this in petition, of course, to God. [See below however.] The middle voice, upon which however too great stress must not be laid (Col. i. 9; Jas. i. 6), denotes the praying for himself

[The reference seems rather to be to the whole paragraph: “Since I am the appointed minister of so great a matter” (ALFORD; so EADIE, ELLICOTT and now MEYER). The other view is perfectly grammatical, but joins this verse to a secondary thought, while the wider reference brings us back, as if the steps were being retraced, to ver. 1: “the prisoner of Jesus Christ in behalf of you Gentiles,” the next verse passing further back to “for this cause.”—R.]

Not to faint, μὴ ἐγκκεῖν.—[Dr. Braune’s rendering is: I pray (God) not to become dispirited, i. e., that I become not dispirited; others I pray (God) that you faint not; while most accept the view which supplies ὑμᾶς as the object of the verb and the subject of the infinitive:

though admitting some uncertainty in regard to it. The union with “boldness” requires the transitive sense. “We may confidently say, that so important an objective truth as our introduction to God by Christ would never have been thus coupled to a mere subjective quality in ourselves” (ALFORD). Still it is not so purely subjective as “boldness.”—R.]

"I beseech you not to faint." See below.—R.] The subject according to the context, especially "in my tribulations," is the Apostle. It is precisely the result of his prayer to God and his intercourse with Him that he is courageous and in high-hearted joy even in tribulations.—In my tribulations for you [ἐν ταῖς θλίψεσιν μου ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν].—The word θλίψις definitely shows that the subject is the Apostle; so does the expression ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν, which is to be closely joined with θλίψεσιν μου. Accordingly Paul does not ask the readers not to faint (Vulgate, LUTHER, MEYER, BLEEK, and many others), but prays to God for himself.

[This view of the verse is supported by such able commentators as BENGEL, RUECKERT, HARLESS (who however altogether unwarrantably joins ὑπὲρ ὑμῶν with αἰτοῦμαι) OLSHAUSEN, TURNER, BAUMGARTEN-CRUSIUS, and is favored by the Syriac version, THEODORET and JEROME. Still the majority of commentators from CHRYSOSTOM to the latest English expositors, reject it. With good reason too, for (1.) it seems unpauline to insert such a prayer here; he rejoiced in suffering (Col. i. 29) and gloried in infirmity (2 Cor. xi. 30), and was speaking of high privilege little likely to suggest faint-heartedness in himself. (2.) The next clause presents, a motive (MEYER), which is irrelevant if the prayer is for himself. (3.) Notwithstanding Braune's remark, μου would be superfluous in that case. (4.) Grammatically it is far simpler to supply ὑμᾶς as the object of the finite verb and the subject of the infinitive, than to supply θεόν as the object and then ἐμέ as subject-accusative; two words necessary to define the thought would scarcely be omitted, and the view we oppose necessarily requires two different words. If, as is natural, only one is to be supplied, that one must be ὑμᾶς.—Ἐν therefore denotes the sphere in which the faint-heartedness of the Ephesians might possibly be shown (ELICOTT); the article is not necessary before ὑπὲρ, since the close connection of thought is similar to that in ver. 1: "prisoner for you Gentiles."—R.]

Which are your glory [ἧτις ἐστὶ δόξα ὑμῶν].—Ἢ τις put for αἰτινες by the attraction δόξα ὑμῶν (WINER, pp. 157, 505). The tribulations of the Apostle for the church are the honor, fame and glory of the same; it would be a detriment, distress and disgrace to the church, to have a founder and leader, who in tribulations became discouraged and despondent; but they confess a faith, for the proclamation of which the Apostles must bear heavy sorrow, yet compared with which sorrows are not to be dreaded, and they have a leader, whom they may joyously and confidently follow. This clause is not to be referred to "faint not" (HARLESS, SCHENKEL and others), nor is it to be left indefinite in an oratorical sense (RUECKERT). It is thus that he prays first for himself (ver. 13) and then (ver. 14) for the Ephesians (RHENFELD). Thus he closes the section concerning himself and his office, in order to pass to a supplication for the church.

[The reference of this clause to "tribulations" is to be maintained and is best indicated by restoring the plural form in English: which are (seeing that they are) your glory. The view of Braune stands or falls with that taken of the former part of the verse. It must be apparent that the other explanation is more satisfactory here. ELICOTT well remarks too: "Glory accrued to the Ephesians from the official dignity, not the personal dignity of the sufferer." Both because God so loved them as to give His Son first, and then to send His servants to suffering, (CHRYSOSTOM) and because these tribulations were the tokens of the freedom of the gospel (EADIE), are these "your glory." He has now returned to his starting-point (ver. 1), and resumes the thought there broken off in ver. 14.—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The idea of substitution is more ethical than doctrinal, and finds a sphere in the whole human life, in its narrowest and widest circles. The Apostle suffers for his Church; his suffering is for her advantage. So the child lives at the expense of its parents; the child for whom no one suffers is a miserable creature, and the parents who do not suffer for their child, nor take sorrow on themselves to avert them from their offspring, are no true parents. So benefactors suffer for their wards, and suffering for them, remove their pain and need. So the shepherds of the people. The suffering of human life is in its widest range vicarious. Where this really exists, without some subtle selfishness, there it is without vanity, desire to please, ambition or vain-glory, there, just as one does his duty to his neighbor, faithful in the least, does he also bear and with joy dares suffer! And it is just he who has felt the truth of the vicarious sufferings of Jesus Christ, who can thus do. The Romanists acknowledge such vicarious suffering only in the case of the saints, we find it in all departments of our social life. As Paul was a martyr, so is every teacher, every mother. But they are only martyrs, i. e., witnesses of the everlasting mercy and the everlasting redemption, Christ Jesus is the author of redemption, the mediator of mercy.

2. The official service in the Church. On this subject this section contains important suggestions of various kinds.

a. First of all Paul feels that he is "the prisoner of Christ Jesus:" he has orders, powers, duties, rights and authority from the Master; quum verbum Christi—porrigunt (ministri), Christi vice et loco porrigunt (Apology Aug. Conf. Art. vii. viii. § 28), non representant suam personam (the same, § 47).

b. The office is a gift of grace (vers. 2, 7); beneficium seu gratia, non iudicium seu lex (Apology, vi. § 6); it stands and falls with the church, so that "a priority attaches neither to the church before the office, nor to the office before the church; rather the office has never existed without the church, as the church has never existed without the office" (HARNACK, Die Kirche, ihr Amt, ihr Regiment, § 41).

c. The office must be distinguished from the general calling of Christians as a special call of the church, but not separated from it ("less than the least of all saints," ver. 8); there is no specific difference, and the ministers of the church remain members of the body of Christ, just as the private Christian does; both belong together and are included in the organism of the church. Hence the communicative "we have" (ver. 12). Here however is the distinction of the New Testament office, that it is not united with a class, family, or with definite persons, like that of the Old Testament. It is filled from among the "saints."

d. In its nature the office is a diakonia (ver. 7: ὁ ἐξενόησεν διάκονος), ministerium, not a lordship; the free inquiry of the individual member in private must not be abridged (ver. 4). "For the Apostles did not receive a mandatum cum liberu, i. e., an entirely free and unlimited authority and power, but a certain [i. e., definite] authority" (Apology, xlv. § 18).

e. The gift of this office is God's Word, and its task is the preaching of the same: "Gospel" (ver. 6), "to preach to the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ, to make all see what is the dispensation of the mystery" (vers. 8, 9); hence we must not preach our own words! So far it is juris Divini, belonging to the economy of salvation as a continuation of the apostolic ministry; not however of the apostolate * with apostolic dignity and authority, for the Apostles as persons have no successors. For this office too we must distinguish the empirical establishment of church offices, which is a matter of ecclesiastical regulation and juris humani. [These principles are of great importance, but the trouble has been that "ecclesiastical regulation" exalted itself to such a degree as to assert for its creatures the jus Divinum.—R.]

f. The equipment for and in this office is the work of the Holy Ghost, who vouchsafes the "revelation" (ver. 3), in whom the mystery is revealed (ver. 5), who furnishes the necessary "knowledge" (ver. 4).

g. Oral preaching and the Holy Scriptures belong together ("ye have heard," ver. 2; "when ye read," ver. 4) in the Apostle's method, just as the congregation should hear and read, both in public and in private.

h. This office lays claim to the person of the minister, not merely to his strength and his time; the office is not conferred upon him just as he is; it does not make demands upon him merely when an official discharge of duty is concerned. Hence the Apostle says: "I became" (ver. 7), "the grace to God which was given to me" (vers. 2, 7, 8) "according to the working of his power" (ver. 7), so that he who is "less than the least" (ver. 8) has still "boldness" and "access with confidence" (ver. 12). [Comp. here the note of EADIE, p. 231, from BAXTER'S Reformed Pastor.—R.]

3. As regards Revelation, Paul only declares, that it was actually the possession of himself and the Apostles (ver. 3, 5). We find moreover at the same time an expression of the necessity of revelation: "the mystery" would never have become "the gospel," had the Apostles been wanting in that understanding and clearness necessary to preach and explain the mystery. Evidently the personal intercourse of the Apostles with the Lord was not sufficient for this purpose, they needed the revealing Spirit, just as Paul required the appearance of the Lord. Nothing is said respecting the mode of revelation in the Apostles, except that it did not consist in a single act, but in a continuous one, which could have its pauses and its ebbings, but never ceased entirely. In the church however, it is plainly stated (ver. 6), the revelation respecting the "mystery" is mediated "through the gospel," and is therefore joined with the words of the preached gospel.

4. Hence there results the duty of the private Christian, neither to absent himself from the common public service, so that he may hear, nor to neglect private closet worship, so as to read. Upon this is based the obligation of the church to circulate the Scriptures through the agency of Bible Societies, and the crime of the Roman pontiff in forbidding and hindering this. * "The old complaint continues still: sed nos non habemus aures, sicut Deus linguam (STIER).

5. The difference in the Holy Scriptures. Old and New Testament, are defined in ver. 5, very much according to the saying of Augustine; et in vetere novum latet, et in novo vetus patet. Both treat of the "mystery," which is the purport of the gospel, as it was the subject of prophecy. The difference is only in clearness respecting this; the former lacks it, the latter possesses it. In the former the full universal idea of the gospel lies hidden, as, in a bud, in enigmatical visions and figures. The hope of the Old Testament prophets had not that clearness of understanding which belongs to the New Testament Apostles and congregations, but the intensity of the consciousness of salvation and of the sense of God's mercy was not less then than afterwards, hence not less perfect in itself, only less distinct in form and expression; so that we may in the light of the gospel and the adult church understand the prophets of the Old Testament better than they did themselves, and yet be not more perfect than they. Hence we can only say with JEROME: aliud est in spiritu ventura cognoscere, aliud ea cernere opera completa, or with CALOVIVS: distinguendum inter cognitionem generalem et specialem. The contrast of the Old and New Testament is not under discussion, as HARLESS remarks, but that bestowal of the Holy Ghost upon the Apostles, which introduced them into the entire already existing truth of redemption, and which was accordingly something actually different from the previous inspiration.

6. Carefully as the Apostle demands the reading of what he has written (ver 4: "while reading," etc.), he yet places it before them as a measure and norm ("in accordance with which"). The preached word, when written, became yet more objective and permanent, as a

* [HODGE: "You could no more appoint a man an Apostle, than you could appoint him a saint. Neither inspiration nor holiness come by appointment. An Apostle without inspiration is as much a solocism as a saint without holiness. Rome, here as everywhere, retains the semblance without the reality, the form without the power. She has Apostles without inspiration, the office without the grace of which the office was but the expression. Thus she feeds herself and her children upon ashes."—R.]

* [BAYNE (from EADIE) on ver. 4: "Here he confuteth the papists, on account of their cursed practice in taking away the key of knowledge—the reading of the Scriptures; in which fact they are like the Philistines, putting out the eyes of Samson, and taking away the smiths, not leaving a weapon in Israel."—R.]

genuine expression of the truth, accomplished by the clarifying reflection of the collected spirit (comp. PETERSEN, Idee der Christlichen Kirche, 2, p. 181 ff.). The propositions: it is true, because it is in the Scriptures, and it is in the Scriptures because it is true, supplement each other.

7. The Church is to be conceived of as a communion rising above the limits of time and of the history of humanity on the earth; it reaches into eternity. But it is also to be regarded as a sphere of the operations of God and of the revelation of His glory, which has a significance, not merely terrestrial but cosmical: a place of the revelation of the Lord, which is the high school of angels (ver. 10); we are not indeed the professors at whose feet the angels must sit as scholars, but it is God who leads them onward in the knowledge of His wisdom; we are but the means of instruction. They attend the work of Redemption from the beginning: Matth. i. 20; ii. 13, 19; Luke i. 11, 26 ff.; ii. 9 ff. Matth. iv. 11; Luke xxii. 43; Matth. xxviii. 2 ff. 1 Tim. iii. 16.

8. Creation and Redemption stand in internal connection (ver. 9); the former was not willed by God without the latter, and is arranged and ordered with reference to it.

9. The strength of the consciousness of sin (ver. 8) is here intensified by means of the contrast with the high office; it is not conditioned by special and peculiar sin, but by his especially clear and profound self-knowledge in the light of the gospel of Jesus Christ, which it was his duty to preach. HARLESS: "Into the inmost depths of the soul each one sees only for himself; what he sees in himself, he does not see in others; what he sees there says to him, that sin dwells in him (Rom. vii. 17) and that the wrath of God is upon him, and that now when God's grace has saved him, he has nothing which he has not received (1 Cor. iv. 7); the hearts of others are searched not by him, but by God." It cannot be affirmed, then, to be a constantly recurring phenomenon, that the most powerful witnesses to Christian truth have been led there through previous and great errors and wanderings; it is however true that such must have obtained a deeper knowledge and experience of corruption in their own hearts, passing through hard and humiliating struggles. Conversion in their case is no greater act of God's grace than in that of others; they feel it as such, however, more vividly and overwhelmingly: Has the Lord helped me, then I know not whom He is unable and unwilling to help!

10. The ground-tone of the Christian is "boldness" (ver. 12), which has a two-fold reference: 1) backwards to the accusing guilt and forwards to the exalted goal; 2) downwards to the threatening world and upwards to the Ever-Present One. In the first aspect this "boldness" is fearless and undoubting confidence, that sin is forgiven, its power broken, and its eradication assured, according to the promise; in the other it is the joyful assurance of the favor and nearness of God, which cannot be disturbed by circumstances the most adverse.—Hence with this "boldness" is joined "the access in confidence" to the throne of the Most High, in the prayer, certain of a hearing, to be preserved in grace and mercy, and to obtain help against the evil without us and the sin within us. [Or taking the other view of the passage, such "boldness and access" possessed "in confidence" so exalts, that he who suffers comforts those who sympathize; the sympathy of Christ not only rises above human sympathy in consoling power, but makes the sufferer able to remove in turn the reflected sorrow in the hearts of sympathizing friends.—R.]

11. Concerning faith it is only stated here, that it is the medium of the blessed condition of the child of God (ver. 12: "through our faith in Him"); it alone gives a courageous spirit, constancy and joyous confidence; without it "we have" none of these.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

That is an elevating sight—a man who has overcome sorrow and compelled it to grant him joy, strength, comfort, as a star in the night joyously twinkles for the traveller. It is sad enough, when a man, an heir of eternal life, a child of a Heavenly Father, permits himself to be overcome by sorrow and cast forth like a faded leaf from the tree, to be trodden under foot, instead of affording shade.—The cause of sorrow was to Paul a cause of joy; on account of the Gentiles, to whom he preached the gospel, he was persecuted, and this persecution turned out for their advantage.—Paul was like a sword in the contest against error and falsehood and godlessness; life was the workshop, God the Lord was the master, who formed it, but suffering was the anvil and hammer, by means of which it became solid and sharp; and that was good for the church.—That sufferer is right and sets God right before others, who is like a farmer, that knows the bright sky is ever behind the cloud of sorrow, and finds in streaming rain a blessing from above, and thus praises and thankfully accepts what city folks call "bad weather."—See to it that you know what gifts are given to you and for what. For in this is the task which you have to do; are you uncertain whether others have rightly profited by you, still be certain of this, that you have done your duty.—Joy in the ministerial office must be greater than the sorrow over the injuries which accompany it. Your calling among men is a gift of God to you and you should be a blessing of God to others.—God does not bestow His gifts of grace perfect and complete out of heaven, as one hangs up a picture in his room; but He produces them in our lives, like a harvest, for while the field is prepared, the seed sown and harrowed in, and sunshine and rain, day and night are ordained.

The Scriptures lay claim to be heard on one matter alone. God's everlasting mercy in Jesus Christ: Is that of importance to you, then the Bible is also: only there is this made clear to you.—About what is spiritual, Divine, eternal, you find no such information anywhere else, whether among the Greeks or the Germans or the English, as in the prophets and Apostles of Jesus Christ; they are greater than all the world's philosophers and poets.—It is wonderful how the mystery of Christ, the theme of the symphony of the Holy Scriptures gradually passes from the faint twilight through the gray morning of the prophets to the bright day in the birth and death of Jesus Christ, and the church, like a Memnon-stature, give a clear note in the beams of the rising sun.—“In a few lines!” often enough a mere phrase. Not so here: the rich contents, the deep insight, the pleasure in the communication, the love to the Church—all these conspire to make what is written brief, all too brief. Here the preacher may learn: much matter, few words!—Hear in the congregation, read in the closet! Walk in the Spirit and search in the Scriptures! Shun not solitude, but seek God there! These are three exhortations and three rules for the growth of the inner man.—If you do not consider yourself worse than others, you have not yet known yourself or God.—You should not lose joy or power in your calling, when you recognize in humility your own insignificance, the office is ever greater than its incumbent and rather holds him than he it.—He who with the microscope of God’s word, honestly searches and knows his own heart and life, will have in the same word, a telescope to help his gaze toward the furthest heaven, the world of angels and the life eternal, in blissful gratitude.

STARKE:—Papal Rome and what belongs thereto is as cruel as heathen Rome was, since it arrests and imprisons so many real Christians.—Let no one run into the important office of the preacher, unless God has sent him there.—Reason knows nothing of the mystery of Christ; it is a revelation from God.—God did not at once make known the secrets of His will in all their extent and present distinctness, but it pleased the Divine Wisdom to proceed therein gradually.—Each book of the Bible is like a jewel in a golden crown; Paul’s Epistles, however, have this excellence, that they lead more richly, powerfully and emphatically to Christ. Hence we must use them like daily bread for the nourishment of our souls. Happy are they who in such a perusal can say: the longer, the dearer!—The calling of the Gentiles remains full of mysteries, for thus God has shown His grace, power and truth.—Why should he who is endowed with office and gifts in Christ’s Church exalt himself? He is what he is, and has what he has, not of merit, but all of grace.—The gospel has to do with the unsearchable riches of Christ: away with all else from the pulpit, such as mere human science, pleasant stories, fables, etc.—Learn a so, O my soul, with the angels the manifold wisdom of God; learn it in the church, and watch how wonderfully God has gathered, called, upheld and protected it; learn it in thyself, and notice how wondrously He has led thee through this world.—Those teachers should be ashamed who attempt to force from the flock with knocks and scoldings, what would be so much better gained by more winning ways, by requests and entreaties.—When faithful shepherds have weak and timid sheep they must strengthen them with the consolations of the word of God and thus instil courage.—The tribulations of its teachers are no disgrace to the Church, but honor and glorious strengthening. For the power of the Spirit and of the truth manifests itself most gloriously, when on this account one is willing to suffer also.

RIEGER:—The chain and the soldier, with which and to whom Paul was bound made him the prisoner of the Emperor, but the willingness of spirit with which these bonds were borne was from Jesus Christ; hence he was “the prisoner of Christ Jesus,” who also was near him and had an oversight of all that occurred to him. To know and make known God in His unsearchable love is more than to investigate all the works of His hands.—God will not give up His right as Creator, His purpose, which he had in the foundation of the world, with respect to the Kingdom of His Son, but through Redemption will save the Creation, and restore it to its original goodness.—How greatly is the manifold wisdom of God made known through the Church, in the gathering of it from all tribes and tongues, in the adorning of it with so many and varied gifts, in overruling all events for its good, in enduring so many tares, in the unfailing fulfilment of all the declarations of God.

HEUBNER:—Every one has a criterion of his Christian knowledge, in his proper perception of the purpose of God in Christ and the indispensableness of Christ. In our day this is often willingly changed. Many would make of Christianity, something local, temporal, and thus degrade it.—Christ is inexhaustible for mind and heart; we find all in Him. If we would speak of Him, the theme is never exhausted. Let us never make of this rich Christ a poor one!—What Christ has instituted must truly be something transcendent, and not so common that every intellect can discover it; else the angels would not be able to look into it and be satisfied therewith.

PASSAVANT:—Paul will not speak or teach from his own wisdom or his own inspirations; he will not give or recommend any thing, that is from his own thought or mind or will; at this he trembles, against this his whole conduct and life in the service of his Lord speaks. Nor will he speak a single word of any wise or learned one of this world, any birth or abortion of their little brain and great conceit; as little will he borrow from their idle word.—Divinely great was the light, which appeared, on so many pages of the Psalms and Prophets, respecting the calling of the Gentiles; yet even to the Old Testament seers themselves this, like many other things in the future universal economy of salvation, remained largely in the dark; much both in general and in particular was still concealed. Still less than they, did the people to whom they prophesied, perceive this mystery. Besides this, up to the times of Christ and afterwards, the view of most of them was disturbed by their inborn enmity and profound contempt for the Gentiles.—Among these “holy Apostles and prophets” none seem to have viewed the mystery of Christ with so clear, profound and quick a glance as did the Apostle Paul.—The great Apostle knows nothing save grace, will know nothing save grace.—The richer my life, my experience, my knowledge of grace, the richer the gifts, the joys, the richer my eternity, the nearer to the eternal building of God, so much the less can I understand it all, so much more deep and unfathomable are these depths.—“The highest of sciences is Christianity!” says a friend of God; “little as Christians devote their attention and study to it! the highest, most enlightened of the angels have made it their study, and learn from it to perceive God in a manner worthy of Him; and those, for whom such a master-piece is wrought, do not know it nor deem it worth their knowledge." Others, on the contrary, search therein in an ungodly spirit alone, their wit will guess everything, their intellect explain all, even arrange all; will blame and criticise, will approve and deny, will break up and break off,—and the powers on high in eternal light wait patiently, until light and knowledge comes to them respecting these things.

STIER:—The bonds themselves preach to the Gentiles; they reveal even to the Apostle himself something new.—The reading for one's self is pre-supposed and recommended in the case of each individual.—Missions are the continued, God-given, gracious and spiritual life of the church, her impulse of growth. They re-act as powerfully, widely and thoroughly as the preaching of the gospel on the church of the baptized, since from them we first learned the idea of the Inner Mission, or as the English say still more beautifully: Home Missions.

ZIEL (on Eph. iii. 8-21):—The Apostle Paul was a rich man in his prison: 1. Rich in the unsearchable riches of Christ, to the proclamation of which the grace of God had called him (vers. 8-12); 2. Rich in his fervent love to the brethren, which revealed itself in his supplication for them (vers. 13-19); 3. Rich in his unswerving confidence in God, who can do exceeding abundantly above all we can ask or think, and with whose praise he is full (vers. 20, 21).

[EADIE:—Ver. 8. The riches of Christ are the true wealth of men and nations. And those riches are unsearchable. Even the value of the portion already possessed cannot be told by any symbols of numeration, for such riches can have no adequate exponent or representative. The latest periods of time shall find those riches unimpaired, and eternity shall behold the same wealth neither worn by use nor dimmed by age, nor yet diminished by the myriads of its happy participants.—Ver. 9. If we gaze upon a landscape as the rising sun strikes successive points and brings them into view in every variety of tint and shade, both subjective and objective illumination is enjoyed. No wonder that in so many languages light is the emblem of knowledge.—At the fittest time, not prematurely, but with leisurely exactness, were created both the human materials on which redemption was to work that peculiar and varied mechanism by which its designs were to be accomplished.—Ver. 10. In the proclamation of the gospel to the Gentiles, with its strange preparations, various agencies and stupendous effects—involving the origination and extinction of Judaism, the incarnation and the atonement, the manger and the cross, the spread of the Greek language and the triumph of the Roman arms—"these principalities and powers in heavenly places" beheld with rapture other and brighter phases of a wisdom which had often dazzled them by its brilliant and profuse versatility, and surprised and entranced them by the infinite fulness of the love which prompts it, and of the power which itself directs and controls.—Ver. 11. In all this procedure, which reveals to princedoms and powers God's manifold wisdom, the Divine eternal plan is consistently and systematically developed in Christ.—R.]

[HODGE:—"Through faith of him." How may I come to God with the assurance of acceptance? The answer given by the Apostle, and confirmed by the experience of the saints of all ages, is, 'By faith in Jesus Christ.' It is because men rely on some other means of access, either bringing some worthless bribe in their hands, or trusting to some other mediator, priestly or saintly, that so many fail who seek to enter God's presence.—R.]

[SCHENKEL:—It is a grace to be able to suffer for the sake of the kingdom of God and the advantage of our brethren: for thus to suffer is a blessing 1) for one's own heart, 2) for the church.—The glory of the Apostolic office: 1. As to its ground, resting on revelation; 2. As to its end, to effect a knowledge of the mystery of God.—The preaching of the gospel: 1) As to its purport, it is about the unsearchable riches of Christ; 2) As to its end, the enlightening of a darkened world.—The Christian Church, the bond which links heaven with earth.—R.]

2. The Apostle's petition with an exhortation for the church.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 14.—[The phrase: τοῦ κυρίου ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ, which follows πατὴρ in 1.3; Col. 1.3; 2 Cor. 1.3; Rom. xv. 6, should be rejected here. The weight of diplomatic authority is against it (omitted in \aleph^1 A. B. C. 17, 67; found in \aleph^3 D. F. K. L. and all other cursives). A number of fathers reject it (Jerome expressly speaks of the omission), while the best versions retain it. It is scarcely credible, as De Wette urges, that it was omitted because coming between πατέρα and πατέρα, since it really disturbs the rhythmic connection; while on the other hand no addition would be more likely than this from the common formula. If internal grounds have any weight, it must be rejected. So Lachmann, Tischendorf, Rückert, Harless, Meyer, Olshausen, Alford, Ellicott; Eadie inclines to this view. Reiche and De Wette retain it, as does Hodge, who says: "the majority of recent editions and commentators retain them," a statement surprisingly unwarranted.—R.]

² Ver. 16.—[The Rec. reads δὴν with D. K. L., and most fathers, but δὴ (\aleph A. B. C. F.) is to be preferred. Comp. I. 17.—R.]

³ Ver. 16.—[Here also as in 1.7; II.7; III.8, the Rec. gives the masculine form (D.³ K. L., cursives), but \aleph A. B. C. D.¹ F. support the neuter.—R.]

⁵ Ver. 18.—[The order of the Rec. (βάθος καὶ ὕψος) is sustained by \aleph A. K. L., most cursives; adopted by Tischendorf, Ellicott, Meyer and Braune, as lectio difficilior. B. C. D. E. F. G., most versions, give the reverse order, which as more natural and prevalent (Rom. viii. 39) is open to suspicion. It is accepted by Lachmann, Alford and others.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 14. The connection. For this cause, τοῦτο χάριν. v.—Thus Paul connects with ver. 1, where the construction is interrupted. Still with ἔπερ ἡμῶν (ver. 13) he has already resumed what was expressed in ver. 1, and with "which are your glory," referred to the previous current of thought (II. 22: "ye are builded together"). Comp. III. 1. [EADIE: "The prayer must be regarded as immediately following that section, and its architectural terms and allusions will thus be more clearly understood." MEYER however explains: on this account that you faint not, etc.—R.]

The prayer, vers. 14, 15.

I bow my knees, κάμπτω τὰ γόνατά μου.—So Phil. II. 10. It describes τὴν κατανευμένην δέξιν (CHRYSOSTOM). BENIGL: "Si præsens adfuisse Paulus, genua flexisset, exardescens pectore." Acts xx. 36. Here the reference is to genus mentis (JEROME); the idea of "praying" is so prominent, that the accusative sometimes follows the verb γονυπετεῖν (Matth. xvii. 14; Mark x. 17).

Unto the Father, πρὸς τὸν πατέρα.—The phrase is found thus without any qualification in II. 18; v. 20; Col. I. 12. [On πρὸς, denoting the direction, see Winer, p. 378. The metaphorical sense of the phrase justifies the preposition; were the idea merely that of bending the knee, a dative would probably follow.—On the phrase: of our Lord Jesus Christ, see Textual Note 1.—R.]

From whom every family in heaven and on earth is named.*—Ἐξ οὗ πᾶσα πατριά—ὀνομάζεται is a periphrasis to πατέρα, which cannot be reproduced, except as Luther (1545) has so beautifully and correctly expressed it: Der der rechte Vater ist über Alles, was da kinder heisst; all editions from 1522–1541 read: was Vater heisst. Evidently "from whom," ἔξ οὗ, refers to "Father," from Him (ἐξ) originates the name borne (ὀνομάζεται) by him who stands at the head of a group, πατριά, which is thus termed from πατήρ. The etymology must be well considered here. While φυλαί (φύλαξ) designates the tribes descending from the sons of Jacob, πατριά (בְּנֵי־יַעֲקֹב) denotes the families in the several tribes, descending from the sons of Jacob's sons; οἰκοί (בֵּית־הָאָבוֹת) is yet more special in its meaning. Hence the reference here is to larger groups. The word designates a lineage, family, springing from one father and bearing his name. [EADIE: "Every circle of holy and intelligent creatures having the name of πατριά takes that name from God as Πατήρ." So ALFORD, ELLICOTT.—R.] Accordingly something concrete and living is treated of, so that it is not—πατρότης, Fatherhood (THEODORET. JOHN of Damascus, ANSELM, LUTHER, 1522–41; MEYER: He is the original Father, the Father of all fathers; THOLUCK, Sermon on the Mount, p. 394; NITZSCH, Prakt. Theol. I. p. 269).

Πᾶσα without the article (WINER, p. 110) necessarily refers to the multiplicity of the families: every family. BENIGL is excellent: omnis, angelorum, hominum ceterorum, ex ipso, ut patre, pendens; as David's family from David (Luke II. 4) and from Abraham, so the blessing comes, like that of a father upon all the families of the earth (Acts III. 25). The phrase: "in heaven and on earth," ἐν οὐρανοῖς καὶ ἐπὶ γῆς, joined closely to πατριά without the article, points to the world of angels and of men, referring to the groups dependent on heads and chiefs. We must then understand here classes of angels (comp. on I. 21), since the angels also are called sons, children of God (Job xxxviii. 7; Luke xx. 36) and call God their Father, not merely their Creator, and races of people as national families, although "children of disobedience" (II. 2; v. 6) are not wanting. For "all angels, all Christians, aye, all children of men are God's children, for He has created them all" (LUTHER) in Christ, the Son of filiation. The word πατριά, which by the addition of πᾶσα and ἐν οὐρανοῖς καὶ ἐπὶ γῆς, has received an extension of meaning reaching far beyond bodily descent, must be understood not merely in a natural, but also in an ethical sense, as indeed the idea: "Father" is thus used. Since "fatherhood" has not a concrete meaning, it cannot be translated by this word, but STIER thus attempts to preserve the concrete force, der rechte Vater über Alles, was nach Vätern heisst.

It is incorrect and ungrammatical to understand by it the whole world family (MEYER, OLS-

* [ELLICOTT renders: "From whom every race in heaven and on earth is thus named," while the German text of Braune runs thus in a literal translation: "whose name every family in heaven and on earth bears."—R.]

HAUSEN and others), or only two groups, angels and men (CALVIN), or the saints in heaven and the elect on the earth (CALOV),* since in that case the article would be found before ἐν οὐρανοῖς and before ἐπὶ γῆς, as in the first case it should stand after πάντα. It is incorrect to ignore altogether the idea of groups, families, which Luther's version throws into the background, and to make of God an "All-father" (MEYER). LUTHER has given occasion to this mistake, but corrected it through his translation; for he says there that God is Father over all, that is called children, of course maintained, cared for, as we are, in Christ. It respects more the right Father than the right children (HARLESS). Finally all polemical reference, such as against the particularism of the Jews (CALVIN), angel-worship (MICHAEL), must be rejected. The passage is ironical rather. Comp. Doctr. Note 2.

Ver. 16. The purport of the supplication. Vers. 16, 17.—That he would grant you.—ἵνα δῶ ἡμῖν marks the purpose and consequently the purport of the supplication, indicating at the same time the confidence of him who prays, that He who is implored will fulfil his request. Comp. i. 17. [The subject and the purpose thus blended as so often when ἵνα follows a verb signifying (even metaphorically) to pray.—R.]

According to the riches of his glory.—Κατὰ τὸ πλοῦτος τῆς δόξης αὐτοῦ defines the ὅω more closely, as a rich and glorious giving. He should give, not merely announce, according to, in the proportion of His riches in glory. See i. 7, 17; Col. i. 11. "Glory" here embraces the whole glorious perfection of God (MEYER); there is no ground for limiting it to power (GROTIUS) or grace (CALVIN).

To be strengthened with might.—Δυνάμει, "with might," placed first for emphasis, cannot anticipate either the phrase "by his spirit," or "in the inner man," nor can it be an instrumental dative (MEYER), nor does it refer to the will or moral being over against knowledge (HARLESS), which also belongs to the inner man and is given prominence in vers. 18, 19. It qualifies the verb "strengthened," κραταιοθῆναι,

* [So BODINUS and HODGE, both insisting upon the exclusive reference to the redeemed. The argument of the latter rests altogether on the incorrect reading he accepts. Admitting that the omission of the article favors the rendering: "every family," he adds that it may still be omitted where the sense is "the whole family," provided the context is so clear as to prevent mistake. But it is not so clear, else the great body of commentators would not have mistaken it; hence the condition is not met. Besides the context does not teach, except critical judgments are to give way to exegetical preferences, "that those who are here contemplated as children, are those who are by Jesus Christ brought into this relation to God." "Consequently" it ought not to be affirmed that "the word πατριά cannot include any but the subjects of redemption." Undoubtedly there is an underlying thought of redemption; "It is not in virtue of God's creative power that the Apostle here prays to Him, but in virtue of His adoptive love in Christ" (ALFORD). The thought of an "All-Father" is remote enough, but any unnecessary limitation of πάντα πατριά is at the same time a limitation of the wider results of Redemptive Love so frequently hinted at by Paul and not very remote here (ver. 10). ALFORD: "The Apostle seems, regarding God as the Father of us His adopted children, to go forth into the fact, that He, in this His relation to us, is in reality the great original and proto-type of the paternal relation wherever found." And in an ethical sense this relation may be readily conceived of as existing in heaven among other than those redeemed from earth.—R.]

which is antithetical to the term ἐγκατεῖν, "faint" (ver. 18) thus not merely excluding discouragement and weakness, but marking also the external efficiency, the influence on the world, the overcoming as well as the standing fast, like ἀνδρίζεσθε before κραταιοῦσθε (1 Cor. xvi. 13). See vi. 10; Col. i. 11; 1 Pet. v. 10. Hence the passage does not refer to mere passivity, so that δυνάμει is merely a strengthening of the verb (RUECKERT). LUTHER is incorrect: "That he may give you strength—to become strong." [The instrumental sense is adopted by ELLICOTT, HODGE, ALFORD, EADIE and many others. Braune's view virtually resolves the dative into an adverb. ELLICOTT: It defines "the element or influence of which the spirit is the 'causa mediana.'" The contrast with ἐγκατεῖν, though plausible, must not be pressed. EADIE, who finds a reference to the figure of the temple in ver. 18, sees an architectural allusion here.—R.]

Through his Spirit [διὰ τοῦ πνεύματος αὐτοῦ].—The means of imparting such strength is indicated thus (αὐτοῦ=θεοῦ, who is implored); God's Holy Spirit makes us strong within, and thus prepares not only the actual fellowship in the kingdom of God, but also the powerful demonstration of the same; hence BENDEL well says: δυνάμει bene congruit cum mentione spiritus.

In the inner man.—[Εἰς here is not=ἐν, not—in regard of (MEYER, WINER, DE WETTE, HODGE: as to), but "to and into," marking "the direction and destination of the prayed for gift of infused strength" (ELLICOTT).—R.] "Ὁ ἐσω ἀνθρώπος" (so also Rom. vii. 22) is the antithesis of ὁ ἔξω ἡμῶν ἄνθρωπος (2 Cor. iv. 16), which "perishes," while "the inward man is renewed day by day." It is not something physical, but moral, hence too, not=νοῦς, which can have a "vanity" (iv. 17), of which "corrupt" can be predicated (1 Tim. vi. 5), which is impossible in the case of the inner man. It is rather—"the hidden man of the heart" (1 Pet. iii. 4) and refers to the concealed, displaced and obscured image of God within us. Accordingly the Apostle says εἰς τὸν ἐσω, to become strong so far as to reach within to this; the preposition thus marking the aim towards which the becoming strong should be constantly and renewedly directed. See WINER, p. 389. Accordingly "the inner man" cannot be used interchangeably with "the new man" (iv. 24); the latter is the new creature, in which the former lives again, rises anew out of the death of sin which has come upon it: "the inner man" does not stand in antithesis to the "body," but includes so much of it as God in the creation has prepared and designed for the life in glory, in the new creation for the resurrection of the body. See Doctr. Note 3. [Comp. LANGE, Romans vii. 7–25, especially my Excursus, pp. 232–236.—R.]

* [Dr. HODGE, very sweepingly, intimates that all those interpretations which distinguish this "inner man" from the renewed man, belong to "the theory of Semi-Pelagianism, embodied and developed in the theology of the Church of Rome." But this is based on a mere assumption, viz., that this view of "the inner man" as the seat of spiritual influences implies the actual sinlessness and unfallen status of "that inner man," an implication distinctly denied by many of the supporters of this theory, among whom are expositors,

Ver. 17. That Christ may dwell in your hearts through faith.—This verse forms an explanatory, further developing, parallel to the infinitive clause of ver. 16. We have here a second petition, in continuation of the first, hence Luther is not altogether incorrect in inserting an exegetical "and." [See below.] Καταικησας denotes a permanent indwelling of one taking entire possession, as Col. i. 19; ii. 9; Matth. xii. 45; Luke xi. 26; 2 Pet. iii. 13; Jas. iv. 5. The expression οικειν, Rom. vii. 20 (ver. 17: ἐνοικίσα), viii. 9; 1 Cor. iii. 16, is weaker. Here it stands first for emphasis and refers to κατοικητήριον, ii. 21, 22. Comp. John xiv. 21-23. BENGEI is excellent: in perpetuum. It corresponds to "strengthened with might," which precedes it; as the former is marked as an effect from without, from above, by "into the inner man," so the latter is distinguished by "in your hearts," as an internal condition.

Διὰ τῆς πίστεως [almost=through your faith] denotes in any case a power of the Spirit which has been appropriated by the Christian; accordingly the previous petition was διὰ τοῦ πνεύματος, "through the Spirit," to whom the initiative belongs, the Spirit of Christ, preparing for Him (BENGEL: ubi spiritus Dei, ibi etiam Christus), while πίστις, "faith," is wrought by the Spirit in the human spirit, is the power of man, awakened, directed, strengthened by the Holy Spirit, to appropriate Christ, to become Christ's. Hence it is neither idem per idem (MATTHIES), nor something entirely different (RUECKERT), nor yet a consequence from what precedes, independent of ὧς, but dependent on κραταιωθῆναι (BLEEK).

[The connection has been much discussed. MEYER (following CALVIN: declarat, quale sit interioris hominis robur) takes the clause as Braune does: parallel to the last clause of ver. 16, with an explanatory force. DE WETTE explains the infinitive as one of design, an opinion to which EADIE formerly inclined. Notwithstanding Braune's objection, the simplest explanation is that of BLEEK, adopted previously however by

ALFORD and ELLICOTT among others. This accepts the clause as one expressive of the result ("so that") of the inward strengthening. The emphasis resting on the infinitive seems to demand this (ALFORD). This is a somewhat lax construction, but clearly admissible (WINER, p. 298).—The view which connects "the inner man" with this verse (SYRIAC, AMBROSIASTES, PELAGIUS): "In order that Christ may inhabit the inner man by the faith which is in your hearts," is altogether untenable. On καρδιά, comp. i. 18; DELITZSCH, Bib. Psychologie, II. p. 203 f.: "the seat and centre of the moral life viewed on the side of the affections." CALVIN: "Partem etiam designat ubi legitima est Christus sedes; nempe cor: ut sciamus, non satis esse, si in lingua versatur, aut in cerebro volitet.—R.]"

The end of the supplication; vers. 18, 19 a.

Ver. 18. That ye.—Iva, "that," is placed after the closer definition of the subject, as ἔως, 2 Thess. ii. 7, and as iva is put after the object in 2 Cor. ii. 4; Gal. ii. 10; Acts xix. 4. Similarly 1 Cor. xi. 14, 15; xiv. 7 (ἵνα), 16 (πως). [So Rom. xi. 31, where however Dr. Lange denies the trajection. This view of the construction is accepted by BEZA, CAMERARIUS, GROTIUS, CALIXTUS, SENLER, STORR, ROSENUELLER, FLATT, MEIER, MEYER, WINER (eds. 6, 7), BUTTMANN, SCHENKEL, HODGE. It is however adopted by none of the ancient versions except the Gothic, is rejected by ORIGIN expressly. The other view joins this clause to what precedes, as a consequence of the indwelling of Christ, accepting an irregular nominative. So in the main: CHRYSOSTOM, ERASMUS, LUTHER, ESTIUS, MORUS, KOPPE, RUECKERT, MATTHIES, HARLESS, OLSHAUSEN, B-CRUSIUS, DE WETTE, BLEEK, EADIE, ELLICOTT, ALFORD. Our preference is for the former construction. See below.—R.]*

* [EADIE thus states his view: The change of syntax indicates a change of connection, and the use of the irregular nominative makes the transition easy to the form adopted with iva. The clause thus changed becomes a species of independent proposition, giving a marked prominence to the sense, and connected at once with the preceding context as its result, and with the following context as its starting idea. So ELLICOTT, who in his translation puts a dash before and after the clause. The course of thought then is: "Christ dwelling in their hearts—they are supposed, as the effect of this inhabitation, to have been now rooted and grounded in love; and as the design of this confirmation in love—they are then and there qualified to comprehend," etc. This construction is certainly admissible, although HARLESS is fanciful in accounting for it by the reference to both the dative and genitive which precede. MEYER presents the forcible objection that the present participles would occur were this the connection. When to this it is replied, "that the clause does express the state which must ensue upon the indwelling of Christ before what is expressed in the next clause can in any way be realized, and that therefore the perf. part. is correctly used" (ELLICOTT), I find in this but a confession of that subordinate relation of the clause to the next one, which is implied in the other view. If the ideas are so nearly similar, a trajection seems a better explanation, than to complicate the relation of the clauses further (we have already a leading clause in ver. 14, a clause of purport in ver. 16, containing a finite verb followed by an infinitive, on which infinitive a clause of result depends, ver. 17. The view under discussion would make an irregular sub-subordinate clause of result to be followed (ver. 18) by a clause of design, which the other view would append directly to the purport of the prayer). On the other hand this metathesis is open to objection. Such a trajection implies an emphasis on the words thrown in advance, and it is asserted that there is no necessity for such emphasis here, but this is no real objection, since the words can be emphatic (notwithstanding ALFORD's denial). Again, it is said that the premiss words in all such cases form the objective factor of the sentence and are not connected with who cannot be classed among the advocates of Semi-Pelagianism. I append the statement of ELLICOTT, which agrees with my own view, referred to above: "The expression ὅπως ἀνθρώπος (Rom. vii. 22) is nearly identical with, but somewhat more inclusive than ὁ κρυπτός τῆς καρδίας ἄνθρωπος (1 Pet. iii. 4), and stands in antithesis, to ὁ ἔξω ἄνθρωπος (2 Cor. iv. 16); the former being practically equivalent to the voûs or higher nature of man (Rom. vii. 23), the latter to the σάρξ or μελὴ: see BECK, Selenehre, III. 21, 3, p. 68. It is within this ἔξω ἄνθρωπος that the powers of regeneration are exercised (HARLESS, Christi Ethik, § 22 a), and it is from their operation in this province that the whole man (secunda interioris spectatus, Bengel) becomes a νέος ἄνθρωπος (as opposed to a former state), or a καὶνὸς ἄνθρωπος (as opposed to a former corrupt state), and is either ὁ κατὰ Θεὸν κτισθεὶς (chap. iv. 24), or ὁ ἀνακαινισμένος εἰς ἐνὶ γυναικὶ κατ' εἰκόνα τοῦ κτιστάτος αὐτοῦ (Col. iii. 10), according to the point of view under which regeneration is regarded. The distinction between this and the partially synonymous terms πνεῦμα and voûs may perhaps be thus roughly stated: πνεῦμα is simply the highest of the three parts of which man is composed; voûs the πνεῦμα regarded more in its moral and intellectual aspects, quatenus intelligit, cogitat, et vult; ὁ ἔξω ἄνθρωπος the πνεῦμα or rather the whole immaterial portion, considered in its theological aspects, and as the seat of the inworking powers of grace." To which may be added that owing to the fact that πνεῦμα has also a second meaning (the human spirit as lawrought upon by the Divine Spirit), Paul does not use it in Rom. vii. 7-25, but rather voûs and ὁ ἔξω ἄνθρωπος. This view of the phrase is adopted by EADIE and ALFORD, and may be regarded as the prevalent one in Germany, perhaps now among English commentators.—R.]

Being rooted and grounded in love.—The perfect participles, ἐρριζωμένοι καὶ τεθεμελιωμένοι, denote a state, in which they already are and continue to be, which is the pre-supposition, in order that they may be able to know. This state is effected by what has been prayed for in vers. 15, 16; hence according to the sense and the context it is impossible to connect these participles with what precedes (CHRYSOSTOM, LUTHER: "and to become rooted and grounded through love," RUECKERT, HARLESS, BLEEK and others), even if it were grammatically admissible to join a nominative to ὧν, as in iv. 23: ὧν—ἀνεχόμενοι—σπουδάζοντες. Col. ii. 2; iii. 16. See Winer, p. 532. This position gives especial weight to the participles, which introduce two figures borrowed from a tree and a building. They mark that a profoundly penetrating life (ἐρριζωμένοι) and a well-grounded, permanent character (τεθεμελιωμένοι) are necessary. [The first may be regarded as used "without any other allusion to its primitive meaning than that of fixedness, firmness at the base or foundation" (ELLCOTT).—R.] Comp. 1 Cor. iii. 9; Col. ii. 7.

The double figure strengthens the notion of the relation to love; this latter (ἐν ἀγάπῃ) is made prominent by being placed first. "In" marks "love" as the soil, in which they are rooted, and as the foundation, on which they are grounded. This implies moreover that it is not their own love which is referred to, but one which corresponds with the soil afforded to the tree, the foundation given to the house; and this would undoubtedly be, in accordance with the context, the love of Christ (BENGEL), were not all closer definition wanting, even the article. Accordingly this substantive rendered general by the absence of the article corresponds with the verbal idea: in loving, i. e. in that love, which is first God's in Christ and then that of men who become Christians, who are rooted in Him and grounded on Him through faith. [The reference to the Christian grace of love (EADIE, ALFORD, ELLCOTT) is preferable, since it does not lay too much stress on the absence of the article, as is done by both MEYER (in amando) and HARLESS (subjective, because anarthrous), and does not confound two things (God's love to us and our love in response), either of which might be represented as soil and foundation, scarcely both.—R.] But it is not necessary to supply "in Christ" (HARLESS) in thought, as if "in love" could be instrumental and the preposition could be repeated with two different references and used in joining two distinct definitions. Nor should it be limited to "love of the brethren" (CALVIN, SCHENKEL, BLEEK and others), as is still further evident from what follows.

May be fully able to comprehend [ἵνα ἐξισχύσητε καταλαβέσθαι].—Καταλαβέσθαι here means more than a mere intellectual apprehension, a perception, as in Acts iv. 13; xxv. 25; x. 34, but pre-eminently an inward experience: it corresponds with γινῶναι, which is conjoined to it with τε, but differs from it however, the first word denoting the inward experience, the latter the spiritual perception. [The tense of this verb perhaps implies the singleness of the act, and the voice the exercise of the mental power, a dynamic middle (KRUEGER), indicating the earnestness or spiritual energy with which the action is performed (ELLCOTT).—R.] The verb ἐξισχύσητε, placed in emphatic position, adds the idea of exertion, an energetic pressing through; BENGEL: evaleatis.

Something important is treated of, which cannot be comprehended in solitude, for one's self alone, but only in fellowship: with all saints, σὺν πᾶσι τοῖς ἁγίοις.—Like all science, the science of God's love, the study of God, is a joint labor.

What is the breadth and length and depth and height, τί τὸ πλάτος καὶ μήκος καὶ βάθος καὶ ὕψος.—The lively, roused spirit of the Apostle here borrows the figure of a body, a mathematical magnitude [sacra illa Pauli mathematica], as in Job xi. 8, 9, it is applied to God's wisdom and perfection; it is instead of and = τί τὸ μέγεθος, what is the greatness. Since the article occurs but once, the unity of the object referred to is strongly indicated. Very naturally the "breadth" comes first, to this the "length" corresponds; then the "depth" is the nearest dimension, and the "height" closes the series: what is the object then whose dimensions Paul notices here? It is not directly designated, and hence must be taken from the context. The added clause connected with this by τε points at once to "the love of Christ." The dimensions set forth here then become clear: "breadth" refers to the nations lying beside each other on the earth, over all of whom the love of Christ will extend itself; "length," to the successive ages during which it will reach; "depth," to the misery and corruption of sin, into which it will descend; "height" to the glory at God's throne and near His heart to which it would elevate all.

To return to ver. 9 and accept "the mystery" as the object (CHRYSOSTOM, CALOVIVS, RUECKERT, HARLESS and others) is as unfounded as to find a reference to "the fulness of God" (ver. 19), and with Rev. xi. 1; xxi. 15, 16, to understand the Church of Christ, the temple of God (BENGEL, STIER, [EADIE], and others), or merely to supply "of God" or "of Christ" (MATTHIES, and others); HOLZHAUSEN alone suggests "our love!" Arbitrary as many of the explanations of the four dimensions undoubtedly are, the opinion of MEYER, that every special interpretation is unpsychological, only opening the door to subjective speculations, is equally unjustifiable. Abusus non tollit usum. The thought of the Apostle is clear: Loved and loving thou knowest the love of Christ. Certainly it is not: In the love to the brethren thou wilt know God's love. Comp. 1 John iv. 10, 16; John xv. 9-11.

[This simple view of the object whose dimensions are here predicated is held in the main by CALVIN, CALIXTUS, MORUS, STORR, HODGE, MEYER, ELLCOTT. EADIE strangely enough opposes it because τε follows: see his notes for a good resumé of opinions. ELLCOTT says: "The consequent clause, without being dependent or explanatory, still practically supplies the defining the subject as here (ELLCOTT). ELLCOTT's remark is true as regards the other cases where ἵνα is translated, but in 2 Thess. ii. 7, ἵνα is put after the subject, which if not strictly parallel, is certainly analogous.—R.]

genitive: Paul pauses on the word ὑψος, and then, perhaps feeling it the most appropriate characteristic of Christ's love, he appends, without finishing the construction, a parallel thought which hints at the same conception (ὑπερβάλλουσαν), and suggests the required genitive." ALFORD, less correctly, leaves the object indefinite: "of all that God has revealed or done in or for us," a view which results from his insisting on the subordinate character of the clause introduced by τε. This little word really settles the question the other way.—An allusion to the temple of Diana (MACKNIGHT, CHANDLER) is exceedingly improbable, and the reference to the Christian Church finds no support in the context, foregoing or subsequent. AUGUSTINE gives the fanciful explanation: sacramentum crucis, which ESTIUS elaborates. Comp. that of SEVERIANUS (in ALFORD), and the various homiletical applications given in Hom. Notes.—R.]

Ver. 19. And to know the knowledge-surpassing love of Christ [γινῶναι τε τὴν ὑπερβάλλουσαν τῆς γνώσεως ἀγάπην τοῦ Ἀριστοῦ].—Γινῶναι τε adds something closely related, giving prominence to the perception of what has become a matter of internal experience. The object is "the love of Christ," obviously Christ's love, not our love to Him. To the former alone is the attribute "knowledge-surpassing" applicable. BENGE: suavissima hæc quasi correctio est; dixerat: cognoscere, statim negat cognitionem idoneam haberi posse. The participle, which is here placed between the article and substantive, must evidently be taken as an adjective, governing with its comparative meaning the genitive which follows, superiorem cognitione. See WISER, p. 324. It is = ὑπέχουσαν πάντα νοῶν, "which passeth all understanding" (Phil. iv. 7). Comp. Phil. iii. 8-10. It is an oxymoron, like 1 Cor. i. 21, 25; 2 Cor. viii. 2; Gal. ii. 19; 1 Tim. v. 6, and refers to an (adequate) apprehension of the love of Christ which surpasses knowledge (i. e., the particular abstract knowledge, which is possible to man of himself). HARLESS: "Love fully solves the mystery of love; only love experiences love and knows love. The γνώσις of the reflecting understanding finds its limit here; the γνώσις of love understands the love of Christ, which otherwise far transcended γνώσις." LUTHER (1522-41): also to know the love of Christ, which yet exceeds all knowledge; in 1545 the incorrect rendering first appeared, which goes too far in the attempt to popularize the Scriptural language: and to know that to love Christ is better than all knowing. This is contrary both to the language and the context. Yet it cannot be said, that the love of Christ is the object of a knowledge, which never attains its full end (RUECKERT). Against this is the previous expression: "that ye may be able," as well as the remainder of the verse. [Nor can we accept the view of HARLESS and OLSHAUSEN: "that ye may know that the love of Christ is knowledge-surpassing," since the participle, which is properly taken as an adjective, is thus twisted into an infinitive, and since the Apostle's prayer is thus unnecessarily shorn of its fulness.—R.]

The final end of the supplication; ver. 19 b.

That ye may be filled up.—This phrase connects itself with "that ye may be able . . to know," and designates the highest, last favor which the Apostle implores for the Church. With what are they to be filled?

To all the fulness of God [εἰς πᾶν τὸ πλήρωμα τοῦ Θεοῦ].—Εἰς designates that toward and unto which the becoming filled proceeds, and πᾶν τὸ πλήρωμα, meta est (BENGE), to which the Church should attain, when it is filled. It is therefore in her, not without her. Hence the Apostle is treating of a fulness in them which God grants, and which is unincumbered, unabridged. They must themselves, through the experience and knowledge of the love of Christ, be prepared, expanded, strengthened and fitted to receive πᾶν τὸ πλήρωμα, "all the fulness," which God will impart, has determined and ordained to impart. What God imparts is indeed in Him, from His own character and glory He imparts. LUTHER: "That is according to the Hebrew mode of speech as much as to say, that we are filled in every way, by which He makes full—that He alone completely rules and works in us."

It is a bolder expression than 2 Pet. i. 4: "partakers of the Divine nature." Comp. iv. 13; Col. ii. 9, 10. CHRYSOSTOM: πληροῦσθαι πάσης ἀρετῆς, ἥς πλήρης ἐστὶν ὁ Θεός. THEODORET: ἵνα τελείως αὐτὸν ἔνοικον διέχησθε. It is not to be limited to the presence of grace (HARLESS), or to charisms (MEYER), nor to be pantheistically extended or applied to the universe, filling itself in God, i. e., reaching the highest expression of its perfection, and reflecting itself in the Church, so that in it there is no more defect to be discovered (SCHENKEL). A fulness of God, which complements His Godhead, as though God's Being were first perfected through the Church, is as little the subject treated of as a pantheistic deification of men. See i. 23. The Apostle undoubtedly refers to the persons and personal culture of the individual members of the Church. See Doctr. Note. 4.

[MEYER and DE WETTE take πλήρωμα in the sense of πλήθος, and the genitive as that of origin. But the GREEK FATHERS, and OLSHAUSEN, ALFORD, ELLICOTT, HODGE, among late commentators, prefer to take πλήρωμα in the strict sense of id quo res impletur, and the genitive as a possessive, implying: "that ye may be so filled as God is filled," the reference being not to charismatic gifts, but to the spiritual perfections of God. The only objection is, that such a fulness could not be realized here in a state of imperfection, but εἰς shows that a standard is here set up, and none but a perfect one would be thus held before them. The other view is too tame for the climactic position and force of the clause. ALFORD: "All the fulness of the Godhead abides in Christ, Col. ii. 9. Christ then abiding in your hearts, ye, being raised up to the comprehension of God's mercy in Him and of His love, will be filled, even as God is full—each in your degree, but all to your utmost capacity, with Divine wisdom, might and love."—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The fervency of the worship (καμπῶν τι γόνarά μου) does not lose itself in the joyous sense of the love of God (πρὸς τὸν πατέρα), but becomes more deep and clear in love to the neighbor, in unselfish supplication, which in the scale of prayer rises above the lowest grade, which is a cry of need, a cry for help, above the grade of a pupil, the petition for supply of needed good and protection from threatening evil, and approaches in its best feature the master-prayer of thanksgiving, which is so often forgotten, and of praise, that so often is not understood.

2. The Father who is here supplicated is not the All-father of the 18th century or of the rationalists, nor the Father of the heathen. For He is not that weak father, who on account of His goodness consents to withdraw all the demands of His righteousness; nor is He merely the Creator, as if He were, like Jupiter, a father of the trees and animals, of the flowers of earth and the stars of heaven, as well as of angels and men, and as if the idea of "Father" included only that of the Creator, who calls into being. The father is more than the begetter, he is also the provider, the teacher, the guardian in preserving sacred love. Where such paternal care exists, it comes from God, it points to Him, the original Father. Even the most scanty traces of such fatherhood, i. e., of such companies with a father at their hand, point to Him, who has ordained and still sustains such relations. The children may be lost and not permit Him to work within them; still traces of Him, kindnesses from Him are so little wanting, that even among the heathen "an altar with this inscription, To the unknown God," points to them. The Church sings and speaks of a λόγος σπερματικός, and sees a great family in different groups, in different circumstances, conditions and attitudes, but at the head, over all and for all the One Father in Christ.

3. The inner man (ὁ ἑσω ἄνθρωπος) is the remnant of the man created in the image of God, which is found in all men, even though extremely disfigured or shrivelled up into insignificance. On this account is Redemption possible, man is capable as well as in need of redemption. Hence the inner man is to be thus distinguished from the new man (ὁ καινὸς ἄνθρωπος): the former is the remnant of the original man as created by God in His own image, the latter is the beginning of the regenerated man, new born in Christ; that is still present in all men, this not yet existing in all, though it might and should be; that is found without the Church also, this begins only within it; the former is the starting-point for the latter, the latter is the result of the reviving of the former obtained in Christ; that is the first creation, conceived in retrospect, this the "new creature," conceived as rising; the former is accordingly of nature, which God in holy love has created, preserved and guided, the latter of grace, in which He has had mercy upon the former. But universal as the need of redemption and the capacity for redemption are, man is, on account of this need and in spite of this capability, not in a condition to win the gracious right of sonship, or obligated thereto (SCHENKEL), but on account of this need notwithstanding this capability only in a state to receive the gift of renewed sonship. See Ezeg. Notes, ver. 16.

4. In the economy of salvation,—in which our passage, being addressed to believers, presupposes justification and antecedent repentance, and regards only the growing renewal, the strengthening of the inner man, his growth in the grace and truth of Christ—the Father constantly, at every stage, takes the initiative, and the recovering man takes no step forward without power received from God. Hence the supplication, that He would "grant" and that too "through His Spirit" to the inner man: thus the renewal within begins from above. Then the awakened, renewed power of the inner man appears in faith, in dependence draws Christ into himself, into his heart, as a guest into his house, for continued intercourse with Him, carefully directing himself by Him in all respects. The inner man, when once he has actually, with saving effect, become the object (εἰς) of the working of the Holy Ghost, becomes the subject of transforming activity in faith, which like a screw binds Christ to the soul. Though we may not, with the mystics, accept a union essentialis et corporalis, still we should not, with the rationalists, deny the conjunctio substantie hominis fidelis cum substantia sanctæ trinitatis and affirm only a dynamic or operative presence of Christ.

5. The work of salvation is a difficult one, and demands the power of God and man. Of God: hence Paul prays (ver. 16): "that he would grant you according to the riches of His glory." Of man: hence ver. 18: "that ye may be fully able."

6. Knowledge and Love are not to be separated. There is not merely an "illumination" before conversion and repentance, but also after justification through faith. In the enjoyment of the love of Christ, which we experience, our love is strengthened, forgetting itself and yet with a profound remembrance of itself it knows what it has experienced, denying itself it is thus strengthened to a clear knowledge of the love of Christ. Human things one must know, in order to love but Divine things one must love, in order to know (PASCAL). Love, hastening before, ever gains new material and light for knowledge. "The more I love, the more I find that I ought to love Thee."

7. The connection of faith and love is also presupposed here, and in such a way that the former is the mother's lap for the latter; the faith in that love of God in Christ, which we experience and enjoy, must impel to love, to love in return again and again.

8. Christ's Love surpasses all knowledge and understanding, that only toilsomely attains to seeing. HOFMANN: "There is really but one love in the world, because but one actual entering in of person into person. The eternally personal God, who is Love, who has entered into humanity as the personal Christ, who in the Holy Ghost personally flows into the personal life of men, so that we have Him and are His, He loves and is loved. Only where this archetypal fountain of love exists, can man exercise toward his fellow man a copied love." Only so far as it is felt, can it be known in our weakness.

9. The completion of fellowship with God points into eternity, from the militant to the triumphant church; there the children become heritors, are taken on His throne and heart. Here many radial lines already proceed from the circumference, grace, peace and joy, truth and freedom, sonship and the sense of sonship, life-power and life-fulness, yet they come together in the center only above. Let us only hold fast to the unity of the family of God in heaven and on earth, the oneness of the Father through Christ in the Holy Ghost.

Had not the Apostle said so, no one would have discovered from his tone, that he was in bonds and chains, looking death in the face. To him affliction is a clear winter night, in which the stars of promise only shine the brighter. Has he tears in his eyes, they become a telescope to carry his sight into the far distant heavens, to open heaven to him and permit him to gaze into the depth of its wonders. It does not occur to him, to pray for release; he asks only for the perfecting and ennobling of the church.—In outward woe he thinks, feels and prays about inward weal alone; in evil, that concerns himself, about the good of the church alone.—God, the true Father, is not nearer to heaven with its angels and saints than to earth with its sons of men; were we but nearer to Him!—He is the Rich One, who can and will give; we are the poor ones, who should receive and—will not!—It were better if thou didst not care so much how to adorn the outer man through the spirit of the world and of fashion; God can through His Spirit re-animate and strengthen the inner man.—Above all see how it stands within thee, so that what God has created after His image in thee be not stunted and starved out. Thine outer man may laugh and sing and dance, while the inner man laments and sighs and goes to destruction.

Christ wishes to dwell with thee, not as a mere passing guest; so order thy work and recreation and mode of life after His example, that it may please Him to dwell there and not to hasten away. He is willing to belong to thee; it is not enough then that thou hearest Him, hearkenest to Him, thou must also belong to Him as His possession, must submit thyself and all thou hast to His disposal.—Bind thyself in faith to Him and hold communion with those who believe in Him, that thou mayest grow in the knowledge of His love. Root thyself ever deeper in that love, ground thyself ever more firmly upon it.—Do like Ernest the Pious, who in 1636 had a medal struck in commemoration of his marriage with Elizabeth Sophia of Altenburg, with this inscription on the one side: Christum lieben ist das beste wissen (Loving Christ is the best knowledge), and on the other: Gott, lehre erkennen mich und Dich (God, teach me to know myself and Thee)!—Holy love alone lets us understand and use the Scriptures ever better and better! If we look at God's word and world without love; we see them only remotely.—Three-fold aim of Christian supplication: 1. Strengthening of the inner man; 2. Knowledge of the love of Christ; 3. Fulness of Divine glory.

STARKE:—In praying the outward posture is indeed of little importance; it is left to Christian liberty to take this or that position with the body; yet no kind of posture seems better fitted for fervent, earnest prayer, than kneeling.—Thou hast indeed a merciful, gracious and loving Father: Thinkest thou, He can ever forsake thee? That is an idle thought. As little as He can take Love out of His heart so little can He forget thee. See, what is the best thing a teacher can ask for his flock; but also what thou too, O soul, must seek after, to be strengthened through the Spirit of God in the inner man.—It is not enough to have come into a state of grace through conversion, there must be added a strengthening and fortifying, which however is not the work of man, since Christ is the Author and Finisher of our faith. Though our sins were so broad, so long, so deep, so high, as heaven and earth, yet is the grace and mercy of God deeper, broader, higher and longer, so that it cannot be measured.—The mystery of the love of God is incomprehensible: in future perfection we will understand it. Because we still await that time, let us meanwhile imitate such love in its depth, by helping those who are in the deepest misery and least deserving; in its breadth, by showing to all men without distinction, for God's sake, kindness and affection, in its length, by never ceasing or becoming weary; in its height, by looking up to God, devoting to Him all our efforts, and having His glory as our purpose.—In Christianity more depends upon taking in faith, than upon giving and doing in love. For the more we take of the fulness of God, the more we can give.

A. MUELLER:—He who lets Christ dwell in his heart, only that he may have from Him a household blessing or a joyful consolation, sells Him his heart; but he who surrenders himself to Christ out of pure love, at the same time thinking himself unworthy of the least look of His grace, gives Him his heart.

RIGER:—God oftentimes indeed begins in a very small way in His works of grace, because He will effect nothing according to absolute power, but so as to lead men to faith and obedience.—Christ dwelling in the heart and His Spirit lay claim also to the members of the body, putting them into the service of righteousness, to bring forth fruit unto God in holiness.—Being rooted and grounded in love we obtain the ability to comprehend, not merely to know, but also with other powers of soul so to appropriate something as to be filled therewith. Faith widens the heart, so that more and more can be grasped. But with these enlarged views, which are imparted to us, we should not sunder ourselves from other saints, nor attach to anything such an immoderate value, as to sever the bond which unites us with other saints, but apply all to the edification of the body of Christ.

HEUBNER:—It is a truly proud misery of Kant's, his denying kneeling as a slavish Orientalism. He can scarcely have felt the impulse of a praying heart. Lichtenberg judges very differently, when he says: "When the body falls upon its knees, the spirit lifts itself to God."—We have too little bending of the knee; the Catholics perhaps too much, so that a Catholic may occasionally be recognized by the looks of his clothes at the knees. Spener wished that kneeling devotion was more common among us.—What a comfort for fatherless children and widows, what hope for affectionate fathers, to know that their dear children have in heaven a better Father than themselves. Still the human relation can best teach the true “Father-theology.”—A church can be good outwardly and apparently and yet be without inward life. This inward life comes from the Spirit of God. Christianity should be learned not by heart, but in the heart.*—Christ will dwell, not in stone churches, but in living hearts; the heart should live and move in Him, His Spirit should animate our spirit in constant intercourse with Him.—When Christ dwells in the heart, every one has his Christ in his neighbor.—Breadth: the Church of Christ should stretch itself over the whole circle of the earth, over all lands. The length refers to time; she continues throughout all centuries. The depth points to her foundation; she has it in the unfathomable abyss of Divine mercy, and her height reaches into heaven, it is unassailable, for the church on earth and in the spirit world is one. This is the greatness and the origin of the spiritual temple.—Love to Christ, a simple heart full of faith and love to Him, is better than all science. This love has an unconditional value, is in itself the highest: not so with knowledge; it can give a kind of enlightenment, without at all affecting the heart. The heart excels the understanding. Science should not be over-estimated, and made an idol. Science can never conquer the enemies of the Kingdom of God, she should be a handmaid. The true science is only where the cross is. Only the theologus crucis is the theologus lucis.

PASSAVANT:—With a narrow heart we cannot pray with confidence. Hence everything demands that we should receive Divine riches, which enlightens our mind, expands our heart and makes God great in us.—How worthy of admiration, how highly exalted above man is this inner man of the heart! Faith is his reason and his light; love his heart and his life; the Holy Ghost his soul and strength; Jesus Christ his ego and his nature; God his Father and at the same time his heritage, his glory, his riches, his eternal dwelling-place; God makes him, His work in His own good time, and this through a power whose working corresponds with the riches and the glory of His grace.—Did Christ dwell in us, what would we become to our friends, to our enemies, to the world, to the heavens!—Only the Spirit of God in us can disclose to us what God is; only faith, through the Holy Ghost, can apprehend Christ and His life in us; only pure, holy love in us can comprehend what is transcendent and blissful, the wonders of the love of God in Jesus Christ.—There is a breadth and length and depth and height; for this no worlds are too broad, no paths too long, no space too wide, no abyss, no hell too deep, no heaven too high, that it may not reach thither, and penetrate there with might and almightiness, with light and life, with comfort and salvation and peace from eternal compassion.—“fulness of God” the destination and end of man, the aim and end of all the decrees of God, of all the mysteries of Christ. Canst thou not satisfy man? Must he still fill himself with a thousand trifles besides, that his happiness may be complete?

STIER:—The higher his petition seeks to ascend above all understanding to Him, who is able to do above all, the deeper he bows himself.—The indwelling of Christ: Its beginning—through faith; means—Christ's love, which becomes ours; aim—according to the widest extension of the plan (knowledge) and inmost depths of the foundation (Christ's love).

GERLACH:—The love of Christ to us precedes all our love and knowledge.

NITZSCH:—The essential petition, which we, each for all and all for each, should bear in our hearts, during the varieties and vicissitudes of our life-path. 1. Its purport: a) To become strong in the inner man; b) To have vital fellowship with the Redeemer; c) To know His love. 2. The effect.

WOLTERS (Dedication sermon at Godesberg): The proper prayer for a young congregation: 1) that its members become strong in the inner man: 2) that Christ lives in their hearts; 3) that they understand His love in its greatness and blessedness.

GENZKEN (Preparatory Lecture on Eph. iii. 13–21*): St. Paul our example in prayer. 1) He bows his knees, so we under the burden of our guilt; 2) He addresses himself to the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; so there is no other name for us; 3) He asks power for the inner man to strengthen in faith, in love, and for every good work; so we.

LÖHNE:—St. Paul's request to the Ephesians, his prayer to God, his song of praise to Him, all in relation to the great mystery of building the church on earth.

WESTERMEIER:—The best prayer: 1) to whom it is addressed; 2) the gifts it desires; 3) the basis on which it rests.

KLUGE:—Seek the kingdom of God, not in external things, but in the inner man—1) in judging of the contest of the gospel against the world; 2) of the blessing of the gospel in yourselves.

RABUS:—A glance into the closet of the Apostle: 1) How we should approach God in prayer; 2) how supplicate Him; 3) how praise Him.

RAUTENBERG:—What Paul does in his tribulations, that his disciples may not become weary in the walk of faith: 1) He is far from them—yet sends them his mighty word; 2) He suffers the contempt of the world—but endures it for their glory; 3) He cannot give them his hand, but he bows his knee for them.

DR. MEIER (Baptismal discourse on ver. 18): On the breadth, length, depth, height of the love of God.

PRÖHLE:—Paul's pious wish for the Church at Ephesus: 1. That they might not become weary in their Christian course (ver. 13). 2.

* [The German has a similar paranomasia: Man soll das Christenthum nicht auswendig, sondern inwendig lernen.—R.]

* [Brichtrede is literally a discourse at confession, but among Protestants means the service preparatory to the communion, during the previous week. The etymology confirms the view, that our preparatory lecture is borrowed from the Romanist usage of confessing before the communion, though in reality a proper mode of obeying the injunction: Let a man examine himself.—R.]

That God would give them power to become strong in the inner man (vers. 14-16). 3. That Christ may dwell in their hearts (ver. 17). 4. That they may be able to comprehend with all saints the breadth—the universality, embracing all, the length—the endlessness from eternity to eternity, the depth and height—the immeasurable and incomprehensible greatness of the love of Christ.

[HODGE:—The most beautiful object might be in the apartment of a blind man, and he not be sensible of its presence; or if by any means made aware of its nearness, he could have no delight in its beauty. Christ dwells in us by faith, because it is by faith we perceive His presence, His excellence and His glory, and because it is by faith we appropriate and reciprocate the manifestations of His love. Faith is to this spiritual communion what esteem and affection are to the fellowship of domestic life.—The love of Christ is infinite; not only because it inheres in an infinite subject, but because the condescension and sufferings to which it led, and the blessings which it secures for its objects, are beyond our comprehension.—R.]

[EADIE:—Ver. 15. They lose the cold and official name of subjects in the familiar and endearing appellation of sons, and they are united to one another not dimly and unconsciously, as different products of the same Divine workmanship, but they merge into one family—"all they are brethren."—Ver. 17. When Ignatius was asked, on his trial, by the Emperor, what was the meaning of his name—Theophorus—he promptly replied, "He who has Christ in his breast."—Love is the fundamental grace.—Ver. 19. As the attachment of a man, it may be gauged; but as the love of a God, who can by searching find it out? Uncaused itself, it originated salvation; unresponded to amidst the "contradiction of sinners," it neither pined nor collapsed. It led from Divine immortality to human agonies and dissolution, for the victim was bound to the cross, not by the nails of the military executioner, but by the "cords of love." It loved repulsive unloveliness, and, unnourished by reciprocated attachment, its ardor was unquenched, nay, is unquenchable, for it is changeless as the bosom in which it dwells. Thus it may be known, while yet it "passeth knowledge;" thus it may be experimentally known, while still in its origin and glory it surpasses comprehension, and presents new and newer phases to the loving and inquiring spirit. For one may drink of the spring and be refreshed, and his eye may take in at one view its extent and circuit, while he may be able neither to fathom the depth nor mete out the volume of the ocean whence it has its origin.—R.]

3. Conclusion in the form of a Doxology.

(CHAP. III. 20, 21).

- 20 Now unto [to] him that [who] is able to do [above all things], exceeding abundantly above all that [above what] we ask or think, according to the power that 21 worketh in us, Unto [to] him be [the] glory in the church by [in]¹ Christ Jesus throughout all ages, world without end [lit., unto all the generations of the age of the ages]. Amen.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 21.—After ἐν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ Ν, A. B. C. insert καὶ before ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ. A few authorities [D¹ F.] read: ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ καὶ (ἐν) τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ, evidently from doctrinal hesitation about placing the church before Christ; in single minor authorities ἐν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ is wanting. This arises from the inappropriate καὶ, which only disturbs, and although well supported externally, is inadmissible on internal grounds. It may be rejected, and is rejected by Tischendorf, on the authority of a number of important MSS. [These are D² K. L., besides the great majority of cursives, oldest versions, and many fathers. Rejected by Tischendorf, Meyer, and most, bracketted by Alford, accepted by Lachmann, Elliott (ed. 3, 4 only). Before the discovery of Ν, the internal grounds were sufficiently strong to outweigh the preponderant uncial testimony in its favor, but now the question is more doubtful. The sense is not affected materially by the variation, though the insertion precludes one interpretation. The word may have been inserted to indicate the other meaning, hence its omission presents a lectio difficilior.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

In general the doxology is frequent, either at the beginning (i. 3-14; 1 Pet. i. 3-5), or at the close of an Epistle (Rom. xvi. 25-27; Phil. iv. 20; 2 Tim. iv. 18; 1 Pet. v. 11; Jude 25; Heb. xiii. 21), or at the close of a section, as here, Rom. xi. 33-36; Gal. i. 5; 1 Tim. i. 17.

Ver. 20. Now to him who is able to do above all things—Τῷ ὁ δὲ* δυναμένῳ stands emphatically first, because the matter in hand is the manifestation of God's power and almightiness (ver. 16: δυνάμει, ver. 18: ἐξισχύσατε). With the infinitive ποιῆσαι ["to do," to effect], we must closely connect ἐπὲρ πάντα, "above all," under which we should understand creatures, powers and events, which may act in a hindering, disturbing or destructive way.

* [ALFORD: "δὲ brings out a slight contrast to what has just preceded—viz., ourselves, and our need of strength and our growth in knowledge and fulness," but the contrast is not strong enough to justify our rendering the particle: "but."—R.]

Exceeding abundantly above what we ask or think [ὑπερεκπερισσοῦ ὧν αἰτούμεθα ἢ νοοῦμεν].—In this added qualification the Apostle places God's almightiness in comparison with his prayer, and that in a most striking manner. Hence ὑπερεκπερισσοῦ, found also in 1 Thes. iii. 10, v. 13 [?]. Similar expressions, strengthening the sense, occur in Eph. i. 21; iv. 10; Rom. v. 20; 2 Cor. vii. 4, 13; xi. 5; xii. 11; 1 Tim. i. 14; Mark vii. 37; xiv. 31; vi. 51. In its comparative signification it governs, as in ver. 19: ὑπερβάλλονσαν τῆς γνώσεως, the genitive ὧν, which is = τῶν αἰτούμεθα ἢ νοοῦμεν. BENDEL: Cogitatio latius patet quam preces; gradatio. God is greater than our heart (1 John iii. 20). CHRYSOSTOM: ἐγὼ μὲν γὰρ εὐχομαι, αὐτὸς δὲ καὶ χωρὶς τῆς ἐμῆς εὐχῆς μεῖζονα ἐργάσεται τῶν ἡμετέρων αἰτήσεων οὐκ ἀπλῶς μεῖζονα ἢ ἐκ περισσοῦ ἀλλ' ὑπερεκπερισσοῦ, τὸ μέγος ἐμοῖαν τῆς δωρεᾶς.

[The relative does not refer to πάντα; it introduces a new but related subject. The two phrases are not in apposition, but the second member explains the first. There is no tautology therefore, since subjoined to the expression of God's super-abundant power, we have a definition of the mode in which it displays itself, viz., by conferring spiritual gifts in super-abundance (EADIE). There is no hyperbole as HARLESS thinks, though Paul has such a marked predilection for ὑπέρ and its compounds; it "occurs nearly thrice as many times in Paul's Epistles and that to the Hebrews as in the rest of the New Testament; and of the 28 words compounded with ὑπέρ, 22 are found in these Epistles, and 20 of them there alone."—R.]

According to the power that worketh [or is working] in us, κατὰ τὴν δύναμιν τὴν ἐνεργοῦμένην ἐν ἡμῖν.—This belongs to the phrase: "able to do." The present middle participle marks the continued efficiency of His power, while "in us" indicates both the object and the sphere of activity. Paulus allegat experientiam (BENDEL) and full of confidence turns from the beginning to the future. Comp. Col. i. 29. Miraculous gifts (MICHAEL) are not referred to, nor should ὑπέρ πάντα, "above all," be limited to quæ hactenus visa sunt (GROTIUS), or the preposition ὑπέρ be taken adverbially (BENDEL), as in 2 Cor. xi. 23 alone. [The power, so frequently referred to in this Epistle, is the might of the indwelling Spirit. The middle (comp. Gal. v. 6) is used mainly in non-personal references; see WINER, p. 242.—R.]

Ver. 21. To him be the glory, αὐτῷ ἡ δόξα.—The pronoun sums up vigorously and emphatically what is predicated in ver. 20. The dative denotes that the glory is due, will be given to Him (Luke xvii. 18; John ix. 24; Acts xii. 23; Rom. iv. 20; 1 Pet. i. 21; Acts iv. 9, xi. 13; xiv. 7; xvi. 9; xix. 7). [So most commentators]. Accordingly the article, ἡ δόξα, does not indicate the "glory," which He has (HARLESS); in that case the pronoun αὐτοῦ would occur, as in the interpolated doxology at the close of the Lord's prayer: δοῦ σοῦ ἐστὶν ἡ βασιλεία, κ. τ. λ. But it is the glory of the church, which indeed she has first from God, but which as received from Him, properly His and yet appropriated by her, she returns to Him with gratitude and praise. It is not = ἐπαινος, praise, which consists in words, nor = τιμὴ, honor, which consists in the judgment of those who praise, but refers to the life, worship, and character of the church. Comp. i. 12, 14: εἰς ἐπαινον τῆς δόξης αὐτοῦ, "unto the praise of his glory." It is most natural to supply ἐστω.

In the church in Christ Jesus, [ἐν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ].—The preposition ἐν before τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ points to the sphere in which the glory of God is given back, defining more closely either the omitted ἐστω or ἡ δόξα. By ἡ ἐκκλησία, "the church," we should understand the assembly of those in whom God's power has become efficient and works (ver. 20: "in us"); it is accordingly no external region (MEYER), which is indifferent internally, and beside which an inner spiritual sphere is to be indicated (ἐν Χριστῷ); the church is indeed herself such a sphere. Hence the phrase "in Christ Jesus," defines more closely the church, its character and status, in order to explain, in what church the glory can and shall be given to God. Luther has rendered it properly as one notion: die in Christo Jesu lebendige Gemeinde (the church alive in Christ Jesus).

[To this interpretation, which is that of OLSHAUSEN, STIER and others, it is properly objected that such a definition of the church is altogether unnecessary. If καὶ be accepted (see Textual Note) this exegesis is inadmissible. Nor is the view of MEYER (with HARLESS, DE WETTE, EADIE, HODGE, ALFORD and ELLICOTT) open to the objection urged by Braune that it presents an external region internally indifferent. The sphere of the giving of glory is defined in a twofold manner: "It is offered in the church, but it is, at the same time offered 'in Christ Jesus,' or presented by the members of the sacred community in the consciousness of union with Him" (EADIE); "if any glory comes from us to God it is in Christ." The repetition of ἐν seems to point to such a meaning, even if καὶ be omitted.—R.] Hence it is not = τὸ διὰ Χριστοῦ (GROTIUS); comp. Col. iii. 17; Rom. i. 18; vii. 25. [CALVIN, BEZA and RUECKERT: per Christum; E. V.: "by Christ Jesus;" ὄν Χριστῷ (ECUMENIUS), all alike objectionable, for even the instrumental sense of ἐν is not exactly = διὰ, and the proper sense of the preposition is the more necessary because it occurs for the second time.—R.]

Unto all the generations of the age of the ages, [εἰς πάσας τὰς γενεὰς τοῦ αἰῶνος τῶν αἰώνων, ἀμήν].—The phrase εἰς πάσας τὰς γενεὰς designates the successive groups which are added to this church; γενεαὶ designates the groups of living persons. Now, at the time when Paul writes, the beginning has been made, the first γενεά, "generation," which reflects Godward the glory, the light in and from His light, is present; and thus it should and will continue, hence εἰς, "unto." It is = εἰς γενεὰν καὶ γενεάν, or εἰς γενεὰς γενεῶν (Luke i. 50, various reading); this repetition expressing the same idea as πάσας; "the iterative form of the expression indicated the extension" (HARLESS).

The phrase τοῦ αἰῶνος τῶν αἰώνων defines to what these γενεαὶ belong and extend, in omnes generationes, que complectitur δ αἰὼν, qui terminatur in τοῖς αἰῶσι perpetuos (BENGE). Ὁ αἰὼν marks the unity or totality of passing time, which at the same time includes eternity. We have no word which indicates both, as the Greeks had. [True in both English and German]. BENGE: αἰῶνες periodi æconomie divine ab una quasi scena ad aliam decurrentes; hic amplificatur causa utrumque vocabulum, cum metaphora in γενεαί, generatio, conjungitur, ut significetur tempus bene longum; nam in αἰῶσι non jam sunt GENERATIONES. Paul says therefore, that the church now begun shall continue through a long series of generations; begun on earth it will be developed throughout these generations, and even when generations shall cease, shall continue in æons, without succession of generations, and these generations and those æons (in which new generations are not added, but the constituent ones continue permanently) form a whole, one αἰὼν, the αἰὼν μέλλων. Instead of this full formula we find only εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας, Rom. i. 25; ix. 5; xi. 36; xvi. 27; Luke i. 33; 2 Cor. xi. 31; or αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων, 1 Tim. i. 17; 1 Pet. v. 11. Rev. i. 6, 18; iv. 9, 10, etc.; εἰς πάντας τοὺς αἰῶνας, Jude 25; εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα, Matth. xxi. 19; Mark xi. 14, etc.; εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα τοῦ αἰῶνος, Heb. i. 8. Comp. Doctr. Notes, 5, 6.

[Only the most extravagant literalism can exclude the idea of eternity from this cumulative expression, and only the most forced exegesis can include "distinct traces of gnosticism." HARLESS makes a subtle distinction between αἰῶνες τῶν αἰώνων and αἰὼν τῶν αἰώνων, taking the former as more extensive, the latter intensive, for which there is little room here. MEYER is perhaps too literal in his view of γενεαί, which BRAUNE apparently adopts. ALFORD is satisfactory: "Probably the account of the meaning is, that the age of ages (eternity) is conceived as containing ages, just as our 'age' contains years; and then those ages are thought of as made up, like ours, of generations. It is used, by a transfer of what we know in time, to express, imperfectly and indeed improperly, the idea of Eternity."—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. God's Omnipotence is unlimited, if we leave out of view His own will: He can do what He will (Ps. cxv. 3).

2. God's power works in His people (ἐν ἡμῖν, ver. 20), not merely over them, and about them; for they do not resist Him with that will which He has given from His own will to those created in His image. He will not, with His omnipotence, force any into the Church in Christ Jesus, into salvation. Man has might to resist God's Almightyness within himself. [The limitation or extension of meaning which theologians of different schools may put upon this last sentence, need not be discussed here. Given free-will, the sacred right of personality, and it is true in some sense—awfully true, since this is the fearful price of our privilege as free men. How God's Almightyness, notwithstanding, never fails of its purpose, we do not know; that it never does, lies at the foundation of all proper theology.—R.]

3. The Essence of worship is the thankful return of what God has bestowed and the recipient has accepted and appropriated; hence the approach of the recipient to the Bestower, in gratitude for the gift, praise for the Giver; the deepest ground of adoration is, however, the condescending grace and imparting love of the Almighty God. He who is blessed begins to bless the Blessor (i. 3) and ends in praise of the God of glory (iii. 20, 21).

4. The true Church, a creation of God (ver. 20), a living congregation, an assembly of sanctified persons, is Christian, having and needing no other Mediator than Christ Jesus, proving and defining the relation to the church according to the relation to Him.

5. The Christian Church has a history, a development through a long series of generations even into eternity. HOFMANN (Schriftbeweis, II. 2, p. 127) retains the kai before ἐν Χριστῷ Ἰησοῦ and thinks the glorifying of God "in the church" takes place only in time and on earth, but "in Christ" eternally, as though the church were a temporal thing and nothing more. [EADIE: "The obligation to glorify God lasts through eternity, and the glorified church will ever delight in rendering praise, 'as is most due.' Eternal perfection will sustain an eternal anthem."—R.]

6. The Church of Jesus Christ does not find her final issue in the State (ROTUE), or in a higher grade of culture;* she has a rising without a setting. Rescued through all the changes of national life, she is herself the rescuer of individuals, and of larger groups as well, unto the future of eternity.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Prayer is no limit to God's working in thee, but a condition, which He Himself has appointed, without which thou canst not experience His almighty grace.—Thou art a creature of God, and shouldst become a work of His, praising the Master hand in word and deed, and above all in private character and conduct.—"Exceeding abundantly!" Hagar asked a drop and found a well (Gen. xxi. 19); Saul sought his father's asses and found a crown (1 Sam. ix. 3; x. 1); David asked bread and received a kingdom (1 Sam. xxi. 3).

STARKE: God does more than we desire. Joseph wishes only to be free from the iron chains: behold, God not only does what he desires, but gives him golden chains besides.

HEUBNER:—In the synagogues, mosques, and pagodas there is no true praise of God, nor yet in our churches, if Christ be not known.—The prayer of Paul for the church (vers. 13-21). 1. It was prompted by the impulse of love (ver. 13). 2. Full of confidence toward God, the Father of all churches (vers. 14, 15). 3. It was holy in its purport (vers. 16-19). 4. Hopeful, certain of hearing (vers. 20, 21).—God the true Father. 1. Exposition: a) He is not only the physical Creator and Upholder, but b) spiritual Father (vers. 14-16). 2. Ground of our belief in this: a) not mere reason and experience, but b) the gospel of Christ (vers. 17, 18). 3. Power of this belief: a) it attracts our heart to God (ver. 18), so that we understand God's heart, b) it strengthens unto obedience, c) it gives comfort and hope (vers. 19-21).—The intimate fellowship of the Apostles and their churches as an example for us.—The inner growth of a Christian church.

* [When De Wette asks: "Was the Apostle warranted in expecting such a long duration for the Church?" he proves his utter want of sympathy with this Epistle, and abundantly justifies the criticism made on his commentary by ALFORD (see Introd. § 3, 5).—R.]

RIEGER: What occurs to each one at his conversion and during his daily renewal, is as good an evidence of the "exceeding abundant" power of God, as what occurs in the creation, preservation and government of all things.

[EADIE:—The Trinity is here again brought out to view. The power within us is that of the Spirit, and glory in Christ is presented to the Father who answers prayer through the Son, and by the Spirit; and, therefore, to the Father, in the Son, and by the Spirit, is offered this glorious minstrelsy: "As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end. Amen."—R.]

III. PART SECOND.

THE SPIRIT RULING IN THE CHURCH OF CHRIST.

CHAPTERS IV.-VI. 20.

1. The Theme of the Whole Part:

Walk worthy of the calling love and unity.

CHAP. IV. 1-3.

- 1 I therefore, the prisoner of the Lord, beseech you [I exhort you therefore, I the prisoner in the Lord,]¹ that ye walk worthy of the vocation [calling] wherewith ye
- 2 are [were] called, With all lowliness and meekness,² with long-suffering, forbearing
- 3 one another in love; Endeavoring [Earnestly striving] to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 1.—Nearly all MSS. have: ἐν κυρίῳ; κ: ἐν Χριστῷ. [The change of order is for the purpose of bringing out the emphatic force of παρακαλῶ (exhort rather than beseech); the second I being required in English. In is substituted for of as more correct, while calling is in itself a better word than vocation, serving here to preserve the correspondence between the substantive and verb (aorist: were called).—R.]

² Ver. 2.—[The spelling πραῦτης (κ: B. C. 17) is considered by Tischendorf, Alford, Ellicott, as the best attested form in the dialect of the New Testament. Comp. Gal. v. 23. Braune apparently prefers πραότης (Rec., A. D. F. L., most cursives). His rendering of the three terms is very neat: mit aller Demuth und Sanftmuth, mit Langmuth.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1 a. The connection. I exhort you therefore, I the prisoner in the Lord [Παρακαλῶ οὖν ὑμᾶς ἐγὼ ὁ δέσμιος ἐν κυρίῳ].—The verb παρακαλῶ, placed first for emphasis, marks what follows as the ethical part. Οὖν, "therefore," joins this practical, hortatory portion of the letter with the previous theoretical part, and that too as a consequence, so that the one forms a foundation for the other; the context indicating the reference more closely.—Ὁ δέσμιος, "the prisoner," resumes what was expressed in iii. 1 and continued further in vers. 13, 14. As Paul in his bonds prays for the Church, so he exhorts it also. Although the paronomasia (παρακαλῶ—κλησεως) recalls ἐκκλησία, yet the reference is not to ἐν τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ, ver.

21, but to the whole of what precedes (τῇ ἐκκλησίᾳ has occurred already in i. 22), which is, however, summed up in the concluding doxology. Hence MEYER is incorrect in taking οὖν as an inference from iii. 21 merely.* The exhortation of the Apostle gives special emphasis to ἐγὼ, "I," even though it stands after ὑμᾶς, "you," in the Greek. The phrase, ὁ δέσμιος

* [EADIE accepts a reference to the preceding paragraph; ALFORD to all that precedes so (Προεξ., but adds: "here perhaps also a resumption of τοῦτου χάριν of chap. iii. 1, 14, and thus carried back to the contents of chaps. i. ii." ELLICOTT: "To those passages in the preceding chapter which relate to the spiritual privileges and calling of the Ephesians, e. g., vers. 6, 12, but especially to ver. 14 ff., in which the tenor of the prayer incidentally discloses how high and how great that calling really was." The objection to the more general reference in my mind is, that it assumes the Epistle to have been by the Apostle himself purposely divided into two parts, doctrinal and practical, like the divisions of a sermon. Paul's method is rather that of concatenation.—R.]

ἐν κυρίῳ,* "the prisoner in the Lord" (which can be taken together grammatically, and must be taken together in view of the reference to iii. 1), marks the importance of the exhortation of Paul, who as a "faithful member of Christ" bears chains in and for the cause of Christ. CALVIN: Erant (vincula) enim veluti sigillum honorifice illius legationis, quam obtinuerat. THEODORET: Τοῖς διὰ τὸν Χριστὸν δεσμοῖς ἐναβρίβηται μᾶλλον ἢ βασιλεὺς διαδήματι. He is a shining example, and elsewhere he refers to his own walk in agreement with his preaching (I Cor. iv. 16; xi. 1; Phil. iii. 17); he speaks accordingly ad excitandum effectum, quo sit efficax exhortatio (ESTIUS), but not ut Paulum obsequio exhilararent (BENGEL). He wishes to gain attention and efficacy for his παρακαλεῖν, by appealing, not to his imprisonment, which in itself was incapable of strengthening his exhortation, but to his willing, joyful, worthy wearing of the bonds; thus at the same time also strongly urging self-denial. The verb itself means originally to call hither, to invite (Acts xviii. 20); then to address either hortatively (Rom. xii. 1; 2 Cor. ii. 8) or consolingly (2 Cor. ii. 7; i. 6; v. 6, 7). Ὑμᾶς, "you," designates the Church in its individual members; he always conceives of the Church as a fellowship of particular persons.

The fundamental exhortation. Ver. 1 b.

That ye walk worthy of the calling [ἀξίως περιπατῆσαι τῆς κλήσεως.—The infinitive περιπατῆσαι (see ii. 2), as in Acts xviii. 33, 34, sets forth the purport of the exhortation. The emphasis, of course, rests upon the closer qualification ἀξίως (“worthily”), which stands first; for the kind of walk is the important matter. The genitive (as in Phil.
i. 27; Col. i. 10; Rom. xvi. 2; 1 Thess. ii.
12) τῆς κλήσεως denotes that call of God, to which the walk must correspond, in order to be worthy.

Wherewith ye were called, ἡς (instead of ἡ, 1 Cor. vii. 20) ἔκ τῃ ᾧ ἡ τ. e. g.—This relative clause joined per attractionem (see on i. 8) indicates that the call has already taken place and been accepted. He speaks of a walk corresponding to the call already received, not as though we should walk worthily, in order to be called, but, since we are called through the grace of God without our merit or worthiness, we should not be unworthy of such grace (CALVIN).

* [The choice of this phrase here, following iii. 1, where the genitive occurs, is overlooked in the E. V. it is another instance of it (it is doubtful if it ever is), but denotes the sphere or element of the captivity. As distinguished from iii. 1, this passage gives prominence to the fellowship with Christ and devotion to His cause, while the genitive marks Christ more definitely as the author or originator of the captivity. "In the Lord" seems to be at times, ELICOTT remarks, little more than a qualitative definition, yet there is far more danger of abridging than extending its profound spiritual significance.—The phrase cannot be joined with the verb, as is done by SEMLER and KOPPE.—R.] νέει, as is shown by the examples ἀκούειν, κλέπει, etc. The accusative νήν, though admitting that a dative might be proper here, De Wette denies the propriety of the expression εἰλην καλὴν (cognate accusative), though it is defended by WINER, p. 154, and occurs in Arrian, Epict.: κατασχέουεν τὴν κλήσιν ἢν κεκλήκειν. The dative gives the simpler grammatical form and through a slight violation of the law of analogy, is sustained by the analogy of 2 Tim. i. 9; 1 Cor. v. 20 is not decisive since ἐν with the dative, present, and the relative ἥν may be attracted into that case, though it probably is not.

Closer definition of the Christian walk ; vers. 2, 3

Ver. 2. With all lowliness and meekness [$\mu\epsilon\tau\alpha$ πάσης ταπεινοφροσύνης καὶ πραότητος. See Textual Note 2].—This clause defines more closely “walk worthy of the calling,” joining with it two attendants which belong to the Christian walk (WINER, p. 353).* First stand “lowliness,” which has for its opposite “minding high things” (Rom. xii. 16), “thinking one’s self to be something” (Gal. vi. 3); it is $\pi\acute{\alpha}\sigma\eta\varsigma$ ἀρετῆς ὑποθέσις (CHRYSOSTOM). Comp. Phil. ii. 3; Col. ii. 18, 23; iii. 12, 13. It is belief in our poverty over against faith in Christ, so that we know we have nothing, know nothing, can do nothing, having only an empty hand, yet an open one, to receive what the Lord will give. Accordingly, as in Matt. v. 3, 4, 5, to “the poor in spirit” and “they that mourn” ($=\sigma\omicron\iota$ ταπεινοφρονοῦντες) are joined “the meek,” so here “meekness,” $\pi\rho\acute{\alpha}\upsilon\tau\eta\varsigma$, is added, that mildness which is gentle toward others, because it thinks: Have I been helped, then I do not know, who should not be helped! Comp. Gal. vi. 1; 2 Cor. x. 1; 1 Cor. iv. 21; 2 Tim. ii. 25. [See TRENCCH, Syn. N. T. § xlii., perhaps the most discriminating essay on these words which can be found.† —R.] The adjective $\pi\acute{\alpha}\sigma\eta\varsigma$, “all,” denotes all the various relations and situations of lowliness and meekness; the former must manifest itself in both intellectual and ethical spheres, before God and men, the latter toward friend and foe, under violations of our own rights and property as well as those of our neighbor.

With long-suffering, μετὰ μακροθυμίας, is co-ordinate in form with the other two, standing closely connected, yet taken up by itself. Long-suffering (Matt. xvii. 26, 29; 1 Cor. xiii. 4; 2 Cor. vi. 6; Gal. v. 22) is a manifestation of meekness; much depends upon it frequently in the life of a church. Hence it accords with the context to distinguish this by a second μετὰ and to conjoin it to the other terms. [The word means, not taking swift vengeance or inflicting speedy punishment, though it becomes more general in its sense=forbearance of every kind. The pointing of the E. V. is correct, making the phrase a separate clause. Besides the objection which Braune urges below against connecting it with what follows we may add, that thus the phrase would receive undue emphasis and the parallelism of the participial clauses be disturbed. —R.]

Forbearing one another in love [ἀνεχόμενοι ἀλλήλων ἐν ἀγάπῃ].—We would expect the accusative here instead of the nominative: παρακαλῶ ὑμᾶς—περιπατήσαι—ἀνεχομένους. It is not however the υἱὰς, “you,” which is to be more closely defined, but the "walking," not the subject, who should walk, but the predicate, how the walk is to be conducted; the two participles (here and ver. 3) do not then present secondary and additional thoughts. The passage is continued as though, in accordance with the sense, περιπατήσατε were to be read. So i. 18; Col. iii. 16; ii. 2, 10. WINER, p. 532. Ἀνεχόμενοι are those who endure the injuries and sins of others; ἀνοχή is the action of μακροθυμία, "long-suffering," which as the disposition, virtue, is to be perceived in the former. Comp. Rom. ii. 4; 2 Cor. xi. 1; 2 Thess. i. 4. Ἀνεχέσθαι is the active forbearance, ὑπομένειν the quiet endurance. TITTMANN, Syn. I. p. 194. The genitive ἀλλήλων, "one another," refers to the fact, that each one, who has to endure from another, gives occasion also for endurance; "long-suffering" is well aware of this.

* [Σύν denotes coherence, often with the same idea of assistance; μετά refers to an accompaniment or attendant.—R.]

A. [TRENCH properly objects to CHRYSOSTOM's proud humility, which shows itself in his definition of the first term: "making ourselves small when we are great," defining it rather: "the esteeming ourselves small, inasmuch as we are so: the thinking truly, lowly of ourselves."—The second term is more than gentleness, to which BRAUNE and HOPES seem to limit it; it rests on the former as its foundation, accepting God's dealings in humility, and manifesting itself toward men, because they are His instruments.—R.]

In love, ἐν ἀγάπῃ.—This shows at once that the forbearance should not be mere coldness, indifference, obtuseness. Love should be the element of the endurance (iii. 18). Aliorum infirmitates æquo animo ferimus, nec ob ea, quæ nobis in proximo displicent, ab ejus amicitia recedimus, sed personam constantem amamus, etsi vitia in odio habeamus (CALOVIVS). Hence "in love" is not to be joined with what follows (OLSHAUSEN); nor are we besides this qualification of "forbearing," to take "with long-suffering," as still another such (CALVIN, RUECKERT, HARLESS, STIER and others); for the "forbearing" is the act of the "long-suffering," and the latter is not therefore the attendant (μετά) of the former, but its ground, its cause; a forbearing without love is conceivable and actually occurs, but never without long-suffering and yet in love, since love, according to its very nature, "suffereth long" (μακροθυμεῖ, 1 Cor. xiii. 4). Still less allowable is it to join the first μετὰ with ἀνεχόμενοι (BENGEL). [MEYER properly urges against this view that it makes an abrupt, instead of an easy, transition from the general: "walk worthy," to the special: "forbearing one another."—R.]

Ver. 3. Earnestly striving to keep [σπουδάζοντες τηρεῖν].—The participle is to be regarded grammatically like the preceding one. [This clause is parallel to the preceding, and indicates not so much, as Meyer says, the inward feelings by which the ἀνεχέσθαι is to be characterized, as rather the motive to it, and the accompanying or simultaneous effort" (EADIE).—R.] It describes the zealous striving (LUTHER: be diligent), as Gal. ii. 10; 1 Thess. ii. 19. The present infinitive τηρεῖν denotes the continued maintenance which is necessary every day, since dangers constantly approach. The idea of the verb refers to retaining possession of property, which has not first to be gained. Etiā ubi nulla fissura est, monitis opus est (BENGEL).

The unity of the Spirit, τὴν ἐνότητα τοῦ πνεύματος, not τοῦ νοός, is the unity which the Holy Spirit effects. So CHRYSOSTOM: τὸ πνεῦμα τοὺς γένει καὶ τρόποις διαφόρους διετηκότας ἐνὸς, and most. It is not the unity peculiar to the Spirit, which needs not to be preserved by us (SCHENKEL), but the unity and concord of the Church and its members, and indeed only that which the Holy Ghost works; that accomplished by the spirit of the age is not the object of zealous preservation (τηρεῖν), but only of purification. [The genitive is that of the originating cause (EADIE, ELLICOTT) rather than a possessive. —The reference to the human spirit is altogether inadmissible, yet is advocated by ANSELM, ERASMUS, CALVIN, ESTIUS, RUECKERT, and others.—R.]

In the bond of peace, ἐν τῷ συνδέσμῳ τῆς εἰρήνης.—This defines more closely the "keeping" which is the object of the "earnestly striving," and in the same way (ἐν) as in ver. 2 ("forbearing"—"in love"), since something depends upon the motive and mode of preserving unity. The very "unity," which is "of the Spirit," required and wrought by the Spirit, can be fostered, furthered and preserved in a carnal manner, from political and egotistical grounds. Against this our phrase is directed. Ὀσινδωσμος, with the exception of Acts viii. 23, occurs only here and in the Epistle to the Colossians (ii. 19; iii. 14); to vers. 2, 3, Col. iii. 13, 14 are evident parallels. There "love" is "the bond of perfectness," hence a bond well adapted to preserve the unity of the Spirit. "Peace" is indeed itself a condition corresponding alike with "unity" and "love;" it is in spiritual life, and for the Church, first peace with God, and then that peace of heart which is undisturbed by the assaults, temptations and ills of the world and the flesh, not even by the disquiet of the conscience; and further with respect to our neighbor, it is peace with him in love to him, out of love to the Lord of the Church, the Saviour, to the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ and our Father, and to His children through Him. Hence love is the bond which cherishes peace in the Church, and in such love should that unity be preserved, which God's Spirit will work in the Church of Christ; "love edifieth" (1 Cor. viii. 1). Accordingly "the bond of peace" is love itself (so BENGEL). The genitive is, therefore, not epeexegetical (BLEEK), nor the genitive of apposition (MEYER, SCHENKEL); else, as RUECKERT aptly remarks, the foundation of the building would be sustained by a perishable roof, the unity of the Spirit be preserved in or through peace with our neighbor, while the Apostle says, that the unity of the Spirit should be preserved in the efficient strength of the power, which fosters this very peace; that is love, which has peace through faith in love, and brings, establishes and retains peace. Where it is wanting, there is carnal nature and discord (1 Cor. iii. 3). Accordingly the preposition "in" designates love as the element in which the unity of the Spirit is to be maintained; hence ἐν is not—διὰ (BLEEK).

[Braune's view takes the genitive as gen. objecti. It is adopted by BENGEL, RUECKERT, HARLESS, STIER, following THEOPHYLACT. But it is open to serious objection. It is far from probable that the Apostle would express the notion "in love" by such a periphrasis, especially as the parallel clauses are not parallel in the meaning of their several parts. Certainly the Ephesians would not have the Colossian Epistle at hand to suggest to them this sense, and it is not at all obvious without that suggestion. The assumption that ἐν was instrumental may have led to this view of the phrase (MEYER). On the other hand if the genitive be taken as one of apposition, defining the "bond" as "peace" (so FLATT, OLSHAUSEN, MEYER, EADIE, HODGE, ALFORD, ELLICOTT), we have an obvious and simple interpretation, suiting the sense of év. RUECKERT's objection really applies only to the instrumental sense of the proposition. ALFORD: Peace binds together the Church as a condition and symbol of that inner unity which is only wrought by the indwelling Spirit of God—Far more than the union of Jew and Gentile is meant.—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Doctrine and Exhortation. "The distinction of doctrinal and hortatory parts must not assume the unapostolic character of that modern fiction, according to which exhortation is so severed from doctrinal discussion, as to contain no doctrine at all. As little as an apostolic Epistle is a mere doctrinal discussion, so little is an apostolic, or even a Christian, exhortation without doctrine. What the Apostle requires, are not requirements in addition to and outside of doctrine, but requirements of doctrine, if by doctrine we mean the knowledge of Christian saving truth. This is the very order, which distinguishes Christian ethics from all other." The Apostle now shows his readers, "what the gospel requires, after he has called to their memories what it has given them. It requires manifestations of life from those who had been quickened, not from the dead. It expects works of love and righteousness from those who believe and are justified, from him who has been new-created unto good works (comp. on ii. 10). It expects good fruit from a good tree. The opinion that men can gather grapes of thorns, see works of holiness without faith, and make man just before God without the Redeemer; the preaching of morality and the theory of good works without faith, all constitute a perversion of Christian intelligence and of the apostolic order into the futility and confusion of pseudo-Christianity," (HARLESS). [The Apostle's "therefore" rebukes both the dogmatism of dead orthodoxy, and the cry: give us something practical, none of your dry doctrine. At one time the application to the former was more necessary, but the tendency of the present day calls for special attention to the other phase of the matter. When professing Christians or churches tire of the facts respecting God's love in Christ (the real Christian doctrine on which the Apostle's "therefore" rests), they have already ceased to be in earnest about the worthy walk.—R.]

2. Paul's right to exhort. The exhortation of the Apostle proceeds rather from the Christian worthiness of "the prisoner of the Lord," than from the apostolic dignity of the ambassador of the Lord; the latter is more the merely outward, the former more the inward authority, both belonging together; the latter could not exist without the former and vice versa. The former would have neither courage nor right without the latter, but the latter would lack fervency, sincerity and emphasis without the former. The most winning exordium as well as the most powerful Amen, is still the Christianity of the servant of Christ. Vita clerici evangelium est populi. Non bene auditur, qui non bene diligitur (GREGORY the Great). There should be no complaint, because at the present time so much is made to depend on the person, to this first of all men will look.

3. The calling. With the calling which God proffers to us, which we have experienced, the Christian life begins. At first we have only to hear (hören), then it comes about that we hearken (zuhören), and finally we adhere (zugehören). Many are the methods of the call: through God's word sung or spoken in the sanctuary, in the pictures of sacred art, in holy action, in the statements of pious Christians, or in the Scriptures as we read in the closet, from the mouth of a mother or a child, from events in the life of others or ourselves, in the voice of conscience and the immediate suggestion of the Spirit, suddenly, or in the way of gradual consideration, of recollection of what was previously learned and perhaps long-forgotten—thus often is the call addressed to each: every one is more than once, yes many times called by God to Himself. To this the walk should correspond, to this it should give testimony.

4. The worthiness of the walk is determined first and chiefly by the relation of him who is called to the revelation of grace which introduces and regulates the spiritually received, personal fellowship of grace with God. Thus the foundation of the Christian life is laid. In the received benefits and possession lies the germ of all the blessings of eternity. The great matter is constancy, fidelity, personal fidelity to the inwardly efficient word of God, to the personal fellowship with God wrought by the Holy Ghost who calls us, not to a precept, a law, rule, maxim, not even to one's own nature and soul; this comes in as a result of the first, which is the cause, the basis, the foundation work, followed by a superstructure of fidelity to the renewed soul.

5. Lowliness is the first attendant (μετά) of the Christian walk, beginning after the call of God: He who hears the call, recognizes Jesus as the Christ, feeling, He has more and is more, His heavenly and Divine fellowship is beyond all our experience, He knows and explains and presents the Father's will in overpowering clearness, strength and beauty, and thus he who is called ever feels himself to be more insignificant, sinful and needy. In listening to and looking unto Jesus, lowliness springs up within him; he became a Christian not having this, he did not need to bring it to Christianity or as a price for it, but by becoming a Christian he becomes humble, and that too in the most profound earnestness and lively sorrow over his own sin and poverty and weakness. The more the Christian knows and feels himself to be exalted as a child of God, as a member of the body whose Head is Christ, so much the more does he feel himself to be exalted without any desert or worthiness, only through the fellowship of grace with his Creator, Redeemer and Comforter. He rejoices in his peculiar gifts, but only as given, not as profitable or abused. He well knows, that he is of worth before God, but also that what he is and has is little in comparison with what he should and might be and have, that he is an unprofitable servant and yet is a child of God, a joint heir with Christ.

6. Meekness is joined with lowliness. This is not a soft, yielding natural disposition, nor a prudent bridling of a passionate nature, but it is humility applied to the world, not taking offence at the offences of the world, even though misunderstood, mercilessly treated, oppressed and persecuted. This does not estrange her, for she knows herself. The knowledge and experience of corruption and of salvation through Christ in our own heart, produces either no permanent feeling, or else a common feeling, a fellow-feeling, which looks upon him who gives or prepares offence, as one who is suffering under sin, as unfortunate, rather than as evil-minded and rejoicing in sin; accordingly she remains without bitterness, because she has herself experienced the rich grace of God, and perseveres in patience, because she knows God's patience. [It is also exercised toward God, in submission, which is the foundation of its manifestations toward men.—R.]

7. Long-suffering is added as an especial attendant of the Christian walk in social life. It is meekness towards the sins of others, whom we can punish, meekness, keeping its ground against a long series of these. She knows out of her own experience of the long-suffering of God, that sin is misery, out of which condemning and judging never helps us, but rather grace and mercy, if one will let himself be helped. Long-suffering restrains from punishment, that rejects, cuts off, expels from fellowship and friendship, having instead entreaty, exhortation, instruction, discipline in word and deed. She can lovingly hope, is lovingly spirited and brave. She bears with her neighbor, does not weakly yield, does not stand by coldly and stolidly, nor yet embittered and in carnal anger; she is not whimpering and feeble, but strong and heroic in her love, like a mother or a friend.

8. Unity should be the object of zealous striving, but only that unity which the Holy Ghost works. It is not first to be made, is not factitious, but unity, wrought from above, which we have only to preserve. Over against this, the Christian must keep at a distance from all party combinations, which in effect introduce discord and schism into church-life. But he must also avoid jumbling together the great variety and wealth of gifts and powers, and seeking to unite all under external form and letter. No carnal strife, but also no slothful peace, no patched-up, hypocritical or dead unity.

9. The impulse under which we must endeavor to keep this peace, is peaceable love, which can have foes, but is a foe to none, rejoicing in every gift and creature of God, embracing such and leading them into the life of the church, employing and enjoying them, as a nation in time of peace with its various classes, labors and powers, strives in every direction to perform its task, not from the motions of the flesh, but from the basis which God has given, out towards the appointed goal.

10. Paul conceives of the Church of Christ above all as a living company of Christian persons, not as an institution with all its regulations. But the sacredness does not rest upon the individuals, but inheres in the whole organism, which the Holy Ghost animates.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Suffer as a Christian, in order to be able to work in the service of the Master.—Show thyself in deed a servant of Christ, in order in such service to be able to direct aright in word, those who are directed to thee.—Loosen doctrine from the precept which it contains, but do not sever them from one another; distinguish, but do not divide them. There is no Christianity without Christ, and no religion without morality, but at the same time those ethics are of no value which have no doctrine behind them. True the conscience is the voice of God, but what were that, if it were without the Word of God?—He who walks unworthy of his vocation is doubly culpable, more than a heathen; do not despise the calling.—As a child of man, a son of earth, no one stands alone and solitary, but with others, as child of God also dost thou belong to a family; take heed thereto! Thou belongest not merely to the visible, but also to the invisible church.—The three chief virtues of a Christian: Lowliness, meekness, and long-suffering [Demuth, Sanftmuth, Langmuth].—Humility is the basis of all Christian virtue; without it all is wicked, however praiseworthy it may otherwise appear. It is nothing more than evangelical truth applied to all cases; a doctrine which does not make us humble is of no account.—Christian practice in walk and conversation is indispensable; it is more important to be skilful in this, than to have special insight respecting the theory.

STARKE:—Christians have a great and important calling, to walk worthily according to the commands of their Saviour. O that we ever had this calling before our eyes in all our doings!—Where there is much cross, there much light is. Tribulation brings experience; he preaches best who preaches out of his experience.—What God gives and how He gives should satisfy us. Bread and honor are the twin-portions of our calling.—He lives in no shame, who has an unpleasant calling, for God has set him in it. Has God ordained, our pleasure's gained!—Without lowliness, gentleness and patience the unity of the Spirit cannot be maintained. All discord, heresy and schism come from the vices which are opposed to these virtues.—A gentle spirit is the garden in which patience grows.—Unity of the Spirit, the highest ornament of Christians. How? should those live in discord, who are members of one body, of one Head, Jesus Christ? But that is the very sign of a corrupted Christianity, that there are so many sects, so much discord and strife among Christians.

RIEGER:—Paul has just prayed so heartily, now he can exhort so profitably. Have you never found that after secret intercourse with God in prayer, your neighbor's heart also inclines more to you, and is more willing to receive a word which is redolent of prayer?—The call entitles us indeed to the kingdom and glory of God, but it obligates us also to sanctification, and to adorn the doctrine of God and our Saviour.—Humility stands in the feeling of her own defects, and knows how slowly the growth of the inner man proceeds; hence in meekness she does not exact too much of others, and in long-suffering does not lose patience, when an enduring love is necessary in meeting others. Endurance is keenly felt, but love sweetens it, as we see in the case of our children, what we can endure in them, in order in love to help them out of their infirmities. Endeavor overcomes all difficulties: only ever revert to confidence in God.—Unity in the Spirit we dare not make, but only keep it.—To maintain peace is better than to maintain right.

HEUBNER:—The Christian should be and remain conscious of the fellowship to which he belongs: it is a calamity in the Christian church, that this consciousness has been so greatly extinguished. This consciousness should not be maintained proudly but humbly, because the higher the aim, the greater the required perfection, so much the more should each one be conscious of his distance from it and his weakness. The principle of the Christian communion is: to humble ourselves, to become the least, to serve; out of this grows meekness, which shows itself towards those who make the fulfilment of the duty difficult for us.—Endurance presupposes, that every one has something that is obnoxious to others. It is necessary, because we ourselves are troublesome to others, and because we are all members of one body, and because it is God who places others by our side.—The unity in the Spirit is something very different from corporate, external, conventional, superficial unity; it dwells deep within, in the entire will and disposition, it is holy, proceeding from the Spirit, not from mere prudence, concerning itself about essentials, not about non-essentials. From this we infer what real union is; the Spirit alone can create it, that made by man is as a rule of no value.—SPANGENBERG says: "I hold that no one is a child of God merely because he belongs to this or that religion [i. e., Christian confession]; to him who receives Jesus Christ, power will be given to become a son of God. In Christ Jesus nothing avails save faith, which works by love. He in whom I find this faith is my brother. Is he of another religion, that makes no difference, he is still my brother and nearer to me than my fellow-professors who have no faith. Indeed, because he is of another religion, in which the gospel does not shine so brightly, he is to me a miracle of grace."—The Moravians have been very unjustly accused of narrow-heartedness.

PASSAVANT:—The calling of men was from the beginning, to live innocently and holily, thankfully and obediently toward their God. The calling of the sinner is: to repent, to forsake the ways of sin, to seek pardon, grace and peace; to turn to the holy and living God, whom he has long forsaken. The calling of the Christian is this: internally and externally, with word and work, with his whole life, in all things, at all times in the church, before believers and unbelievers, to give glory to God the Father in Jesus Christ.—One may endure the faults of his neighbor from want of feeling, from mildness of temperament, from human good-nature, from earthly politeness, from temporal policy, from pharisaical hypocrisy; nothing is so common; but it is rarely done out of real Christian love.

STIER:—What is not rooted in humility does not deserve the name of a virtue.—Always and everywhere this alone is of avail, to cherish the unity of the Spirit; thus out of every desolation a new edifice is formed, without this the most beautiful structure becomes rotten and finally breaks.

GERLACH:—Patience manifests itself in the quiet endurance of injuries, long-suffering, more in the active maintenance of others in necessities, even when criminal.

SERMONS on the Epistle for the 17th Sunday after Trinity (iv. 1-6). WESTERMEIER: Unity in the Spirit: 1. What is it? 2. By what means is it preserved? a) in general (ver. 1); b) in particular (vers. 2, 3); 3. On what grounds should it be maintained (vers. 4-6).

ZIEL:—Endeavor to keep the unity of the Spirit! 1. On what this admonition is based (vers. 4-6). 2. How we obey it (vers. 1-3).

AHLFELD:—Walk worthy of your Christian calling! 1) Your calling as children of God; 2) your calling as brethren to each other; 3) your calling, to derive the power for such a walk from the right sources.—Our joy in the congregation of the saints. 1) Who are these saints and how far does this fellowship extend? 2) What is the bond which encircles them? 3) What blessing and what joy do we derive from this fellowship of the saints?

RAUTENBERG:—The unity of the children of God. 1) How the Divine call requires it; 2) in what it consists; 3) from what it proceeds; 4) to what it obliges every one.

KAPFF:—Endeavor to keep the unity in the Spirit! 1. Let go what disturbs unity. 2. Hold fast what confirms it.

HEUBNER:—The unity of the Christian Church. 1. Oneness of life: a) Worthy walk, b) brotherly love, c) peaceableness. 2. Oneness of faith: a) in one Holy Ghost, b) in one Saviour, c) in one God and Father.—The duties of Christian church-membership. 1. A walk which is worthy of the call into the church (ver. 1). 2. Specially fraternal walk in humility and love (ver. 2). 3. A concordant, harmonious walk, not mere external but internal unity (ver. 3), for the fellowship of the Church is not merely a body, but a Spirit (ver. 4); it is founded upon one faith in Christ and one confession (ver. 3) and is perfected in God the Father.—The communion of the saints. 1. A description: not of a place, nor of a form, but of love and of faith. 2. How is it established: not by force, by human power or act, but by the Spirit of God. 3. Its importance. The equality of our fellowship in Christianity. 1. Proof: we have one calling, one Saviour, one Father. 2. Application: Thanksgiving to God, caution against pride, consolation for the lowly and poor, awakening endeavors after this fellowship.

PRÖHLE:—Endeavor to keep the unity in the Spirit! 1. Only in sorrow can we receive this exhortation now-a-days. 2. May it knock loudly upon the conscience of every one. 3. And may it bind anew in firm union our hearts and hands.—Forbearing one another in love. 1. Meaning: a) We should follow after peace, as husbands, wives, kinsmen, masters, servants. b) This is possible through lowliness, meekness, long-suffering. 2. Motive: a) The duty of brotherly love, b) our own defects; to-day I must bear with you, to-morrow you must bear with me.

2. Three motives to the preservation of the unity in the Spirit.

CHAP. IV. 4-16.

a. The working of the Triune God in the Church.

(CHAP. IV. 4-6.)

4 There is one body, and one Spirit, even as ye are called [as ye were also called]
5, 6 in one hope of your calling; One Lord, one faith, one baptism, One God and Father of all, who is above [over] all, and through all, and in you all [in all].

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

1 Ver. 6.—[The Rec. inserts ὁμῶν (with very slight authority), while D. F. K. L., good versions and a few fathers, 40 cursives, read ἡμῶν; no pronoun occurs in N. A. B. C., 10 cursives. Most fathers also sustain the omission, which is accepted by nearly all editors and commentators since Lachmann, the pronouns being regarded as exegetical glosses to confine the assertion to Christians.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Connection.—These three verses are joined to what precedes without any connecting particle, and, as parallel clauses, follow each other without any such particle, since the context, being quite clear, requires none. THEODORET: πανταχοῦ τὸ ἐν καὶ εἰς τέθεικεν εἰς συμφωνίαν συνάπτων τὴν ἐκκλησίαν. BUGENHAGEN: omnia, unde Christiani sumus, unitate nobis commendantur. The exhortation to maintain the unity of the Spirit has mainly occasioned these verses; they give a reason for it; γὰρ is wanting however, on account of the liveliness of the discourse, and for emphasis.* The objective bases for unity in the Spirit, to which they have been exhorted, the motives for such exhortation are stated.† Hence we should supply ἵνα, and not ἐστὶ, as though it were continued exhortation (Syriac, CALVIN, HOFMANN, Schriftbeweis, II. 2, p. 127, and others). [Braune's view is that generally received, and by far the most tenable.—R.]

Ver. 4. The nature of the fellowship.—There is one body and one Spirit [ἐν σῶμα καὶ ἐν πνεῦμα].—Ἐν σῶμα (i. 23; ii. 16; Rom. xii. 5; 1 Cor. xii. 13, 20) designates the totality of Christians as a corpus mysticum; it is not—ἐκκλησία, church, which is to be viewed as the external phenomenon, the body of Christ is hidden, but a reality, like the body of nerves, a hidden reality, which can be traced, making itself perceptible, the invisible church, the unity of which is emphasized by the Apostle and to be held fast.—Καὶ ἐν πνεῦμα is added to designate the soul of this body, the Holy Ghost, which forms and moulds the body, and to show that this σῶμα of Christ is no πῶμα. He is not speaking therefore of an ideal invisible church, which does not actually exist, but of the actual, real essence of the church, which is internal, but comes into being continuously. It is foolish to explain here, we should be united penitus, corpore et anima, non ex parte duntaxat (CALVIN and others).

Since Christ's body and the Holy Ghost are perceptible, not in their essence, but only inwardly and in their effects and consequences, Paul refers next to their own experience:

As ye were also called in one hope of your calling [καθὼς καὶ ἐκλήθητε ἐν μιᾷ ἐλπίδι τῆς κλήσεως ὑμῶν].—According to the calling (καθὼς καὶ ἐκλήθητε), by means of which he who is called has obtained or can obtain knowledge and perception of the "body" and "Spirit" just mentioned! This calling points likewise (καὶ) to the unity, because it is consummated "in one hope;" as soon as a man is called of God, he is in the hope of salvation (σωτηρία, κληρονομία) and this hope is one and the same for each and all who are called, by right, in tendency and effect. This "hope" belongs so especially to the being called (ἐκλήθητε) that it can be termed all along "of your calling;" hope and calling are not to be separated from each other. BENDEL is excellent: Spiritus est ARRHABO, atque ideo cum ejus mentione conjungitur SPES HEREDITATIS. They belong together from the beginning; Paul here however refers to the history of the origin of church-fellowship which is to be maintained, whether one looks at the unity of the church, or of principle, or of aim. It cannot be said that the calling consists in hope (BENDEL: ἐν exprimit indolem rei, HABLESS and others), still less that it takes place by means of hope (MEYER), or that ἐν is=εἰς. WINKER, p. 385.

[See EADIE for a list of prepositions used with καλέω in the New Testament. He, with ALFORD

* [So EADIE with more correctness than ALFORD and ELLICOTT, for though γὰρ is not to be supplied, yet the logical connection of the assertion is argumentative. It is one of the rare cases where the grammatical nicety of the commentator last named has led him somewhat astray.—R.]

† [So MEYER: "Objective relations of unity, to which the non-observance of the precept in ver. 3 would be opposed. These are: 1. The Church itself constituted as a unity—one body, one Spirit, one blessed consummation, ver. 4; 2. That by which this constitution of the same as a unity has and does come to pass—one Lord, one faith, one baptism, ver. 5; 3. The supreme Ruler, Administrator and Preserver of this entire unity—one God and Father, etc., ver. 6. Notice the triple tri-partite division."—R.] and ELLICOTT, rightly supports the usual meaning of ἐν here: the element in which the calling took place. ELLICOTT speaks of this sense of the preposition as being, "so to say, its theological meaning." He takes the genitive as one of originating cause, but it is rather that of possession, "the genitive of the correlative noun, suggesting what belongs to the call and characterized it, when they received it. The 'hope' is 'one,' for it has one object, and that is glory: one fountain, and that is Christ" (EADIE). Ἐλπίς is of course subjective.—R.]

Ver. 5. Christ and the union with Him.—One Lord, one faith, one baptism.—This refers to the way and the means of salvation. Εἰς κύριος, "one Lord," is Christ, the Lord par excellence. See ver. 1; i. 21. The word found in Deut. vi. 4 is now applied in the New Testament to Christ (1 Cor. viii. 4-6). His will has authority over all. Each one stands equally near to Him; for there is "one faith," which unites with Him; faith (i. 1, 15; ii. 8; iii. 12, 17) unites inwardly to the one Lord, trusts Him as Lord. Hence there is but one faith, and not several kinds: fides, qua creditur; it is not then a faith in abstracto (HARLESS), nor the doctrine of faith (GROTIUS and others); for this faith is actually and efficiently present and a living power, a believing. [A vast deal of difficulty as well as of error is avoided by bearing in mind that πίστις, "faith," in the New Testament, almost invariably means subjective faith (Gal. i. 23 is the only exception, and this perhaps an apparent one). The conception of "faith" as a universal dogma belongs to a later age, and while it has preserved Roman Catholic uniformity, has not "kept the unity of the Spirit." So the Apostle implies: Because there is one faith, keep unity, not because we need unity, lay down one objective Catholic undoubted Christian faith. Dr. HODGE defends the objective sense here, but must make limitations which are of necessity indefinite enough to cast doubt on his own view. Still the context plainly points to the "one Lord" as the object of the "one faith:" and in the nature of things one subjective recognition of this eternal truth respecting Christ, this apprehension of Him in His Person and work, necessarily involves a common objective profession of it, and thus we pass to the third term of the verse, which is to be regarded as the external sign of faith, and in one aspect as a profession objectively made.—R.]

Faith, which is one, begins with baptism, which is also only one; the former is an internal subjective medium, the latter an objective one, from without and above; these two factors make the Lord our own, and us the Lord's own. Modo baptismus modo fides præponitur, Mark xvi. 16; Col. ii. 12 (BENGEL). [The order of the words does not justify this view of Dr. Braune's. ALFORD takes the verse as presenting three great facts on which unity rests, the first objective, the second subjective, the third compounded of the two: "the objective seal of the subjective faith, by which, as a badge, the members of Christ are outwardly and visibly stamped with His name." To find a reference to one mode of baptism is unwarranted by text or context.—R.]

Why the Lord's Supper is not mentioned, is evident from the context, which contains the motives for the exhortation, to desire to preserve the unity of the Spirit. The Lord's Supper is rather an act of the preserved unity, than a motive for its preservation. It is celebrated by those who have been reconciled with God and hold each other to be brethren; it does not so much give an impulse to peaceableness, as it is a result of the same, as a common celebration of those who have become united together, as an attestation of the church which has become one in the Lord. DE WETTE refers to this by intimating that the Lord's Supper is not mentioned, because it is a representation of unity.* The reference to the fundamental conditions of the Christian communion at its beginning is an insufficient ground for the omission of this sacrament (HARLESS and others). Still less admissible is it to suppose that it is included in the one sacrament of baptism (CALOVIUS), or in the "one Lord, one faith" (OLSHAUSEN), or to explain historically, that there has been as yet no separate celebration (MEYER), or that this is prophetic foresight, since the unity of the sacred feast would be broken nevertheless (STIER), or because he did not wish to hinder the manifold form of the rite (SCHENKEL), or because a definite expression for it was wanting (BLEEK).

Ver. 6. The deepest basis of true unity. One God and Father of all.—Here God the Father is referred to, after the Spirit (ver. 4) and the Son (ver. 5) have been made prominent. As little as God can be disunited with Himself, so little should you who are His children be among yourselves. Hence to the phrase "one God," there is added exegetically: "and Father," the genitive "of all," under which Christ cannot be included, leading us to understand it as the Father of believers, of those who have become God's children in Christ. "Father" cannot then mean merely "creator," according to the heathen conception, nor can "of all" be neuter in this context. Nam omnes ad unitatem rediguntur (BENGEL), and the following "all" (πάντων πᾶσι) takes up the first one again, referring to persons, to the members of the Church, who should preserve the unity in the Spirit; on which account ver. 7 continues: "to every one of you." It is accordingly neither neuter (IRENÆUS and others), nor to be extended to men in general (HOLZHAUSEN).

Who is over all, ὁ ἐπὶ πάντων, marks the Ruler, Guardian, Guide (WINER, p. 351) governing over all (WINER, p. 390). CHRYSOSTOM: ἐπάνω πάντων, τὴν δεσποτείαν σημαίνει.

And through all, καὶ διὰ πάντων, per omnes operans (BENGEL); the individuals are instruments, means, as Rom. xv. 18; 1 Cor. iii. 9; Gal. i. 1: δι' ἀνθρώπων—διὰ Ἰησοῦ. See WINER, p. 390.

And in all, καὶ ἐν πᾶσι, dwelling in all

* [On this question, which seems to have occupied undue prominence from the sacramental tendencies of many commentators, ELLICOTT remarks that if a reason must be assigned, "it must be referred to the fundamental difference between the sacraments. The one is rather the symbol of union, the other, from its single celebration and marked individual reference, presents more clearly the idea of unity,"—the idea most in harmony with the context."—R.]

(BENGEL, WINER), filling them, perfecting them (John xiv. 23). All three qualifications refer to "God and Father," hence are not to be interpreted in a trinitarian sense, of the Father, Son and Holy Ghost, so that He who is "through all" is the Head working through all, and He who is "in all" is the indwelling Spirit, yet such a reference lies unmistakably in the background (Rom. xi. 36; 1 Cor. xii. 4-6; 2 Cor. xiii. 13), at all events was not far off, so that HARLESS can discover here a recapitulation of "one God," "one Lord," "one Spirit," which STIER and others think was intentional. Comp. HOFMANN, Schriftbeweis, I. p. 201 f., who doubts any reference to the Trinity, but applying it to the Father not without the Son and the Spirit, excludes no one Person. The reference to Redemption alone is clearer, hence "through all" is not to be understood of the all-pervading creative power, nor of Providence in general.

[While the mention of "one baptism," with its Trinitarian formula, suggests the great probability of a reference to the Trinity in the several expressions of this verse, which is further favored by the first and third prepositions, it is far safer not to press it. The express mention of the "Father" is against it; διὰ can be referred to the work or office of the Son only by departing from its proper sense or inverting its relation to the rest of the verse ("per quem omnia facta sunt," AQUINAS, so OLSHAUSEN), and as EADIE remarks: "In previous portions of the Epistle triune relation has been distinctly brought out; here the representation is different, for unity is the idea dwelt on, and it is the One God and Father Himself who works through all and dwells in all." ELLICOTT here confessedly allows doctrinal considerations to outweigh his exegetical convictions, and it is precisely thus, that those who defend the well-grounded doctrine of the church lose in their contests with those who impugn it. They attack our exegesis of a passage like this, and we must defend the doubtful, unimportant outpost at a disadvantage.—One thing is certain that this passage refers to believers alone, neither teaching God's Fatherhood of all men (though ALFORD thinks it is referred to as a lost possession), nor pantheism of any kind.—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The unity of the Church. Although ἐκκλησία and σῶμα (Χριστοῦ) describe so nearly the same, that of the former it is said (i. 23): "which is his body," while in Col. i. 24 we read of "his body, which is the church," yet the two may be thus distinguished: the former designates the church as an assembly of believers, of saints; the latter as a living organism, the organ of Him who is the Head, thus with the corpus Christi mysticum, giving more prominence to the inner concealed side, the unity of the same. Hence there are indeed "churches," but no "bodies of Christ." The Nicene creed was right in adding: UNAM et sanctam catholicam et apostolicam ecclesiam (the Apostles' has only: sanctam ecclesiam catholicam); so the Augsburg Confession, Art. 7: quod UNA sancta ecclesia perpetuo mansura sit. Strictly there is but one Church of Christ, though in groups of congregations with different confessions. No confessional church (though, strictly speaking, the term is a misnomer) is the Church of Christ, it is only a church by the side of others, through which the body of Christ extends itself.

2. The distinction of the body of Christ from the Spirit is indicated definitely enough by their being placed side by side, yet the latter at the same time gives prominence to the church as the working-place of the Spirit.*

3. The call, when accepted and effectual, begins within the called, not with a mere promise which he receives, but with a hope corresponding thereto, so that the objective call of God and the subjective acceptance of the man come together, and he from the very beginning knows and feels himself to be shown out of the lower sphere of life into the higher one.

4. Christ is the One Lord, and no faith in Him is genuine, except it be in Him as Lord. It is not sufficient to believe the Master or Teacher; it is not enough to feel and deem ourselves scholars, hearers, disciples. The Christian must be servant, subject of Christ, not merely to hear or listen to Him, but to belong to Him, to hearken to Him, to obey, to follow Him as His vassal, attendant, servant. No human dignity, in the history of our lives or of the world exceeds the dignity of Christ: He is the one only Lord; who gives Him up, must give up faith and the fellowship of the church.

5. Baptism, with which faith begins (regeneratio præcedit fidem) imparts the germ of the new life, the beginning of the gift of the Holy Ghost, the principle of faith in the subject, as at birth, upon coming to the light of the world, man is endowed with reason. It is not merely a symbolical act, nor a mere prophecy of the cleansing which begins later, but it is the incorporation into the body of Christ, animated by the Spirit, implantation into the soil of divine life. [This is the Lutheran view, approaching, in its estimate of the objective grace of this Sacrament, the position of Romanism and Anglicanism. Certainly the fact that baptism is mentioned at all, puts it into an exalted position, from which unchurchly Zwinglianism would degrade it. But it is not placed before faith, nor is there here any warrant for the assertion that faith begins with baptism. The Reformed or Calvinistic view is most in accordance with our passage. See Heidelberg Catechism, Questions 69-74; Belgic Confession, xxxiv.; Westminster Confession, xxviii.; comp. especially Romans, p. 206, Doct. Note 3.—While there is no reference to the one mode of baptism, there is probably an allusion to the fact that baptism is not or should not be repeated.—R.]

* [HODGE: "There are many passages to which the doctrine of the Trinity gives a sacred rhythm, though the doctrine itself is not directly asserted. It is so here. There is one Spirit, one Lord, one God and Father. The unity of the Church is founded on this doctrine. It is one, because there is to us one God the Father, one Lord, one Spirit. It is a truly mystical union; not a mere union of opinion, of interest, or of feeling; but something supernatural arising from a common principle of life. This life is not the natural life which belongs to us as creatures; nor intellectual, which belongs to us as rational beings; but it is spiritual life, called elsewhere the life of God in the soul. And as this life is common on the one hand to Christ and all His members, and on the other to Christ and God, this union of the Church is not only with Christ, but with the Triune God."—R.]

6. God, the Father of believers, is not far from them, over them, but near to them, disposing concerning them, working through them, yes, dwelling in them, as in a temple, furnishing His work as in a work-shop. God is a Person, who not only rules throughout the universe, but gives to His own a special personality.

7. The Atheist denies the Father, the Deist the Son, the Pantheist the Holy Ghost, because he substitutes for it the unholy "spirit of the world" (BAADER).

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ever return from multiplicity to unity, and in freedom to obligation; but never let your view of the unities be disturbed. Do not hold faith higher than baptism, penetrate into the communion of the Church until you reach the Spirit which is its soul, and do not sunder the Lord Jesus and God the Father!

STARKE:—There is but one Church, which receives life and movement from the Holy Ghost, and hence but one ship, with which we can sail into the haven of bliss; all other vessels destroy and drown.—Christians are all equal in the fellowship of heavenly possessions, and no one has a better God, Christ, Spirit, Faith, etc., but what one has, the others have also, although one may have a greater enjoyment of such possessions than another.

RIEGER:—The body of Christ is ruled by one Spirit; one Lord gave Himself for the Redemption of all; out of one Word of truth and of faith are we convinced; one baptism is the door of entrance for us into the kingdom of God. Therefore God administers such a government of love over all, that as much as possible equality is established; out of his property every one can contribute something to the common benefit: as God on the other hand so gives Himself to be enjoyed by each, that he dare not look too anxiously upon others, still less through secret envy render difficult his keeping peace with all.—HEUBNER, see Homil. Notes on the preceding section.

PASSAVANT:—There is one path, one goal, one house, one family, one home to which you have been called; you all hope for one heaven, and in the same heaven to obtain a common inheritance, an identical blessedness and glory in the heavenly life.—"I do not know, how it happens, that we glory in being the children of God so confidently and yet at the same time forget brotherly love."

STRICK:—Where there is still body, there is also Spirit—that is the Apostle's great thought.—Baptism and Faith belong together: 1. As faith is the subjective appropriation, so baptism is the objective representation of the same; 2. Faith takes out of the Lord's hand, in baptism we have the firm foundation and beginning from the Lord.—I confess that I find the one faith on the Lord in many a [Roman] Catholic with the hearty joy of fraternal agreement, and in many a zealot for the pure Word and Sacrament I might look for it with pain and in vain.

[EADIE:—"One baptism" is the result and expression of the "one faith" in the "one Lord," and, at the same time, the one mode of initiation by the "one Spirit" into the "one body."—All this unity is but the impress of the great primal unity—one God.—Christ's claim for the preservation of unity is upon all the churches—a unity of present connection and actual enjoyment—not a truce, but an alliance, with one living and cognizance—not a compromise, but a veritable incorporation.—HODGE:—All sins against unity are sins against the Holy Ghost.—R.]

[Seven times does the word "one" occur in these verses, but the middle term is "one Lord," next on either side "one hope"—"one faith."—How great a unity results from "one faith," the same trust of the heart on the "one Lord;" one creed often leads and always permits us to chop logic and split hairs, but where the "faith" is "one," hearts are one, and no earnest Christian has failed to notice how quickly this manifests itself.—It is a comfort to come back from the jars of the church of to-day and the wars of the church of the past, to the simple truth: There is one body: but here too faith is required.—R.]

b. The gift of Christ to individuals.

(CHAP. IV. 7-10).

7 But unto every [to each] one of us is given grace [was the¹ grace given] according to the measure of the gift of Christ. Wherefore he saith, When he ascended up on high, he led [a] captivity captive, and² gave gifts unto [to] men. ([omit parenthesis]) Now that he ascended, what is it but that he also descended first [omit 10 first]³ into the lower parts⁴ of the earth? He that [who] descended is the same also that [he it is also who] ascended up far [omit far] above all [the] heavens, that he might fill all things. ([omit]).

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

¹ Ver. 7.—[The article is omitted in B. D.¹ F. G. L., a few cursives, by Lachmann; bracketted by Alford; inserted in N. A. C. D.³ K., accepted by Tischendorf and most recent editors. The omission was probably due to the η which precedes, and some glosses still further sustain its genuineness.—The order of the E. V. is altered for the sake of retaining the article, and was substituted for it, to bring out the force of the aorist.—R.]

² Ver. 8.—[$\kappa\alpha\iota$ is omitted in N. A. C.² D.¹ F., versions and fathers; rejected by Lachmann, Tischendorf (ed. 2), Elliccott. It is found in (Rec.) N.² B. C.¹² D.³ K. L., nearly all cursives, versions (Syriac, etc.), fathers; accepted by Tischendorf (ed. 7), Meyer, Alford, Braune. As it is wanting in the LXX., the internal evidence seems to decide in its favor; an insertion for the sake of connection is not probable.—See Exeg. Notes for the text of the original Hebrew and the LXX.—R.]

⁴ Ver. 9.—[The authority for $\mu\epsilon\rho\eta$ is much stronger than for $\pi\alpha\tau\epsilon\rho$ (N. A. B. C. D.³ K. L., nearly all cursives, a few versions and fathers), though it is open to suspicion as an explanatory gloss, and is rejected by Tischendorf, Meyer and Elliott (omitted in D.¹ F., most fathers). It is however retained, on account of the strong uncial support, by Lachmann, Scholz, Rückert, Alford and Braune.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 7. Every one is cared for by Christ.—But to each one of us, $\epsilon\tilde{\nu}\iota\ \delta\epsilon\ \epsilon\kappa\acute{\alpha}\sigma\tau\omega\ \eta\mu\acute{\omega}\nu$.—Antithetical to “through all and in all,” in order to explain it and to give prominence to the subjective condition, which is a motive for the preservation of unity; “of us” holds fast to the circle of Christians, of believers; it recalls iii. 20: “in us.” After the seventh “one” and the fourth “all,” prominence is given to the specializing of what is common to all, to what is peculiar to the individuals. [Hence $\epsilon\tilde{\nu}\iota$ in addition to $\epsilon\kappa\acute{\alpha}\sigma\tau\omega$.—R.] It cannot be referred to teachers (PASSAVANT), or to extraordinary Christians (BAUMGARTEN-CRUSIUS), or to the relation of Jewish and Gentile Christians (OLSHAUSEN). Each has a part in salvation, and should prove it in concord; each has a part in salvation, and hence should be treated in a fraternal manner.

Was the grace given [$\epsilon\delta\acute{o}\theta\eta\ \eta\ \chi\acute{\alpha}\rho\iota\varsigma$].—The verb stands first for emphasis: Every one has received, no one has it of himself; each has to recognize that, for himself, in order not to be proud, for another, in order not to despise or avoid him. That which was given by Christ is “the grace,” God’s grace, which is active and noticeable in Christianity,* and of which he has already spoken in ver. 6 (HARLESS); or the grace imparted

According to the measure of the gift of Christ [$\kappa\alpha\tau\grave{\alpha}\ \tau\acute{o}\ \mu\acute{\epsilon}\tau\rho\omicron\nu\ \tau\eta\varsigma\ \delta\omega\rho\epsilon\acute{\alpha}\varsigma\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\ \chi\rho\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\upsilon$].—One kind of grace is given, and yet very differently. It is given by Christ; hence the genitive $\chi\rho\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\upsilon$ is the genitive subjecti, on which account we find in ver. 8: “and gave gifts,” ver. 11: “and He gave,” accordingly that gift which He has given, not received (OEDER in Wolf). He gives to each individual, to one more, to another less, to each the entire grace, but in peculiar form, with differently manifested strength, efficacy and tendency; hence “according to the measure of the gift of Christ.” [“In proportion to the amount of the gift which Christ gives” (ELLICOTT), the first genitive being a simple possessive genitive, and the second that of the agent, or both being subjective. STIER tries to combine the ideas of giving and receiving in the phrase: “of Christ.” “The rule is not our merit, or our previous capacity, nor our asking, but His own good pleasure” (HODGE).—R.]

Christ has power thereto; Vers. 8-10. a) The quotation (ver. 8). b) The further exposition and application (vers. 9, 10).

Ver. 8. Wherefore he saith.— $\Delta\acute{o}$ denotes that in the quotation there is a reference and proof, i. e., for “the gift of Christ;” as will appear. We most naturally supply $\eta\ \gamma\rho\alpha\phi\acute{\eta}$, the Scripture, with $\lambda\acute{\epsilon}\gamma\epsilon\iota$, “saith” (Jas. iv. 6; Rom. xv. 10; Gal. iii. 16; 1 Cor. vi. 16: $\phi\eta\sigma\acute{\iota}\nu$), and not $\acute{o}\ \theta\epsilon\acute{o}\varsigma$ (MEYER, SCHENKEL), or $\acute{o}\ \lambda\acute{\epsilon}\gamma\omega\nu$ (BLEEK: the writer). [The fact that Paul frequently supplies $\eta\ \gamma\rho\alpha\phi\acute{\eta}$ (Rom. iv. 3; ix. 17; x. 11; Gal. iv. 30; 1 Tim. v. 18) is against Braune’s view; for in some of these passages there is a reason for its insertion (see Romans, p. 314), and as the Scriptures are God’s Word (MEYER), the natural aim and obvious subject is $\acute{o}\ \theta\epsilon\acute{o}\varsigma$. So ALFORD, ELLICOTT and most.—R.] The quotation is from Psalm lxxviii. 19: $\epsilon\lambda\acute{\iota}\tau\ \lambda\acute{\epsilon}\gamma\omega\ \epsilon\tilde{\nu}\iota\ \kappa\alpha\tau\grave{\alpha}\ \mu\acute{\epsilon}\tau\rho\omicron\nu\ \tau\eta\varsigma\ \delta\omega\rho\epsilon\acute{\alpha}\varsigma\ \tau\omicron\upsilon\ \chi\rho\iota\sigma\tau\omicron\upsilon$. In Paul it reads:

When he ascended upon high he led a captivity captive, and gave gifts to men, $\acute{\alpha}\nu\alpha\beta\acute{\alpha}\varsigma\ \epsilon\tilde{\nu}\iota\ \psi\upsilon\phi\omicron\varsigma\ \eta\ \chi\mu\alpha\lambda\acute{\omega}\tau\epsilon\nu\ \epsilon\nu\ \alpha\iota\chi\mu\alpha\lambda\omega\sigma\acute{\iota}\alpha\nu\ \kappa\alpha\iota\ \acute{\epsilon}\delta\omega\kappa\epsilon\ \delta\acute{o}\mu\alpha\tau\alpha\ \tau\omicron\iota\varsigma\ \acute{\alpha}\nu\theta\rho\omega\pi\omicron\iota\varsigma$.—The citation is unmistakable up to the last clause: Paul has used the third person instead of the second, because he would mark the application and not merely quote; but in the last clause he substitutes “give” for “receive,” and the dative $\tau\omicron\iota\varsigma\ \acute{\alpha}\nu\theta\rho\omega\pi\omicron\iota\varsigma$ for $\epsilon\nu\ \acute{\alpha}\nu\theta\rho\omega\pi\omicron\iota\varsigma$. The article is found in the Hebrew, in the Kameis, and in the singular, the general idea, which Paul expresses by the plural, inheres. Accordingly there remains but three variations of any consequence: $\lambda\acute{\epsilon}\gamma\omega$, $\lambda\alpha\mu\beta\acute{\alpha}\nu\epsilon\nu$, to receive, what is in itself inadmissible, $\acute{\alpha}\nu\theta\rho\omega\pi\omicron\iota\varsigma$, to give; instead of $\delta\acute{o}\mu\alpha\tau\alpha$, the dative, which is not represented by $\tau\omicron\iota\varsigma$, but by $\eta\mu\acute{\iota}\nu$, and the added $\kappa\alpha\iota$. What in the glorious Psalm is said of God, whose triumphant doings on the earth are praised, and who takes up His abode on Mount Zion, in His sanctuary, to which the people festively draw near, and whither the Gentiles also will come, this the Apostle here applies to Christ. David sang of the ark of the covenant, which, after a great victory, was transferred (STIER) or brought back (HENGSTEN-

* [The aorist points to a definite act: “by Christ, at the time of His exaltation—when He bestowed gifts on men” (Alford).—“The grace,” as the article is to be retained, has some shade of a transitive force, denoting the energizing grace which manifests itself in the peculiar gift (ELLICOTT) rather than the spiritual gift itself and the influence, function, or office flowing from it (HODGE).—R.]

BERG) to Zion. In this fact he sees the principle of the history of the Kingdom of God, appearing in ever widening circles and nobler manner; the fact is to him a type of the method and course of the Messianic kingdom. Hence the general view (vers. 2-7 and 29-36) and the reminiscence of the journey through the wilderness from Sinai to Zion (vers. 8-19). So that the Apostle is perfectly justified in finding the singer's eye directed towards Christ and thus interpreting it. The height ("on high") in the Psalm is first of all Zion (ver. 16, 17; comp. Jer. xvii. 12, 23; xxxi. 12; xxxiv. 14, where צִיּוֹן is spoken of Zion); but this is a type of heaven; of the most holy height, on which according to the Apostle has heaven in his mind (ver. 10).* By "captivity," αἰχμαλωσία, according to Judith ii. 9; Ezra vi. 5; Rev. xiii. 10, we must understand captives, a troop or group of them, and not prison, captivity (LUTHER). This the parallelism which follows in the Psalm (LXX: ἀπεθώκοντες, Vulgate: non credentes) teaches us; indeed the next clause (ἐλαβεῖς δόματα ἐν ἀνθρώπῳ) indicates plainly enough that the notion of αἰχμαλωσία is that of a turba captivorum, a crowd of captives, since the passage speaks of gifts in the man (in the human race), in men, presents consisting in men, whom He received and bore with Him into the same sanctuary.† This however the Apostle does not simply take up in his quotation, does not place it after the first clause without any connecting particle, but with καί, which denotes advance, something further, passes from the quotation over into the meaning: and He gave. For what God conquers, overcomes, leads with Himself, takes to Himself, makes His own, He does not wish to retain for Himself, but He transforms it, endows it, and makes it a gift: His captives become His servants, Israel's servants. He makes the enemies and antagonists of His theocracy its servants. So in a higher sense Christ; He made

Saul Paul, the enemy and destroyer of His church an Apostle. God's taking, receiving, points to a subsequent giving, Christ's giving to a previous receiving. Thus the taking of gifts in men passes over into a giving for men, and the citation from David's Psalm the Apostle interprets as referring to Christ. By "men," τοῖς ἀνθρώποις, we must understand chiefly men conquered by Him, His men, to whom He has given gifts of grace, that they themselves may and can become gifts for men in wider circles (see ver. 11; Acts ii. 33).

After all this, it cannot be said that the citation is not from Ps. lxxviii. 19, but ex carmine, quod ab Ephesiis cantitari sciret (STORR, FLATT), or that Paul did not know the exact words (RUECKERT), nor non nihil a genuino sensu detorsit, de suo adjecit (CALVIN), or to invent an exegetical tradition from the Targums (which were made not earlier than the third century, and the Syriac and Arabic versions, altered to accord with the Apostle, and to suppose the Apostle had followed this (HOLZHAUSEN, MEYER and others). Nor should we go beyond the context, and find a reference, as in Col. ii. 15, to Satanic powers, which He has led captive (CHRYSOSTOM, BEZA, CALOV., BENIGL, STIER and others), since this does not comport with the Apostle's interpretation, or to the souls released from Hades (ESTIUS, DELITZSCH, Psychology, p. 358, and others), since enemies are spoken of. Finally we cannot infer from this passage in the Psalms and the use Paul makes of it this difference between the Old and New Testaments, that in the former God receives gifts from or among men, but in the latter gives to men (SCHENKEL).

[The real difficulty of this verse lies in the form of the last clause. That Paul quotes from the Psalm which has a Messianic reference, that Christ is represented as returning victoriously to heaven with a crowd of captives, is evident, and occasions no difficulty. But as the point of the section is Christ's giving to men, it is singular that the words: "gave gifts to men" are not found in the Psalm, which says: "received gifts among men" (קָבַץ, lit., in the man), or as Braune takes it, "consisting in men," i. e., the captives. Dr. J. A. ALEXANDER (Psalms, in loco): "To receive gifts on the one hand and bestow gifts on the other are correlative ideas and expressions, so that Paul, in applying this description of a theocratic triumph to the conquests of our Saviour, substitutes one of these expressions for the other." If this be deemed satisfactory, and Braune's view, which obviates the difficulty in קָבַץ, be accepted, the solution is complete. But if the latter be rejected (see footnote on αἰχμαλωσίαν), then we can render the original passage: "has taken gifts among men" (the collective sense is clearly correct) and consider the whole phrase recast by the Apostle to express the correlative idea which is at hand, and which is contained in the further, fuller, and deeper meaning of the Psalm, here succinctly, suggestively and authoritatively unfolded (ELLICOTT). This seems to be more satisfactory than to attempt to prove that the Hebrew expresses this meaning. It may be admitted that it is often=danda sumpsit (as EADIE clearly proves) but that it means this in the Psalm in question is

* [The inspired and prophetic character of the Psalm, and its antiquity are undoubted (see HITZIG, HENGSTENBERG, DELITZSCH, against DE WETTE and EWALD). It was probably composed after a battle, and quite as probably (against EADIE) "at some bringing up of the ark to the hill of Zion," which took place after a victory (HENGSTENBERG: taking of Babbah, 2 Sam. xii. 26). ALFORD, with reference to the return of the ark, says: "It is therefore a Messianic Psalm. Every part of that ark, every stone of that hill, was full of spiritual meaning. Every note struck on the lyres of the sweet singers of Israel, is but part of a chord, deep and world-wide, sounding from the golden harps of Redemption. The partial triumphs of David and Solomon only prefigured as in a prophetic mirror the universal and eternal triumph of the Incarnate Son of God. Those who do not know this, have yet their first lesson in the Old Testament to learn." Comp. Doctr. Note 3.—R.]

† [In the revision by Four Anglican Clergymen, captives is substituted for captivity. "A captivity" is a literal rendering which points to the concrete sense.—As regards this concrete sense, there is little difference of opinion, the only question being: Who are the captives? Obviously enemies who have been overcome, either (a) men who become His servants, those referred to in τοῖς ἀνθρώποις (BRAUNE), following some fathers, HARLESS, OLSHAUSEN and others), who were previously prisoners of Satan (though BRAUNE does not bring this out, or (b) Satan, sin, death (CHRYSOSTOM, BENIGL, MEYER, STIER, EADIE, ALFORD, HODGE, ELLICOTT); CALVIN seeks to combine the two. The former view greatly lessens the difficulty in the last clause of the quotation, helping to justify the substitution of the notion of giving for that of receiving in the original passage. But this very fact lays it open to suspicion as an exegesis for an emergency. The other view is favored by Col. ii. 15 (though not to be limited by the reference there), it preserves the analogy of the comparison, and gives a forcible meaning. Other views have been suggested, but not very probable ones.—R.]

very doubtful. The same view would render $\epsilon\lambda\theta\eta\varsigma$, for men, which becomes to men, after the bestowal of the gift. See EADIE in loco.—R.]

Ver. 9. Now that he ascended, $\tau\delta\delta\epsilon\alpha\nu\epsilon\beta\eta$, taken from the $\alpha\nu\alpha\beta\acute{\alpha}\varsigma$.—[Not the word, which does not occur in the passage quoted, but the predicate, which is contained in $\alpha\nu\alpha\beta\acute{\alpha}\varsigma$ (MEYER). The $\delta\epsilon$ introduces a slight explanatory transition; not strictly a proof (HODGE, ELLICOTT, following HOFMANN and MEYER) of the correctness of the Messianic application of the passage cited, but a further explanation of what it means as thus applied. MEYER now (4th ed.) gives up his former view, remarking that such a proof was unnecessary and illogical, since the subject of the Psalm in its Messianic fulfilment was self-evident, and God Himself is conceived of in the Old Testament as $\delta\kappa\alpha\tau\alpha\beta\acute{\alpha}\varsigma$.—R.]

What is it [What does it imply] but that he also descended [$\tau\acute{\iota}\epsilon\sigma\tau\iota\nu\epsilon\acute{\iota}\mu\eta\delta\tau\iota\kappa\alpha\iota\kappa\alpha\tau\epsilon\beta\eta$].— $\tau\acute{\iota}\epsilon\sigma\tau\iota\nu$ =what is thereby expressed (Matth. ix. 13; John xvi. 17 ff.; x. 6)? $\delta\tau\iota\kappa\alpha\iota\kappa\alpha\tau\epsilon\beta\eta$, He has not merely ascended, but has also previously descended; the former presupposes the latter. Thus heaven is indicated as His original dwelling-place (John iii. 13) and His Person as that glorious, helping One, who can and will give gifts. [So MEYER. It is impossible to understand the verse otherwise than as indicating heaven to be the point of departure and the place of return for Him who descends and ascends. The doubt respects only the place whither He descended and whence He ascended.—R.]

Into the lower parts of the earth, $\epsilon\iota\varsigma\tau\alpha\kappa\alpha\tau\omega\tau\epsilon\rho\alpha\mu\acute{\epsilon}\rho\eta\tau\eta\varsigma\gamma\eta\varsigma$.—This closer definition of the descending evidently indicates the depths of the lower world, the subterranean world, which is below the surface of the earth; the genitive is partitive, governed by $\mu\acute{\epsilon}\rho\eta$. The thought occurs in a variety of forms (Phil. ii. 10: $\kappa\alpha\tau\alpha\chi\theta\iota\nu\omega\nu$; Acts ii. 27, 31: $\epsilon\iota\varsigma\alpha\delta\nu$; 1 Pet. iii. 19: $\epsilon\nu\phi\upsilon\lambda\alpha\kappa\eta$). The expression here corresponds to $\kappa\alpha\tau\omega\tau\alpha\tau\alpha\tau\eta\varsigma\gamma\eta\varsigma$ (Ps. lxxiii. 10), grammatically $\tau\eta\varsigma\gamma\eta\varsigma$ might be the genitive of apposition (WINER, p. 494), like $\epsilon\iota\varsigma\tau\omega\iota\nu\delta\iota\sigma\tau\omega\iota\sigma\tau\omega\iota\sigma$ (Isa. xxxviii. 14). It is also true that the context up to this point would permit us to refer the phrase to the earth alone. But the following $\tau\alpha\pi\acute{\alpha}\nu\tau\alpha$ (ver. 10) and the design of the Apostle to show the power of Christ, require the fullest justifiable meaning of the expression, and hence the application to Hades. There is no reference to burial (CHRYSOSTOM and others), nor in accordance with Ps. cxxxix. 15 to the mother's womb (CALIXTUS and others).

[This interpretation of the phrase: "the lower parts of the earth" is the one anciently received, current among Romanist expositors, and adopted more recently by BENDEL, RUECKERT, OLSHAUSEN, STIER, TURNER, WORDSWORTH, ALFORD and ELLICOTT. The other view: the lower parts, viz., the earth, is accepted by the majority of modern commentators, such as CALVIN, GROTIUS, HARLESS, DE WETTE, HOFMANN, HODGE and EADIE (who gives a full statement of views and a good defence of this interpretation). It may be remarked that while one class of expositors may have been led to the one conclusion by a desire to sustain the article of the Apostles' Creed: "He descended into hell," the other may have been quite as much influenced by a fear of favoring the Romanist appendages to that article. Both views are alike grammatical, for while the positive would more naturally express the latter sense and the superlative the former, we have here the indefinite comparative, which may mean either. Doctrinally either view is admissible, while the considerations mentioned by Braune perhaps make the ancient view the preferable one. On Christ's descent into Hades, see Dr. SCHAFF's note, Matthew, pp. 228-229, and LANGE and MOMBERT, First Peter, pp. 63 f., 67-72. ZANCHIUS, BARNES and others favor the notion that the phrase signifies, in general, lowliness or humiliation, a view altogether untenable, because opposed to the context, and an unnecessary departure from the literal meaning.—R.]

Ver. 10. He who descended, he it is also who ascended [$\delta\kappa\alpha\tau\alpha\beta\acute{\alpha}\varsigma\alpha\upsilon\tau\acute{o}\varsigma\epsilon\sigma\tau\iota\nu\kappa\alpha\iota\delta\alpha\nu\alpha\beta\acute{\alpha}\varsigma$].—Both thoughts are here brought together, without $\alpha\upsilon\nu$, in a lively, joyous manner, marking the identity of the Person. $\kappa\alpha\tau\alpha\beta\acute{\alpha}\varsigma$ stands first, having the emphasis, and $\alpha\upsilon\tau\acute{o}\varsigma$ [He, emphatic], not $\delta\alpha\upsilon\tau\acute{o}\varsigma$ [the same, as in E. V.], gives prominence to the Person, who ascended out of the deepest depths, above all the heavens, $\iota\pi\epsilon\rho\alpha\nu\omega\pi\acute{\alpha}\nu\tau\omega\nu\tau\omega\nu\omicron\upsilon\rho\alpha\nu\omega\nu$; the strongest antithesis to ver. 9. Under the term "heavens" there is no necessity for reckoning either three (HARLESS and others) according to 2 Cor. xii. 2, or seven (MEYER and others), according to the prevalent Jewish opinion.* Similar expressions: Heb. iv. 14; vii. 26.

That he might fill all things, $\iota\nu\alpha\pi\lambda\eta\rho\omega\sigma\eta\tau\alpha\pi\acute{\alpha}\nu\tau\alpha$.—The Apostle thus gives the motive for what he has presented [in ver. 7]. There is nothing into which He cannot penetrate. Comp. i. 23. $\tau\alpha\pi\acute{\alpha}\nu\tau\alpha$ designates all regions into which He can carry His gifts, can penetrate with His grace and glory, all regions and all persons within them.† There is no reference to a fulfilment of Old Testament prophecy (ANSELM, KOPPE and others), or to the completion of the work of Redemption (RUECKERT and others); nor is it to be limited to Christians (BEZA, GROTIUS, SCHENKEL and others), for He rules also among and in His enemies (Ps. cx. 12). CHRYSOSTOM is excellent: $\tau\omega\tau\acute{o}\epsilon\sigma\tau\iota\tau\eta\varsigma\epsilon\nu\epsilon\rho\gamma\epsilon\iota\alpha\varsigma\alpha\upsilon\tau\acute{o}\u00b2\kappa\alpha\iota\tau\eta\varsigma\delta\epsilon\sigma\pi\omicron\tau\epsilon\iota\alpha\varsigma$, that He lets none slip, gives to every one, who has permitted himself to be conquered; the gracious and efficient presence of Him, the God-man, is thus established, and ver. 7 explained.

* [ALFORD: "It is natural that one who, like St. Paul, had been brought up in the Jewish habit of thought, should still use their method of speaking." But this does not imply an acceptance of such a division of the heavens; rather this: "Whatsoever heaven is higher than all the rest which are called heavens, into that place did He ascend" (BISH. PEARSON in ELLICOTT).—R.]

† [So HODGE, EADIE, ALFORD and ELLICOTT. Even Dr. Braune does not attempt to justify the use made of this passage to defend the doctrine of the ubiquity of Christ's body (Form. Concord.). On which ELLICOTT aptly says: "Christ is perfect God, and perfect and glorified man; as the former He is present everywhere, as the latter He can be present anywhere."—R.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The idiosyncrasy and freedom of the individual is as little altered by the gift of Christ's grace as the former is of itself able to replace the latter by its own self-originated development. There must be giving, and indeed in this there is necessary a repeated proffering, making receptive or preparing, appropriating and preserving; the Lord offers ten times before we once receive, accept, take; so little does the Lord limit the freedom of the recipient. With the gift (Gabe), however, a task (Aufgabe) is at the same time appointed to the recipient: he must use it, gain with it. The gift does not obliterate national, corporate, local, temporal, individual differences, but purifies and ennobles them. Temperament and natural mental powers, talents and inclinations are only refined, directed, moved and used for the Lord's kingdom and our own salvation. "It is self-evident that the gifts of grace are not mere developments of the natural talents of the man,—but this does not deny that they are planted in a natural talent" (KANNIS, Lehre vom heil. Geist I. p. 72).

2. Christ is the Lord, who gives. He has fought the fight of Redemption, and stands as a conqueror there; has overcome as the Lion of the tribe of Judah, and as the Lamb of God, who bears the sins of the world. He can give to every one and He is willing to do so. His χρῖσμα, by means of which He makes men Christians, is a χάρισμα, grace in a special manner adapted to the individual. Comp. 1 Cor. xii. 8 ff.

3. Respecting the internal connection of the Old and New Testament, as well as for Hermeneutics and Homiletics, much can be deduced from the application of this citation from the Psalms in our passage.

a. "The Apostle knows that what the Old Testament contains, the New Testament must also contain, only in a more glorious manner. Comp. 2 Cor. iii. 7-11. He knows that however different according to the different relations, which are indicated in the very character of the Old Testament revelation, it still inheres in the nature of this unity of the two revelations, to bear witness of this unity to those who can and will seek it. All that was written aforetime was written εἰς ἡμετέραν διδασκαλίαν (Rom. xv. 4)." HARLESS. Besides the definite prophecies, there are in the Old Testament enough types and things typical of Christ and what has taken place in and through Him. What occurred in the people of Israel and is narrated as history or sung by holy men of old, is something pointing to the future; while at the time indeed it is accomplished fact or acute sketching of a living person, yet beyond this it has a validity for the Messianic period, so that when this comes in it is related to it as σκιά to σῶμα, shadow to body. In the Old Testament the Logos is concerned, but concealed, in all; in the New Testament manifested openly in all glory, full of grace and truth. The Jehovah of the Old Testament is the Redeemer in the New. Comp. RIEM, Lehrbegriff des Hebräerbriefts, I. p. 131 ff.

b. Hermeneutics should perceive and show forth, in the acts of God narrated or sung in the Holy Scriptures, His administration, both going back to seek the preparatory and prophetic types, and forwards to point out the advancing accomplishment. But there must be a distinction made between what the passage to be expounded expresses as the sense and meaning of the writer, and what the deed or person, so simply and transparently described, signifies in the kingdom of God, in His people, of which signification the writer may be entirely unconscious. "The knowledge which looks back to the guidance of youth is the knowledge belonging to Christianity; the guidance of youth is the history of the Old Testament theocracy; the veil which rests on the guidance of youth disappears with the knowledge of manhood in Christ (2 Cor. iii. 4-16)." HARLESS. Every important poet, every skilful artist, may first perceive in the later inspection of his work thoughts therein, of which he neither was nor became conscious in making it. So in the Scripture often enough is there more than the writer had in his consciousness. [Comp. Exeg. and Doctr. Notes, Galatians, iv. 19-30. Even EADIE, who is most earnest in the effort to prove that the Apostle cites from the Psalm in accordance with its original and exact sense, says: "Our position is, that the same God is revealed as Redeemer both under the Old and New Testament, that the Jehovah of the one is the Jesus of the other, that Psalm lxxviii. is filled with imagery which was naturally based on incidents in Jewish history, and that the inspired poet, while describing the interposition of Jehovah, has used language which was fully realized only in the victory and exaltation of Christ."—R.]

c. Homiletics may and should place the biblical history of the Old and New Testament, as a concrete manifestation of a Divine thought or of Divine guidance and ways, which enclose love and wisdom for men, besides others in the present life of the world or of individuals, in order to place these latter in that true light, which the former gives. For God and the Saviour Jesus Christ is the same in the Old and the New Testament, and at all times, ours as well, in His Church. GAUPE (Homiletik I. p. 174) calls this the tropological view. [Admitting both the usefulness of teachings drawn from analogy, since analogy, figure, type, etc., all indicate the harmony of the Divine will in Creation, Providence and Redemption, and the propriety of such extensions and applications of the Old Testament on the part of an inspired Apostle, we must remember that our tropological exposition is not authoritative, and that we can base no doctrine or precept upon it, but only use it to elucidate established doctrine or enforce plain precept.—R.]

4. The Christology of this passage. It says that Christ is originally in heaven; there is His eternal dwelling-place. But He betook Himself into lowliness and penetrated the universe even to the lower regions, in order to fill all with His glory. He works as King, dispensing victoriously, where He has wrought as champion. His pre-existence is taken for granted, while we are especially taught His eternal activity of grace in all directions and for all times and for every man.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Only take what Christ gives thee; thou needst envy no one.—Thankfully recognize what He has given to another; it benefits thee also.—Do not be satisfied with the natural endowments of your nation, your class, your family, or your intellect; let them be sanctified, purified, penetrated by grace in Christ. The most highly gifted natural man is always smaller and poorer than a living Christian (GOETHE, TERSTEEGEN).—Christ is King, Lord; His sword is His word, but this is a sword.—He has descended into the deep as a Redeemer; thy sin is not too deep and thy heart is not too bad: He can fill it.

STARKE:—Each member must be contented with his measure of gifts, received without pride, shared without envy.—Dear Christian, wilt thou ascend with Christ and reach His glory, then must thou first descend and suffer.

RIEGER:—No one has all, and no one need be concerned lest he come away entirely empty.—The origin of all gifts is to be found especially in the exaltation of Christ, which began with the victory over the rulers of darkness, over the principalities and powers who held us captive, who were themselves taken captive in the deep path of Christ's humiliation, and in the moment of Christ's death, when they believed they had gained the mastery over Him, must find and feel Him to be their Conqueror and Destroyer.

HEUBNER:—The diversity of gifts as respects degree and subject, should not occasion boasting or envy. In working together for the Kingdom of God there can be no envy; where there is envy, there the labor is for personal advantage.—Christ's Kingdom embraces also the invisible Kingdom of God. Would this be conceivable, were He a mere man?

PASSAVANT:—It has ever been the indiscretion and folly of men in the world, that they have forgotten the One Great Giver in the gifts and gifted, looking with especial astonishment to this teacher, with especial love to this benefactor, with especial admiration to this hero;—a virtual idolatry.—The main blow and the victory for all time and for eternity took place in and with the death of Christ—in and with His Resurrection.

STIER:—Each for himself and all together have to walk the same way in Christ.—The gifts of Christ are themselves at the same time men; all gifts of grace are pre-eminently official gifts.

[EADIE:—Ver. 7. The law of the Church is essential unity in the midst of circumstantial variety. Each gift in its own place completes the unity.—Ver. 9. Reproach and scorn and contumely followed Him as a dark shadow. Persecution at length apprehended Him, accused Him, calumniated Him, scourged Him, mocked Him, and doomed "the man of sorrows" to an ignominious torture and a felon's death. His funeral was extemporized and hasty; nay, the grave He lay in was a borrowed one. He came truly "to the lower parts of the earth."—Ver. 10. But as His descent was to a point so deep, His ascent is to a point as high. His position is the highest in the universe.—R.]

[HODGE:—Ver. 7. To refuse to occupy the place assigned to us in the Church, is to refuse to belong to it at all.—Vers. 9, 10. All other comings were typical of His coming in the flesh, and all ascensions were typical of His ascension from the grave.—It is God clothed in our nature who now exercises this universal dominion; and therefore the Apostle may well say of Christ, as the incarnate God, that He gives gifts unto men.—R.] c. The organization and organism of the Church.

(CHAP. IV. 11-16.)

- 11 And he gave some, apostles [some to be apostles]; and some, prophets; and 12 some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers; For [Unto]¹ the perfecting of the saints, for the work of the ministry [or of ministration], for the edifying [build-13 ing up] of the body of Christ: Till we all come in [unto] the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto a perfect [full-grown] man, unto the 14 measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ: That we henceforth be no more [To the end that we be no longer] children, tossed to and fro [tossed as waves], and carried about with every wind of doctrine [teaching], by [in] the sleight of men, and cunning craftiness, whereby they lie in wait to deceive [in craftiness tending to 15 the system² of error]; But speaking [holding]³ the truth in love, may grow up into 16 him in all things, which [who] is the head, even Christ:⁴ From whom the whole [all the] body fitly joined [framed] together and compacted [,⁵ by that which every joint supplieth [by means of every joint of the supply], according to the effectual [omit effectual] working in the measure of every [each several] part,⁶ maketh increase [the growth] of the body unto the edifying [building up] of itself in love.

¹ Ver. 12.—[Unto is substituted for the preposition for, to indicate the difference in the Greek prepositions. In order to, with a view to, would express one view of the meaning of the verse, but unto suits the view of Dr. Braune better. Ministration is preferable to ministry, since the latter is now confined by usage to the office of the preacher and pastor. Building up is Saxon, edifying Latin.—R.]

² Ver. 14.—[N. B. D. P. K. L. support the form μεθοδίαν, adopted by Tischendorf (ed. 7); but μεθοδίαν (Rec.) is preferable, "as changes in orthography which may be accounted for by Itacism or some mode of erroneous transcription must always be received with caution" (Ellicott).—The periphrasis is necessary to express the force of πρός.—R.]

³ Ver. 15.—[See Ezeg. Notes, especially the additional footnote.—R.]

⁵ Ver. 16.—[The view of the connection taken in the Ezeg. Notes requires the insertion of a comma here, to indicate that the subsequent phrases qualify the main verb.—The less usual form: συμβεβασόμενον is sustained by N. A. B. (?) C. D. F. G., adopted by Tischendorf, Ellicott and others. Comp. iii. 6, where the usual euphonic changes in the prefixed preposition are ignored in the best MSS.—Effectual is omitted to avoid conveying the impression that the working is God's ἐνέργεια.—R.]

⁶ Ver. 16.—[A. C., some versions and fathers sustain the reading μέλους, but it is probably a gloss occasioned by σώμα; μέρους is found in N. B. D. F. K. L., and accepted by all recent editors.—R.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 11. Christ's gift for the Church.—And he gave [καὶ αὐτὸς ἔδωκεν].—"And" joins with what precedes ("that he might fill all things"), what follows, which has the former as its aim. As the clause of design (ver. 10) refers to the beginning (ver. 7: "according to the measure of the gift of Christ"), so the clause "he gave," αὐτὸς ἔδωκεν, refers back also (ver. 10: αὐτός, ver. 8: ἔδωκε, ver. 6: ἔδοθη).* Αὐτός gives emphatic prominence to the Person of the Giver, the Exalted One: He and none other. Ipsē, summa potestate; and repetitur ex v. 10. Ministri non dedere se ipsos (BENGEL). It is not—αὐτός (SCHENKEL), nor is ἔδωκε=ἔθετο (THEOPHYLACT, HARELESS) in accordance with 1 Cor. xii. 28. [EADIE remarks (and ALFORD approves): "The idea is, that the men who filled the office, no less than the office itself, were a Divine gift."—R.] Nor should the aorist be pressed, so as to express only something momentary, passing; Paul is himself included, as one whom the Exalted One gave to be an Apostle; the historical fact is indicated. CALVIN has justly said: et suscitavit interdum prout temporum necessitas postulavit, although he accepts the first three classes of officers as belonging only to the beginning of the Church (Institutes, IV. 3, 4).

Some to be Apostles [τοὺς μὲν ἄποστολούς].—Τοὺς μὲν, τοὺς δὲ is not=ἐνίοις, some [i. e., some Apostles], since this is only a numeral, while the former expression points as a demonstrative to definite persons, whom He has prepared to be the gift, and given as ἄποστολούς. "Apostles" are those immediately called and equipped by the Lord to extend His work; they were especially endowed by Him, and had personally great advantages and prerogatives. First of all there were twelve; after the apostasy of Judas, Matthias was chosen by the disciples somewhat precipitately, before the day of Pente-

* [ELICOTT: "There is here no direct resumption of the subject of ver. 7, as if vers. 8-10 were merely parenthetical, but a regression to it; while at the same time the αὐτός is naturally and emphatically linked on to the αὐτός of the preceding verse. This return to a subject, without disturbing the harmony of the immediate connection or the natural sequence of thought, constitutes one of the high excellences, but at the same time one of the chief difficulties in the style of the great Apostle."—B.]

cost, while Paul was called by the Lord Himself as the twelfth.* Still Barnabas was called an apostle in connection with Paul (Acts xiv. 4, 14) and others also (Rom. xvi. 7; 2 Cor. viii. 23; Phil. ii. 25), hence this is not an abuse of the term (BLEEK), so that one might thus name those men, chosen and specially endowed by the Lord, appointed to found churches, as Boniface the Apostle of the Germans, Egede the Apostle of Greenland, Ziegenbalg and Schwartz the Apostles of India.

Some prophets.—"Prophets" are (ii. 20; iii. 5) men, who receive revelation (ἀποκάλυψις) from God, and, perceiving God's will and thought with clearness, announce the same with discretion and power; the prophet is μάντις, as far as he has revelation (1 Cor. xiv. 26); the latter becomes a prophet through interpretation; "glossarily" (to be distinguished from the Pentecostal miracle) is a morbid species of prophecy (1 Cor. xiv. 27 ff.). They appear in Acts xi. 27; xiii. 1; xv. 32; xxi. 10. They are concerned, not so much with the future (BENGEL) as with the eternal. To them correspond in the progress of ages those theologians with more profound insight into God's truth and will, as well as into the character and course of His Kingdom, such as Luther. [Comp. the excellent note of EADIE in loco. HODGE: "As the gift of infallibility was essential to the Apostolic office, so the gift of occasional inspiration was essential to the prophetic office."—R.]

And some evangelists.—"Evangelists," such as the deacon Philip (Acts xxi. 8; viii. 4-12), περιιόντες ἐκκλήρυττον (THEODORET), as travelling missionaries† (NEANDER), but also in per-

* [On the position of Matthias, comp. i. 1 and Acts (in loco). EADIE thus enumerates the essential elements of the apostolate: 1. That the Apostles should receive their commission immediately from the living lips of Christ. 2. That having seen the Saviour after He rose again, they should be qualified to attest to the truth of His resurrection. 3. They enjoyed a special inspiration. 4. Their authority was therefore supreme. 5. In proof of their commission and inspiration, they were furnished with ample credentials. 6. Their commission to preach and found churches was universal and in no sense limited. This statement, approved by ALFORD and ELICOTT, involves further: That they have no personal successors, can have none; that no supreme authority exists in any ecclesiastical office, unless that office be the Apostolate. See further, Galatians, i. 1-3, Doctr. Notes; Romans, p. 59.—R.]

† [Dr. HODGE, in an excellent note here, remarks that the prevalent view at the time of the Reformation (see CALVIN in manent positions (2 Tim. iv. 5; comp. 2 Cor. viii. 18), in consequence of their own view of the facts of the Gospel (John xvi. 26 ff.), or mediate tradition (Luke i. 1-4). It must not be referred to "those writing the Gospel" (CHRYSOSTOM); BENDEL also goes too far in ascribing to them preterita; they have to do with the life of the Lord in prophecy and fulfilment.

And some pastors and teachers, τοὺς δὲ ποιμένας καὶ διδασκάλους.—JEROME: Non ait, alios autem pastores et alios magistros, sed alios pastores et magistros, ut qui pastor sit, esse debeat et magister et nemo pastoris sibi nomen assumere debet, nisi possit docere quos pascit. BENDEL: Pastores et doctores hic pinguntur, nam pascunt (and regunt) docendo maxime, tum admonendo, corripiendo, etc. The pastors are—πρωτοστάμηναι (Rom. xii. 8), who have the office of κυβέρνηται (1 Cor. xii. 28) and must be "apt to teach," διδασκτικοί (1 Tim. iii. 2; 2 Tim. ii. 24; Tit. i. 9), they are "bishops," ἐπίσκοποι (Acts xx. 28). Οἱ κατὰ πόλιν καὶ κώμην ἀφωρισμένοι in distinction from εὐαγγελισταί (THEODORET). BLEEK takes them as distinct; and he is right to this extent only, that the "teachers" are not always "pastors;" it is as "apostles and prophets" (ii. 20; iii. 5); hence despite this distinction, they form one category beside the previous ones.

[There has been much dispute whether these terms refer to two classes of stationary church officers, or to one whose twofold duty is indicated by two titles. The latter view is favored by the absence of the distinctive τοῖς δέ, and is accepted by AUGUSTINE, JEROME, BENDEL, HARLESS, OLSHAUSEN, MEYER, HODGE, EADIE and ALFORD.* The former is accepted by THEOPHYLACT, CALVIN, GROTIUS, NEANDER, DE WETTE, STIER, though the definitions of the distinction vary greatly. ELLICOTT says: "The ποιμένες (a term probably including ἐπίσκοποι and πρεσβύτεροι) might be and perhaps always were διδασκαλοί, but it does not follow that the converse was true. The χάρισμα of κυβέρνηται is so distinct from that of διδασκαλία, that it seems necessary to recognize in the διδασκαλοί a body of men (scarcely a distinct class) who had the gift of διδασχά, but who were not invested with any administrative powers and authority." Is the teacher then the parish schoolmaster or the professor of theology? or a preacher who does no pastoral duty? The Reformed Church polity has usually recognized the distinction (Westminster Directory, Constitution of Reformed [Dutch] Church loco) regarded this term as applied to "vicars of the Apostles," such as Luke Timothy, Titus. This is altogether untenable, and no doubt arose from the effort, made by CALVIN and others, to prove that all the offices referred to except that of "pastors and teachers," were of a temporary nature, and thus to establish the principle of "parity of the clergy."—R.]

* [ALFORD remarks that the figure in rounder, if pressed, would imply that they were entrusted with some special flock, which they tended; and then the "teaching" would necessarily form a chief part of their work. EADIE says the former term implies careful, tender, vigilant superintendence and government, being the function of an overseer and elder. The official name ἐπίσκοπος ("bishop"), he adds, is used by the Apostle in addressing churches formed principally out of the heathen world (Ephesus, Philippi, Crete), while πρεσβύτερος ("elder"), the term of honor, is more Jewish in its tinge (Acts, Epistles of James, Peter and John). "Speaking to Timothy and Titus, the Apostle styles them elders (and so does the compiler of the Acts, in referring to spiritual rulers); but describing the duties of the office itself, he calls the holder of it ἐπίσκοπος."—R.]

in America, etc.), but practically it has amounted to nothing, as indeed little good has ever resulted from the attempt to reproduce accurately as jure divino those distinctions which expositors discover in the offices of the primitive Church. It may be remarked that while this phrase shows that every pastor ought to be a teacher, putting the former phase of duty first, it will ever be the case that through native endowment some ministers are better adapted for one part of the duty than for the other, though there is no warrant for total neglect of either, or for appointing in one congregation one minister to be pastor and another to be teacher; for the latter would nowadays take undue precedence of the former. Those who are "teachers," in our sense of the word, are also in the most important sense "pastors."—R.]

It is unmistakable that these four categories above named, so divide themselves, that the first three do not belong to a single congregation, but to the whole Church or a number of congregations, the last however is definitely appointed to one congregation. A gradation from higher to lower is noticeable also, in this manner, that the higher includes the lower grade or grades. Thus Jesus is called and calls Himself "Apostle" (Heb. iii. 1, after Jno. xx. 21); "Prophet" (Matt. xiii. 57; Luke xiii. 33; Acts iii. 22 ff., vii. 37); εὐαγγελιζόμενος (Luke iv. 18, 43; xx. 1); "Shepherd," ποιμὴν (Jno. x. 11; 1 Pet. ii. 25); "Teacher" (Matt. xxiii. 8; Jno. xiii. 14). Accordingly BENDEL says: Cum summis gradibus conjuncti poterant esse inferiores; omnes Apostoli simul etiam vim prophetiam habuerunt. Sed prophetæ et evangelistæ non simul etiam Apostoli fuerunt. Finally it must be noticed, that the offices themselves are not named here, and that in distinction from 1 Cor. xii. 28, the official persons stand in the foreground as gifts, in Corinthians the gifts of office, the offices themselves falling into the back-ground in both cases. See further, Doctr. Notes 1, 2.

Ver. 12. The immediate aim of the activity of the persons in office. [Note on the relation and dependence of the clauses of this verse. There is great difference of opinion, but of the various views those numbered (4) and (5) are most worthy of consideration. Braune adopts (4); but (5) seems to be preferable.

1. The clauses are taken as co-ordinate (CHRYSOSTOM, ZANCHIUS, BENDEL, E. V.), but this is opposed by the change of preposition, and in that case we would have a different order, the second clause would come first.

2. The trajection (GROTIUS, KOPPE and others), which actually put that clause first, is altogether unwarranted.

3. The second and third clauses are taken as parallel (by HARLESS and OLSHAUSEN), but as dependent on the first, in a partitive sense: some to teach, others to be edified. But there is nothing to indicate such a sense, and it is logically inadmissible, since the "saints" of one clause and "the body of Christ" of the other are identical.

4. Braune follows ERASMUS, DE WETTE, MEIER, FLATT, RUECKERT, SCHENKEL and many others, in taking the second and third as dependent on the first, or rather the second dependent on the first and the third on the second. The meaning then is: "For the perfecting of the saints unto all that variety of service which is essential unto the edification of the body of Christ." As this view is fully presented below, the objections to it alone require mention at this point. These as urged by MEYER are: a. That as the context treats of offices in the Church, it is improper to enlarge the meaning of διακονία beyond that of official service (Rom. xi. 13; 2 Cor. iv. 1; vi. 3; comp. Acts vi. 4; 2 Cor. iii. 7 ff.; ix. 12, etc.). b. That with such a meaning πάντων would have been so essentially necessary with ἀγίων, that it could not have been omitted. These objections are sufficiently strong to lead him to adopt the next view.

5. The second and third clauses are taken as co-ordinate, and dependent on ἔδωκε, "he gave;" the first expressing the more ultimate and final purpose (πρός) of the action, the other two the more immediate end (εἰς). This view is adopted by ALFORD, ELLICOTT, HODGE, EADIE (2d ed.), and gives this sense: "He gave Apostles, etc., —to fulfil the works of the ministry, and to build up the body of Christ, His object being to perfect His saints." So HOFMANN substantially. The great objection is the strange order which places the more ultimate end first, but as the difficulty seems to inhere in the Apostle's own choice of prepositions, it is not decisive against this view. While preferring it, I would not insist on its correctness, but, leaving Dr. Braune's notes as they stand, add in footnotes the requirements of this interpretation.—R.]

Unto the perfecting of the saints [πρός τὸν καταρτισμὸν τῶν ἀγίων].—Πρός marks the end aimed at, viz.: "the perfecting of the saints." Καταρτισμός, occurring only here, like κατάρσις in 2 Cor. xiii. 9 designates the re-establishment of an affair, so that it is ἀρσις (only 2 Tim. iii. 17, τέλειος, various reading), integer, as it should be (1 Cor. i. 10; 2 Cor. xiii. 11; Gal. vi. 1; 1 Thess. iii. 10; Heb. x. 5; xi. 3; xiii. 21; 1 Pet. v. 10). Non potuit honorificentius verbi ministerium commendare, quam dum hunc illi effectum tribuit (CALVIN). Through the ministers of Christ the Christians should become complete, perfect.* For what purpose?

For the work of the ministry [or of ministration, εἰς ἔργον διακονίας].—Hence there is no thought of merely external increase (PELAGIUS, BEZA). Εἰς marks that for which the saints should become expert, complete. The nouns, without the article, have here a more general meaning: ἔργον indicates the efficiency of the διακονία, and the latter denotes that every work which it does, is a service to our neighbor and then to the whole. Διακονία is a general service (2 Tim. iv. 11; 2 Cor. xi. 8). This meaning is demanded here by the context, the connection with the saints, the members, each one of which has his office (Rom. xii. 4) and needs the other (1 Cor. xii. 21). Comp.

* [HODGE gives the following meanings which have been suggested here: 1. The completion of the saints ("the number of the elect"). 2. Their renewing or restoration. 3. Their reduction to order and union as one body. 4. Their preparation for service (so BRAUNE). 5. To their perfecting. The last he prefers, as is required by the view taken of the relation of the clauses.—R.]

2 Tim. iii. 17: πρὸς πᾶν ἔργον ἀγαθὸν ἐξηρησιμέυος. It must not be referred to church service, ecclesiastical office, the diaconate in a technical sense (MEYER).* Comp. on ver. 16.

For the building up of the body of Christ, εἰς οἰκοδομὴν τοῦ σώματος τοῦ Χριστοῦ.—The aim of the "ministry" is again subjoined with the preposition εἰς. So great is the significance of the preparing of Christians through the ministers of the Church to ministering activity in the congregation! The body of Christ is there, it exists, but new members are continually incorporated in it, it extends and increases; hence both of the figures derived from the body (i. 23; ii. 20-22) are included. LUTHER is very good: "that the saints may be fitted to the work of the ministry, that thus the body of Christ may be edified." Accordingly the three clauses are not co-ordinate (CHRYSOSTOM, BENIGL and others); nor are the two subjoined with εἰς co-ordinate (RUECKERT, MEYER, HARLESS and others), nor yet dependent on ἔδωκε, as some think, while others make them dependent on καταρτισμὸν. Quite as little can we accept a trajection of the second number before the first (GNOTIUS, KORPE and others). [See above for a classification of opinions.—R.] Comp. Doctr. Note 3.

Ver. 13. The end of the perfecting. Till we all come [μέχρι καταντήσωμεν οἱ πάντες].—Μέχρι denotes the final, highest aim, not the beginning and entrance of the same, ἄχρι, but the presence and enjoyment of it (TITTMANN, Syn. I. p. 33 ff.). [Comp. Dr. SCHAEFF's note, Romans, p. 181.] Καταντήσωμεν, the conjunctive without ἄν denotes simply the future; the verb itself however is φθάνειν (ECUMENIUS), the arriving at the destination, as frequently in the Acts (xvi. 1; xviii. 19, 24, etc.), in a local sense; here and Phil. iii. 11 however in the spiritual sense, prominence being given to the free movement, which is occasioned, strengthened and animated by the educating καταρτισμός.†

Under the term οἱ πάντες, "all,"—οἱ ἅγιοι, as a complete whole, the Apostle includes him-

* [The term is not to be restricted to the diaconate, nor to the ministry, i.e., the office of pastor and teacher (HODGE), but seems to refer to "spiritual service of an official nature" (so MEYER). Hence ministration is preferable to the more technical word ministry, though BRAUNE extends the significance in accordance with his view. On the absence of the article ELLICOTT remarks: "Διακονία may possibly have been left studiously anarthrous in reference to the different modes of exercising it alluded to in ver. 11, and the various spiritual wants of the Church; ἔργον however seems clearly definite in meaning, though by the principle of correlation (MIDDLETON, Art. iii. 3, 6) it is necessarily anarthrous in form."—R.]

† [ELLICOTT remarks that this clause is parallel to, but at the same time more nearly defining the nature of the ἔργον. The article is not required, as edifying generally is the object. There is no confusion of metaphors, since both words have a distinct metaphorical meaning, where the original allusion is in a measure lost.—R.]

‡ [All reference to coming together from different starting-points, or coming out of previous wanderings is imaginary (MEYER). ELLICOTT remarks that too much weight must not be laid on the omission of ἄν as giving an air of less uncertainty to the subjunctive, since there was an evident tendency in later Greek to omit it in such cases, adding: "the use of the subjunctive (the mood of conditioned but objective possibility), not future (as Chrysostom) shows that the καταντάν is represented not only as the eventual but as the expected and contemplated result of the ἔδωκεν."—R.]

self; it is therefore implied that those in whom there has been a beginning of πίστις (HARLESS), even the greatest, the Apostles, are in need of progress towards the goal, are not yet there, even although in advance of others, but further their own progress when they labor for others (Phil. iii. 13, 14; Rom. i. 11, 12). Accordingly "all" is not to be extended to all men (JEROME). BENIGL is excellent: Ne apostoli quidem se putarunt metam assecutos, nedum ecclesia. Semper proficiendum fuerat, non standum, nedum deficiendum. Et nunc ecclesia ideam sui optimæ non a tergo respiciat oportet, sed ante oculos habeat, ut futuram, etiam non assequendum. Notate hoc, qui antiquitatem non tam sequimini, quam obtenditis.

Unto the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God, εἰς τὴν ἐνότητα τῆς πίστεως καὶ τῆς ἐπιγνώσεως τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ θεοῦ.—The preposition marks the goal. The repeated article demands absolutely, that "faith" and "knowledge" be kept apart as distinct, independent ideas, although the genitive which they have in common ("of the Son of God") occasions a connection by means of the copulative conjunction. "Faith" designates the immediate possession, "knowledge" the assurance obtained by means of knowing (MATTHIES); the former is applicable to an ethical, the latter to an intellectual sphere; the latter proceeds constantly anew from the former, the former is itself the permanent beginning, the constant principle, not merely an initiatory stage to be surpassed; both belong together accordingly. The unity of both, since "one faith" is presupposed (ver. 5), refers to the various degrees of clearness and power in the individual members (οἱ πάντες), to littleness of faith, weakness of faith, want of maturity, etc. Accordingly the genitive, "of the Son of God," defines both more closely, indicating that they are as strong, as He possessed them, and that thus we, being God's children who will grow up and become educated, should possess them; He is the Author and Finisher of our faith (Heb. xii. 2) and knowledge, thus Example and Standard. If He is not the object, there is neither faith nor knowledge at all. Hence it is the genitive subjecti (STIER), not objecti, as most consider it. But unity of faith and knowledge is not meant, either alone (OLSHAUSEN), or in connection with the other meaning (STIER); we should rather refer it to the unity of the individuals, of the church-members, which is effected by the faith and knowledge of Christ.

[The view of OLSHAUSEN is, that the unity is the state in which faith and knowledge are identified; fides implicita developing into fides explicita (BISPING). EADIE and ALFORD virtually accept this as included here, the latter citing DE WETTE: "True and full unity of faith is then found, when all thoroughly know Christ, the object of faith, alike, and that in His highest dignity as the Son of God." But the second term is not epexegetical of the first, and faith is not to be lost in knowledge, but abides (1 Cor. xiii. 13).—The strong word ἐπιγνώσις must be noticed. If any prefer the more common view of the genitive as that of the object, the following statement (HONGE) will be satisfactory: "Faith and knowledge express or comprehend all the elements of that state of mind of which the Son of God is the object—a state of mind which includes the apprehension of His glory, the appropriation of His love, as well as confidence and devotion. This state of mind is in itself eternal life." "The unity of faith is now confined to the first principles; the unity of faith contemplated in this place is that perfect unity which implies perfect knowledge and perfect holiness."—R.]

Unto a full-grown man, εἰς ἄνδρα τέλειον.—The singular marks the unity of the Church, which grows up into a perfect man.* Here a "development" (werden) is spoken of, which is involved in the καταντῆν; the Church, the body of Christ, becomes a personality educated and completed to the perfect life-degree of Christ. For τέλειος is the opposite of νήπιος (ver. 14); like 1 Cor. iii. 1; ii. 6 and Heb. v. 13, 14, it means one in ripe, full manhood.

Unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ [εἰς μέτρον ἡλικίας τοῦ πληρώματος τοῦ Χριστοῦ].—"Unto the measure of the stature" points to a definite measure; it does not therefore extend in infinitum. Ἡλικία from ἡλιξ, qui adultæ et maturæ ætatis est, certainly designates, as in Luke xix. 2, the stature, the bodily size, elsewhere (Matt. vi. 27; Luke xii. 25; ii. 52; Heb. xi. 11; Jno. ix. 21, 23) however, the age, generally the age of manhood; it is, more fully expressed, the maturity, the full growth, and in accordance with the context the spiritual maturity (STIER).† The genitive: τοῦ πληρώματος τοῦ Χριστοῦ, "of the fulness of Christ," defines more precisely the measure of the maturity: it is conditioned by the fulness, the state of being filled, which comes from Christ, accordingly by Himself, who lives in it and by His gifts and powers. We should become perfect, as He, the Head was, 1 Cor. xii. 12. Hence LUTHER is incorrect: in the measure of perfect age; for πληρώματος is not to be made an adjective quali-

* ["Metaphorical apposition to the foregoing member, the concrete term being probably selected rather than any abstract term, as forming a good contrast to the following νήπιος (ver. 14), and as suggesting by its 'singular' the idea of the complete unity of the holy personality, further explained in the next clause into which they were united and consummated" (ELICOTT). As a curiosity ALFORD cites from AUGUSTINE (Civ. Dei, xxii. 17): "Nonnulli, propter hoc quod dictum est, Eph. in. 13, nec in sexu fœmineo resurrecturas fœminas credunt, sed in viris omnes aiunt."—R.]

† [As the word undoubtedly means either stature or age, the latter being more common, or perhaps includes both, like the German Erwachsenheit, the sense here must be determined by considerations drawn from the passage itself. KOPPE, HOLZHAUSEN, HARLESS, MEYER, HONGE prefer the sense: age, because "full-grown men," "children" (ver. 14), point to this; the phrase which follows is then a characterizing genitive. But "measure" seems more appropriately used in reference to "stature" and the idea of magnitude is indicated by the words "fulness," "grow up" (ver. 15) and by the figure of ver. 16. This sense is adopted by ERASMUS, GROTIUS, BENIGL, RUCKERT, STIER, EADIE, ELICOTT, ALFORD. It may be added that πλήρωμα does not refer to the Church (STORR and others), nor to the knowledge of Christ (GROTIUS). The genitive τοῦ Χριστοῦ is a genitive subjective: Christ's fulness: "This stature grows just as it receives of Christ's fulness; and when that fulness is wholly enjoyed, it will be that of a 'perfect man'." (EADIE). Some of the Fathers referred this passage to the resurrection, teaching that man shall rise from the grave in the perfect age of Christ, having the form and aspect of thirty-three years of age, the age of Christ at His death. See MEYER, who has a note on the time of fulfilment in which he brings out his favorite views about the Second Advent and Paul's expectation of its speedy coming.—R.]

fying ἡλικία. The explanation: full gracious presence of Christ (HARLESS) is insufficient; still more so the meaning given by RUECKERT: Christ stands before us as the ideal of manly size and beauty.—Whether this goal will be reached in this life or only in the next, is decided by πίστις in the context, to this extent, that we must refer it to this life also, although indeed many a one first attains unto it in the future life, since this coming to the appointed goal extends through centuries. Comp. Doctr. Notes 4, 5.

The purpose, vers. 14, 15. a) negatively, ver. 14; b) positively, ver. 15.

Ver. 14. To the end that we be no longer children [ἵνα μηκέτι ὤμεν νήπιοι].—Ἴνα sets forth the purpose, which aims at the fulfilment of μηκέτι ὤμεν νήπιοι, and this must accordingly take place before the goal is reached, "unto a perfect man." It is not to be joined to ver. 13 (SCHENKEL),* but to vers. 11, 12, more particularly to ἔδωκε, and unfolds wherein the "perfecting of the saints" consists. As the Apostle, who, although the most advanced, still in humble sense of fellowship, bears and suffers in the imperfection of the Church, includes himself (ὤμεν), we must not find here a reproach, but a point or state of transition, which does not continue, hence μηκέτι, which does not recall false teachers in Christendom generally (MEYER). The Gentiles are not yet νήπιοι; Christians in their incipency are such (Matt. xi. 25; Luke x. 21; 1 Cor. iii. 1; viii. 11; Gal. iv. 13; Heb. v. 13); they should not however remain so, but advance to ripe manhood.

Tossed to and fro [as waves] and carried about [κλυδωνιζόμενοι καὶ περιφερόμενοι].—This describes more closely the νηπιότης, with reference to appearances and experiences observed and felt in the churches, inclusive of the false teachers who had appeared and would appear. "Tossed as waves" † (fluctuantes, Vulgate), moved as waves, intrinsecus, aursum deorsum, etiam citra ventum (BENGEL), "and carried about," extrinsecus, huc illuc, aliis nos adorantibus (BENGEL), describes the ready excitability of the unsubstantial, the immature (Jas. i. 6; Heb. xiii. 9; Jude 12); they are dependent on their surroundings, on influences and insinuations, are moved:

* [SCHENKEL'S view is somewhat novel. He takes our verse as giving the purpose of ver. 13, and to the objection that this places perfection before the state of childhood answers, that the last verse refers to the whole Church, this to individuals. Because the whole Church is perfect, the members should be no longer children. But this is very unsatisfactory. The two leading views are those of HARLESS and MEYER. The former takes our verse as co-ordinate with ver. 13, and immediately dependent on vers. 11, 12, giving the purpose of the ministry (so FLATT, BREEK, HODGE). MEYER, who has a clear statement of the case in loco, takes this verse as subordinate to ver. 13, and remotely dependent on vers. 11, 12. He holds that ver. 13 defines the "terminus ad quem," which characterizes the functions of the Christian ministry, while ver. 14 thus explains the object, our ceasing to be children, contemplated in the appointment of such a "terminus," and thence more remotely in the bestowal of a ministry so characterized. To the former view there is the decided grammatical objection that a clause introduced by ἵνα is made co-ordinate with those introduced by εἰς, in that case too ver. 13 would follow vers. 14, 15. The latter view avoids these difficulties without being open to the logical objection which probably led to the adoption of the former.—R.]

† [Not by the waves, like a deserted ship, as MEYER and others hold, but like the billow itself.—R.]

By every wind of teaching, παντὶ ἀνέμῳ τῆς διδασκαλίας.—The wind has a great variety (παντὶ), from the aura seculi, levis aura populi to the strong continuing trade-wind, and as to its origin from coarse to refined carnal interests, as well as in its tendency toward aims against the Church or in favor of a false church. [The dative is the dynamic dative, KRAEGER.—R.] "Teaching" is introduced under the figure of the wind, because it is something pneumatic and because, as the wind in proportion to its strength or the free situation of the water, stirs this from ripples to foam, so the teaching sets in motion the spirit of the νήπιος, which is so easily tossed to and fro. The νήπιος will learn, know; that is the proper way to perfection. But beside the one wholesome teaching of truth there appears the multifarious teaching of error as a great danger,* and the greater because it works, moves, attracts and hurries along:

In the sleight of men.—Ἐν τῇ κυβείᾳ, belonging to the participles, refers with the article to "teaching;" through the sleight befitting the doctrine, and with the substantive (from κίβος, die), to dice-playing, in order to denote, that the teachers deal with the Scriptures and the truth and men, as players with dice (LUTHER). [Braune agrees with DE WETTE, MEYER, HODGE, and the E. V., in regarding ἐν as instrumental, but as this seems pleonastic after the dative, "and would mar the parallelism with ἐν ἀγάπῃ (ver. 15), the preposition appears rather to denote the element, the evil atmosphere as it were in which the varying currents of doctrine exist and exert their force" (ELLICOTT). So HARLESS, OLSHAUSEN, EADIE and ALFORD.—R.] The genitive ("of men") indicates that the νήπιοι stand under the influence of men, instead of their placing themselves under the guidance of Christ (MEYER), and also under that of many instead of one. But this is not all; the added parallel clause carries the matter further; there is not only human sleight, temeritas, but a plan also:

In craftiness tending to the system of error [ἐν πανουργίᾳ πρὸς τὴν μεθοδεῖαν τῆς πλάνης].—Ἐν connects with the previous phrase. Πανουργία corresponds with κυβεία, and gives prominence to what the latter does not indicate, the nequitia, the conscious malice; hence it is incorrect to find this in the previous phrase (HARLESS, STIER). The article can be dispensed with, since the closer qualification is added. The preposition, as in ver. 12 (πρὸς τὸν καταρτισμὸν), denotes toward what the craftiness proceeds (WINNER, p. 378). This is τὴν μεθοδεῖαν (only here and vi. 11, where the plural is used), which is derived from μεθοδεῖαν, to follow in order to track up something, then machinare, meaning therefore machinatio, crafty pursuing (LUTHER: erschleichen, to sneak upon), to follow and come upon in a sneaking manner; in this there is found pre-arrangement, system. The principle which μεθοδεῖται is indicated by the genitive τῆς πλάνης.

* [EADIE: "The article τῆς before διδασκαλίας gives definite prominence to 'the teaching,' which, as a high function respected and implicitly obeyed, was very capable of seducing, since whatever false phases it assumed, it might find and secure followers." The substantive is abstract and general; teaching is preferable to doctrine, because it brings out the active agency employed with more distinctness.—R.]

This is not error mentis, but lying, the opposite of ἀλήθεια (1 John iv. 6); hence, especially as τῷ διαβόλῳ is added in vi. 11, BENOEL is on the right track when he says: i. e., Satanæ.* It is true the πλάνη is in the main only personified (MEYER); but it has a kingdom and a πνεῦμα, that operates through men, the false teachers (τῇ κυβείᾳ τῶν ἀνθρώπων), as through serviceable tools, proper instruments.

Ver. 15. But holding the truth in love, may grow up into him, ἀληθεύοντες δὲ ἐν ἀγάπῃ αὐξήσωμεν εἰς αὐτόν, is to be joined with ἵνα (ver. 14) as the antithesis (δέ) to "no longer children." Hence LUTHER is incorrect: "but let us be honest in love and grow." Christians (οἱ πάντες, ver. 13), not merely teachers, are the subject. Αὐξάνειν is simply to grow, not to remain νήπιος, to come out of the νηπιότης. Hæc αὐξήσις, augmentatio (ver. 16), media est inter infantes et virum (BENGEL). Accordingly εἰς points to the goal; hence "into Him" (MATTHEWS, STIER); it corresponds to the εἰς ἀνδρα τέλειον, we should become a perfect man, as He is. The phrase "Head" from the following relative clause should not be pressed (HOFMANN, MEYER), in order to make the meaning still more difficult; τὰ πάντα stands between, and this accusative of reference will not allow εἰς αὐτόν to be=grow in respect to Him (MEYER), whatever that may mean. ["Unto and into Him," as the goal and standard of our growth, with a secondary thought apparently of the incorporation of all the Church in Christ, which is developed in the subsequent context. The phrase is not to be joined with "in love" (HARLESS).—R.] Still less can it mean: ipsius cognitione (GROTIUS), virtute et influxu (A-LAPIDE).

While εἰς αὐτόν denotes the goal of the growth, ἀληθεύοντες ἐν ἀγάπῃ designates the condition under which, the state in which it takes place. Hence the two are to be joined: true in love. Ἀληθεύειν is=ἀληθῆς εἶναι (PASSOW, sub voce); the context explains it further. In the New Testament only here and Gal. iv. 16. There vivit indicates that it means speaking the truth, here the context is a different one. While αὐξήσωμεν forms an antithesis to νήπιον ὄμεν, ἀληθεύοντες stands in contrast to the manner of such ("tossed as waves and carried about") and to "teaching" in general, as well as that of the deceitful false teachers in particular. BENGEL is excellent: VERANTES, LUTHER (Gen. xlii.

16): if you design truth. The whole personality is spoken of, in walk and nature, and the meaning is more than merely: to be true in speech, verum dicere (HOFMANN, Schriftbeweis, II. 2, p. 130, MEYER).*

Ἐν ἀγάπῃ sets forth the sphere or element in which the ἀληθεύειν moves; ἀγάπη and ἀλήθεια are correlative ideas.† Comp. 1 Cor. xiii. 6. Love is here entirely undefined, hence general: love for the truth, for the brethren, who come into danger through false teachers, or themselves become false teachers, to the Church as a whole, to God. There is accordingly no reference to forbearance toward error (HARLESS), or love towards those of different profession (MEYER), or something of the same; nor is ἐν=δὲ (SCHENKEL), or σύν, or merely upright in love (LUTHER and others).

In all things who is the head, even Christ [τὰ πάντα, ὅς ἐστιν ἡ κεφαλὴ, Χριστός].—Τὰ πάντα,‡ without a preposition, as 1 Cor. ix. 25; x. 33; xi. 2, or with κατὰ (Col. iii, 20) denotes, on account of the article, all, to which reference has been made, into which we must grow: faith, knowledge, truth, love, etc. "Who is the Head, even Christ," with great emphasis, in order to furnish a motive for growing up into Him. We might have found τὸν Χριστόν, in apposition to εἰς αὐτόν, but it can either be in apposition to ἡ κεφαλὴ, or in the first instance still be in the nominative (WIKER, p. 495).

Ver. 16. Comprehensive conclusion.—From whom, ἐξ οὗ, marks the cause, the source, and as the context demands, a continuing one. Christ is the goal (εἰς αὐτόν) and the source of the life-development of the Church (MEYER). If then CHRYSOSTOM says: σφόδρα ἀσάφως ἡμῖν εἰσε τὰ πάντα ὁμοῖο θελήσαι εἶναι, an exact analysis of the sentence will show what is incorrect (ἀσάφως). Col. ii. 19 is parallel.

a. The subject.—All the body fitly framed together and compacted [πᾶν τὸ σῶμα συναρμολογούμενον καὶ συνβιβασμένον]

* (Though the more extended meaning is stoutly denied by MEYER, it is accepted by CALVIN, DE WETTE, RUECKERT, ALFORD, HODGE, EADIE and ELLICOTT. The difficulty is to express the sense in English: being true is literal, but not satisfactory; walking truthfully, walking in truth, though giving the correct sense, would be inapt here; holding the truth is the best rendering, if the care is taken not to give an objective sense to truth.)—Comp. the remarks of ALFORD (who renders: being followers of truth) and ELLICOTT.—R.]

† [The question of connection is much disputed. Many, perhaps most, join "in love" with the participle (CALVIN, GROTIUS, ALFORD, RUECKERT, HODGE, STIER, BLEEK among others), while HARLESS, MEYER, OLSHAUSEN, EADIE and ELLICOTT connect it with the verb "grow." In favor of the former, the order, the parallelism of structure with ver. 14, the otherwise feeble and awkward position of the participle at the beginning of the sentence, Paul's habit of subjoining his qualifying phrases, and the vital association between love and truth, may be urged. The latter view is supported by MEYER as better agreeing with his rendering of the participle: speaking the truth; he urges also that "in love" ought to be joined with the same verb as in ver. 16, and that thus "in love," at the beginning here and at the close there, receives its due emphasis. Still the other seems preferable, for the connection in verse 16 is equally open to discussion. It is not "a fact justitia, ruit cælum" truthfulness: but must be conditioned by love; a true-seeking and true-being with loving caution and kind allowance" (ALFORD).—R.]

‡ [This is the accusative of the quantitative object (ELLICOTT) "we are to grow in all those things in which the Christian must advance" (OLSHAUSEN).—R.]

* [On the reading μεθοδεῖαν see Textual Note 3. As to its meaning, we may remark that the bad sense is not necessarily inherent in the term, which signifies: "a deliberate planning or system." Still here the bad sense is fixed on it by the genitive which follows, and we might render it: stratagem, though in the full phrase, "system of error," the meaning is sufficiently evident. EADIE renders "a system," but "the system of error" is one. The force of the preposition can be brought out in English only by a periphrasis: tending to, leading to, not according to. The word πλάνη here includes the idea of deceit no doubt, but is perhaps better expressed by error, "error in its most abstract nature." The genitive is subjective, the error plans and machinates. That the Apostle meant to characterize "error" as evil, morally as well as intellectually wrong, is evident enough from the context. When RUECKERT says that this was Paul's weak side, to stigmatize those in error, in a spirit of dogmatical defiance, he betrays his usual incapacity for comprehending the Apostle. If truth be not sanctifying, and error demoralizing, then the Scriptures and human experience are alike at fault.—R.]

νον].—"All the body" takes the term "all" (ver. 13) as a unity; the main idea is that of totality. ["All the body," which the E. V. gives in Col. ii. 19, is perhaps preferable to "the whole body," the idea being of the entire body as including every member, rather than of the body as a whole (τὸ πᾶν σῶμα more accurately expresses this). The latter notion becomes the stronger one in the close of the verse.—R.] The double definition, "fitly framed together and compacted," describes the Church in its present development (present participle). The first adjective (see ii. 21; of a building) indicates the individual parts and members (ἀρμός, groove, joint, member), which are printed together (σύν), the other, used more precisely of men who enter into a society, marks these members as individuals, as persons. In this the difference and the reason of the double expression is found. In such a union the Church is conceived of, because it is a building; besides a society is spoken of, a society of persons, a congregation. Accordingly such a two-fold designation sets forth, either the figure and fact (MEYER) or harmony and solidity (BENGEL). ELLICOTT suggests, in accordance with the simple meaning of the words, that the latter term refers to the aggregatum, the former to the inter-adaptation of the component parts.—R.]

[By means of every joint of the supply.

—This phrase, which presents more difficulties than any other in our verse, is discussed below by Dr. Braune, who joins it with the predicate, not with the subject (i. e., as a qualification of the participle) as is done in the E. V. The latter view of the connection is adopted by the majority of commentators (so HODGE, EADIE, ELLICOTT), and is favored by the position of the phrase and the parallel, Col. ii. 19. The former is defended by MEYER, STIER, ALFORD, CHRYSOSTOM, THEODORET, BENGEL). It may be remarked in favor of this, that it gives more perspicuity to the passage, "the whole instrumentality and modality here described belonging to the growth" (ALFORD), the repetition of σῶμα is more natural in an involved predicate, while the complicated subject is much more awkward. As regards the parallel, the position there is totally different. It ought to be added that the earlier defenders of this view advocated a sense of the word ἀφή (=αἰσθησις, the perception of the vital energy imparted from the head), which did not admit so readily of the connection with the participles. Still Braune's view is preferable.—R.]

b. The predicate.—Μακeth the growth of the body, τὴν αὐξησιν τοῦ σώματος ποιεῖται.—Col. ii. 19: αὐξή τὴν αὐξήσιν. The repetition of τοῦ σώματος ("of the body") instead of ἑαυτοῦ ("itself") marks the permanent effect proceeding from the cause, and as compared with Christ's continued influence, puts into the background the self-development as an entirely independent one. Only when the principle of life in the Church has grown and been strengthened through Christ, does it become perceptible (εἰς οἰκοδομὴν ἑαυτοῦ); yet it is already indicated by the middle (ποιεῖται). This repetition is therefore not to be explained by the distance of the predicate from the subject (σῶμα) as an effort at distinctness (MEYER), or as negligence (RUECKERT), or as a Hebraism (GROTIUS), or because the interest of individuals is not under discussion (HARLESS, STIER).*

The predicate is then enlarged by a designation of the means: by means of every joint of the supply [διὰ πάσης ἀφῆς τῆς ἐπιχορηγίας].—Ἀφή (from ἀπτεσθαι) cannot according to Col. ii. 19, where it is put in one category with συνδέσμων and connected with ἐπιχορηγούμενον καὶ συνῆ, ζαζόμενον, mean the same band, yet must be something similar.† It cannot be=αἰσθησις (CHRYSOSTOM), sensation (MEYER), contact (HOFMANN). Since ἀφὴν ἔχειν means to have something enchaining, enticing (PASSOW, sub voce), and the singular is found here, the most natural and correct meaning will be: connection or grasp. Ἐπιχορηγία (from χορηγία) means to lead a choir, to defray the expenses of a choir, to render a public service, the contribution to expenditures, public, common rendering of service; accordingly the growth of the Church is by means of every grasp of contribution or service rendered (genitive objecti, and not of apposition, SCHENKEL, not=πρός, GROTIUS, HOFMANN and others).

[To this view of Dr. Braune it may be objected that it loses sight of the strict anatomical figure without substituting for it the subtler interpretation of Chrysostom and others. It seems better to take ἀφή in the sense indicated by Col. ii. 19, and render it "joints." The qualifying genitive is as ELLICOTT remarks: "a kind of genitive definitions, by which the predominant use, purpose, or destination of the ἀφή is specified and characterized." "The joints are the points of union where the supply passes to the different members, and by means of which the body derives the supply by which it grows" (ALFORD). HODGE is undoubtedly correct in interpreting this supply as "the Divine life or Holy Spirit communicated to all parts of the Church" (against Braune, who seems to refer it to the service rendered by the individual members), but it is very doubtful whether he is right in saying that the ἀφαι "are the various spiritual gifts and offices which are made the channels or means of this Divine communication." Most recent commentators have wisely refrained from thus particularizing. Certainly when these ἀφαι are taken as meaning the officers mentioned in ver. 11, despite all saving clauses, a step is taken toward the Romanist and High Anglican view of the clergy. The figures of Scripture, through wrested and strained interpretation, have been made subservient to great error.—R.]

According to the working in the measure of each several part [κατ' ἐνέργειαν

* [The repetition is generally regarded as made for the sake of perspicuity, especially as ἑαυτοῦ is found in the next clause. Perhaps however the body as a whole comes more into view now.—The middle is apparently not so much reflexive as intensive and indicative of the energy with which the spiritual process is carried on (EADIE, WORDSWORTH, ELLICOTT).—R.]

† [In Colossians (p. 55) Braune seems to limit the word to "nerves," in accordance with the view which joins each of the substantives there used with one of the participles. As this is scarcely tenable (see in loco), and as the article is not repeated with the second substantive in that passage, the category "joints and bands" decides yet more definitely against any interpretation of this word which removes it out of the general class of the anatomical arrangements.—R.]

ἐν μέτρῳ ἐνδὸς ἐκάστου μέρους].—This qualifies the phrase which precedes. Κατ' ἐνέργειαν, without the article on account of the following qualification (i. 19; iii. 7), defines the ἐπιχορηγία as an efficient one, while the proportion of this efficiency rests "in the measure of each several part," in the measure, which every part, the individual member of the Church in himself has from Christ. The service rendered proceeds therefore from the individual parts, from each one, so that it is not to be referred merely to the ministry, the officers of the church (HARLESS). This efficient service of the individuals is to the advantage of the whole and conditions the growth of the whole. Comp. vers. 7, 12. This part of the sentence is therefore to be closely connected with ἐπιχορηγίας, and not joined immediately with αἰζηνα ποιεῖται (MEYER), with which it is connected only through the former.*

Unto the building up of itself in love, εἰς οἰκοδομὴν ἑαυτοῦ ἐν ἀγάπῃ.—The aim is thus set forth, and as in ver. 12 it is οἰκοδομή; the self-development is here marked, since the powers of growth thereto are given from Christ. This self-edification is consummated only in love, as the life-sphere rendering it possible. "In love" therefore depends grammatically on "edifying" (BLEEK), not on "maketh increase" (MEYER).† With this so emphatic conclusion ("unto the building up of itself in love") the Apostle is brought back to his starting-point (ver. 1-3), to the bond of peace.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Christ gives official persons (ver. 11). It is not so much that Christ established certain regulations binding on the Church, as that He has bestowed on it persons, charisms for the endowment of an office, a ministry. He is the Author and Possessor of the office, not only the first, but the only one, who has never relinquished it and never will to the very end. "Christ gives the Church's ministers, the Church takes those given and sets them in the service of the Church. Accordingly the Church, or he who represents the rights and duties of the Church, never has to choose the subjects arbitrarily, but to know and recognize those endowed by Christ as those given by Him, and to place them in the ministry; hence the highest idea of the ecclesiastical directory is to examine whether those concerned are given by Christ, without prejudice however to other requisites which are matters of ecclesiastical polity." MEYER. Concerning the double aspect of the office, which is both divini and humani juris, a divine institution as well as a human, ecclesiastical arrangement, the passage does not speak more definitely. But three things are plain: 1) It is incorrect to affirm that Christ now raises up no apostolic men, no prophets nor evangelists, but only pastors and teachers. See the Exeg. Notes. He does this according to the necessity of the times. 2) It is also erroneous to find no offices at all appointed, and to be unwilling to institute any, as if it were only a human notion to establish a teaching ministry. So the Quakers (according to Barclay in GUERICKE, Christl. Symbol, p. 626) and SCHENKEL, Ephesians, p. 66, 5; the former accept only the authority of the Divine endowment of persons, the latter regards the service alone as from the Lord, but the office as a human regulation. 3) Just as little however should these official persons whom the Lord gave at the beginning and still gives to the Church, be fixed in number, as the Irvingites would do, or be stiffened into a hierarchy as among the Roman Catholics.*

2. The distinction between the official persons, involving as it does no subordination of one class to the other, since indeed the Apostle Matthew is specially designated as Evangelist, John as prophet and Evangelist, while Peter calls himself "presbyter" (1 Pet. v. 1), is altogether irrelevant as respects the teaching office: this individualizes itself in the other offices. Subordination exists only as respects Christ who gives them. They have no reason for self-exaltation on account of their gifts or special calling, nor has the congregation any for aversion to recognize and respect them and their calling: the Lord works with His word and Spirit in them and

* [EADIE: "We are ignorant to a very great extent of the government of the primitive Church, and much that has been written upon it is but surmise and conjecture. The Church represented in the Acts was only in process of development, and there seem to have been differences of organization in various Christian communities, as may be seen by comparing the portion of the Epistle before us with allusions in the three letters to Rome, Corinth and Philippi. Offices seem to be mentioned in one which are not referred to in others. It would appear, in fine, that this last office of government and instruction was distinct in two elements from those previously enumerated; inasmuch as it was the special privilege of each Christian community—not a ministerium regum, and was designed also to be a perpetual institute in the Church of Christ. The Apostle says nothing of the modes of human appointment or ordination to these various offices. He descends not to law, order or form, but his great thought is, that though the ascended Lord gave such gifts to men, yet their variety and number interfere not with the unity of the Church." As this Epistle has for its fundamental thought, "the Church which is in Christ Jesus," it is remarkable how the Apostle in it scarcely touches upon those points, which seem to fill the minds of many who profess to hold an exalted estimate of the Church: Nothing about the ministry constituting the Church, though enough to show the necessity for the ministry; nothing about the Church maintaining the succession through fixed forms, but a good deal about Christ's giving real pastors and teachers (the Church sometimes fails to receive such through the most ancient order of succession); nothing about Church polity, but much about the means of her advancement toward unity of faith and knowledge, toward perfection, toward the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ.—R.]

* [It is difficult to decide the question of connection. In favor of the view taken by BRAUNE "is the position of the words, and also the congruity of the figure. It is more natural to say that the Divine influence is according to the working of every part—i. e., according to its capacity and function—than to say, 'the growth is according to the working,' etc." (HODGE). ELLICOTT and ALFORD connect it with the verb however. The "working" is the functional energy of the body, not Divine inworking, as seems to be indicated by the E. V.: "effortful working."—R.]

† [MEYER's view overlooks the verb with qualifications, "Love is just as much the element in which the edification, as that in which the growth takes place" (ALFORD).—In the hope of giving clearness to the exegesis of this verse, a summary is added: From whom (Christ) all the body (each and every member) fitly framed together (joined together) and compacted (forming one whole) grows (as if possessed of life in itself) by means of every joint (every special adaptation in gift and office) of supply (which Christ grants to these joints as means and instruments, the supply being) according to the working in the measure of each several part (Christ's vital energy is serviceable only as supplied by the means He has chosen, and He chooses to supply it as the several parts of the body exercise their functions, so that the growth is not only from Him, but symmetrical and organic also) unto (the end being) the building up of the body itself in love (as the element of edification).—R.]

through them (Acts xiii. 21; xv. 28), and this arrangement belongs to the living and animating organism of the Church, in which the life of Christ develops itself. The officers should be called neither clerics nor Geistliche, nor should the Church be divided into ecclesia representans and representata. For every Christian belongs to the κλήρος θεού, has a part in the κληρονομία (i. 11, 15), should be "geistlich," and have τὸ πνεῦμα, and the ministers as the Lord's servants must labor in and for the Church, to serve her, not to represent her, but the Lord.

3. The task of the official persons with their gifts for their special calling, over against the other members of the body of Christ with the general call, is "the perfecting of the saints," and this reaches also to "the work of the ministry," to "the edifying of the body of Christ." As certainly then as the servants of the Lord have to serve the Church and its individual members, hence not in the commission of the Church, as though this were always and everywhere the only efficient impulse, nor yet out of their own authority, so certainly should these ministers be prepared for their special service by their labors in the Church, as they have been called and installed by her. As the Lord works upon the Church, and this should permit itself to be acted upon, so she has the duty of working again according to His purpose, of leading back to Him under His guidance and the help of God, which He will grant and furnish for her welfare. The first link in the chain of congregational activity is the officers, the second is every Christian in healthy activity at his post, and thus the joyous upbuilding of the whole is advanced, which reacts on the ministers and individual members of the Church. Thus it goes from above to below, from the ministers in immediate rapport with the Lord to the individuals, the Church, the whole, and from individual to individual, and through them to the whole, and from this back again to the individuals. The lay element must be cultivated, set in motion, sustained, animated and guided. The design is to bless men, to serve the people, the people, the people, as LUTHER (1 Adv. Kirchenpostille, ed. Franke I. p. 42) preaches. In avoiding the Scylla of priestly rule, many fall into the Charybdis of congregational or lay rule.* This is of importance for all Church polity.

4. Like all pedagogy, the pedagogy of the church also should make itself superfluous and unnecessary. The utility of the ecclesiastical office is appointed to this end, and should be managed accordingly.† But this gives neither right nor occasion to undervalue at the time what will and should cease after its time. Fidelity to the Master demands that it should be left to Him, when and how He will break up the form, lest we in doing so should spill and lose its contents and substance.

5. In connection with the prospect that we all (ver. 13) shall attain unto the unity of faith and the knowledge of the Son of God, it must be remarked:

(1.) That this is not spoken of in any way (see Exeg. Notes) of the apocatastasis: "A communion of the enjoyment of salvation" (SCHNECKENBURGER) is not indicated, but the progress from the militant to the triumphant church, the development, not from unbelief to blessedness, not from eternity to God, to heirship with Him, but from faith to sight, from service according to God's will to participation in the glory of His Nature.

(2.) A uniformity of expression, of forms and formulas, is not meant, but that condition is meant which the Lord Himself foretells (John x. 16), when there shall be "one fold" and "one Shepherd," when the church of Christ is developed out of and beyond all "fermentation," is ripened, ministers and members furthering each other's advance, the individual parts and the whole in accord, and on the basis of a deeper unity the proper variety existing in glorious harmony.

It cannot be overlooked, that, although the differences, which divide, will disappear, because error attaches to them, or at least immaturity, the removal of differences cannot be anticipated, unless the church, instead of growing up unto a perfect man, should become an assembly of offensively over-prudent children. Even the distinction of sex shall be removed (Matt. xxii. 30), and that till such a point be gained the Christian ministry will be continued, but also and primarily, that the grand purpose of a continued pastorate in the church is to enable the church to gain a climax which it will certainly reach; for that climax is neither indefinite in its nature nor contingent in its futurity." On the question whether the goal plainly set before the church in ver. 13, is attainable here in this world there is great difference of opinion. That it will first be reached hereafter is held by THEODORET, CALVIN, HODGE and others, and that it is attainable here is affirmed by CHRYSOSTOM, THEOPHYLACT, JEROME, LUTHER, DE WETTE, MEYER, STIER, SCHENKEL. That now is mentioned does little to decide the matter, nor is there anything to indicate that the distinction of here and hereafter, entered into the Apostle's mind. He regards the church as one, speaks of the goal set before her on the earth, not stating whether it is to be attained on earth (So HARLESS, OLSHAUSEN, EADIE, ELLICOTT). Besides eschatological views do much to give indefiniteness to the terms "here and hereafter" in our use of them. "In such sketches the Apostle holds up an ideal which, by the aim and labor of the Christian pastorate, is partially realized on earth, and ought to be more vividly manifested; but which will be fully developed in heaven, when, the effect being secured, the instrumentality may be dispensed with" (EADIE). That effect has not yet been secured, that instrumentality may not yet be dispensed with: yet those who are tossed as waves, who are carried about by every wind of doctrine, who according to the Apostle show most clearly the present necessity for the ministerial office, are readiest to cry out that it is useless. Would that the church needed ministers less! Then they might go out into the world more frequently to win souls for Christ! Paul here certainly does not prophesy of that "church of the future," in which there shall be neither pastor nor teacher, because each member is able to take care of himself, and there is nothing to be held up to "faith." That "Church" in the view of those who proclaim its coming, will be based on "knowledge;" but it will be γνώσις not ἐπιγνώσις, perception of some fragments of truth, not the grasping and knowing with "faith and knowledge" all Truth, in the Person "of the Son of God."—R.]

* [All questions of Church polity assume an entirely different aspect, when viewed in the light of the voluntary principle, which totally deprives the State of any control in the internal affairs of the Church. There can be no question that the Erastianism prevalent in Germany has done as much to hinder the development of the lay element in Church work in that country, as the opposite principle has to further that development in America. But the latter state of things has its dangers, e.g., incapable Sunday School superintendents and teachers, elders or deacons or church wardens or whatever they may be called, who, while contributing little to the spiritual advancement of the Church, take advantage of their office, or of the influence of their purse in the annual estimates, to control and annoy him whom God gave to be "pastor and teacher."—R.]

† [EADIE: "The meaning (ver. 13) is, that not only is there a blessed point in spiritual advancement set before the church, as that of corporeality in general; but that is no reason why we should treat the body as a prison of the soul, and desire to be without sex, before we enter the company of the angels. Let each one be faithful to his own church and to his Lord! Beyond Christ we cannot go, without Him or against Him there is no progress.

6. He who allows himself to be determined by external influences, is still immature, is as yet no man, independent, firm and clear, unless these influences come from the source of truth and life, from Christ: from Him and to Him our life comes and goes. Influences of an unchristian character are brought by the spirit of this world into every age, and many a one may unconsciously serve this spirit against the truth; as in the history of the world there is presented a plan of God, so in these there is a method which points beyond them into the kingdom of darkness and lies.

7. Truth and Love, which belong together, since the former has an ethical character, and the latter is not blind, are the fundamental elements of growth, requiring Christ as the aim and spring of our life, the gifts of Christ and the acceptance on the part of the church, her receptivity and self-activity, the reciprocity of the whole and each individual member. By this we may judge the wrong and error of the separate divisions and generations of the church. The Catholics do not let Christ work as a fresh streaming fountain, nor rightly value the life of the members of the church, but put the apostolic power of the Pope with his hierarchy in the front and centre; they undervalue the Head and members and overvalue the ministers of the church, who become masters. The Lutherans have hampered the lay element, and suffer the consequences of the abridgement: the fellowship of the church is too little developed. The Reformed are wanting in the sacramental element; they foster what is individual and social, rather than that which is formative and established, as the sects proceeding from them plainly show.—By this passage every position and every age regulate itself.

Take heed, pastor, that thou not only hast an office and ministry shown to thee, which thou administertest, but that thou art and becomest more and more thyself a gift of Christ to His church.—Rejoice, O church, that the servants of Christ are Christ's gifts for thee and use them according to His will against thy lust and errors.—Thou shouldst not say, that Christ raised up Apostles, prophets, evangelists, only in the first century and never since; nor deny that He raises up the pastors and teachers of His church.—All ministry, even the most important minister is in vain, if he does not labor further into the house and the bye-ways, so that each in his place may do his duty as a Christian; but if the spiritual teachers do their duty, the church will not remain unspiritual.—Do not reckon according to visible results; concealed and gradual is the progress of the work, reaching its mark at last and in glory. But do not think hastily and proudly, now is the time of maturity! You may in the end mistake the impulse of the spirit of the age for the showers of Christ's Spirit and the Shibboleth of party-spirit for the word of life, and this deception would be fearful.—No one is so much a minor as to be without responsibility and strength to resist; have regard to this, proving all things by the truthfulness in love, by Christ, the End and Source of all growth! Preach the word simply and purely! Certainly, but not less: love it in the same way. Love does not, indeed, work by means of injustice, untruth, deception, counterfeiting, intrigue, misrepresentation and pretence. But she creates fellowship, and truth is the cause, not of the isolated individual, but of the fellowship of heaven and earth, of the nations, of the earth, and of centuries, age of thousands of years.

STARKS: For as rogues so manage dice that they must fall according to their wish, so do schismatics and fanatics act with the sacred Scriptures.—Truth and love must be side by side. True teaching and lovely living. That is the sum of all Christianity. Love and unity edify.

RIEGER: The goal of our growth is a long distance before us, the hindrances are many; but growth is the most certain way thither. For as little as in physical growth is advance made all at once with immoderate rapidity, but as in the use of the ordained means, with proper labor and exercise, in confidence on God and His bestowed blessing, in love and peace with one another, the body grows, not one member only, but one just as another, so we, through God's word, prayer, embracing all the means afforded us in the church, the school and the home, reach the position of men of God furnished for every good work.

HEUBNER: Christ's kingdom embraces even the invisible kingdom of God. Would this be conceivable, if He were a mere man?—The variety of offices should not lead to ambition and place-hunting, but to the service of the church.—The stature of manhood in a Christian consists in this, that he, irrespective of men has spiritual majority and independence. Teachers should not wish to keep the congregation in a state of immaturity, but their task is to render themselves unnecessary.—It is the duty of the Christian to strive after this maturity.—Humanity is capable of an ever-increasing perfection by means of Christianity. Progress in Christianity is, however, no advance beyond Christianity.—The Christian is firm in his faith and free from the miserable dependence on foreign and worldly opinion.—How much is still wanting in the mutual support of all in the Christian church. All should be for the furtherance of the Christian life: for example, the household life should be a school of Christianity, the State should further the church, and the schools of learning educate for Christianity, all arts and sciences should subserve religion.—It is child's play, even when not detrimental, to speculate how far this figure of the body can be carried out into detail, who, for example, is eye, ear, breast, back, etc. This can lead to results of as revolting a character, as the Hindoo system of caste.

PASSAVANT: One class, as well as another, is chosen to their particular service by the Master of the church; and He who on earth was in the form of a servant, will regard the more lowly of His servants with special looks of love. He sees the heart, and fidelity in what is little is precious in His sight.—To seek truth always and everywhere, in all things and among all persons; to act in truth with all, towards all, with one's self and before God; to base one's inmost thoughts and impulses always in and on the truth—this keeps the heart, amid all the lies, lusts and illusions of this false world, firm and quiet, as the ship that has escaped the waves and cast anchor in the harbor.—All genuine truth and love come alone from Christ upon us and into us, leading us back again to Christ.

GERLACH: In every false teaching which separates men from Christ and His word, the Apostles show us also a work of wickedness. Human nature was not created by God so perverse as to choose without the fault of man, a lie instead of the truth.

ZELLER: These are the instruments by which the Lord has chosen to build His Church, not Popes, not Emperors and kings, not princes and great ones, the mighty monarchs of this world, but Apostles, Evangelists, pastors and teachers, men illuminated by His spirit, endued with power from on high, not merely by men, but given and appointed by Himself. It is to take place through the peaceful means of preaching, pastoral care, instruction.

[EADIE: Ver. 12. The spiritual advancement of the Church, is the ultimate design of the Christian pastorate. The ministry preaches and rules to secure this, which is at the same time the purpose of Him who appointed and who blesses it.—Ver. 13. Christians are all to attain to oneness of faith, that is, all of them shall be filled with the same ennobling and vivifying confidence in this Divine Redeemer—not some leaning more to His humanity, and others showing an equally partial and defective preference for His Divinity—not some regarding Him rather as an instructor and example, and others drawn to Him more as an atonement—not some fixing an exclusive gaze on Christ without them, and others cherishing an intense and one-sided aspiration for Christ within them—but all reposing a united confidence in Him—"the Son of God."—The Christian church is not full grown, but it
